First Library 3 with Sanggath Ad O of See 9, 1103 Paper to I November 16-3, and January 1903 Nov Fibrary to Edwar Mountly Party Josephany

TO THE

)RS OF THE MONTROSE BURGHS

I BEG LEAVE TO

INSCRIBE THIS BOOK

Y GRATEFUL RECOGNITION

, or

JONFIDENCE AND FRIENDSHIP

WITH WHICH

THEY HAVE HONOURED ME

NOTE

THE material on which this biography is founded consists mainly, of course, of the papers collected at Hawarden. Besides that vast accumulation, I have been favoured with several thousands of other pieces from the legion of Mr. Gladstone's correspondents. Between two and three hundred thousand written papers of one sort or another must have passed under my view. To some important journals and papers from other sources I have enjoyed free access, and my warm thanks are due to those who have generously lent me this valuable aid. I am especially indebted to the King for the liberality with which his Majesty has been graciously pleased to sanction the use of certain documents, in cases where the permission of the Sovereign was required.

When I submitted an application for the same purpose to Queen Victoria, in readily promising her favourable consideration, the Queen added a message strongly impressing on me that the work I was about to undertake should not be handled in the narrow way of party. This injunction represents my own clear view of the spirit in which the history of a career so memorable as Mr. Gladstone's should be composed. That, to be sure, is not at all inconsistent with our regarding party feeling in its honourable sense, as entirely the reverse of an infirmity.

vi Note

The diaries from which I have often quoted consist of forty little books in double columns, intended to do little more than record persons seen, or books lead, or letters written as the days passed by. From these diaries come several of the mottees prefixed to our chapters; such mottees are marked by an asterisk.

The trustees and other members of Mr. Gladstone's family have extended to me a uniform kindness and consideration and an absolutely unstituted confidence, for which I can never cease to owe them my heartiest acknowledgment. They left with the writer an unqualified and undivided responsibility for these pages, and for the use of the material that they entrusted to him. Whatever may prove to be amiss, whether in leaving out or putting in or putting wrong, the blume is wholly mine.

CONTENTS

2007 1

	* 60 · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·
			₹ 1 ×
	$ 4 7 7 6 19 4 18 18 18 18 18 18 18 18 18 18 18 18 18		ţ
1 .	នាល់ខេត្តពីសិទ្ធិសាសនិស	*	*
17.	Eliter Commence of the Commenc		* ' ¢
$1$.	######################################	,	4 - 1 J. J.
	49-72-3-7-
ř.,	STATE TO THE SEASON SEASON AND SE	-	٠. ٤٠
di a	. चतुरको । केविकार अस्तराहर सार्वेद करायर अस्तराहर अस्तराहर अस्तराहर अस्तराहर अस्तराहर अस्तराहर अस्तराहर अस्तर		1 1 4
* * * * .	Paul Galit Gerard america to Base at		$ + 1 £
15.	1 $20°C (4.88% 10) (4.10)	•	4 ** **
	THE MESSIVE FRANCE.	•
17.1	$195 $ $16 $ $ 10 COS$ 15 $ 10 S		* :· #
÷ 24.	ANTERIO DE AND ANTER CONTOCA CONTENTA CARE		439
11:11.	$ 2.5 C (3) 45 2.00 N 325 NC
18.	35.44.3515.35.55		2731
	- Marthart Baret (1975) - San		8 4 4 6 A
* * * *	· 艾克斯· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	٠	[14]
	1:12 1 5: 1 5 1
	editorial for
à.	779078450 5-50 4-X519054		81 CAM
	TO AND A REPORT OF THE POST OF		*****
	· 在各种的 "在这个时间的这种是不是一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一个一	•	350
	PARTORN AND SEED IN PRINCES AND ARREST ARREST AND ARREST ARREST AND ARREST ARREST AND ARREST		200
	GORDELATE ACCORDING TO THE REPORT OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPE	, h' A But No.
	BULLIONS TOUNDES -PULLIN DEFENDING	•
	END OF PROTECTION		425
	BHOK[IV] = 8
	(1830-1839)
I.	THE COALITION	. ,	113
H.	THE TRIUMPH OF 1853		157

CHAIL	7 %	FACE
111	THE CPIMPAN WAP	476
11	ONFORD PEFORN-OPEN CIVIL SEPVICE	496
7	WAP FINANCE-TAX OR LOAN	513
1.1	CRISIS OF 1850 AND BREAK UP OF THE PEELITES	521
111	POLITICAL ISOLATION	514
ИII	GENERAL ELECTION-NEW MARPIACE LAW	558
17	THE SECOND DEEBY GOVERNMENT	574
- 1	THI IONIAN ISLANDS	594
11	JUNCTION WITH THE LIBERALS	621
	BOOK F (18 9 1565)
ī	THE ITALIAN I EVOLUTION	635
11		652
	BATTLE FOI FCONOM	676
11		685
-	AMERICAN CIVII WAI	703
	DEATH OF TRIPADS—DAYS AT LALMORAL	721
	O I IB II DI-DENMAI K	741
	ADVINCE IN PUBLIC TOSITION AND OTHERWISE	755
17
	—I ALLI (MENTAP) LEADEPSHIP	772
1	MATTER FOCILSIASTICAL	792
-	IOPULAR ESTIMATES	501
	1)TTI 9	814
	PEFORM	832
111		Q r G
	OFFINE OF THE HISH CAMPAICA	871
	I FIME MINISTEP	853
	100K 11
	(18- 15-1)
	RELICIOUS FOLALITY	591
	FIRST CHAITED OF AN ACRAIGN DEVOLUTION	915
	FDUCATION -THE CAPTEL AND THE TALENTS	433
	THE H INCOCKLINES WILL	950
	SECTRALITY IND ASSESSMENT	272
	THE I LACK SIX	943
	DAYS VOLK OF A CIANT	937
VIII	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •	1011

Book R

1809-1831

INTRODUCTORY

I AM well aware that to try to write Mr. Gladstone's life at all -the life of a man who held an imposing place in many high national transactions, whose character and career may be regarded in such various lights, whose interests were so manifold, and whose years bridged so long a span of timeis a stroke of temerity. To try to write his life to-day, is to push temerity still further. The ashes of controversy, in which he was much concerned, are still hot; perspective, scale, relation, must all while we stand so near be difficult to adjust. Not all particulars, more especially of the latest marches in his wide campaign, can be disclosed without risk of unjust pain to persons now alive. Yet to defer the task for thirty or forty years has plain drawbacks too. Interest grows less vivid; truth becomes harder to find out; memories pale and colour fades. And if in one sense a statesman's, contemporaries, even after death has abated the storm and temper of faction, can scarcely judge him, yet in another sense they who breathe the same air as he breathed, who know at close quarters the problems that faced him, the materials with which he had to work, the limitations of his time—such must be the best, if not the only true memorialists and recorders.

Every reader will perceive that perhaps the sharpest of all the many difficulties of my task has been to draw the line between history and biography—between the fortunes of the eommunity and the exploits, thoughts, and purposes of the individual who had so marked a share in them. In the ease of m of letters, in whose lives our literature is admirably rich, this difficulty happily for their authors and for our delight does not arise. But where the subject is a man who was four times at the head of the government-ne phantom,

Δ

but dietator-and who held this office of first minister for a longer time than any other statesman in the reign of the Queen, how can we tell the story of his works and days without reference, and ample reference to the course of events over whose unrolling he presided, and out of which he made history? It is true that what interests the world in Mr Gladstone is even more what he was, than what he did, his brilliancy, charin and power, the endless surprises, his dualism or more than dunlism, his vierssitudes of opinion, his subtleties of mental progress, his strange umon of qualities nover elsowhere found together, his striking unlikeness to other men in whom great and free nations have for long periods placed their trust. I am not sure that the meessant soarch for clues through this labyrinth would not end in analysis and disquisition, that night be no great improvement oven upon political history. Mr Gladstone said of reconstruction of the meeme tax that he only did not call the task hereulean because Hercules could not have done it Assuredly, I min not presumptuous enough to suppose that this difficulty of fixing the precise scale between history and biography has been successfully overcome by me It may be that Hercules himself vould have succeeded little liciter

Some may think in this connection that I have made the prepondorance of politics excessive in the story of a genius of signal versatility, to whom politics were only one interest among many No doubt speeches delates lills divisions motions and manageres of party, like the manna that fed the children of Israel in the vilderness lose their sayour and power of nutriment on the second day. Yet after all it was to his thoughts his purposes his ideals his performances as statesman in all the widest significance of that lofty and honourable designation that Mr Gladstone ower the lasting salistance of his fime. His life was ever 'areatly alardal' he said 'in working the institution s of his country'. Here we mark a signal trust. Not fer two centuries wiree the lustoric strife of anglican and puritan had i it is and I mduced a ruler in who is the religious motive was para ne in In the like degree. He was not only a point al fine but a moral force. He strove to use all the powers of his own genius and the powers of the state for moral purposes and religious. Nevertheless his mission in all its forms was action. He had none of that detachment, often found among superior minds, which we honour for its disinterestedness, even while we lament its impotence in result. The track in which he moved, the instruments that he employed, were the track and the instruments, the sword and the trowel, of political action; and what is called the Gladstonian era was distinctively a political era.

On this I will permit myself a few words more. detailed history of Mr. Gladstone as theologian and churchman will not be found in these pages, and nobody is more sensible than their writer of the gap. Mr. Gladstone cared as much for the church as he cared for the state; he thought of the church as the soul of the state; he believed the attainment by the magistrate of the ends of government to depend upon religion; and he was sure that the strength of a state corresponds to the religious strength and soundness of the community of which the state is the civil organ. should have been wholly wanting in biographical fidelity, not to make this clear and superabundantly clear. Still a writer inside Mr. Gladstone's church and in full and active sympathy with him on this side of mundane and supramundane things, would undoubtedly have treated the subject differently from any writer outside. No amount of candour or good faith—and in these essentials I believe that I have not fallen short—can be a substitute for the confidence and ardour of an adherent, in the heart of those to whom the church stands first. Here is one of the difficulties of this complex case. Yet here, too, there may be some trace of compensa-If the reader has been drawn into the whirlpools of the political Charybdis, he might not even in far worthier hands than mine have escaped the rocky headlands of the ecclesiastic Scylla. For churches also have their parties.

Lord Salisbury, the distinguished man who followed Mr. Gladstone in a longer tenure of power than his, called him 'a great Christian'; and nothing could be more true or better worth saying. He not only accepted the doctrines of that faith as he believed them to be held by his own communion; ho sedulously strove to apply the noblest moralities of it to the affairs both of his own nation and of the commonwealth It was a supreme experiment. People will perhaps some day wonder that many of those who derided the experiment and reproached its author, failed to see that they were making manifest in this a wholesale sceptieism as to truths that they professed to prize, far deeper and more destructive than the doubts and disbeliefs of the gentiles in the outer courts The epoch, as the reader knows, was what Mr. Gladstone called 'an agitated and expectant age.' Some stages of his career mark stages of the first importance in the history of English party, on which so much in the working of our constitution hangs. His name is associated with a record of arduous and fruitful legislative work and administrative improvement, equalled by none of the great men who have grasped the holm of the British state. The intensity of his mind, and the leugth of years through which he held presiding office, enabled him to impress for good in all the dopartments of government his own severo standard of public duty and personal exactitude. He was the chief force, propelling, restraining, guiding his country at many decisivo moments. Then how many surprises and what seeming paradox. Devotedly attached to the church, he was the agent in the overthrow of establishment in one of the three kingdoms, and in an attempt to overthrow it in the Principality. Entering public life with vehement aversion to the recent dislodgment of the landed aristograpy as the mainspring of parliamentary power, he lout himself to two further enormously extensive changes in the constitutional centre of gravity. With a lifelong belief in parliamentary deliberation as the grand scenrity for judicious laws and national control over executive act, he yet at a certain stage betook himself with magical result to direct and individual appeal to tho great masses of his countrymen, and the world boheld tho astonishing spectaclo of a politician with the microscopic subtlety of a thirteenth contury schoolman wielding at will the new democracy in what has been called the country of plain men.' A firm and trained economist, and no friend to socialism, yet by his legislation upon land in 1870 and 1881 he wrote the opening chapter in a volume on which many an unexpected page in the history of Property is destined to be inscribed. Statesmen do far less than they suppose, far less than is implied in their resounding fame, to augment the material prosperity of nations, but in this province Mr. Gladstone's name stands at the topmost height. Yet no ruler that ever lived felt more deeply the truth—for which I know no better words than Channing's—that to improve man's outward condition is not to improve man himself; this must come from each man's endeavour within his own breast; without that there can be little ground for social hope. Well was it said to him, 'You have so lived and wrought that you have kept the soul alive in England.' Not in England only was this felt. He was sometimes charged with lowering the sentiment, the lofty and fortifying sentiment, of national pride. At least it is a ground for national pride that he, the son of English training, practised through long years in the habit and tradition of English public life, standing for long years foremost in accepted authority and renown before the eye of England, so conquered imagination and attachment in other lands, that when the end came it was thought no extravagance for one not an Englishman to say, 'On the day that Mr. Gladstone died, the world has lost its greatest citizen.' The reader who revolves all this will know why I began by speaking of temerity.

INTRODUCTORY

That my book should be a biography without trace of bias, no reader will expect. There is at least no bias against the truth; but indifferent neutrality in a work produced, as this is, in the spirit of loyal and affectionate remembrance, would be distasteful, discordant, and impossible. I should be heartily sorry if there were no signs of partiality and no evidence of prepossession. On the other hand there is, I trust, no importunate advocacy or tedious assentation. He was great man enough to stand in need of neither. Still less has it been needed, in order to exalt him, to disparage others with whom he came into strong collision. His own funeral orations from time to time on some who were in one degree or another his antagonists, prove that this petty and ungenerous method would have been to him of all men most repugnant. Then to pretend that for sixty years, with all 'the varying weather of the mind,' he traversed in every zone the restless ocean of a great nation's shifting and complex polities, without many a faulty tack and many a wrong reckening, would indeed he idle. No such claim is set up by rational men for Pym, Cromwell, Walpole, Washington, or either Pitt. It is not set up for any of the three contemporaries of Mr. Gladstone whose names live with the three most information transactions of his ago—Cavour, Lincoln, Bismarck. To suppose, again, that in every one of the many subjects touched by him, besides exhibiting the range of his powers and the diversity of his interests, he made abiding contributions to thought and knowledge, is to ignore the jealous conditions under which such contributions come. To say so much as this is to make but a small deduction from the total of a grand account.

I have not reproduced the full text of Letters in the proportion customary in English biography. The existing mass of his letters is enormous. But then an enormous proportion of them touch on affairs of public husiness, on which thoy shed little new light. Even when he writes in his kindest and most cordial voin to friends to whom he is most warmly attached, it is usually a letter of business. He deals freely and genially with the points in hand, and then without play of gossip, salutation, or compliment, he passes on his way. Ho has in his letters little of that spirit in which his talk often abounded, of disengagement, pleasant colloquy, happy raillery, and all the other undefined things that make the correspondence of so many men whose husiness was literature, such delightful reading for the idler hour of an industrious day. It is perhaps worth adding that tho asterisks denoting an omitted passago hide no piquant hit, no personality, no indiscretion; the omission is in every case due to consideration of space. Without these asterisks and other omissions, nothing would have been easier than to expand these three volumes into a hundred. I think nothing relevant is lost. Nobody over had fower secrets, nobody ever lived and wrought in fuller sunlight.

CHAPTER I

CHILDHOOD

(1809 - 1821)

I know not why commerce in England should not have its old families, rejoicing to be connected with commerce from generation to generation. It has been so in other countries; I trust it will be so in this country.—Gladstone.

THE dawn of the life of the great and famous man who is our subject in these memoirs has been depicted with homely simplicity by his own hand. With this fragment of a record it is perhaps best for me to begin our journey. 'I was born,' he says, 'on December 29, 1809,' at 62 Rodney Street, Liverpool. 'I was baptized, I believe, in the parish church of St. Peter. My godmother was my elder sister Anne, then just seven years old, who died a perfect saint in the beginning of the year 1829. In her later years she lived in close relations with me, and I must have been much worse but for her. Of my godfathers, one was a Scotch episcopalian, Mr. Fraser of —, whom I hardly ever saw or heard of; the other a presbyterian, Mr. G. Grant, a junior partner of my father's.' The child was named William Ewart, after his father's friend, an immigrant Scot and a merchant like himself, and father of a younger William Ewart, who became member for Liverpool, and did good public service in parliament.

Before proceeding to the period of my childhood, properly so-called, I will here insert a few words about my family. My maternal grandfather was known as Provost Robertson of Dingwall, a man held, I believe, in the highest respect. His wife was a Mackenzie of [Coul]. His circumstances must have been good

Of his three sons, one went into the army, and I recollect him as Captain Robertson (I have a seal which he gave me, a three sided cairngorm. Cost him 7½ guineas). The other two took mercantile positions. When my parents made a Scotch tour in 1820 21 with, I think, their four sons, the freedom of Dingwall was presented to us all, with my father, and there was large visiting at the houses of the Ross shire gentry. I think the line of my grandmother was stoutly episcopalium and Jacohite hiit, coming outside the western highlands, the first at least was soon rubbed down. The provost, I think, came from a younger hand of the Robertsons of Struan.

On my father's side the matter is more complex. The history of the family has been traced at the desire of my eldest brother and my own, hy Sir William Friser, the highest living authority 2 He has carried us up to a rather remote period, I think before Physheth, but has not yet been able to connect us with the earliest known holders of the name, which with the aid of charter chests he hopes to do Somo things are plain and not without interest They were a race of horderers There is still an old Gledstanes or Gladstone castle. They formed a family in Sweden in tho seventeenth century The explanation of this may have been that, when the umon of the crowns led to the extinction of horder fighting they took service like Sir Dugald Dalgetty under Gustavus Adolphus, and in this caso passed from service to settlement. I have never beard of them in Scotland until after the Restoration otherwise than as persons of family. At that period there are trices of their having been fined by public authority, but not for any ordinary criminal offence From this time forward I find no trace of their centility. During the eighteenth century they are. I think, principally traced by a line of multsters (no doubt a small lusiness then) in Lanarkshire Their names are recorded on tombstones in the churchyard of Biggar I remember going as a child or box to see the representative of that I rauch, either in 1820 or some years earlier, who was a small watchmaker in that town He was of the same generation as my father but came. I understood, from a semior brother of the family. I do not know whether his line is extinct. There also seem to be some stray Gladstones who are found at Yarmouth and in Yorkshire.¹

The freed in was f smally be $5 x William Fraser ded in stowed on lim in 1853

My father's father seems from his letters to have been an excellent man and a wise parent: his wife a woman of energy. There are pictures of them at Fasque, by Raeburn. He was a merchant, in Scotch phrase; that is to say, a shopkeeper dealing in corn and stores, and my father as a lad served in his shop. But he also sent a ship or ships to the Baltic; and I believe that my father, whose energy soon began to outtop that of all the very large family, went in one of these ships at a very early age as a supercargo, an appointment then, I think, common. But he soon quitted a nest too small to hold him. He was born in December 1764: and I have (at Hawarden) a reprint of the Liverpool Directory for 178—, in which his name appears as a partner in the firm of Messrs. Corrie, corn merchants.

Here his force soon began to be felt as a prominent and then a foremost member of the community. A liberal in the early period of the century, he drew to Mr. Canning, and brought that statesman as candidate to Liverpool in 1812, by personally offering to guarantee his expenses at a time when, though prosperous, he could hardly have been a rich man. His services to the town were

1 Researches into the ancestry of the Gladstone family have been made by Sir William Fraser, Professor John Veitch, and Mrs. Oliver of Thornwood. Besides his special investigation of the genealogy of the family, Sir W. Fraser devoted some pages in the Douglas Book to the Gledstanes of Gledstanes. The surname of Gledstanes occurs at a very early period in the records of Scotland. Families of that name acquired considerable landed estates in the counties of Lanark, Peebles, Roxburgh, and Dumfries. The old eastle of Gledstanes, now in ruins, was the principal mansion of the family. The first of the name who has been found on record is Herbert de Gledstanes, who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296 for lands in the county of Lanark. The Gledstanes long held the office of bailie under the Earls of Douglas, and the connection between the two families seems to have lasted until the fall of the Douglas family. The Gledstanes still continued to figure for many generations on the border. About the middle of the eighteenth century two branches of the family—the Gledstanes of Coeklaw and of Craigs-failed in the direct male line. Mr. Gladstone was descended from a third branch, the Gledstanes of Arthurshiel in Lanark-The first of this line who has shire. been traced is William Gledstanes, who in the year 1551 was laird of Arthurshiel. His lineal descendants eontinued as owners of that property till William Gledstanes disposed of it and went to live in the town of Biggar about the year 1679. This William Gledstanes was Mr. Gladstone's great-great-grandfather. The connection between these three branches and Herbert de Gledstanes of 1296 has not been ascertained, but he was probably the common ancestor of them all.

testified by gifts of plate, now in the possession of the elder lines of his descendants, and by a remarkable subscription of six thousand pounds ruised to enable him to contest the borough of Lancaster, for which be sat in the parliament of 1818

At his demise, in December 1851, the value of his estate was, I think, near £600,000. My father was a successful merchant, but considering his long life and means of accumulation, the result represents a success secondary in comparison with that of others whom in native talent and energy he much surpassed. It was a large and strong nature, simple though hasty, profoundly affectionate and capable of the highest devotion in the lines of duty and of love. I think that his intellect was a lattle intemperate, though not his character. In his old age, spent mainly in retire ment, he was our constant [centre of] social and domestic life My mother, a beautiful and admirable woman, failed in health and left him a widower in 1835, when she was 62

He then turns to the records of his own childhood, a period that he regarded as closing in September 1821, when he was sent to Eton. He begins with one or two juvenile performances in no way differing from those of any other infant—navita projectus humi the mariner flung by force of the waves naked and helpless ashore. He believes that he was strong and healthy, and eams well through his childish alliments

My next recollection belongs to the period of Mr Canning's first election for Liverpool, in the month of October of the year 1812. Much entertaining went on in my father's house, where Mr Canning himself was a guest, and on a day of a great dinner I was taken down to the dining room. I was set upon one of the chairs, standing, and directed to say to the company 'Ladies and gentlemen'

I bave, thirdly, a group of recollections which refer to Scotland Thither my father and mother took mo on a journey which they made, I think, in a post-chaise to Pdinburgh and Glasgow as its principal points. At Edinburgh our sojourn was in the Royal Hotel, Princes Street. I well remember the raitling of the windows when the easile guns were fired on some great occasion, probably the abdication of Napoleon, for the date of the journey was, I think, the spring of 1814.

In this journey the situation of Sanquhar, in a close Dumfriesshire valley, impressed itself on my recollection. I never saw Sanquhar again until in the autumn of 1863 (as I believe). As I was whirled along the Glasgow and South-Western railway I witnessed just beneath me lines of building in just such a valley, and said that must be Sanquhar, which it was. My local memory has always been good and very impressible by scenery. I seem to myself never to have forgotten a scene.

I have one other early recollection to record. It must, I think, have been in the year 1815 that my father and mother took me with them on either one or two more journeys. The objective points were Cambridge and London respectively. My father had built, under the very niggard and discouraging laws which repressed rather than encouraged the erection of new churches at that period, the church of St. Thomas at Seaforth, and he wanted a clergyman for it.1 Guided in these matters very much by the deeply religious temper of my mother, he went with her to Cambridge to obtain a recommendation of a suitable person from Mr. Simeon, whom I saw at the time.2 I remember his appearance distinctly. He was a venerable man, and although only a fellow of a college, was more ecclesiastically got up than many a dean, or even here and there, perhaps, a bishop of the present less costumed if more ritualistic period. Mr. Simeon, I believe, recommended Mr. Jones, an excellent specimen of the excellent evangelical school of those days. We went to Leicester to hear him preach in a large church, and his text was 'Grow in grace.' He became eventually archdeacon of Liverpool, and died in great honour a few years ago at much past 90. the strength of this visit to Cambridge I lately boasted, there, even during the lifetime of the aged Provost Okes, that I had been in the university before any one of them.

I think it was at this time that in London we were domiciled in

¹ John Gladstone built St. Thomas's Church, Seaforth, 1814-15; St. Andrew's, Liverpool, about 1816; the church at Leith; the Episcopal chapel at Fasque built and endowed about 1847.

² Charles Simeon (1759-1836) who played as conspicuous a part in low church thought as Newman afterwards in high.

Russell Square, in the house of a brother of my mother, Mr Colin Robertson, and I was rexed and put about hy heing forbidden to run freely at my own will into und about the streets, as I had done in Liverpool. But the main event was this we went to a great service of public thanksgiving at Saint Pauls, and sat in a small gallery annexed to the choir, just over the place where was the Regent, and looking down upon him from hehind. I recollect nothing more of the service, nor was I ever present at any public thanksgiving after this in Saint Pauls, until the service held in that cathedral, under my advice as the prime minister, after the highly dangerous illness of the Prince of Wales

Before quitting the subject of early recollections I must name one which involves another person of some note. My mother took me in 181- to Barloy Wood Cottage, near Bristol Here lived Miss Hannah More, with some of her coeral sisters I am sure they loved my mother, who was love worthy indeed. And I cannot help here deviating for a moment into the later portion of the story to record that in 1833 I had the honour of hreak fasting with Mr Wilherforce a few days before his death,1 and when I entered the bouse, immediately after the salutation, he said to me in his silvery tones, 'How is your sweet mother? He had been a guest in my fathers house some twelve years before During the afternoon visit at Barles Wood, Miss Hannah Moro took me aside and presented to mo It was a copy of her Sacred Dramas, and it now remains in my possession, with my name written in it by her She very graciously accompanied it with a little speech, of which I cannot recollect the conclusion (or apodosis), but it began, 'As you have just come into the world, and I am just going out of it. I therefore, etc.

I wish that in reviewing my childhood I could regard it as presenting those features of innocence and beauty which I have often seen elsewhere, and indeed, thanks be to God, within the limits of my own home. The lest I can say for it is that I do not think it was a vicious childhood. I do not think, trying to look at the past impartially that I had a strong natural propensity then developed to what are termed the mortal sins. But truth obliges me to record this against myself. I have no recollection of being a loving or a winning child; or an earnest or diligent or knowledge-loving child. God forgive me. And what pains and shames me most of all is to remember that at most and at best I was, like the sailor in Juvenal, digitis a morte remotus, Quatuor aut septem ; ¹

the plank between mc and all the sins was so very thin. I do not indeed intend in these notes to give a history of the inner life, which I think has been with me extraordinarily dubious, vacillating, and above all complex. I reserve them, perhaps, for a more private and personal document; and I may in this way relieve myself from some at least of the risks of falling into an odious Pharisaism. I cannot in truth have been an interesting child, and the only presumption the other way which I can gather from my review is that there was probably something in me worth the seeing, or my father and mother would not so much have singled me out to be taken with them on their journeys.

I was not a devotional child. I have no recollection of early love for the House of God and for divine service: though after my father built the ehurch at Seaforth in 1815, I remember cherishing a hope that he would bequeath it to me, and that I might live in it. I have a very early recollection of hearing preaching in St. George's, Liverpool, but it is this: that I turned quickly to my mother and said, 'When will he have done?' The Pilgrim's Progress undoubtedly took a great and fascinating hold upon me, so that anything which I wrote was insensibly moulded in its style; but it was by the force of the allegory addressing itself to the fancy, and was very like a strong impression received from the Arabian Nights, and from another work ealled Tales of the I think it was about the same time that Miss Porter's Scottish Chiefs, and especially the life and death of Wallace, used to make me weep profusely. This would be when I was about ten years old. At a much earlier period, say six or seven, I remember praying earnestly, but it was for no higher object than to be. spared from the loss of a tooth. Here, however, it may be mentioned in mitigation that the local dentist of those days, in our case a certain Dr P of — Street, Liverpool, was a land of savage at his work (possibly a very good natured man too), with no deas except to smash and erash. My religious recollections, then, are a sad blank. Meither was I a popular boy, though not egregiously otherwise. If I was not a had boy, I think that I was a boy with a great absence of goodness. I was a child of slow, in some points I think of singularly slow, development. There was more in me perhaps than in the average boy, but it required greatly more time to set itself in order and just so in adult, and in middle and later life, I acquired very tardily any know ledge of the world, and that simultaneous conspectus of the relations of persons and things which is necessary for the proper performance of duties in the world.

1 wer 50 (Demond from dooth by four or maybe seven fingers' breadth?

I may mention another matter in extenuation I received, unless my memory deceives me very little hencht from teaching My father was too much occupied my mother's health was broken We the four brothers, had no quarrelling among ourselves but neither can I recollect any influence flowing down at this time upon me, the junior One odd incident seems to show that I was meek, which I should not have supposed, not less than thrifty and penurious, a leaning which lay deep, I think, in my nature, and which has required effort and battle to control it It was this By some process not easy to explain I had, when I was probaily seven or eight, and my elder brothers from ten or eleven to four teen or thereabouts, accumulated no less than twenty shillings m silver My brothers judged it right to appropriate this fund, and I do not recollect either annoyance or resistance or complaint But I recollect that they employed the principal part of it in the purchase of four knives, and that they broke the points from the tops of the blades of my knife, lest I should cut my fingers

Where was the official or appointed teacher all this time? He was the Rey Mr I awson of Cambridge, who had I suppose, been passed by Mr Simera and become private tutor in my father a house. But as he was to be incumbent of the church the bishop required a parsolage and that he should live in it. Out of this grew a very small school of about twelve boys, to which I went, with some senior brother or brothers remaining for a while hands, with nice and clean accompaniments. It seemed to me pleasing, and in no way repelled me, but it inside no deep im regularly on Sundays in the Sunday school built by my father near the Rinneco bridge. It was, I think, a duty done no near the Rinneco bridge. It was, I think, a duty done in under constraint, but I can recollect nothing which associates it with a seriously religious bits in myself.

11

nito lino Robertson of Dingwall. Her father was of the clan children six years later. In 1900 ho took for his second m 1732 Jane Hall, a lady of thit city who died without son Hering estiblished lumself in Freetpool he married born and John Gladstones (b Dec. 11, 1764) nas their eldest 1 Acilson of Springheld. To them sixteen children nevo modest way as corndealer, wholesalo and retail His wife was made his way from Biggar to Leich and there set up in a stones grindfather of him with whom no are concerned, from moderate lairds to small maltsters Thomas Glad their gentility surrines and appareutly they glided down Just been told during the eighteenth eentury no traces of out ou at. swobada to amend Brome straig stood blo the close of the seventeenth century we linger, in the rent counties Rozburgh, Peebles, Lanarh, and in short deeds are lost the same name is attached to estates in hings in dim ages but the links are sometimes broken, title genericate tell of recognitions of their nebibity by Scottish the southern border of Scotland The explorations of the and partish rolls in charter chests and rosal cortificates, on stance Gladstones whose name is to be found on tembstones ovorhangs the erse of the Gladstanes Gledstanes, Glad necestral origins and the ordinary traileshit of generalogy Inttle of interest ern be certainly established about his far off To these fragments no long supplement is needed

Donnschald and her mother use of hin atth Meckinsics

Munn. 5, and other highland stocks? Their son therefore t Trefrequent is analyted may are areag the papers. Let t 0 000 or two lettler $_{\rm eff}$ extended at respecting whole to Mr. Cladence 3 000 or two lettlers $_{\rm eff}$ extended at respecting whole to Mr. Cladence 3 000 or two lettlers $_{\rm eff}$ was of unmixed Scottish origins, half highland, half lowland borderer.¹ With the possible exception of Lord Mansheld—the rival of Chatham in parliament, one of the loftiest names among great judges, and chief builder of the commercial law of the English world, a man who might have been prime minister if he had chosen—Mr. Gladstone stands out as far the most conspicuous and powerful of all the public leaders in our history, who have sprung from the northern half of our island. When he had grown to be the most famous our island. When he had grown to be the most famous man in the realm of the Queen, he said, 'I am not slow to that ancient burgh. ni semit fabuel to oiler emesand himself, who, with other important reforms, had cleared away the last of Dingwall had no less distinguished and the worthy Provost Robertson appositing the rights of their country; throughout the highlands, and many of themselves in ru resbect ages, stood high for so many generations, knows them no more. The family of Inshes, in belonged to the powerful Cuthberts possess the fine estate of Inshes; while that of Castlehill, which succession until the present time, The Robertsons, in regular Hill. tinetion, changed the name to Castleson, and Easter Inshes that of the Cuthberts, who, for the sake of disbecame the property of young Robertson, his father-in-law, Wester Inshes Crown lands, possessed by Mr. Fraser of Abertarff. On the death of Paterbeth's Castlehill, now known as the being married to Cuthbert of Mac-Some time thereafter he married the second daughter of Paterson of Wester and Easter Inshes, the eldest was the theme of praise with all. and his brave and gallant conduct Robertson returned home scaithless, Poeh Lochy young ារជាខ្លាយនេះ J.L from the bloody suce meetris providential succour, gave birth to been slain, shortly afterwards, as a tradition, however, states that six-teen widows of the Erasers who had extirpated; tamily was well nigh returned to tell the tale.

The other sons and daughters of this marriage were Thomas, d. 1889; Robertson, d. 1875; John Neilson, d. 1863; Anne, d. 1829; Helen Jane, d. 1880.

to claymore, that only four of the Frasers, and ten of the Macdonalds mination, foot to foot and claymore carried on with such bloody deteronly in their shirts. The contest was stance of the combatants fighting rived its appellation from the circum-Macdonalds of Clanranald, and dewas fought between the Frasers and bearer to Lord Lovat. This battle ant of the above, acted as standardfought at the west end of Loch-Lochy in 1544, John Robertson, a descend-In the battle of Blair-na-leine, of the family of Struan, Perthahire, and was a merchant in Inverness in are known: The first was a member the north the following particulars Inshes, of whose early settlement in ancient family of the Robertsons of Dingwall was a descendant of the (March 2, year not given) has the following: —' Provost Robertson of fifteenth century. As for his maternal grandfather, the Inverness Counter on the burgess-roll as early as the berrs of his name and blood appeared Dundee (1890) he mentioned that was probably one planted out. so far north, and that the pewterer first time that he had heard of the name Mr. Gladatone replied that it was the must have been fairly well educated. -not one in twenty-so that George could sign their names at that period Very few orattsmen burgess oath. ont of behave appended to the about 25 years of age. His signature in 1656, when he would have been George joined the Haumerman Craft merks' (£16, 13z. 4d. sterling), 1698. of 'Georg Gladstaines, pewterer, 300 established in 1633, occurs the name Hospital, Aberdeen, Craftsman's

and of aronob silt guomA: 7881 mi

of him as a highlander in the eustody of a lowlander. earth, we may perhaps but a sort of oxplanation in thinking control, of Ossianic flight with a steady foothold on the solid of passion with circumspection, of pride and fire with selftraricties of temperament, his union of impulse with caution, but when we are puzzled by Mr. Cladstone's seeming coneustody of a Scotsman. It is easy to make too much of race, his singular duality of disposition, as an ardent Italian in tho An illustrious opponent once described him by way of hitting in my veins except what is derived from a Scottish ancestry.' 1 eaur boold to gorb a ton tadt sont odt ai oar gairete teat odt claim the name of Scotsman, and oven if I wore, there is nno sid no yloxisno unordT zotezeib a od bluon teallad ni were on their way to him for cargoca. To send them back number of vessels had been chartered for the enterprise, and he found a severe scarcity and enermons prices. A large unlimited confidence from Sir Claude Scott. On his arrival, ninctics ho was sent to America to purchaso corn, with pool was settled for fourteen years. Sometime in the partnership, but Gladstono's existing arrangement in Liverby his extraordinary vigour and shrewdness as to talk of a banker (not yet, however, a baronet). Scott was so impressed Lane, and here became acquainted with Sir Claude Scott, the London to enlarge his knowledge of the corn trade in Mark stones, and Bradshaw, so no dropped the s. He visited sounded awkwardly in the style of the firm, Cerrie, Gladber eent In 1757 ho thought the plural ending of his name lent him five hundred, and a friend another five at five thousand pounds being fifteen hundred, of which his father Liverpool, his contribution to the total capital of four was admitted to a partnership with two corn-merchants at Four years later, probably after a short period of service, ho business at Leith, and liero ho saved five hundred pounds. About 1783 he was made a partner by his father in the Of John Gladstone semething more remains to be said.

tra urura 1 At Dundey, Oct. 29, 1899t. seems to have taken out bettern a lat 1535 fernal the clange in an connection with the purchase of a

offered itself to him.' tand to bin if it is any kind of work in aid of others that provided for many young men in the same way. I never for them, not to assist himself, says Mr. Gladstone; 'and he He brought his brothers to Liverpool, but it was to provide his own account, with a prosperity that was never broken. years of partnership expired, Gladstone continued business on source of this kind made fortune secure, and when the fourteen ruin, did not exceed a few hundred pounds. Energy and reflour; and the loss on the venture, which might have meant with timber and other commodities, one only of them with purchases of all sorts that he could; then loaded his ships resources, he travelled south from New York, making the best taken for granted between him and his sons. He could sorts of questions with his children, and nothing was ever It was John Gladstone's habit, we are told, to discuss all

ing old man I have ever known.'1 I think (and I strive to think impartially), the most interestof character, which, crowning his other qualities, made him, found a rest, and an indescribable frankness and simplicity of affection, a keen appreciation of humour, in which he joined a corresponding warmth and, so to speak, eagerness at once and actively pursue it; and with all this energy he tolerate those who, perceiving an object to be good, did not not understand, says the illustrious one among them, nor

His eyes filled with tears as he exclaimed: "None but his osity, his nobleness, last and greatest of all—his loving nature. grandeur, the breadth and depth of his character, his generpiece, and in strains of fervid eloquence dwelling on the now, rising from his chair, standing in front of the chimneything led to his speaking of his father. I seem to see him alone with Mr. Gladstone at Carlton House Terrace someing,' writes a female relative of his, 'when I was breakfasting and affectionate devotion remained unbroken. One morn-To his father's person and memory, Mr. Gladstone's fervid schildren can know what torrents of tenderness flowed from

The successful merchant was also the active-minded his heart,",

Is from why John Gladstone mened Cammonto so from date axed tor his torage to take up the successful of India. and his own recall to poner while he was nathing for the Canning spent the days between the death of Castlereach that he learned Canningto doctrine It Scalottle House omed it era it ind insering era oneisheld inrilled limbine (in Pitts grie It ous at least of these performances tho her famous declaration that his political allegames and lumed enjuraci vien of commercial policy. At Incresol he made On extholic emmemperion ho followed Pitt, as he did in an much relation cither to social fiets or to popular principles. the political neophy ie is by no ineans free from froth without conorma splendour and a superblinding facinating to incetings section and partiamentary retorn though by Peterloo messacre and upon the topics relating to public abound in much pure tory is and his speech after the Camings rich gry repiring eloquence. In substance they years for which he served them are excellent specimens of The specelies unide to his constituents during the ten that could engrgo in the concerns of a commercial country business in England and one of the ablest practical statesmen whom he described to the constituency as the best man of elections down to 1822 when how as succeeded by Hushisson, triumph over Brougham and held the seat through four by John Gladstone to stand for Liverpool He was elected in Castlereagh as leader in the House of Commons was invited profice of the foreign office because he would not serve mider In 1912 Comming who had just refused Lord Liverpools party inside the outenchments of Eddanta to be telt as a profession of the connection of the connection of the connections of the concentration of the concentration of the procession for particles. As were need the copious chinos of 1638 and retuctes. As were need the copious of the contraction of

- over eleven, and on the eve of his departure for Eton: hundreds of surviving letters from his youngest son, then motion in 1821, and the matter figures in the earliest of the one of the unajority who by six carried Plunket's eatholic emancipation he went with Canning and Plunket. He was with ministers, and on the open question of eatholic formances in the House were not remarkable. He voted Berwick, but was unseated the year after. His few por-Liverpool contributed one-half. In 1826 he was chosen at him twelve thousand pounds, towards which his friends in boroughs of extremely easy political virtue. Lancaster cost for Lancaster in 1818, and next for Woodstock in 1820, two naturally pointed to parliament, and he was elected first honoured by the freedom of Liverpool. His ambition giver for beneficent public purposes, and in 1811 he was with a critical eye by old friends; but he was a liberal penalty of men who change their party, and was watched presbyterian also he turned churchman. He paid the

Seaforth, Mar. 10, 1821.

I address these tew lines to you to know my dear mother is, to thank you for your kind letter, and to know whether Edward may get two padlocks for the wicket and large shore gate. They are now open, and the people make a thoroughtare of the green walk and the carriage road. I read Mr. Plunket's speech, and I admire it exceedingly. I enclose a letter from Mr. Rawson to you. He told me to-day that Mrs. R. was a great deal better. Write to me again as soon as you can.—Ever your most affectionate and dutiful son,

In after years he was fond of recalling how the Liverpool with which he had been most familiar (1810-20), though the second commercial town in the kingdom, did not exceed 100,000 of population, and how the silver cloud of smoke that hosted above her resembled that which might now appear over any secondary borough or village of the country. 'I have seen wild roses growing upon the very ground that is now the centre of the borough of Bootle. All that land is now partly covered with residences and partly with places of business and industry; but in my time but one single house business and industry; but in my time but one single house stood upon the space between Binntoso brook and the town of Liverpool. Among his early recollections was 'the of Liverpool'. Among his spectacle of a doek delivery on the Alersey after a long provadence of westerly winds followed by a change. Liverpool cannot imitate that now [1892], at least not for the eye.

Ш

Trenelan's Macanday, L p 111, Brongham in 1824 brought the blow in the United States.2 West Indies, as the execution of John Brown was its deathit has been truly said, was an event as fatal to slavery in the prison killed him. The death of the Demerara missionary, homo authorities, the fiery heat and noisome vapours of his Before the atrocious sentence could be commuted by the usido, he was convicted on hearsay and condemned to death. court in which every rulo of ovidence was tyrannically set had in fact done his best to stop the rising. Tried before a the lash of the cart-whip. Smith was arrested, although he were shot down in the thickets, others were tern in pieces by in force for over five months. Fifty negroes were hanged, many Martial law, the savage instrument of race passion, was kept rising was stamped out with great crucky in three days. John Cladstone's plantations happened to be its centre. The outbreak of the slaves occurred in Demerara, and one of knows the ease of the missionary John Smith. In 1823 an most honourable and glorious chapters in our English history was a slave-holder. Everybody who has over read one of the higher diguity, including many peers and oven some bishops, merchaut, like a lost of other men of equal respectability and in 1807, but slave labour remained, and the Liverpool The infamy of the slave-trado had been abolished the West Indies, some in Jamaica, others in British Guiana or came the owner of extensive plantations of sugar and coffee in the last ten years of his mercantile course John Gladstone be-The Gladstone firm was mainly an East India bouse, but in off In Could Smith 1, a Trevelbor Market, in principle, in the condition of the could be conditioned by the condition of the could be conditioned by the condit

71. 20 'dd '27.72'

diffuse religion among the people. seemed to be rather to revolutionise the colonies than to denounced the missionaries as hired emissaries, whose object that well-meaning but mistaken man, Mr. Wilberforce,' to basi and bewollot onw alambivibui betestatui to gaingizeb levelled at the planters by all 'the intemperate, credulous, slavery in the abstract, but protested against the abuse discussion through a long series of letters, he did not defend He was an indomitable man, In a newspaper मिश्रा माध्या nis plantations; as we shall see, it did not finally die down heated and prolonged controversy as to the management of prominent figure. John Aladstone became involved in que uodn suoissno the Gladstone estates made rather case before the House of Commons, and in the various dis-

². savala edit ior 1603 slaves. and apart from his partnerships, a little over seventy-five John Gladstone appears to have received, individually the twenty million pounds of compensation were distributed, Three years later, when emancipation came, and crimes. lanoitan do suonish teom sht deintry ot ytiunsgui lausunu to type an admitted by the abolitionists to be an attempt of negroes in the colonies. The pamphlet made its mark, the condition of the lower classes at home than to the bolt, he hinted that the public would do better to look to the very formation of society; and finally with a Parthian Providence had seen fit to permit in certain climates since for him to seek to destroy a system that an over-ruling the way of emancipation insurmountable; that it was not the welfare of the colonies, he considered the difficulties in when forced to work; that, as their labour was essential to to Sir Robert Peel, to explain that negroes were happier In 1830 he published a pamphlet, in the form of a letter

It is as well, though in anticipation of the order of time, to complete our sketch. In view of the approach of full

2 In Demerars the average price of slaves from 1822 to 1830 had been £114, 11s. 5¼d. The rate of compensation per slave averaged £51, 17s. 1¾d., but it is of interest to note that the slaves on the Vreedenhoop estate were valued at £53, 15s. 6d.

I, A statement of facts connected with the present state of slavery in the British sugar and coffee colonies, and in the United States of America, together with a view of the present situation of the lower classes in the United Kingdom.

House in 1840, Gladstone, these reports were laid upon the table of the fined, punished, and dismissed. Upon the motion of W, E. contented. The interpreter, who had abused them, had been in one erse, and these on Vreedenhoop appeared perfectly the whole, no one had ever maltreated or beaten them except the coolies on Vreedestein appeared contented and lappy on condition of the various Gladstone plantations reported that (Aug. 3, 1839), and commissionors sent to inquire into the Thomas Gladstone, his eldest son, defended him in parliament African negro, and John Gladstone was again in hot nater. tions was drawn in a light only less latid than the case of the Guinea slavers; the condition of the coolie on the sugar plantato reproduce the horrers of the middle passage of the vanished questions in new forms. The voyage from India was declared ledge and sanction. 1 The importation of coolies raised old betzen in the colony could be punished without his knew-Demerara, that he said 'he could sleep satisfied that no set such an iron yoko upon the planters and their agents iu mg the flogging of female slaves in the Balamas, new military engineer under Wellington, and who, after abolishhumane and vigorons man, who had done much work as were made with no effect by the governor at Demerara, a on terms drawn up by the planters themselves. mitting the West Indian planters to ship coolies from India secretary of state, to issne an order in council (1837) perabolition, John Gladstone induced Lord Gleuelg, the whig

We shall have not animportant glimpees, as our story unfolds lizelf, of all those transactions. Meanwhile, it is interesting to note that the statesman where ensign there exists note that the statesman where the pullation of sharety must have made a daily topic. The maion, moreover, of fervid ovangelical religion with anti-agonism to abolition must in those days have been trac, anti-agonism to abolition must in those days have been trac, and in spite of his devoted faith in his father the youthful and in spite of his devoted faith in his father the youthful

^{1.} Inc. Ant Harms Care, publisher of an article setting for an inches and a manical beautiful and a publisher a per a manical beautiful and a publisher and a manical beautiful and a publisher and a publisher and a manical beautiful and a manical and a publisher and a manical beautiful and a manical and a manical beautiful and a manical and a

³ Letter to Dundas, with a sketch of a Neyro Code, 1792. But see Life of Wilderforce, v. p. 157. 1818. ni beneildug aaw nietenskan f religion than to all the rest of the regulations put together. rated the state of mankinkly to the effect and betar sound principles of those who ever have at any time melio-'I confess, he said, 'I trust infinitely more (according to the the slave trade, Burke too had argued against total abolition. and imagination were impressed. 2 On slavery and even the yet more venerable name of Burke, my youthful mind between nations; with Canning, and under the shadow of towards the establishment of free commercial interchanges abroad; with Canning, I rejoiced in the opening he made disabilities, and in the character which he gave to our policy youth; with Canning, I rejoiced in the removal of religious that name governed the politics of my childhood and of my the great name of Canning; every influence connected with when risen to meridian splendour, 'under the shadow of power of doing mischief.' 'I was bred,' said Alr. Gladelone finds too late that he has only created a more than mortal the work of his hands a perception of right and wrong, he corporal capabilities of a man, but being unable to impart to the hero of which constructs a human form with all the creature resembling the splendid fiction of a recent romance,1 nfancy of his uninstructed reason, would be to raise up a strength, in the maturity of his physical passions, but in the 'I'v turn linn loose in the manhood of his physical the negro as a being with the form of a man and the intellect the object of a pious hope, and no more. Canning described action, and that his freedom as a result of amelioration was tion, of the lot of the negro slave was the utmost limit of ciples common to the statesmen of the day: that ameliora-Canning, in 1823, had formally laid down the neutral prinperhaps consoled himself with the authority of Canning. Chadstone may well have had uneasy moments. If so, he

,388£

.72 House of Commons, April 27,

CHYPTER II

ELON

(1281-1281)

Ir is in the public schools and unrecentive shirt the youth of England are, by a discipline which shallow pudgments invo sometimes attempted to undervalue, prepared for the duties of public his There are not and spleadid exceptions, to be sure, but in my consenence I believe, that England would not be write she is without his test system of public education, and that no other country out her system of public education, and that no other country can become man England is, without the advantages of such a system—CANYING

ne is difficult to discorn the true dimensions of objects in that mirago which covers tho studies of one's youth -- Ollabstork.

summer and winter. The school, said the new scholar, has anaster of the room) to sleep with his muchow open both the smallest inconsemience, though it was his eastom (when the very cronded church and: from this he nover received looled down the Long Walk, while the windows looked into lauuch at a public school. The door of his damo's house much mitigated the sense of isolation that attends the first then in the upper division, and this helped my start and I ment, he says, under the ning of uny oldest brother, lapso of years; to him it was ever 'the queen of all schools.' nover shook it oil. His attachment to Eton grow nith the English governing class of that day, and the new Etenian set forth a superstitiou that had a powerful hold on the page. Caming's nords at the head of our present chapter officed, so profound is the early writing on one opening traces in heart and mind that the waves of time nover of 1827 It impressed images that nover faded, and left tito at Eton lasted over six Jears, until the Christmas Ix September 1821, the young Gladstone was sent to Eton.

only about four hundred and ninety fellows in it, which was considered uncommonly small. He likes his tutor so much that he would not exchange him for any ten. He has various rows with Mrs. Shurey, his dame, and it is really a great shame the way they are fed. He and his brother have far the best room in the dame's house. His captain is very good-natured. Fighting is a favourite diversion, hardly a day passing without one, two, three, or even four more or less mortal combats.

they are to have a regular battle in the playing fields. battle put his finger out of joint, and as soon as it is recovered fellow, and of not knowing any one here. Arthur in a former We also labours under the additional disadvantage of being a new over the form without receiving a single blow of any consequence. very triumphantly by knocking the arrogant Arthur backwards him bleed at both his nose and his mouth, he finished the affair olow with interest; they degan to fight; after Macdonald had made even a fellow much bigger than himself, he returned Arthur's almost knocked backwards, but disdaining to take a blow from his might, and gave him so violent a blow that Macdonald was began to push him out of his seat. Arthur struck at him with all from him, Macdonald very properly took him at his word, and the additional insult that he might try what he could do to take it he airily asked him to give it him again, which being refused, with pushed out of his seat in school by a fellow of the name of Arthur, and about the strongest fellow in the school of his size. Being remarkably clever, and a capital fighter). He is tough as iron, advantages. His name is Macdonald (he once had a brother here most honourable spirit in a highlander labouring under great dis-Johanna (November 13, 1821), of an instance of the highest and You will be glad to hear, he writes to his Highland aunt

Other encounters are described with equal zest, especially one where 'the honour of Liverpool was bravely sustained,' superior weight and size having such an advantage over toughness and strength, that the foe of Liverpool was too badly bruised and knocked about to appear in school. On another occasion, 'to the great joy' of the narrator, an oppidan vanquished a colleger, though the colleger fought its forms had been surrendered.'? of Christianity was all but dead, though happily none of wrote of this period forty years after, the actual teaching official church of England varnish. At Eton, Mr. Gladstone was essentially little better than pagau, medified by an pious munificence of Henry vi. now inspired a seene that most active of all the religious sections; and the ancient and the influence of the evangelieal party, at that moment the theso circumstances reduced to zero, there was no trace of more. Religious instruction, as we may suppose, "as under in the evening of his life was that he had not degged far boys on a single summer day; and whose one mellow regret on heroic occasions was known to have flogged over eighty regeneration in the childish soul was the birch rod; who Keate, with whom the appointed instrument of moral of flogging; for the headmaster was the redoubtable Dr. a boy was killed. With plenty of fighting went on pleuty these desperate affrays, and once at least in these times used to stop under the wall of the playing fields to watch broken and quite black. The Windsor and Slough coaches back to the classic studies that soften manners, with a face so furiously that he put his fingers out of joint, and went 4 Gicanusts, sin p. 13%. A st. 27 searchmes told of Prosent Goalell. and was in many respects, their education. Some of those among the fellows who received what was supposed to be, There note many sludes of distinction,' he observed, said, 'we knew very little indeed, but no knew it accurately. siderable proficiency. 'When I was at Eton, Mr. Gladetone attention to French, and even then to have attained conand more seriously in 1827. He seems to have paid much the helidays, going to Liverpool for the purpose, first in 1224 first picked up a little mathematics not at Eton, but during That's as they please,' replied the genial doctor." Gladstone please, said Keate. 'Must the beys touch their hate to me?' Meate if he might wear a cap and gown. That's as you him. In his anxiety for position the unfortunate man asked rival, theology. There was a mathematical master, but nobody learned anything from him, or took any notice of Science oven in its rudiments fareil as ill as its eternal shades of distinction were extremely questionable, and the comparative measures of honour allotted to talent, industry and idleness were undoubtedly such as philosophy would not justify. But no boy was ever estimated either more or less because he had much int took nothing from him nothing to him if he had much, it took nothing from him if he had nuch, it took nothing from him if he had little. A sharp fellow who worked, and a stupid fellow who was idle, were both of them in good odour to be an insufferable solecism.¹

88

ELON

olergymen in those days). He was a reputed whig, an easy and discipline, and no energy of desire to impress himself upon bis discipline, and no energy of desire to impress himself upon his pupils. I recollect but one piece of advice received later from him. It was that I should form my poetical taste upon Darwin, whose poems (the 'Botanic Garden' and 'Loves of the Plants') I obedicated that I should form any poetical taste upon Darwin, whose ently read through in consequence. I was placed in the middle ently read through in consequence. I was placed in the middle temore fourth form, a place slightly better than the common run, but inferior to what a boy of good preparation or real excellence would have taken. My nearest friend of the first period was would have taken. Aly nearest friend of the first period was above me in the school.

At this time there was not in me any desire to know or to excel. My first pursuits were football and then ericket; the first I did not long pursue, and in the second I never managed to rise above mediocrity and what was termed 'the twenty-two.' There was a barrister named Henry Hall Joy, a connection of my father through his first wife, and a man who had taken a first-class at Oxford. He was very kind to me, and had not of knowledge. Indeed I had read Froissart, and Hume with of knowledge. Indeed I had read stroissart, and Hume with came to the sections headed 'A Parliament.' Joy had a taste for classics, and made visions for me of honours at Oxford. But the subject only danced before my cyes as a will-of-the-wisp, and without attracting me. I remained stagnant without heart or without attracting me. I remained stagnant without heart or without attracting me. I remained stagnant without heart or without attracting me. I remained stagnant without heart or without attracting me. I remained stagnant without heart or without attracting me. I remained stagnant without heart or bope. A change however arraved about Easter 1822. My remove' was then under Hawtrey (atternants head-master and provost), who was always on the lookout for any bud which be could warm with a little sunshine.

He always described Hawtrey as the life of the school, the annu to whom Eton owed more than to any of her sons during the century. Though not his pupil, it was from him that dhadetone, when in the fourth form, received for the first chalestone, when in the fourth form, received for the first time incentives to exertion. 'It was entirely due to reception of a spark, the drainace particulum aurace, and reception of a spark, the drainace particulum aurace, and exception of a fam idea, that in some tinne, manner, and degree, I might come to know. Even then, as I had really no instructor, may efforts at Eton, down to 1827, were perhaps of the purest plodding ever known.

late, Half a dozen of them met every whole holiday or record that 'Keate did not make any jaw about being so himself with his brother at the Christopher, and is glad to that any good father would have his son to bo. Ho enjoys short, just the diligent, cheerful, healthy-minded schoolbey rigidly refused any part in boyish indecorums. Ho was in stand aside from the harmless gaieties of boyish life, but he haboons, a bore in the full sense of the word. He did not and money, a most ingenions contrivance to exhibit us as extremely ill, the whole thing a wretched waste of time Missolonghi. Of Montem as an institution he thought at its hereest, and it was the year when Byron died at ful Canaingito; the heroic struggle against the Turk was glories of the costume of a Greek patriot, for he was a faithmasquerado of Montem he figured complacently in all the boat, whether skiff, funny, or wherry, single-handed. In the He was assiduous in the Eton practice of working a small memory here made him boast of crimes that were not his. who knew him as a schoolboy decided that an aspiring had once taken a drive in a bired tandem, but Etonians and cards, and usually lost. He claimed in after life that he first three years at Eton. In the ovening he played chees Evidently he was not a boy of special mark during the warm breath of family affection, and of all those natural His letters written from Econ breathe in every line the kings and Turkish sultans. sity anticipates the wrath of later attacks on Meapolitan just been promoted, an invective that in volume and intentime, against the master of the remove from which he has himself to fag. In passing he launches, for the first recorded and here instead of fagging he acquires the blessed power he has got into the fith form after taking sixteen places, seven places.' In the summer of 1823 he announces that have been sent up for good a second time, and have taken into the remove between the fourth and fifth forms. most sanguine expectations I ever entertained. I have got he tells his sailor brother of his success: 'It far exceeds the again before the fourth of June. Before the end of June, tinue to do as well as this, and I will send you up for good form. In the spring of 1822 Hawtrey said to him: 'Con-He started, as we have already seen, in middle fourth

half, and went up Salt Hill to bully the fat waiter, eat toasted cheese, and drink egg-wine.

His letters written from Econ breathe in every line the warm breath of family affection, and of all those natural pieties that had so firm a root in him from the beginning to the end. Of the later store of genius and force that the couch of time was so soon to kindle into full glow, they gave but little indication. We smile at the precocious copia famel that at thirteen describes the language of an admonishing acquaintance as 'so friendly, manly, sound, and disinterested that notwithstanding his faults I must always think well of him. He sends contributions to his brother's scrap-book, and one of the first of them, oddly enough, in view of one of the great precocupations of his later life, is a copy of Lord Edward Fitzgerald's stanzas on the night of his arrest:

Of thy pride and thy splondour has passed,
And the chain which was spurned in thy moment of power,
And the chain which was spurned in thy moment of power,
Hangs heavy around thee at last.

The temper and dialect of evangelical religion are always there. A friend of the family dies, and the boy pours out his regret, but after all what is the merely natural death of list of boys against whom H [the another rale of this activity a marking was induced to ourit from the Gladstone on this occasion to day, and from kindness or good the list of boys to be sledged. Mr. stone, put down your own name on not meet their friends. Next day when I went into school H foated ont in a voice of thunder, "Clad by, my father supplied mo with a three and that it they were pur build-grad list the could small amount and measurement of the could smooth the could be cou any way with wine, of which, by the coming down from London to see

I Doyle celle a civery of the Down matterf hat complianced, and who being i logged to cheer the down the celle a civery of the Down with a cell time of the cellers. The but to cheer the cellers and the celler cellers are the celler cellers and the celler celler cellers are cellers and the celler celler cellers and the celler cel of the tyrants froouties! His school work was diligently remarkably well, and there are stories that he was even one With the formidable Keate the boy seems to have fared by the entherems and conjectures of the parent , Licind to Fair Dealing, while the son was equally diverted stone was much amused and interested by the anonymous assailants Ignorant of his nameless champion, John Gladbearing off Anchises, in the filial duty of repelling his sires years to como, was now first employed, like the pious Ameas troversial pen that was to know no rest for more than seventy local prints for sundry economic meonsistencies and tho con Leverpool Courser' His father had been attached in the he says in 1826, Intely been writing several letters in the Monday, and reach home at eight on Tuesday!' 'I have,' brodigiously quiek travelling to leave Eton at thelve ou there is no fear of it beating Liverpool' Meanwhile 'what opened a great and enterprising undertaking, but still corn' In May 1827, the Gloucester and Berkeley canal is The other is for building a bridge over the Mersey at Euntor the conveyance of goods by locomotive steam engine of these is a railroad between Liverpool and Manchester as ever, he has two principal plans now in embryo One he writes to his brother, is as active in mind and projects' His father is the steady centre of his life 'My father,' cannot escape the vigitance and the reproof of his bishop? prelude by even worse enormities unnamed, that surely of attending a fancy ball, but has followed that vicious man, also an intimate friend, who has not only been guilty Dr N compared with the awful state of a certain clergy-

One constant entry, we may be sure, is bausted texts. 'Cease to do evil, learn to do well, and the other ever unexthe time, 'Weighed in the balance and found wanting,' task. Mention is made of many sermons on Redeeming lot of hendecasyllables, and thirty alcaic stanzas for a holiday egboq-egbod s'',ertem esia baryana aice metre,'a hodge-podge There is, of course, a steady refrain of Greek iambics, Locke on Toleration (' much repetition'). (which he liked better than either the other or Tis Pity), of it good, the end remarkably beautiful') and Broken Heart, Grand Duke of Florence, Ford's Love's Melancholy ('much tory, Measure for Measure and Much Ado, Massinger's Coxe's Walpole, Don Quixote, Hallam's Constitutional Hisimpress my mind so much. In the same year he reads not so clear, so able, so attractive as Hume; does not of Gibbon, whom he pronounces, elegant and acute as he is, In 1827 he went steadily through the second half republican and anti-episcopal—a strange composition, inand unfair, clever and silly, allegorical and bombastic, he reads 'a most violent article on Milton by Macaulay, fair very names are music to a scholar's ear. In the same year Burke, Charendon, and others of the shining host whose tale, indeed, and in after life his favourite of them all), Scott, including the Bride of Lammermoor ('a beautiful Futul Doury ('most excellent'), Ben Jonson's Alchemist; Poems and Epitaphium Damonis ('exquisite'), Massinger's which he finds excellent; Paradise Lost, Milton's Lutin Deism, Locke's Defence of The Reasonableness of Christianity, line's Life of Pitt, Waterland's Commentaries, Leslie on Blair's Sermons ('not very substantial'), Tom Jones, Tomdeal of miscellaneous ground, including Molière and Racine, . supplemented. His daily reading in 1826 covers a good

'humour.' 'One day H. called out ejaculated the boy, with increased to the præpostor, 'Write down Hamilton's name to be flogged for window, lying, and swearing." I never breaking my window, sir," exclaimed Against this final sentence there was breaking my window, sir," exclaimed Against this final sentence there was hone your window, sir," exclaimed to appeal, and, accordingly, Hamilton's name ton was flogged (I believe unjustly) for breaking my window and lying."

Telegraph, 'May 20, 1898.

Telegraph, May 20, 1898.

Head Bible, with Ment's notes In a mood of deep piety to 1s prepared for confirmation. Has appearance at this time was recalled by one who had been his fact delicate youth, with a paid face and brown number delicated well dressed.'

which H Joy had injudiciously mentioned to him descension especially when he spoke to me of some verses dorth Personally I must remember his hindness and con was not at Eton but at home when he heard of Mr Canning s ' Mi Canning here, inquired after me and missed me' He of Commons (Virch 8 1827) Ou r summers day in 1826 horrible nows of the defeat of the eathelies in the House good deal of his time and he is overwholmed by the sociable sedulous The debates in parliament take up a days follow one another very much able-studious cheerful, with more civility and speaks to them differently So the are more directly under the oye of Keate, ho treats them as regards pleasure and opportunity for improvement. They sand very preferable to all other parts of the school both to be careful in using iny authority, etc. He finds tho sixth Was very eivil indeed, told me to take prims, etc., 1826 and on February 20 1827, Keate put him into the He became exptain of the fifth at the end of October

11

Youthful intellect is indicative, and in a great school se impregnated as Eton with the spirit of public life and political rescontion the few boys with active animal political rescontion the few boys with active animal political association the faviliance in the Ston Messellang society, and copied the arts of journalism in the Ston Messellany in the both fields the joung Gladstone took a leading part. The debring seconds part and the state of conting part. The of death is content with the premometry pillary of death seconded by the office of the action of the action of death is condicated and politics of Gladstone energy of death seconded by pulse beating through it. The pointes of the lour, that is to say death of the fact in the order of the out, that is to say overything not fifth jears off, never levelides ground, but the oxecution of Strifferd of this repail inselet, the but the exception of Strifferd of this repail inselet, the humble situation desire themselves? Or has human pride they may deny to others that which they would in an commonplace is east. 'Is human grandeur so stable that of rhetorical form in which, juvenile though it may be, a Already we seem to hear the born speaker in the amplitude can they evade the duty?' And so forth and so forth. Then by what argument can they repel, by what pretence for the purpose of doing good to their fellow creatures. deny, that they are placed in an elevated situation principally advantages. Let them but admit, what I think no one can same reason, though not blessed with the same temporal length remember that the poor are endowed with the humbler walks of life. If such there are, let them at mental improvement of their fellow creatures in the eager or willing to obstruct the moral instruction and to find few, if indeed any, among the higher classes who are increased and gradually increasing civilization, we shall hope President, it begins, in this land of liberty, in this age of all through the long space of intervening years. Alr. manuscript should have been thriftily preserved by him many of his Eton speeches were written out, but that the a curious but a characteristic circumstance not that so funked less than I thought I should, by much. It is he enters in his diary, 'on education of the poor; his first. 'Made my first or maiden speech at the society,' who made his last speech seventy years later, now made on this last question (October 29, 1825) that the orator education of the poor is on the whole beneficial. It was with the character that we ought to seek; or whether the the human mind; whether duelling is or is not inconsistent mathematics and metaphysics to be the better discipline of On duller afternoons they argued on the relative claims of unlawfulness of swamping the tories in the House of Lords. independence, the hard ease of Queen Caroline, and the upon the eatholic question, the struggle of the Greeks for by ingenious youth to admit a hundred cuming sidelights Harley and Bolingbroke, were themes that could be made Queen Anne, the Peerage bill of 1719, the characters of deposition of Richard II., the last four years of the reign of industry and genius of the artisan, to blast his rising hopes, Is it morally just or politically expedient to keep down the on their fellow countrymen as the refuse of mankind? . . . kindness that ought to reign in the breast of all, and to look dely both right and reason, to reject the laws of natural reached such a pitch of arrogance that they have learned to may feel that the boyish speaker is already on the generous Crude enough, if we please; but the year was 1826, and we nutrimont and beware lest driven to despair, et eetera. the minds of the poor; let them satisfy it with wholesome to quell his spirit? A thirst for knowledge has arisen in exclumations of popular applause. In the same gallant merits, save such as arise from the mad and thoughtless aid to alaimomitest on had and it beshin viros od bluoda Ins obtained men that appellation from the multitude-I feroeity which has often been the solo qualification which upon him as a hero, not merely endowed with that animal Graham [the Marquis of Montrose]. It is because I look senict rot evor ym orig I doidw no ebanory ym gaitate ai that as far as regards myself, I shall have very little difficulty controversics, 'Sir,' ho opens on one occasion, 'I declare to hear debating forms and ceremony applied to overlasting In the spacious tournaments of old history, we may smile sold and has the gift of fruitful sympathics.

ELON 98

the return of these members with a triumphant mob at that time had neither friends nor "ealth? . . . Did of the parliament. Sir, do we not all know that the king talking of the riolence offered by the king, and the terror is really a little extraordinary to hear the honourable opener sir, with regard to the impeachment of the five members, it myself by the same principles as directed me then. . . . Now, same unanimity new, but I will endeavour to regulate ment of the Earl of Strafford. I wish I could hope for the unanimously deelared our disapprobation of the impeach-Sir, I look back with pleasure to the time when we the question was between John Hampden and Clarendon. Roman emperors from Augustus onwards. Another time to the question whether Trajan has any equal among the stylo (Jan. 26, 1826) ho votes for Marcus Aurelius, in answer

As for the Eton Miscellany, which was meant to follow in general his pacific policy.' i of the protestant succession, his commercial measures, and overbalance or to apoil the great merit of being the bulwark him. There were sundry considerable blots, but nothing to when I was almost entirely ignorant of the subject, against change;—'Debate on Sir R. Valpole: Hallam, Gaskell, Pickering and Doyle spoke. Voted for him. Last time, one Ereat man he passed a find judgment that years did not which time was to prove the resources so inexhaustible. On on, with all the promise of the os magna sonaturum, of real hero and real martyr, prostituted in the cause, and so rebellion, and the faculties by which he might have been a splendour of patriotic bravery obscured by the darkness of statesman, the candid historian. . . . In Hampden I see the admire the sound philosopher, the rigid moralist, the upright ob, sir, let us not deny it to him after death. In him, sir, I advocates of rebellion, and if he failed in his reward in life, adhered to the cause of justice, he still denounced the ment, and disgrace he endured without a murniur; he still and moderation combined to dietate. . . Poverty, banishking; because he adopted the part which loyalty, reason, cause of monarchy; because he stood by his church and his Earl of Clarendon, because he gave his support to the falling therefore it is, he concludes, that I give my vote to the So he proceeds through all the well-worn arguments; and A the parliament or the insolence of their languinge show it?' accompanying them indicate terror? Did the demands of

As for the kton Miscellany, which was meant to follow earlier attempts in the same line, the best-natured critic cannot honestly count it dazzling. Such things rarely are; for youth, though the most adorable of our human stages, cannot yet have knowledge or practice enough, whether in life or books, to make either good prose or stirring verse, unless by a miracle of genius, and even that inspiration is but occasional. The Microcosm (1786-87) and inspiration is but occasional. The Microcosm (1786-87) and Moultrie and Praed, were well enough. The newcomer was long way behind these in the freshness, brilliance, daring, a long way behind these in the freshness, brilliance, daring,

1 Feb. 10, 1827.

As nearly always happens, it was less by seboolwork or spoken addresses in Juvenilo dedate, or early attempts in the great and difficult are of written composition, that by

Excellent in feeling, to be sure, but as a trial of poetie delicacy or power, wanting the true note, and only worth recalling for an instant as we go

Off in the sculptured raise or that seveling down,

The y tranging give a half given the proud a home,

Yet never actionsed from his bright correct

Again the tomb may yarm—spain may death

Again the tomb may yarm—spain may death

Gainn the last forfest of departing bretth,

Yet never enabrune in slumber dark and deep

A nobles, lofter I rey than where that one desire sleep

redections in Westminster Abbey much more striking ment and the enemy of innoration Nor are the versified principle and concilatory in action, the friend of improve to his proud and exalted station, about being firm in wisdom, about falling, like his great master Pitt a victim mendian splendour, premeture extinction, and inserutable tribute In the prose we hear senerous things about grave of his here, and in the Aliscellany he pays a double Abbey, -his object, an erger pilgrimage to the newly tenanted his mother that he has for the first time visited Westminster the stroke was almost personal In September 1827 he tells days was undoubtedly the death of Canning, and to Gladstone be ealled high. The most moving public event in his school when sincero feelings were deeply stirred, the fight cannot mechanical, their phrase and endence conventional Even to expand Their motion, such as it is, must be pronounced strong pinions into which the half fledged wings nere in time tions have no particular promise or savour, no hint of the exceptions) exectable productions. Certainly his contributurning over the Miscellany, in perusing my own (with few my temper, he wrote afterwards in his dirry in 1835, on and each provided pretty copious effusions I cannot Leep or interest George Selvy n and Cladstone were joint editors, by which only such juvenile performances can either please together their rolls and butter, and breakfasted in one Треу слирред rapid instinct made them close comrades. charm and the power of the younger with the elder, that interest and aspiration spoken and unspoken, such the the sympathy of genius, such the affinities of intellectual than Gladstone, no narrow gulf at that age; but such was Arthur Hallam was a couple of years younger of his time,1 shaim steitle of the one than one the leftiest minds gnibnaterebnu evorogiv eid dtiw eestanding asw naqe course was run in two-and-twenty years, yet in that scanty constellation was the rare youth who, though his shining The brightest star in this cheerful towards free trade. ported by Canning, was cautiously treading in the path emancipation, and to the steps by which Huskisson, supin public debate. Most of them were friendly to catholic questions of politics that were too modern to be tolerated or five of them would meet, and discuss without restraint the years, until that light was put out.' In Gaskell's room four Windsor, which lasted, to my great profit, for some sixty friendship, that with Gerald Wellesley, afterwards dean of occasion or aid to the formation of another very valuable must have been thear, hear! Proximity of rooms gave; mentary reports, and his first cries on awaking in his cradle that his nurse must have lulled him to sleep by parliahumour that enthusiasts often miss. Doyle said of him! of political faculty, an enthusiast, and with a vivacious Milnes Gaskell, a youth endowed with precocious ripeness his unquestionable poetic genius.' A third was James genial character supplied a most pleasant introduction for the pure heroic type.' Another was Francis Doyle, whose measure, it was to reintroduce among the anglican clergy in the single word, noble, and whose high office, in a large 's man whose character is summed up, from alpha to omega, Selwyn, afterwards bishop of New Zealand and of Lichfield, after days he commemorated among his friends George young Gladstone was stimulated, opened, strengthened. blithe and congenial comradeship that the mind of the best filled. eareless of all save truth and beauty,-that were the hours their way into the garden, it was the most careless hours,before any of the imps of disorder and confusion have found Thus, as so many have known in that happy dawn of life, oxtraordinary speed. He had no high or exclusive ways. Ho read largely, and though not superficial, yet with an rare and blessed ereature, unima naturaliter Ohristiana. conduct was without a spot or even a speck. He was that His temper was as sweet as his manners were winning. His and games which he did not enjoy he left contentedly aside. in his old age as one who 'enjoyed work, enjoyed society; Hallam pure whig Hallam was described by Mr. Gladstone Fox, and Canning and Peel, for Gladstone was a tory and about polities, old and new, living and dead; about Pitt and for Hallam was precociously full of Jonathan Edwards; creeds; about Wordsworth, Byron, Shellcy; about free will, churchyard of the elegy; arguing about the articles and the together, often to the monument of Gray, close by the value set upon his passenger's company. They took walks idle passenger up stream as proof positive of no common the Shallows, and he regarded this toilsome carrying of an ing, so the more sinewy Gladstone used to scull him up to another's rooms. Hallam was not strong enough for boat-

ELON

88

the elegies of In Memoriam as most Arthur Hallam, evili, and exxviii.

Youth will commonly do anything rather than write lotters, but the friendship of this pair stood even that test. The prages are redolent of a living taste for good books and serious thoughts, and amply redeemed from strain or affectation by touches of gay irony and the collegian's banter. Hallam applies to Ghadstono Diomodo's lines about Odysseus, of eager heart and spirit so mental in all manner of toils, as the only courrade whom a man would choose! But the Greek hotowas up odubt a complex character, and the parallel is taken by Ghadstone as an equivocal compliment. So hot when no doubt a complex character, and the parallel hotow in the contract of some and the contract of the world by which the clear that the contract of some in white; then could no mortal mon content distributive of snow in white; then could no mortal man content with Odysseus? As happy a forecast for the mon content with Odysseus? As happy a forecast for the

and respect your character. . . . It will be my proudest wrote to Gladstone (June 23, 1830), 'have I ceased to love 'Never since the time when I first knew you, Hallam of a grave refrain that fatal issues made pathetic. and the deepening'twilight. Under all is the recurrent note youth, so different from that other melancholy of ripe years world. Hallam is not without the graceful melancholy of tions with one of them, had the year before burst upon the older than themselves and destined to strango historic relapart of that amazing fiction with which an author, not much stone has read 'the new Vivian Grey' (1827)—the second manage to make a hero of the Corsican. He asks if Gladlife of Mapoleon, how with his ultra principles Scott will divine. He wonders (1826) about Sir Walter's forthcoming He goes to the opera and finds Zucchelli admirable, Coradori stood in the balance of disinterestedness and public virtue. reign of George III.; and observes how much higher all parties this famous crisis with a similar crisis in the early part of the king and the blunders of Wellington and Peel; he contrasts whigs in coalescing with Canning against the bigotry of the passes glowing eulogies on the patriotism and wisdom of the of the brilliant band of the whig writers of that day, Hallam and continued interest. The son of one of the most eminent about persons and paragraphs, but were matters of trained coming from a home where politics were not mere gossip and changing age. Each of these two had the advantage of there is what Gray and West felt not, the breath of a busy there is the same literary sensibility, the same kindness, but of the letters and verses that Gray wrote to Richard West; the friendship of two other Etonians ninety years before, poet. Hallau's share in the correspondence reminds us of Chadstone that Tennyson promised fair to be its greatest great orator of their generation, as when in 1829 he told

'Never since the time when I first knew you,' Hallam wrote to Gladstone (June 23, 1830), 'have I ceased to love and respect your character. . . It will be my proudest thought that I may henceforth act worthily of their affection who, like yourself, have influenced my mind for good in the earliest season of its development. Circumstance, my dear earliest season of its development. Circumstance, my dear carliest season of its development. The stamp of each of our do away with what has been. The stamp of each of our minds is on the other. Many a habit of thought in each is have existed in that combination, had it not been for the old modified, many a feeling is associated, which never would familiar days when we hved together'

but you would please me and obligo me greatly, if you will ask a favour immediately on acknowledging so great a one, through both our hves It is perhaps rather bold in me to a memorial of past and a pledge for future friendship I received your superb Burke yesterday, and hope to find it by writing what I hardly dare trust myself to do by words charteteristic affection 'Perhaps you will pardon my doing literary growth, and he bade his friend farewell in words of journey to Italy that set so unportant a mark on his In the summer of 1827 Hallum quitted Eton for the bring the dally sceno before us and show what his life was A few entries from the schooloes diary may serve to Your most faithful friend, A H H. warmest pleasure it will always be to subscribe himself,

I am separated from you, to remand you of one, whose accept this copy of my fithers book it may serve when

October 3, 1826 -Holiday

October 6 -Fin second Olympiad of Pindar Clarendon for heing late in church Poor coough Did punishment set by Keate to all the fifth form theme Read Clarendon Wrote speech for Saturday week

Wilk with Hallam Wrote over

Notember 13 -Play Breakfast with Hallam Read a little in farour of Cacear Did an abstract of about 100 pages Wrote speech for to morrow fifth, making quotations to it and some other places Did a few Clarendon Read over tenth Satire of Juvenal and read the little Clarendon Read 200 lines of Trachiniae A little Gil Blas in French, and a Euclid Question Was deposition of Richard it justifiable ! norrigion on Orrera Did 3 props of Finished Trachiniae Finished Blairs Read papers, etc. Motember 18 -Play

Walked with Hallam and Doyle Read papers and debates. Notember 14 - Holiday Wrote over theme Did verses. ACLECE

Voted no. Good debate. Finished the delightful oration Pro

.ənoliM

November 21.—Holiday. . . . Part of article in Edinburgh Review on Icon Basilike. Read Herodotus, Clarendon. Did' 3 props. Scrambling and leaping expedition with Hallam, Doyle and Gaskell.

November 30,—Holiday. Read Herodotus. Breakfasted with Gaskell. He and Hallam drank wine with me after 4. Walked with Hallam. Did verses. Finished first book of Euclid. Read a little Charles XII.

February 27, 1827.—Holiday. Dressed (knee-breeches, etc.) and went into school with Selwyn. Found myself not at all in a funk, and went through my performance with tolerable comfort. Durnford followed me, then Selwyn, who spoke well. Horrors of speaking chiefly in the name.

March 20.—My father has lost his seat, and Berwick a representative ten times too good for it. Wrote to my father, no longer M.P.; when we have forgotten the manner, the matter is not so bad.

March 24.—Half-holiday. Play and learning it. Walked with Hallam, read papers. Hallam drank wine with me after dinner. Finished 8th vol. of Gibbon; read account of Palmyra in second volume; did more verses on it. Much jaw about nothing at Society, and absurd violence.

May 31.—Finished ismbies. Wrote over for tutor. Played cricket in the Upper Club, and had tea in poet's walk [an entry repeated this summer].

June 26.—Wrote over theme. Read Iphigenie. Called up in Homer. Sculled Hallam to Surly after 6. Went to see a cricket match after 4.

Gladstone's farewell to Eton came with Christmas (1827). He writes to his sister his last Etonian letter (December 2) before departure, and 'melancholy that departure is.' On the day before, he had made his valedictory speech to the Society, and the empty shelves and dismantled walls, the table strewn with papers, the books packed away in their boxes, have the effect of 'mingling in one lengthened mass all the boyish hopes and solicitudes and pleasures' of his

Eton life 'I have long ago made up my mind that I have of late been enjoying what will in all probability be, as fix as of late been enjoying what will in all probability be, as fix of my own individual case is concerned, the happinest years of my life 'And they have fled! From these few facts do we not draw a train of reflections awithly important in their nature and extremely powerful in their impression on the milled?'

The reminiscences of Eton always gave him, and those who listened to him, much diversion whenever chance brought them to his mind and he has set them ${\rm den}\, n$ in an antebrographic fragment, for winch this is the place — of our existence, the tyrant of our days! Pure, unalloyed, struggling and buffeted-whom but Keatel leest the master my exultation, when I espied among this humiliated mass, too ym ,notions ym sen ted II and pushing bin guiding sigosq church, filled and packed as one of our public meetings is, with from this honourable vantage ground upon the floor of the were I, looking down with infinite complacency and entisfaction compressed, awayed continually backwards and forwards There the centre aisle. Here the mass of human beings, mercilessly below The crush was every "here great, but greatest of all m stuation we surveyed at ease and leisure the stringgling crowds rement bew in the first rank of the gallery From this clerated boy, taken time by the ferelock, and secured the use of τ con futher had on a certain occasion, when I was still a small Eton sive, carrying all the appearance of devoted carnestness. My was solemn, majestic (notwithstanding the squint), and impres arrangements to secure comfortable accommodation The preacher London, which was presbyterian It required careful provious eloquence of Dr Edward Irving drew cronds to bis church in by a considerable interval of years About 1820 [1823], the In connection with his name I shall give two anecdotes separated masters, as the name of Dr Busby seems to mark its introduction magne, the departure of the eld race of English public school the capital figure on the Eton stage, and his departure marked, I ing a little swagger), and character he made himself in every nay teet, or say five feet ene, but by costume, voice, manner (includ To Dr Meate nature had accorded a stature of only about five unadulterated rapture! Such a mepuréreta, such a reversal of human conditions of being, as that now exhibited between the Leton lower boy uplifted to the luxurious gallery pew, and the roomy deck of the upper school with vacant space and terror all around him, it must be hard for any one to conceive, except the two who were the subjects of it. Never, never, have I forgotten that moment.¹

I will now, after the manner of novelists, ask my reader to effect

alike vanished into insignificance. The roar of cheering had a announced the scene was indescribable. Queen and Queen Dowager tion of the birch. But upon this occasion, when his name had been had been the case of Dr. Keate to administer the salutary correcthe persons of the whole of them, with the rarest exceptions, it 'Keate ? - Oh, I hate him.' It is equally beyond doubt that to he liked Dr. Keate, he would beyond question have answered, if, when in that condition, any one of them had been asked how preponderating majority had been under his sway at Eton; and to be beyond doubt that of the assembled company the vastly But the real toast of the evening was yet to come. I suppose it So much was routine; and we went through it as usual. and drew forth, as a matter of course, by far its loudest acclamaand her health consequently figured as the toast of the evening, the Queen Dowager either was, or was believed to be, conservative; acclamation, decently and thriftily doled out. On the other hand to annome stribom a ditw bevieser yllender are agierevee edt government of Lord Melbourne which advised her, the toast of As the Queen was suspected of sympathy with the liberal In those days at public dinners, cheering was marked by gradato whom I chanced to have a seat almost immediately opposite. was in the chair. On his right, not far off him, was Dr. Keate, of the ancient school. Lord Morpeth, afterwards Lord Carlisle, held in Willis's Rooms to commemorate the fourth centenary In the year 1841 there was a very special Eton dinner another, and it not a more complete yet a worthier, turning of the along with me, a transition of some eighteen years, and to witness beginning, but never knew satisfy on oil. Indo the huge nanes a table the the huge on the continually recommenced, the huge of electric continually recommended, a third is process was such that we escemed all to have lost our seats. When at possession and to be hardly able to keep our seats. When a linguist it became possable Keate rose that is to say, his head struggled to speat, I will not say I heard every syllable, for theo, but wholly failed, recommenced the rain to summind a nord or two, but wholly failed, recommenced the rain satings of the sam as certainly one of the most mosting struggles and sat down I that see certainly one of the most mosting specially expectables that in my whole life I have variences.

¹ I have heard him tell this story, reproduced a schoolboy's glee with and Garrick himself could not have more admirable accent and gesture.

Λ1

and gives sundry reasons for that sombre apprehension, a unitarian, the soung churchinan mentions to his father, si od real I' anus ods do syminie ods m canly certosina an speculations, dissolvent and other, were afterwards to take ingenieus, urbane, interestiug, and independent mind, whoso R Greg (bern in the same year as Mr Gladstone), that philanthropic household, meluding among the sens William Wilmslow, were the Gregs of Quarry Bank, a refined and bearing families, with whom he made acquaintance while at condition of the parish was depressing ' Among the neighness, but the days of his energy nero past, and 'tho religious aftern ards testified to his aminbihty, refinement, and deveut-Turner was unado Bishop of Calcutta The bishop's pupil Turner at Wilmslow in Cheshiro, and remained there until Ozferd. In January 1828, Gladstone went to resido with Dr. Some months passed between leaving from and going to to was, indeed, only too well founded

While at Wilmslow (I'eh 5, 1833) Gladstone was taken

While at Wilmslow (I'eh 5, 1833) Gladstone was taken manly and said to be a very elever man,—afterwards to be known as the liberal and enlightened Edward Skinley, Bishop of Norwich, and father of Arthur Stralley, the fumous dean. Hun, out this occasion, the young Gladstone scenific to have seen for the first time. Arthur Stralley, and there was the uniter, and there was the uniter, and there was the uniter of scholars.

Jeans ins junior, and there was then some idea of sculding hun to Liten . Let it happened, he too nes a pupil at changing the face of education in England. where Arnold had just entered on his bold and noble task of for himself and for all of us, went not to Eton but to Rugby, few months later, as all the world knows, Stanley, happily time, and lent me books to read when we went away.'1 and Latin verses. He was very good-natured to us all the that it was a very good place for those who liked boating very much. He talked a great deal about Eton, and said sorts of things. He is so very good-natured, and I like him and talked to W. Gladstone 'almost all the time about all foundland dog in the pond, looked at books and pictures, breakfasted, how he devoured strawberries, swam the New-Cladstone at Seaforth House; in what grand style they has described how he was invited to breakfast with William at Alderley the two lads met again. The younger of them Rawson's at Seaforth, and in the summer after the meeting

Protheto's Life of Dean Stanley, i. p. 22.

CHAPTER III

OXLOED

(October 1228-December 1831)

STEERED in sentiment as she lies, spreading her gardens to the mooninght, and whispering from her towers the last conclaminants of the Middle Age, who will deny that foxford, by her incifiable of bits Middle Age, who will deny that foxford, by her incifiables, to prefetchen—to beauty, in a word, which is only truth seen from another side?—N. Arnote.

great a thing the life of a man may be made. beginning of the wonderful course that was to show how this enchanted and inspiring world, that we recognise the a strenuous future. It is from Gladstone's introduction into and stirring acquisition At prelude of a mau's part to play in could see before him present days of honourable emulation in its traditions rich, nourishing and alive. Such an one academic sloth, the venerable past, not dim and cold, but might well discern behind an unattractive sereen of by piety, munificence, and love of learning in a far-off time, ginntive scholar as he gazed upon the grey walls, reared the threncs of collegiate power. Yet the eye of an imaof lothargy. Toryism of a stolid clownish type still held inheritance. Ozford was slowly awakening from a long ago ati no evolves and traing talent first entors on its GLORIOUS to most are the days of dife in a great school, but

The Eten boy became the Christ Church man, and there began residence, Oetober 10, 1828. Mr. Clindsbones rooms, during most of his undergraduate life, were on the right, aband, and on the first floor of the staircase on the right, as one enters by the Canterbury gate. He tells his mother that they are in a very fashionable part of the mother that they are in a very fashionable part of the college, and mentions as a delightful fact, that Grakell and college, and mentions as a delightful fact, that Grakell and Seymer have rooms on the same floor. Samuel Smith was brated until 1831, when he was succeeded by the more celebrated Dr. Gaisford, always described by Mr. Gladstone as a splendid scholar, but a bad dean. Gaisford's excellent and he had the signal merit of speech, Spartan brevity. For a short time in 1806 he had been tutor to Peel. When profuse compliments on his crudition, the learned man replied, profuse compliments on his crudition, the learned man replied, an undergraduate on his crudition, the learned nan replied, 'My Lord, I have received your letter, and accede to the contents.—Yours, T. G., And to the complaining parent of an undergraduate he wrote, 'Dear Sir,—Such letters as yours are a great annoyance to your obedient servant T. Gaistord.' This lacenic gift the dean evidently had not time ford.' This lacenic gift the dean evidently had not time to transmit to all of his flock.

his comprehension and the unerring Charles Wordsworth's Annals. dean—a system that would not be approved in our epoch of received a studentship honoris causa, by nomination of the five to six hundred. At the end of 1829, Mr. Gladstone gentlemen commoners like Acland and Gaskell had from three hundred and fifty to five hundred pounds a year; but commoners, according to a letter of Gaskell's, had from Christ Church won five first classes out of ten. Most vas still operative.² At the summer examination of 1830, tigers, and not to be afraid of killing one's self by work, time, whose advice to Peel and other pupils was to work like The influence of Cyril Jackson, the dean in Peel's in the schools the college was at the top of its academic have been no irreconcilable prejudice against reading, and formed with common decency. There seems, however, to found little satisfaction, for the service was searcely peractually killed. In the chapel the new undergraduate rowdyism, and in one bear-fight an undergraduate was infested with some Christ Church in those days was you will but read him four or five times over every year, in half a dozen years you will know him by heart, and he well deserves it.'—Parker's Life of Sir R. Peel, i. p. 28.

² After Peel had begun his career, Jackson gave him a piece of advice that would have pleased Mr. Gladston :—' Let no day pass without Elevate your own mind by continual meditation on the vastness of its climax.

and Eton had won.

competitive examination, but still an advance upon the competitive examination, but still an advance disposing of sime-honoured practice of deans and canons disposing of studentships on groundes of private partiality without reference to desert. We may assume that the dean was not indifferent to academic promise when he told Gladstone, very good-naturedly and eivilly, that he had determined to offer him his nomination. The student designate wrote a theme, then is no minution. The student designate wrote a theme fareieal, examination in Homer and Virgil, was elected as matter of course by the chapter, and after chapte on the morning of Christmas eve, having taken several oaths, was formally admitted in the name of the Holy Thinity.

The following of Christmas eve, inving taken several oaths, was formally admitted in the name of the Holy Thinity.

Aristotle, especially on the Rhetoric. With Charles Words-worth, son of the master of Trinity at Cambridge, and worth, son of the master of Trinity at Cambridge, and afterwards Bishop of Saint Andrews, he read for scholarship, an undergraduate, he wittes to his fathor (Nov. 2, 1830), an undergraduate, he writes to his fathor (Nov. 2, 1830), I am wretchedly deficient in the browledge of modern fanguages, literature, and history; and the classical know-is acquired here, though sound, accurate, and usoful, yet is not such as to complete an education. It looked, in truth, is not such as to complete an education. It looked, in truth, and such as to complete an education. It looked, in truth, and such as to complete an education of looked, in truth, and they caustic eaging of a brilliant colleague of his in a later years were not at the time unjust, as now it would happily be, that it was a battle between Bton and education, happily be, that it was a battle between Bton and education, happily be, that it was a battle between Bton and education,

Mr. Gladstone never to the end of his days ceased to be grateful that Oxford was chosen for his university. At Cambridge, as he said in discussing Hallant's choice, the pure refluencents of scholarship were more in fashion than the study of the great masterpieces of antiquity in their substance and sprite. The classical examination at Oxford, ments of scholarship and pootry, history, and philosophy mas connewhat cutweighted the scholarship, and philosophy was somewhat outweighted the scholarship, and philosophy was somewhat outweighted the scholar-history scholarship and painteephy in contemporate the action of the philosophy was somewhat outweighted the ballotry.

he would have found the Ethics and the Rhetoric treated, If Mr. Gladstone had gone to Oxford ten years earlier,

The time was in truth the eve of an epoch of illumination, 2. bedsireq noitibert brotzO eat bad virettu os—eloaw a exception of Hampden, who could expound Aristotle as there was even one single tutor in 1830, with the possible standards. Oxford scholars of our own day question whether three as yet did the teaching go deep compared with modern and logic were the new acquisitions, but in none of the us the right way about the real world.1 Aristotle, Butler, was studied as the master of those who know how to teach Whately's common sense had set a new fashion, and Aristotle dramatists and orators, as pieces of literature. As it was, only much less effectively, in the Cambridge method, like

What interests us here is not the system but the man; that now proceeded from her venerable walls. their expected course by the startling theological movement mori abias bearut ylqrada erev broizO-ta anoitutitani to shall soon see, both the revival of learning and the reform This was not for a quarter of a century; for, as we called to play a part, though hardly at first a very zealous In that overthrow, when the time came, Mr. Gladstone was reform overthrew the entrenchments of academic abuse. but more than twenty years passed before the spirit of tolerated by the church. Copleston made a wretched reply, the injustice was tolerated by the state and the impiety a great seminary of religious education; the apathy with which and religious bond; the systematic perjury so naturalised in to private advantage; its unhallowed disregard of every moral oppression of Oxford'; its sacrifice of the public interests with a learning all his own, of the corruption and 'vampire exposure,3 in his most trenchant and terrifying style and of 1831 is the date of Sir William Hamilton's memorable new light is wont to strike with its first rays. The summer and in these epochs it is not old academic systems that the

and never was vital temperament more admirably fitted

² Ibid. i. p. 465. ³ Reprinted from the Edinburgh Review in Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, pp. 401-559. (1852.) .£9¥ .q On the four periods of Aristotelian study at Oxford in the first half of the century see Pattison's Essays, i.

by its vigour, sincerity, conscience, compass, for whatever, yood seed from the hand of any sower might be east upon sood seed from the shad of any sower might be cast upon the In an entry in his disay in the usual strain of eventeen the coverion (April 25, 1830), is a sentence that reveals what was in Mr. Gladstone the nourishing principle of growth:

'In practice the great end is that the love of God may become the habit of my soul, and particularly these things are to be sought:—I. The spirit of love, 2. Of self-sacrifice, 3. Of purity, 4. Of energy, Just as truly as if we were recalling some here of the secreteenth or any earlier century, is this the biographic educ.

TOH SUM no kinder where his kindness was paid for, than where it Dr. Gaisford would perhaps have put it that the tutor was under the tio of some definite and positive obligation." gratuitous and spontaneous, than when he seems to be which is by no means less strong and full when purely is oue certainly of extreme benevolence, and of a benevolence familiar and so famous. Saunders' disposition, it appears, redundant roll that was for many long years to be so gentleman to his father, we may bear for the first time the residence at Christ Church. In his description of this with whom he had done some rudiments before going into being singularly able and stimulating to his pupils, and matics with Saunders, a man who had the reputation of of 1830, when he returned to Cuddesdon to read mathodie. His roally liard work did not begin until the summer so long indulged myself, is now gone by, and I must do or half-measures and trifling and pottering, in which I have course pretty easily. Then he changed, The time for indolence, and for a year and a half he took his college Gladstone constantly reproaches himself for natural government's intention to emancipate the catholics. hither the first positive and indubitable announcement of the arrived just before, it was understood; and I suppose brought assembly. It was addressed to the vice-chancellor and had Peel, resigning the seat for the university, was read before the came the most interesting pare of the whole. A letter from was earried by 156 to 48. . . . After the division, however, when the scrutiny took place, it was found that the petition answered by "Peto!" "Peto!" from many quarters. However, House, the question was, "Pelitne aliquis serutinium?" which was had placet and non-placet, and in place of a member dividing the favour of sending up the petition. Instead of aye and no they present. Three speeches were made, two against and one in There were rather above two hundred doctors and masters of arts and I dave say saves the Roman eatholies many a hard word. speaking, etc., and this rule, I assure you, stops many a mouth, transacted in Latin; I mean such things as putting the question, moderate terms possible. All the ordinary business there, is year by year. This time it was worded in the most gentle and which it has long been the practice of the university to send up I say yesterday a most interesting scene in the Convocation, house. The occasion was the debate on the anti-catholic petition, Irish] a king and a parliament of their own, and so to have not be a very good thing if we were to give them [the fright, and mine was asking me this morning whether it would makers, Gladstone writes home, 'seem to continue in a great an oath at baptism, we ought to hold by it. troubled for the king's conscience, observing that if we make come of it as yet. The college scout declared himself much eatholic emancipation, but she did not see that so much had vein informed him how frightened they had all been about a farmer's wife got into the coach, and in communicative not abate. On Gladstone's way to Oxford (April 30, 1829) inscriptions on the walls, soon disappeared, but panic did votes to 609. The relics of the contest, the figures and the 337 yd netred arw. eH brought forward for re-election. and after some deliberation allowed himself to be again A few days later, Peel accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, no inoto to do with them. The old egg-woman is no white no mo inoto to do with them.

The catholic question, that was helping many another and older thing to divide England from Ireland, after having for a whole generation played havee with the fortunes of party and the careers of endesmen, was now drawing swiftly to its close. The Christ Church student land a gimpse of one of the opening scenes of the last act. He writes to his brother (Feb. 6th, 1829):—

A salet, and wonders how Mr. Peel, who was always such a well-beliaved man here, can be so foolish as to lithink of letting in the Roman canholics. The unthinking and the ignorant of all classes were much alike, Arthur Halliam went to see King John in 1827, and he tells his friend how went to see King John in 1827, and he tells his friend how out at the top of his voice, Bravo! Bravo! No Pope! The lounds of elapping, while a gentleanariu the next box cried out at the top of his voice, Bravo! Bravo! No Pope! The same correspondent told Gladstone of the father of a common out at the top of his voice, Bravo! Bravo! No Pope! The groun friend, who had challenged him with the overwhelming than friend, who had challenged him with the overwhelming done any good to the world? A still stormier conflict than even the commonipation of the depths, before Mr. Gladstone Oxford and the country to the depths, before Mr. Gladstone took his degree.

.

him from Cambridge, and really strove hard to make them notes of reminiscence, 'had heard superlative accounts of 'I know Maurico well, says Mr. Gladstone in one of his a signal rather for rivalry than reverential acknowledgment. presence of a commanding spirit would in all other cases be too, men eminent for intellectual power, to whom the , whom Maurice has moulded like a second nature, and these to cultivate his acquaintance. I know many, says Hallam, Hallans had written to Gladstono (Juno 1830) exhorting him many minds in the couning generation. Of Maurice, Arthur more, destined to closo and life-long friendship; F D. Maurico, then of Exeter College, a namo destined to stir so Arthur; Hamilton, afterwards Bishop of Salishury; Phillianother of his Oxford life, were the two Aclands, Thomas and new acquisitions to the circle of his intinnatos at one time or Lincoln. These had all been his friends at Eton. Among Canning, afterwards Lord Canning; the two Denisons; Lord Doyle, Gaskell; Bruce, afterwards Lord Elgin; Charles them were Frederick Rogers, long afterwards Lord Blachford; to have been as a rulo very intimate. Principal among His friendships at Oxford Mr Gladstone did not consider all realities to myself. One Sunday morning we walked to Marsh Baldon to hear Mr. Porter, the incumbent, a calvinist independent of the chique, and a man of remarkable power as we both thought. I think he and other friends did me good, but I got little solid meat from him, as I found him difficult to eateh and still more difficult to hold.

particularly as regards our own situation. I bless and praise tion of an hour and a half with Anstice on practical religion, lately almost engrossed my mind.' Another day—' Conversahad long talks together, 'about that awful subject which has none, to discern the right path for myself.' They afterwards destiny. O for a light from on high! I have no power, may appear to many) which may powerfully influence my Thoughts then first sprang up in my soul (obvious as they Oxford to Cuddesdon on subjects of the highest importance. (1830), Mr. Gladstone conversed with Anstice in a walk from of such a man] will be they.' The diary tells how, in August fixed habits and unremitting industry, these [the example stances could confer upon me the inestimable blessing of perfect self-command, and of great industry. If any circumthan a clever man, a man of excellent principle and of to his father (June 4, 1830) as 'a very clever man, and more him in the deepest things was Anstice, whom he describes had earned. The friend who seems most to have affected its own foolishness by severer doses of mockery than he Philosophy, and on whom the public by and by avenged a grander reputation than he deserved by his Proverbial name of Tupper, who, in days to come, acquired for a time acquaintance. In the account of intimates is the unexpected stone tells us that he certainly was not more than an even contain the name of James Hope; indeed, Mr. Glad-The lists of his guests at wines and breakfasts do not as president of the Union, he did not at this time know both read with the same tutor, and one succeeded the other here first became an acquaintance. Manning, though they Sidney Herbert, afterwards so dear to him, now at Oriel, and John'; but Gladstone was so good a second that Dr. Burton begged that one-fifth of the prize money might be given to him as solutium.

Tupper (My Life, etc., p. 53, and John 1886) mentions that he beat Mr. good a seco Gladstone for the Burton theological that one-seasy, The Reconciliation of Matthew might be genary,

God for his presence here. 'Long talk with Anstice; would with Anstice; he talked much with Saunders on the motivo of actions, contending for the love of God, not selfishness even in its most refined form."

In the matter of his own school of religion, Mr. Gladstono

elorgynan (1529) on the practice of prayer meetings in his the erudest, they deserve much tenderness. He consults a figuration as the opoche pass. Yet in all their fashions, oven oxecssive. The fashion of such words undergoes transthe days of adolescence, may seem uupleaşantly strained and tolerant of the expansion that comes to religious natures in eyes not trained to evangelieal light and to minds not days is not seldom copiously streaked with a vein that, to later, a languago noble and oxalted even in theso youthful letters in the period from Etou to the end of Oxford and lation-and this notwithstanding the premise. In all his tribe or been lost in the mass of the Egyptian poputhe Hebrew nation would have remained a degraded pariah a bane. For instance, he says that lad Moses never existed, intentions directly ovil, does go far enough to be justly called as an antidote, 'for Milman, though I do think without Milman's History of the Jews, and hopes it may be useful delighted (March 1830) with a university sermon against Socinus and other like aliens from gospel truth, He was was placed upon the same lovel among horceiarchs as of Nature. He was scandalised by a sermon in which Calvin narians.' He remembered his shock at Butler's laudatiou and Dr. Maltby, both of them, I believe, regular latitudisuch ecclesizationl appointments as thoso of Sydney Smith Christian Knowledge Society. In 1831 he bitterly deplores Hannah More's tracts have been put on the list of the him in 1830 expressing his satisfaction that a number of at the time show how just this impression was. We find churchman. The tone and dialect of his diary and letters had no part in turning him from an evangelieal into a high was always certain that Oxford in his undergraduate days rooms. His correspondent answers, that as the wicked have their orgies and meet to gamble and to drink, so they that fear the Lord should speak often to one another concerning Him; that prayer meetings are not for the cultivation or exhibition of gifts, nor to enable noisy and forward young men to pose as leaders of a school of prophets; but if a few scholastic learning, and the necessity of mutual stimulation and refreshment, then such prayer meetings would be a safe and ratural remedy. The student's attention to all religious observances was close and unbroken, the most living part of his existence.

The movement that was to convulse the church had not five movement that was to convulse the church had not my religious opinions. With Newman he seems to have them attempted to exercise the smallest influence over both Bishop Lloyd and Dr. Pusey, he says, 'but neither' of their relations were I know not. 'I knew and respected when I was an undergraduate at Oxford,' he says, but what delicacy or generosity.2 'Dr. Pusey was very kind to me conclusive in argument, but assuredly not wanting in either in later life Mr. Gladstone wrote an interesting account, not from Blanco White, that strange and forlorn figure of whom could doubt, all would admire. A good sermon is mentioned and the church? Of his life and heart and practice, none question, 'Are all Mr. Keble's opinions those of scripture A sermon of Keble's at St. Mary's prompts the uneasy sabbatical doctrine is, I, fear, as mischievous as it is unsound. man of much power and many excellences, but his antihad been made Archbishop of Dublin. Doubtless he is a Whately preach a controversial sermon (1831) just after he any tendency to diverge from the beaten path.'1 He hears sway, 'and frowned this way or that, on the first indication of described as a steady, clear, but dry anglican orthodoxy bore as leaning to rationalism.' What Mr. Gladstone afterwards eyed with suspicion as a low churchman, and Dr. Pusey regarded as a model of orthodoxy; that Dr. Newman was when told that when I was at Oxford, Dr. Hampden was yet begun. 'You may smile,' Mr. Gladstone said long after, liborty is not to be considered as the end of government, was a great shiair. Manutee, who had been admitted to the old non coming to Oxford from Cambridge, moved an amendation of non one of severy man has a right to perform certain personni duties with which no system of government has a right to daties with which no system of government has a right to fallen from the mover, "A man finds himself in the world," as interfere. Gladstone 'objected to an observation that had fallen from the mover, "A man finds himself in the world," as a fallen from the mover, "A man finds in the to his parents, and motion of Lord of Dercorn, that Elixabeth's conduct to Mary Queen of Scots was unjustifable and impolitie, was stiffened into 'not only unjustifable and impolitie, was stiffened into 'not only minutider,' and in that severe form was earried vithout a division.

Plenty of monsense was talked we may be sure, and so there was, yo douth, in the Olive Grove of Academo or amiliar bross surmanned Peripateites and the Soci Epiquican. Yet monsonso notwithstanding, the Essay Club bad members who proved in time to have superior minds if over mon had, and their disputations in one another's rooms helped to start trains of ideas and their disputations in one another's rooms deliped to be more their disputations and to shark trains of ideas howover immeture, and to shake the cherished dogmatisms took thours, to world moves, and oxidity their place. This is how the world moves, and Oxford was just beginning to rub its over, arabing to the speculations was just beginning to rub its over, avairing to the speculations of a new time.

When he looked hack in after times, Mr. Gladstone traced one great defect in the education of Oxford. 'Perlaps it was more great defect in the education of Oxford. 'Perlaps it was my war fault, but I must admit that I did not learn aben I was at Oxford that Miels I have learned since—namely, to set a due value on the imperishable and incestimable principle for British liberty. The temper which too much prevailed in a condemical circles was that liberty was regarded with jealousy and foar, something which not wholly be dispensed and foar, something which not abelians of a vitch, but which was to be continually watched for tent of with, but which was to be continually watched tor tent of

CXCGSSGS.

In March 1830 Gladstone made the first of two attempts to vin the scholarship newly founded by Dean Ireland, and from the beginning one of the most coveted of university prizes. In 1830 (March 16) he wrote:—'There is it appears smaller chance than ever of its falling out of the hands of the Shrewsbury people. There is a very formidable one indeed, by name Scott, come up from Christ Church. If it is to go among them I hope he may get it.' This was Robert Scott, afterwards master of Balliol, and finally dean of Rochester, and the coadjutor with Dean Liddell in the famous Greek and the coadjutor with Dean Liddell in the famous Greek but little better success came either to himself or to Scott. He tells his father the story (March 16th, 1831) and collegians who have fought such battles may care to hear it:—

I must first tell you that I am not the successful candidate, and his mind, which he never had felt in any former examination in extremely near thing, and he had great difficulty in making up one of the examiners, told us this morning that it was an Allies, an Eton man, Scott and I are placed together; and Short, almost thought the favourite candidate, and above the others. I am even with the great competitor, Scott, whom everybody consider myself very well off if I came in pretty high. As it is, own expectations regularly declined, and I thought I might Accordingly from the turn it seemed to take as it proceeded, my examination, though, indeed, it is but a lame one without them. that not one of these three points was brought to bear on the verses, and Greek philosophy. . . . It so fell out, however, men on three points, Greek history, one particular kind of Greek depending for any hope of pre-eminence above the Shrewsbury surprise: For my own part, I went into the examination solely had not come up to reside. This result has excited immense now actually at Shrewsbury, but had matriculated here though he believe) a native of Liverpool.1 His name is Brancker, and he is I) yd now need sah qidaralohes edl .eiusaelq uoy evig thinh. after this I shall have nothing to communicate but what will, I

 1 His father was a Liverpool merchant, and had been mayor.

срія елепт

I only trust that you will not be more annoyed than I am by purposes However, we who are beaten are not fair judges educate the mind but merely to cram and stuff it for theso system is radically a false one, and that its object is not to to strengthen, a prevalent impression that the Shrensbury previous events have created, and this has contributed amazingly the scholarship itself more than any individual character, for The result will affect not educated for such objects as these may fairly enough he attributed to the fact that at Eton we were Something horrever present each of us with a set of books its having been so closely contested, the vice chancellor is to answers, while ours were longwinded And in consideration of given to Brancker chiefly on his having written short and concise which he had been engaged, and indeed he laid the preference

de vioteid edd ni emen daedroquii ar bar egbul e eddeviddi Below Allies came Sidney Herbert then at Oricl, and Grove Il Gladstone a essiy was marked 'desultory beyond belief. the questions not only shortly, but most of them right, and Brancher was said to have non because he answered all

tion He sent in a poem on Richard Cour de Lion for the He was equally unsuccessful in mother field of competi scientific speculation.

cobl --to reprint it and at Mr Gladstones request sent bin a Newdigate prize in 1829 In 1893 somebody raked his lent o

condently absent from the ocrses, I will not eas the poem, on true but weak, and has never bot beyond that stade It was with a real devotiou and absorption It was, however, in my view, between thenty and thirts, due perbips to barng read Dante freulty did develop itself in me a little later, that is to east car with which nature had endowed me I think that a poetical at Eton, and was based upon the possession of a bood or tolerable Uhis freulty of erse had been trained I suppose by cree-making was good, and the faculty of poetry, which was very defective exhibited betneen the faculty of rersification which (I thought) On perusing it I was very much etruch by the contrast it was the fit object of legislation, which was carried by thirtybaris suorgiler a to acitacube that thembasing as beyom I' favour of speedy emancipation of the West Indian slaves. he mentions a debate in which a motion was proposed in In the summer of 1831, the policy and memory of Canning. a strongly-worded motion on a happier theme, in favour of as many as a hundred or a hundred and fifty. He spoke for andiences at Eton, for at Oxford they sometimes mustered the orderl so formidable as it used to be before the smaller He writes home that he did not find Sedition Acts of 1795. in the world,—of the Treason and questionable_things oration much admired by his friends, in favour,—of all the his first start in the speaking line (Feb. 1830) in a strong give the reader a couple of specimens verses':-two pieces were written for Lent dean of Christ Church I am able to of Mr. Gladstone's Latin verse. By the kindness of the present

Ocur de Lion; and without hesitation I declined to allow any

He was active in the debates at the Union, where he made reprint.1

ำเการทานมา[[พ i slidviumini iis biupilo nh

Certa tamen lex ipsa manet, labentibus anuis, Nigrantes vetuit mortis inire domos. . Nec pietas, nec casta Fides, nec libera Virtus, Funereæ forsan cras cecinere tubæ, Jamne joci lususque sonant? viget alma Juventus? Sed gelidâ, quam mox dissipat aura, nive: Sed foliis sylvarum, et amici veris odore, Quisquis houos placeat, quisquis alatur amor. Sed brevior brevibus, quas unda supervenit, undis Territa mox tumido verberat astra salo. Respice paeatum Meptuni numine pontum: En nemus exanimum, qua se modo germina, vorno Tempore, purpureis explicuere comis, Singula præteriens det rapiatve dies? Vivimus incertum? Fortuna lusus habemur?

Affirmatur. i iranas tissog osgiss a mulam nk (1830) Gladstone. Que jubet assiduas quæque subire vices.

(1829) Gladstone.

Jurares Paphiæ lumen adesse deæ. Jurasses torvam percuiso astare Medusam Et propris rureum sede potitur Amor, Quum piget Æolium fræna dedisse ducem; Concita non aliter subsidit pectoris unda, Ac veluti ventis intra sua claustra coactis, Et fronte et rubris pingitur omne genis.

Oum ruit hùc illue, speculum simulacra ruentis

Ora Mimalloneo plena furore, refert,

Pectora vesano cùm turgida conspicit æstu,

Quæ fuit (haud qualis debeat ese) videt. Lumen ut insolits triste tumescat aqus? Quicquid in ardenti flammarum corde rotatur, Cernis ut argutas effuderit Anna querelas!

three to theire. Of the most notable of all his successes

His little diary written for no eye but his own, and m the little diary written for no eye but his violating tho the use of which I must beware of the sin of violating and sanctuary, contains in the most concise of daily records all his various activities and attractive picture of duty, industry. Cuddesdon it presents an attractive picture of the day. The and attention, 'constant as the motion of the day.' The centries are much albe, and a few of them will suffice to entring his life and him before us The days for 1830 may bring the talents at random

May 10, 1830 — Prospectively, I has o the following work to do an in the course of this term (I mention it now, that that this course of this term (I mention it now, that that this is a make in a like one blush if I fail) Buttlers Analogy, analysis and St. John Mortogue Huchentoching, Gresson St. Matthew and St. John hooks Prudeaux (a part of, for Herodotus) Themsteeds Greene and st. John Herodotus) Themsteeds Greene Arabic Morton men Papers British Greakell, who had the Merton men Papers Edinburgh Active on Southey's Colloquets, ['Lacaulay s] Ethics

Arrected day God torgree delices Note to Bouthey's Souloguess, ['Lacaulay s] Ethics

Arrected day God torgree

May 13—Wroto to my mother At abates (Union) Aleased Responses, Virgil, Herodolus, Funke and analysis Repers, Virgil, Herodolus, Innean Mathematics and lecture My all with Ansites Wines, finite many Mathematics and lecture Mill with Ansites Wines, finished book 4

May 25 — Finished Porteus's Endoness Got up a fon hard passages Analysis of Porteus Sunday matters in datumity. Themistocles Sat with Inscoo talking. It alk with Canania and et an in the to Mr. of the staben Trapers June 13 Sunday—Chapel mortning and et ening. Thomas a Kenips Erakinos Erakins Tea with Mayow and Cole Kenings Erakinos Erakins Tea with Mayow and Cole Willed with Vinitee to hear Mr Porter, a wild but splended Willed with Vinitee to hear Mr Porter, a wild but splended preacher

June 14—Gave a large wine parts, Divinity locture. Mathemantes Wrote three long letters Herodotus, begin book 4
Protecues. Non-spapers, etc. Thomas à Lempus

June 15.—: Another wine party. Elhics, Herodotus. A little Juvenal. Papers. Hallam's poetry. Lecture on Herodotus.

June 16.—Divinity lecture, Herodotus, Papers, Out at wine.
A little Plate.

June 17.—Ethics and lecture. Herodotus. T. à Kempis. Wino with Gaskell.

June 18.—Breaklast with Chakell. T. h Kempis. Divinity lecture. Herodotus. Wrote on Philosophy wrsus Poetry. A little Persius. Wine with Buller and Tupper. June 25.—Ethies Collections 6-3. Among other things wrote.

June 25.—Ethics. Collections 9-3. Among other things wrote a long paper on religions of Egypt, Persia, Babylon; and on the Satirists. Finished packing books and clothes. Left Oxford between 5-6, and walked fitteen miles towards Leanington. Then obliged to put in, being caught by a thunderstorm. Comfortably off in a country inn at Steeple Aston. Read and spouted some Promethens Vinclus there.

June 26.—Started before 7. Walked eight miles to Banbury. Breakfast there, and walked on twenty-two to Leanington. Arrived at three, and changed. Caskell came in the evening. Life of Massinger.

July 6. Cuddesdon.—Up soon after 6. Began my Harmony of Greek Testament. Differential calculus, etc. Mathematics good while, but in a rambling way. Began Odyssey. Papers. Walk with Anstice and Hamilton. Turned a little bit of Livy into Greek. Conversation on ethics and metaphysics at night.

July 8.—Greek Testament. Bible with Anstice. Mathematics, strued some Thucydides at night. Making hay, etc., with B., H., and A. Great fun. Shelley.

July 10.—Greek Testament. Lightfoot. Butler, and writing a marginal analysis. Old Testament with Anstice and a discussion on early history. Mathematics. Cricket with H. and A. A conon early history.

long but did little. Translated some Phuedo. Butler. Con-on early history. Mathematies. Crieket with H. and A. A conversation of two hours at night with A. on religion till past 12. Thucydides, etc. I cannot get anything done, though I seem to be employed a good while. Short's sermon.

July 11.—Church and Sunday-school teaching, morning and evening. The children miserably deluded, Barrow, Short. Walked with S.

T 'TOA

September 4.—Same as yesterday. Paradiss Lost. Dired with the bishop. Cards at night. I like them not, for they exoite and keep me avake. Constraing Sophocles.

September 18.—Went down early to Wheatley for letters. It is indeed true [the death of Huskisson], and he poor man, was in his last agonies when I was playing cards on Wednesday night. When shall we learn wisdom? Not that I see folly in the fact of playing cards, but it is too often accompanied by a dissipated spirit.

He did not escape the usual sensations of the decultory when face forces them to wear the collar. In face, at times I find it very itseeme, and my having the inclination to view it in that light is to me the suncet demonstration that my mind was in great want of some discipline, and semie regular exertion, for hitherto I have read by fits and starts and just as it pleased me. I hope that this vacation faminer of 1830 will center on me one benefit more important than any having reference merely to my class—I mean the habit of stardy application and strict economy of time.

We can hardly eay that these fragmentary items reveal the extribing vertile day of extraordinary genius the striking or impressive dawn of extraordinary genius. They bear no trace of precedity, and show little more than other of the common virtuous undergraduate. He kept up a correspondence with Hallam, now at Cambridge, and an extract from one of Hallam, at Cambridge, and an extract is a of Hallam's letters may show something of the writer, as of the friend for whose sympathising mind it was intended:—

Academical bonours would be less than ucubing to me were it not be brounded to be the motion of the wishes, and even these are moderate on the subject. It is please God that I make the name I hear bonoured on a second generation, it will be by inward power which it it please William one, I hope to go down to the own reward; it it please Mim not, I hope to go down to the grave unreprinting, for I have lived and loved and been loved; and what will be the momentary pangs of an atomic exclusione when the scheme of that providential love which persons of that providential love which graves of that providential love which graves.

but for a moment: my favourite poet; it will do us good to hear his voice, though This is its centre. Let me quote to their purpose the words of to be the good of each. Other belief consists not with theism. run, that which is the good of all whundantly manifest itself whole, he, the particle, has no right to complain; and in the long whole; that when he suffers, since it is for the good of that to isolate himself, because every man is a particle of a marvellous pressed with it, will liberate mankind is that no man has a right and adored ? The great truth which, when we are rightly im-

All accidents, converting them to good.'1 Whose everlasting purposes embrace "Of infinite benevolence and power, Sad or disturbed, is ordered by a Being That the procession of our fate, however Exists—one only: an assured belief For the calamities of mortal life One adequate support

Whether in Gladstone's diary or, in his letters, in the the world. one of the pair endowed besides with the thews that throw ship of these two, both of them living under pure skies, but our thinking. Such marked efficacy was there in the friendmore mysterious sources than either patience or method in bas relationships springs arons a thousand subtler and were both of them east in another mould. But the efficacy and methodical thinker in the high abstract sphere. They Hallam or Gladstone had in him the making of the patient of evil. In truth there is little sign that either Arthur resolved itself into an unproved assumption of the necessity and significance of evil, like the talk of Leibnitz about it, his son's talk about this old desperate riddle of the origin he prefixes to his son's literary remains, remarks that all Hallam's father, in that memoir so just and tender which

L Excursion, Book iv. p. l. sake; there is little of Milton's 'quiet air of delightful the born scholar eager in search of knowledge for its own presence of a spirit of action, affairs, excitement. It is not of the time-worn sages, we are curiously conscious of the midst of Herodotus and Butler and Aristotle and the rest

Take of the second

studies, and none of Pascal's 'Inbourng for truth mith many studies, and none of Pascal's 'Inbourng for truth mith should be, not howing but doing—honourable desire of success, satisfaction of the hopes of frends, a general hierary appentic, or school preparation for pivents and public duty in the conscious preparation for pivents and the shallons into the doild, a steady pregression out of the shallons into the dopths, a gaze beyond graden and cloister, an agmen, an public series in a damentary of the days of conflict

A

In September 1830, as no have seen, Hushisson had dis appeared Thomas Gladstone was in the train drawn by the Dark that ran over the statesman and hilled him

Poor Huskisson, ho writes to William Gladstone, the great promoter of the rulivoid, has fallen a victim to its opening! As soon as I beard that Huskisson had been run over, I rin and found him on the ground close to the dulo's [Wellington] car, has logs apparently hoth broken (beage only written in his face Whon they write blood, has eyes open, but death written in his face Whon they ruised him a little he said, 'Leare me, iet me die, 'God forgre me, I am dead an a clasd menn' 'I can refor strand this' On Tuceday he made a speceh in the Jixohango revaing from, when hie said he lipped long to represent thom III casid, too, that day, that we nero sure of a time day, for the dulke would have his old luck. Talked jokungly, too, of insuring his hie for I allaced jokungly, too, of insuring his hie lost of party plus into the rule for the rule of the rule.

And he usees, as ethers dad, the extraordinary eirenmeration that the that of people on the line of read the successive and be the dubes great opponent, thus carried off suddenly betere his 90 ex.

Thero n as sono question of Mr John Gladstoue trhing Hushisson's place as one of the members for Liverpool, but he did not coret it. He forces n con man, local grainstellin be saily azinch him be n is nearly lice, and the felt himself foo old to free the triminal Ho looked upon the Wellington government as the only growmment possible, though as a finend of Cammic he freely recognised its defects, the self will of the duke, and freely recognised its defects, the self will of the duke, and

Peel, he had filled his eabinet. His view of the state of parties in the naturn of 1630 is clear and succinet enough parties in the autumn of 1630 is clear and succinet enough to deserve reproduction. 'Huskisson's death,' he writes to his son at Christ Church (October 29, 1830), 'was a great gain to the duke, for he was the most formidable thorn to prick him in the parliament. Of those who acted with enable them to do so, 'As for the whigs, they can all talk and make speeches, but they are not men of business. The alteratories are too contemptible and wanting in talent to be thought of. The radicals cannot be trusted, for they would soon pull down the renerable tabric of our constitution. The liberals or independents must at least generally side with the duke; they are likely to meet each other side with the duke; they are likely to meet each other side with the duke; they are likely to meet each other side with the duke; they are likely to meet each other

In less than a week after this neute survey the duke made his stalwart declaration in the House of Lords against all parliamentary reform. 'I have not said too much, have less the asked of Lord Aberdeen on sitting down. 'You'ld hear of it, was Aberdeen's reply. 'You've amounted the fall of your government, that's all, said another. In a fortail of your government, that's all, said another. In a fortail of your government, that's all, said another in a fortail of your government, that's all, said another in a fortail of your government, that's all, said another in a fortail of your government, that's all, said another in a fortail of your government, that's all, said another in a fortailly for the country was gradually plunged into a determined artifulgele for the amendance of its constitution.

hostile to the second and mightier innovation as hercely hostile to the second and mightier innovation as he had hostile to the second and mightier innovation as he had been eager for the relief of the catholics, and it was in connection with the Reform bill that he first made a public mark. The reader will recall the stages of that event; how the bill was read a second time in the Commons by a majority of one on March 22nd, 1831; how, after a defeat by a majority of eight on a motion on going into committee, by a majority of eight on a motion on going into committee, Lord Grey dissolved; how the country, shaken to its depths, Luly 8th the second reading of the bill was carried by a hundred and thirty-six; how on October 8th the Lords rejected it by forty-one, and what violent commotions that rejected it by forty-one, and what violent commotions that deed provoked; how a third bill was brought in (December

--: 6381 ni etorw ed bneiri at Christ Church was as vehement as the master,1 To a under whatever shape it might appear Canning's disciple subject, he would oppose reform to the end of his life, that if anyhody asked him what he meant to do on the 1820; and afterwards had declared in the House of Commons ning had denounced parliamentary reform at Liverpool in could restrain the activity and zeal of our Oxonian. Canpreparation for the coming ordeal of the examination schools became the law of the land. Not even the pressure of which was to work the miracle of a millennium, actually ministerial erisis ensued; and how at last, in June, the bill, 1832); how the Lords were still refractory; what a lacerating 12th, 1831) and passed through the Commons (March 23rd, subject, and they misled me. and previous bias. Burke and Canning misled many on that Reform hill frightened me in 1831, and drove me off my natural that it supplied an antidete for whatever it had of hane. The truth paramount over all other motives in the mind, and thus to ended still more strongly in my opinion to make the love of rather to the way in which they were bandled: and further, that tendency. I must add that it was not owng to the hooks, but I think that Oxford teaching had in our day an anti-popular or smothered by the expression of popular opinion such as nobility, the gentry, the elergy are to be alarmed, overswed, self-conceit-in overything but its acuteness.' If, sir, tho its recklessness, in its gaping expectancy, in its self-love and mob beneath the grand stand was Athenian in its levity, in were fow, the nobility none, the clergy one only, while 'the in a letter to the Standard (April 7) The genery present ing at Warwick, of which he wrote a contemptuous account famous Jephson, Mr. Gladstone went to a reform meetstantly went in order to be under the medical care of the While staying at Leanington, whither his family cont It is cutions, no may note in later changed his mind and supported in the majority of one, a few weeks Queenliorough, and he, after soting seat. passing, that Thomas Gladstone, his the amendment that destroyed the clotest procedure, was then member for first half. At the election he lost his such a thing since Pontius Pilate. Wetherell, that Brougham was the first judge who had done Gladstone repeats with deep complacency a saying of committed the enormity of hearing causes on Good Friday, and its small alike moved his indignation. When Brougham most richly deserved impeachment. Its great innovations say that, as far as he could form an opinion, the ministry and his rhetoric was perfectly sincere. He felt bound to so many who had not the sovereign excuse of youth, dolorous spectres haunted him incessantly, as they haunted death are already creeping over England's glory.' These and stability is no more, and that the chill and damp of infallible as it is appalling, that the day of our greatness correction of the stocks, what is it but a symptom as revolution, as an ox goeth to the slaughter or a fool to the rushing or heedlessly sauntering along the pathway of need to undeceive this unhappy multitude, now eagerly this, and if no great statesman be raised up in our hour of water. On another day:sufferer from taking his part in a mighty bonfire in Peck-A hoarseness and cold, which did not, however, prevent the could be heard.' The effect of these exercitations was a there was so much row raised that not one of the candidates perfect good temper. At the nomination in the town hall elbowed one another and bawled and bellowed with the most and after we had dismounted, we went among them and say they were for the most part exceedingly good-humoured, mob enough on both sides, but I must do them justice to were all covered with mud from head to foot. There was 'and we looked as well as we could do, considering that we procession, writes the impassioned student to his father, nomination. I mounted the mare to join the anti-reform to bring in the anti-reform candidate for the county to the great election, and Oxford turned out her chivalry gallantly The undergraduates took their part in the humours of the

I went with Denison and another man named Jeffreys between eleven and twelve. We began to talk to some men among Weyland's friends; they crowded round, and began to hollox received an important lesson from a lumblo source with foreign countries? This is not the only time that I have words, 'Damn all foreign countries, what has old Lugland to do and Bolgnum The mrn looked hard at me and said these very at the revolutions in fereign countries, meaning of centre France uns revolution To corroborate my doctrine I said, "It by, look rdds in a fragment of later years,] on the established text, ictorm forth to a werking man, possibly a forty shilling frecholder, [he they now quote as their authority, been made in 1829? I held ministry have said had the appeal to the voice of the people, which bill and then against the Reform What would this atrocous Why, he voted against the country both times for the Catholic greed One man said to me " hat, vote for Lord Morreys? anti reformers nero alike sensitive on that point and perfectly ality of all counties) against the catholic question Reformers and the freeholders (who may be taken as a last specimen of the gener Brown Buileof edt er grows wod bue enominenn wod bedeinotes. when alone, but happily escaped You would he beyond measure proportion made some laugh, and once very nearly got hustled alone, conversed with a great number, shook hands with a fair of York) Atternards they left me, and I pursued my nork court, son of the greatest parson in England but one (Archbishop it by reminding them that they were going to sote for Mr Harhappened to be true, and flabhergasted me, but he happily turned n bich made one man bolloa, 'Ob, his friber a parson. This St Thomase When we were talking, Jeffreys said something rescued us in great style I shall ever he grateful to the men of men from St Thomas's, broke their ranks, raised a shout, and to a desperate bustle, when lot up rushed a body of Norreys' Trotered are were making a sort of ring round us preparatory

A more important scene which his own fitting eminiones made in a sense distorie, was a debake at the Union upon. Referm in the same month, where his contribution (Way so powerful so incomparably splendid did it seem to their some state of the seem to their splendid one of the splendid one of the seem to their splendid one of the seem to their splendid one of the splendid one of the seem to the splendid one of the splendid one of the seem to the splendid one of the splendid one of the splendid one of the splendid one of the seem to the splendid one of the splendid one of 1831) as modest enough — is no been been and it should really been such is worth while to refer to it. The way in which the present which you will see in Saturday's paper, if you think it wrote a letter to the Standard giving an account of the division, is, has been done in reference to this question. On Friday I England expects every man to do his duty; and ours, humble as it our side, and we had fewer truants in proportion to our numbers. in bringing men down, but the tactics on the whole were better on divided on the first night. Great diligence was used by both parties thirty-eight. We should have had larger numbers still had we was favourable beyond anything we had hoped-ninety-four to named Alston, which produced an excellent effect, and the division a conversion speech from a Christ Church gentleman-commoner, answer, but very ineffectually from the nature of the case. We got attack on Mr. Canning's friends, which Gaskell did his best to than length. Doyle spoke remarkably well, and made a violent stare. However, I fear it does not necessarily imply much more of the society's having done so, which used to make us all gape and of an hour, and there was a legend circulated about an old member one of the finest things in the world to speak for three-quarters society, to speak from three to ten minutes) I thought it must be remember at Eton (where we used, when I first went into the spouted nearly an hour, and I was guilty of three-quarters. were generally short enough. Moncreiff, a long-winded Scotsman, man spoke above his average, and many very far beyond it. They our side and thirteen on theirs, or something of that kind. Every indeed anxious. As it was, there were I think fifteen speeches on hausted. There were eight or nine more on ours ready, and partly decause the speakers of the revolutionary side were exthen, partly because the votes and got tired of dancing attendance, society. The debate altogether lasted three nights, and it closed government, and ultimately to break up the whole frame of that the Reform bill threatened to change the form of the British character, and I moved what they called a 'rider' to the effect to carry on the government of the country was of a miscellaneous The discussion on the question that the ministers were incompetent anything like it known here before and will scarcely be again. might have heard our debate, for certainly there had never been to have permitted your visiting Oxford hast week, so that you generation of undergraduates is divided on the question is quite

The occasion was to prove a memorable one in his career, and a few more lines about it from lus diar; will not be con sidered superflueus —

Aloy 16th —Sleepy Mathematics, few and shuffling, and lecture Read Cannings reform speeches at Liverpool and made extracts. Rode out: Debate, which was adjourned I am to try my hand to morrow My thoughts were but ill-arranged, but I fear they will be no better then Wino with Anstree Singing. I fear they will be no better then

May 17th—Ethres Little mathematics A good deal or hausted in forencon from heat last night Dined with White and bad wine with lim also with young Acland. Cognisations on it. Spoke at the adjourned about 50 three-guarters of an hour, manacimitely after Gaskell who was preceded by Lincoln Row after and adjournment. Tes with Wordsworth duction here). He went with his son in the main he says meso futher upon his sons performance (too long for repro bur breatle and the onticism of the uniters shrewell and the author nould take the money risk. The most putercalmany thousand glowing hearts that he would purbush it if os nozon seil telli eliminol reilimel oot old ni boilqor ban Hatchard doubted the success of an anony mous paruphlet pamphlet (July 1831) and sent it to Hatchard the publisher Suol e our ot nuob ies Aliemor Builinds Albigar sen distance from the days of doon in the examination schools preparation of an elaborate petition and the gathering off sturdy placards against the monstrous bill and besides the published Besides his speech, besides the composition of the speech and with its effect that he wished to have it eccurred His fither was so well pleased nith the gleries of brit serif me all ef us felt that an epoch in our lives had When Gladstene sat down one of his contemperaties has this given in Robbins Arriy Lie, pp. 194 a.

but I cannot go all your lengths, and the language of his judgment sheds a curious light upon the vehement temperament of Mr. Gladstone at this time as it struck an affectionate yet firm and sober monitor.

In the autumn of 1831 Mr. Gladstone took some trouble to be present on one of the cardinal occasions in this fluctuating history:—

able and manly decision, and so may God avert them. the vote may be awful. God avert this. But it was an honourto seeming of the evening with Canning The consequences of to my brother and to Gaskell. Tea with Phillimore and spent off by the Alert. Arrived safely, thank God, in Oxford. Wrote walked home. Went to bed for an hour, breakfasted, and came about until the division, and joined Wellesley and [illegible] as we mained with Ryder and Pickering in the coffee-room or walking having been compelled by exhaustion to leave the House. Reand the Duke of Wellington. Lord Grey's reply I did not hear, narvon, Mansfield, Wynford; next Lords Lyndhurst, Wharncliffe, best speeches, I thought, were those of Lords Harrowby, Carattempt, certainly seemed to me to be with the opposition. Their ing or the attempt to reason, independently of the success in such hended nearly all the oratorical merit of the debate. The reasonand Lord Lansdowne's extremely good, and in these was comprelittle that was new. Lord Grey's most beautiful, Lord Goderich's exuberance in sarcasm. In point of argument it had, I think, appreciated by any hearsay mode of information, and with fertile woulderful, delivered with a power and effect which cannot be hunting during the morning. Lord Brougham's as a speech most duction to Butler. Wrote to Saunders. Much occupied in order-College, which I went to see; also London Bridge. Read introevening. Read Peel's speech and sundry papers relating to King's Had a full view of the peeresses. There nine or ten hours every a round transverse rail, very fortunate in being so well placed. underwent a somewhat high pressure. At the four others sat on interest in the House of Lords. The first, I went forwards and Blackstone's chaise. Present at five nights' debate of infinite October 3rd to 8th.-Journey to London. From Henley in

1831

BOOK

This was the memorable occasion when the Lords through to the Lords the levision bill by 199 to 158, the division not taking place until six o clock in the membranes, were 'an'thi' enough to secure the reversal of the decision. It seems, so far as the country materialy made membranes, we far as I seems, so far as I secure, the reversal of the decision it seems, so far as I most consumnate debrices that ever irred had the fortune of listening to entions entry --to see the Lords throw out the Reform bill, he made t intellectual projects of his own A for days before he went nobrob for bib agrb onoggd to nom to erobe out gnome frigues in store for him then even this The heavy nork gone more than once in a lifetime. Inne had inighter result, made reading for a class a thing not to be undertritigno the mental fringue, and the auxiety as to tho par for such evertions He declared that the bodily self, strango as it now sounds, rather below than above no more to stint cither exercise or sleep, thinking himdays he slowly spread full sail again, and took good care to a full stop After absolute remission of nork for a few affected the head, and in August almost brought him burpose of entertainment. Then his eyes because painful, offeet in this way, then books written professedly for the gramed stuff produces a much more decided and better It is odd enough, though true, that reading hard close humour though in itself not the mest delectable kind twelve heurs a day it 'proved as of old a cure for illhad fallen fairly to work more or less close for ten or was at the political entlook in the beginning of July he pripers had not impaired his studies. Disgusted as he Meanwhile intense interest in parliament and the news-

Λ

Oddee, 3nd, 1841— starten an iden, a chimory, articleted my head, of gribering during the progress of my life, notes and Elementrials for a nork embreaing three divisions, thei many jears Elifornium, and I commit this notice to paper now, thei many jears benees, if it please (cod, I may find it either a pleasant of at least an instructive reminiscence, a pleasant and instructing one, I trust, if I may ever be permitted to execute this design; instructive if it shall point while in embryo, and serve to teach me the folly of presumptuous schemes conceived during the buoyancy of youth, and only relinquished on a discovery of incompetency in later years. Meanwhile I am only contemplating the gradual accumulation of materials.

The reading went on at a steady pace, not without social intermissions:—

Oct. 11th and 12th.—Rode. Papers. Virgil. Thucydides, both days. Also some optics. Wrote a long letter home. Read a chapter of Butler cach day. Hume. Breakfasted also with with great Lady Clanning]. She received us, I thought, with great kinduces, and spoke a great deal about Lord Grey's conduct with reference to her husband's memory, with great animation and excitement; her hand in a strong tremor. It was impossible not to enter into her feelings.

Then comes the struggle for the palm:—

an idle day. Had a good ride with Gaskell. Spent part of the Very kind in him to ask me. Made Saturday in great measure to be very thankful. . . . Dined with Pearson at the Mitre. Heard cheering accounts indirectly of myself, for which I ought digested. In the evening, Greek to translate and illustrate. historical questions. Wrote a vast quantity of matter, ill enough not and cannot understand. On Friday we had in the morning badly, but I afterwards heard, better than the rest, which I could veface in morning, in evening critical questions which I did very a clever and agreeable man. On Thursday a piece of Johnson's latter somewhat abstract. Dined at Gaskell's and met Pearson, speech into Latin with logical and rhetorical questions-the about six and a half hours at work or under. First Strafford's one. In the schools Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; each day Got up a little Polybius, and the history out of Livy, decade over my books of extracts, etc. Read some of Whately's rhetoric. Agamemnon. Got up Aristophanic and other hard words. Went preparing. Read most of Niebuhr. Finished going over the Monday, November 7th to Saturday 12th.—In the schools or overing with him. Read about six hours Sunday, November JSM.—Chapel thrice Bretheat and much conversation with Cameron. Read flible Some divinity of a character approach in go cram Looked over my shorter abstract of Butler. Tea with Harrison Walk with Caskell Wine with Hamilton, more of a party than I quite liked or expected. Altogether my mind was in an unsatisfactory state, though I heard a most admirable sermon from Tyler on Betheeda, which could not have been more epportune if written on purpose for those who are going into the schools. But I am sold, timid, and norlidly, and not into the schools. But I am sold, timid, and norlidly, and not into the schools. But I am odd, timid, and norlidly, and not in healthy state of mind for the great timi of nondialy, and no with I am uttorly and miscrably unequal, but which I also know will be scaled for good.

1831

BOOF

Here is his picture of his vica voce examination

Deutsons, and wrote home with exquisite pleasure been in ing power. Afterwards rode to Cuddesdon with the nithout whom not even such moderate performances would have mill of [saned! Larviz] thomon trut to glad for blood I ban At the end of the science, of course, my spirits were much raised, beyond everything, a bood many persons there, and all friendly Persus Everything was in in favour, the examiners hind Herodotus, Thucy dides, Odywy, Anstophanes (Veywe), and books besides the Testament, namely Rhetoric, Ethics, Phalo, read yough to me or the close. I was only put on in eight an agreeable and short one in my poets from Cremer, who spoke followed a very elever evamination in history from Carbett, and requanted with 3 our books, or something to that effect. Then have construed extremely well, and appear to be theroughly circumstance in my favour He said to me, 'Thank you, you heresiareld in science, a beautiful examination, and with overy I did not auswer as I could bare washed Hampden [the famous was little troubled with fear Examined by Stocker in dismity hard words Went into the schools at ten, and from this time Polyhius, short ahstract of ethics, and definitions. Alse some Notember 14th -Spent the morning chiefly in leaking over my

In well proposed to story by some contemporary lies attended on the pure to have details of Herodotus only brought out his knowledge more fully; how the excitement reached its climax when the examiner, after testing his mastery of some point of theology, said: 'We will now leave that part of the subject, and the candidate, sir; if you please, we will not leave it yet,' and began to pour forth a fresh stream. Ten days later, after a morning much disturbed and excited he rode in the afternoon, and by half-or the list was out, with Gladstone and Denison both of them in the first class; Phillimore and Maurice in the second; Herbert in the fourth.

lasted four days. The doctor gave him draughts to quiet On December 10th the mathematical ordeal began, and sermons. Paid visits to old people. God and Mammon." Read Bible and four of Horsley's and evening. Saunders preached well on "Ye cannot serve remarkable one it is:—'Teaching in the school morning examination, this is the entry, and a characteristic and exertion increased with it. For the Sunday before the subject, Aly work continued and my reluctance to and more thoroughly convinced of my incapacity for the misgivings for the future. 'Every day I read, I am more metry, calculus, trigonometry and the rest, filled him with and all of them in high spirits. But optics, algebra, geohours a day at his hardest, riding every day with Denison, the two schools he passed at Cuddesdon, working some ten Then mathematics were to come. The interval between

On December 10th the mathematical ordeal began, and lasted four days. The doctor gave him draughts to quiet his excitement. Better than draughts, he read Wordsworth every day. On Sunday (December 11th) he went, as usual, twice to chapel, and heard Meyman preach 'a most able discourse of a very philosophical character, more apt for reading than for hearing—at least I, in the jaded state of my mind, was unable to do it any justice. On December 14th, the list was out, and his name was again in the first class, again along with Denison. As everybody knows, Peel had won a double-first twenty-three years before, and in asthematics Peel had the first class to himself. Mr. Gladstone in each of the two schools was one of five. Anstice, whose counsels and example he counted for so much at one whose counsels and example he counted for so much at one double crown and was, like Peel alone in the mathematical BOOK epoch in his cellegiate life, in 1830 carried off the same

first class

1831

December 13th - After finding the first practicable ceach to I eft Oxford on the Champion my eld tuter Knapp length to Mrs G [his mother], Gaskell, Phillimore, Mr Denison, Wrote at more or less Locked up my things Denison, Jeffreys, and myself, was very hearty илио илер Oxford 1 nices mare not hand shahing hetween for his extreme hindness), and such of my friends as were in departure Saw the Dean, Biscoc, Saunders (whom I thanked was well kept in check by the bustle of preparation for speedy the future, for the future was, I bope, not excluded, and feeling It was an hour of thrilling happiness, between the past and

Left Holbern at ten, in Cambridge before five Cambridge was just able to manage breakfast in Bedford Square bottom of my lie itt i say with more truth than I can say, I love her from the presed through this great and famous university this can and trult thrut r don at oradl. Antienes at with at others mutations of his career, to Oxford his affection was prablolim in odt bind. Comuog old guol zul to ogete tern odt he made his wy home, having thus truinphantly achieved Grey, and 'copied a letter of Mr Pitts' I'rom Cumbridgo met Stanhope, an eld Lton man, and the two sons of Lord sermon from Suncen, the head of the English er mycheals, to gloneus authems at Innity and langs, tried to hear a renowed his requaintance with the elder Hillim, listened Breemin to Smyth, the professor of history, to Blibesley, introduced to the inighty Whencil, to Spedding, the great Cambridge He heard Hallam recite his declamation, was are capable of it knew newhere else than at Oxford and full of the peculiar excitement and felicity that those $n \ln \theta$ Tranky, and father of his Oxford tnier He had a rest Here he was received by Werdsnorth the innster of

1 O'104 I' 14P 2' 12'0)

 $I\Lambda$

for the present moment. This letter the reader will find in an object beyond the finding food for it, mental or bodily, of the beings that move so busily in it to and fro, without contemplates the pursuits, desires, designs, and principles who 'casts his eye over the moral wilderness of the world, who votion to that office, he argues, must be plain to any one upon himself the clerical office. The special need of deto forsake the ordinary callings of the world and to take summons him with a voice too imperative to be resisted, being, and as a rational and reasonable being to God, declares his conviction that his duty, alike to man as a social throughout one of the marking traits of his career. He demands of spiritual and of secular life, which remained double-mindedness, that division of sensibility between the ordinary intensity of his religious disposition, and of that interest as the first definite indication alike of the extrason to parent on such a subject ever was, and it is of special the appeal contained in it is as earnest as any appeal from letter is exorbitant in length, it is vague, it is obscure; but the question to an immediate and final settlement. The subject of my future profession, wishing if possible to bring Wrote a very long letter to my dear father on the my future line of conduct. God direct me. I am utterly Uncomfortable again and much distracted with doubts as to Herodotus. ¿Enprupevos. Construing Thucydides at night. the entry is this:—'Began Thucydides. Also working up fluent tract to a personal decision. On August 4th, 1830, the Bible. At Oxford his fervour carried him beyond the if he be unfortunate enough to doubt the authority of the editor to try Leslie's Short Method with the Deists, than he has over his stature or his colour, and beseeching proposition that 'man has no more control over his belief, a Liverpool newspaper, carnestly contesting its appalling composed a long letter, of which the manuscript survives, to chapter. At the end of 1828, the youthful Gladstone had Another episode must have a place before I close this times for good sometimes for evil such a mood has played of redent natures of either sex. In a thousand forms some supreme external will, is a well known element in the youth some apostolic destination, the glow of self devotion to a BOOK full elsewhere? The missionary impulse, the Jearning for minediate matter is the approaching performance in the that it is too carly to decido so grave an issue, and that the common senso Lpe seu quennilà recebts the admonstron with sympath, with entire patience, and with thorough His facher replied as a nise man nas sure to do, almost never faded unpulse in its first slippe did not endure, but in essence it tes part in history. In this case, as in many another, the thusqlf soc ! go Under circumstances so formulable, he dates not look through its property. The whole foundation of society may the existence of the church establishment to be assailed confict proceeding in pirlininent foreshidons i contest for that the heart is to be michael through the head. The bo existed through the heart, but Benthamsus membans another kind Christianity teaches that the head is to Power, one haid of agnorance is and to take the place of ment, and under the plausible maxim that knowledge is male the substitute for the old bends of unreasened attach nu morris, politics, education Tulightened self interest is in the history of mankind. Now principles, he says, previol ment has subsided, but still he sees at hand a great crisis stone tells his father (Jan 17th, 1832) how the oreitethe first, but nith more concentrated power, Mr Clad parts of this second letter no less value and ebscure than n'rs now finally settled At almost equal length, and in adrico ultenorer you may wish for it, The eritted issue for it will then rest wholly with jourself having our and have greater confidence in the choice jou may make, respects I on will then have seen more of the world from the continent and complete your education in all mined the profession you are to follow, until you return written (Nov 8th, 1830), Jour proposal to lerto undeteror unmation schools I lughly approve, his father had for the comparative calm and ease of a professional life. He must hold himself free of attachment to any single post and function of a technical nature. And so—to make the long story short—'Aly own desires for future life are exactly coincident with yours, in so far as I am acquainted with them; believing them to be a profession of the law, with a view substantially to studying the constitutional branch of it, and a subsequent experiment, as time and circumstances it, and a subsequent experiment, as time and circumstances he had written to his brother John (August 29th, 1830), to he had written to his brother John (August 29th, 1830), to think of an inclination opposed to that of my beloved father, and this was evidently one of the preponderant motives in his final decision.

1831

In the same letter while the fire of another devotion.

and renown. full sunshine of a triumphant career of duty, virtue, power, moments come back to Mr. Gladstone's mind, even in the a high-wrought hour may in other hues have at many hint an oracle of their lives. Perhaps these forebodings of longings and expectations.' So men unconsciously often and which I fear would make my life a fever of unaatisfied subjects which have ever proved sufficiently alluring to me, excitable, that I should fear giving up my mind to other truth. Especially as I feel that my temperament is so in his ruins, the magnificence and the glory of Christian commissioned to set before the eyes of man, still great even is prepared to yield other hopes and other desires for this—of being permitted to be the humblest of those who may be that in spite of other longings which I often feel, my lieart pe conjq entely know:—''''' am willing to persuade myself sentences that contain words of deeper meaning than yas still fervid within him, he had penned a couple of In the same letter, while the fire of apostolic devotion

The entry in his diary, suggested by the return of his birthday (Dec. 29, 1831), closes with the words, 'This has been my debating society year, now, I fancy, done with. Politics are fascinating to me; perhaps too fascinating.' Higher thoughts than this press in upon him:—

Industry of a kind and for a time there has been, but the industry of necessity, not of principle. I would fain believe that

1831

omeft gurug slid r bas gmvil a osai strigs gaiserfro to faint and languating embers be kindled by the truth of the of duty he large or small, hut may it he duly filled May those orange off the Redcemer It matters not whether the sphere work (whereof the worker is only God) I might grow into the that I might work an energetic nork in this world, and by that at times has risen high in my soul, a fervent and a buoyant hope in the pretracted, though well nigh dormant life of a desire which loves us all, still vouchsafo mo a testimony of His ahiding presence May the God who acter and results in relation to myself God uso me as a ressel for his own purposes, of whatever char benefit of prayer-of the life of obedience and self sacrifice on my mind—it is the mereased importance and necessity and One conclusion theoretically has been much 1 baltbom ells augmented, but wherein have my deeds of duty been proportion - untrammelled, but if this he true, my responsibility is indeed BOOK my sentiments in religion have been somenhat enlarged and

et mward tife with the same aspiration third birthday closed the same self represent for sluggishness before, the sublimest of English peets and on his twenty-Every reader will remember how just two hundred Jears

As ever in in great tashingolet's eve All 15, if I have grace to use it so, Towards which time keels me and the will of herren To that same lot however mean or lugh, It shall be still in strictest measure even Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,

Gladstone summed up her influence upon him -The generations after he had quitted the university, Mr me an incitimable service. Howhere I have not serupled to integrity of Aristotle, and still more of buther, conferred upo a bibinde of T plate to be an end attrit of the splending little, but in the region of philosophy she had initiated it not foundations of my liberalism School pursuits had revealed not hieritate to say that Oxford had even at this time Ind the excellence cannot grow up in a nation without it And yet I do liberty is a great and precious guts of God, and that human Oxford had rather tended to hide from mo the breat fact that speak with severity of myself, but I declare that while in the arms of Oxford, I was possessed through and through with a virgin love of truth, with a virgin love of truth, so that, although I might be swathed in clouds of prejudice there was something of an eye within, that might gradually pierce them.

H Hoode

9†8I 588I

CHAPTER 1

ENTERS PARLIAMENT ENTERS PARLIAMENT

I MAY speak of this House of Commons as a school of thespines for these of the House of Commons as a school for a transfer of the power and effects a first a great and eshool for the reaston of all the qualities of force, suppleases, and rereatinty of intellects. And it is also a great meral school. It is a school of temper, It is also a great meral school. It is a school of the comparture of the school of partures of the school of the school of partures.

being, for that it shangs was, but of the frame and mould course, a transformation not of religion as the centre of his future path. In either view it marked a change of spiritual eid noqu obada a do guiddones wordt rolltone of guidroose ono religious school Lindled a saving illumination, and A conception now began to possess him, that according to contains one entry of no small moment in his mental history, Of this long journey he kept a full record, and it visited Brussels, Paris, Florence, Zaples, Rome, Vemee, and of Fobraary. He did not return meil the end of July. He left England along with his brothor John at the leginning and after a day or two nith relatives and friends in London, Newman at St. Mary's, took his bachelor's degree (Jan. 26), settled accounts, heard a very able sermen indeed from his way to Ozford, where he laboured through his packing, A Wordsworth for a pocket companion, Mr. Gladstono mado LEAVING home in the latter part of January (1832), with bingra of and noighby chick in to expand

1832 II.

as he passed, that a great mutation overtook him. from Euster Day, through the great sinful streets of Naples Rome. It was, however, in the words of Clough's fine line chill at his heart he came upon the atmosphere of gorgeous would have been ealled in England vital religion. With this apparently much like other men. Even the pastor, though a quiet, inoffensive man, gave no sign of energy or of what and he underwent a chill of disappointment on finding them framed a lofty conception of the people as ideal Christians, to Pinerol, and seen one of the Vaudois valleys. He had by a disenchantment, for ho had made his way from Turin no fleeting impression of a traveller. It had been preceded seantily realise, any bond of sympathy or union.' This was eneumbrances that you searcely own, and can yet moro everlasting truth; yet such is the mass of intervening to abrow out bun etuina unitairdD to asgami out allaw eti feel when you enter this magnificent temple and behold in itself, yet whose melancholy effects the mind is doomed to fathers of the English Reformed Church but upon Rome Rome—whose guilt surely rests not upon the venerable morn su separates neing separates us from first longed for its visible attainment. Here no felt the perienced his 'first conception of unity in the Church,' and In entering St. Peter's at Rome (March 31, 1832) he ex-

One Sunday (blay 13) something, I know not what, set me on examining the occasional offices of the church in the prayer book. They made a strong impression upon me on that very day, and the impression has never been effaced. I had previously taken a great deal of teaching direct from the Bible, as best I could, but now the figure of the Church arose before me as a teacher too, and I gradually found in how incomplete and fragmentary a manner I had also missed in the thirty-nine articles some things indeed I had also missed in the thirty-nine articles some things which ought to have taught me better. Such, for I believe that I have given the fact as it occurred, in its silence and its solitude, was my first introduction to the august conception of the Church of Christ. It presented to me Christianity under an aspect in of Christ. It presented to me Christianity under an aspect in which I had not yet known it: its ministry of symbols, its channels of grace, its unending line of terchers joining from the channels of grace, its unending line of throughout upon distoric fact, uplifting the idea of the community in which we have to the presence of the float High From this time I began to feel my way presence of the float High From this time I began to feel my way by degrees into or towards a time notion of the Church I become a definite and organised idea when, at the suggestion of lames Adelinte and organised idea when, at the suggestion of lames a definite which we just published and remarkable nork of Fainer Hope, I read the just published and remarkable nork of Fainer Hope, I read the just published and remarkable nork of Fainer Hope, I read the just published and remarkable work of Fainer

BOOK of IL

The mighty question—what is the nature of a church and what the duties titles and symbols of includin membership, which in divers titles and shahen the world for so many ages and now first dawned upon his ardent mind, was the goins of a deep and lasting pro occupation of which we shall speedily and nethous ecsention and abundant traces

11

This much it heist became clear to me by the time Count and sander and I me of an ench a matter large moray the met mee of a single person (Lincoln) that person Tirst because the Dul o of Newcastles offer must have been is not of so intoxicating a character is it seemed nt first oremng there has been time to reflect and to see that it on which I received it in a flutter of confusion Since that his father (July 8) inturally lets mo the whole of the evening This sturming or erporering proposed he sign Oaford Union. No wonder that such an offer made him This was the fruit of his finnous anti reform speech at the disposal if he should be read, to enter partitionity life. influence in the berough of Neurit was at Mr Gladstones father the Duke of Noncastle to inform him that his Lord Lincoln saying that he was commissioned by his unneugo before him. At Milan he received a letter from life if rival we may eall it was forced into startling pro-A fow neeks later tho great rival interest in Mr Gradstone a

I had recovered my breath, that decidedly novo than more pormission from my desir tather i onld be necessary to anticonferm of particulus

at all.' And then he falls into a vein of devout reflection, almost as if this sudden destination of his life were some irrovocable priesthood or vow of monastic profession, and not would be thin and narrow to count all this an overstrain. To a nature like his, of such eager strength of equipment; conscious of life as a battle and not a parade; apt for all external action yet with a burning glow of light and fire in the internal spirit; resolute from the first in small things and in great against aimless drift and eddy,—to such an one the moment of fixing alike the goal and the track may one the moment of fixing alike the goal and the track may heretofore asked for pledges, nor now demanded them. was informed by his brother that the duke had neither on which patron and member were to stand? Mr. Gladstone abridge the member's independence? What was the footing contribution towards expenses. Would not this tend to awkwardness appeared. The duke had offered a handsome keep Huskisson out of the Wellington cabinet. Another wards in the same spirit striven with might and main to busiest and bitterest of Canning's enemies, and had after-Mr. Canning?' The duke had in fact been one of the he have had in his mind, my father's connection with to entertain towards Arr. Canning? Does he know, or can inquire of myself, does the duke know the feelings I happen minister the country had ever had. Now it struck me to the House of Lords, declared him the most profligate Then points of doubt arose. 'It is, I daresay, in your recollection,'—this to his father—'that at the time when Mr. Canning came to power, the Duke of Mewcastle, in

After a very brief correspondence with his shrewd and generous father, the plunge was taken, and on his return to England, after a fortnight spent 'in an amphibious state between that of a candidate and idiorny, or private person,' he issued his address to the electors of Newark (August 4, 1832). He did not go actually on to the ground until the end of September. The intervening weeks he spent with his family at Torquay, where he varied electioneering correspondence and yachting with plenty of sufficiently serious spondence and yachting with plenty of sufficiently serious stone's countless political pilgrimages. midnight, Such in forty hours was the first of Mr. Gladthe day was fine. Tea at Stainford; arrived at Nowark at through the heavy tog of Lendou sky, but in the country High Flyer for Norack. The sun hevered red and cold washed and breakfasted, and eamo off at 8 o'elock by a Piccadilly, 184 hours from Exeter. Went to Fetter Lane, Christian Icur [published 1827] At 61 A. arrived at Excellent mail. Dined at Yeovil; read a little of tho which we agreed in disapproving. Gave him some tracts. countryman who got in for a few miles, on Sunday travelling, the prayers. Mail to London. Conversation with a tory near an hour; went to the eathedral and heard a part of My father drove me to Newton; chaise to Exeter. There . . . fair I an Was Touto journey. Was I right? . . . fasted speedily, with infinite disgust. I left Torquay at 84 urgently needed at Nowark, 'I rose, dressed, and breakburst into his bedroom, with the news that his presence was - to Corinne. One Sunday morning (September 23), his father BOOK reading from Blackstone and Plate and the Excursion down stoutly. They put his name into their black schedule with axperience and talent. The unit-slavery men fought him constituency on a candidate of considerable commercial press. The tory paper, on the contrary, congratulated the odt mort fres need mobles had abrow to noiteellee beldmut the first of Mr. Gladstone's two addresses, that a more however, interfere. The whig newspaper said roundly of our fellow countrymen is not now the case.' He did not, remuneration, which nuhappily among soveral classes of much startled by the passage about labour receiving adequate a dignified and impartial foreign policy. The duke was emancipation until that instruction had fitted them for it; Christian instruction for the West Indian slaves, but no grounds; adequate remuneration of labour; a system of ments; correction of the poor laws; allotinent of cottago and state, the defence in particular of our Irish establishmodern programme, the points are these: - union of church for so memorable a journey. Thrown into the form of a His two election addresses are a curious starting-point duke's interest!' before, I believe, they never supported any one on the vote: they came forward, and enrolled their names, though even, of almost every religious seet! Not one refused their faction of baptists, wesleyan methodists, and I may say he made his replies, to the thorough and complete satisversation, but by the tact, quickness, and talent, with which who was present, 'he shone not only in his powers of conhotel, and according to the friendly narrative of his brother, interview with forty voters of abolitionist complexion at his election address, and apparently made converts. He had an held to the ground he had taken at Oxford and in his list of the zealous soldiers of humanity. The candidate these standard sophistries should be placed on the black of surface. We cannot be surprised that any adherent of His father's pamphlets undenbtedly exposed a good deal if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death. declaring that the that stealeth a man and selleth him, or hin on the hustings whether he know a text in Exodus have commended the regulation of it, by bluntly asking doctrine that if slavery were sinful the Bible would not posers from a pamphlet of his father's, and they met his nine-and-twenty other emididates, they harried him with a right to do as he liked with his own. This clear-cut enunhaughty truism, then just ceasing to be true, that he had brought him into a novel age, defended himself with the duke, whose chief fault was not to know that time had audacity of a petition to parliament was projected. The carried with bands of music through the streets. Even the The notices were framed, affixed to poles, and forty of them with notice to quit. Then the trodden worm his nominee, by serving, in concert with another proprietor, the whigs of the borough for the outrage of voting against the Duke of Newcastle, who three years before had punished influence over about one quarter of them was exercised by lot qualification, to elect a couple of members. The principal contained rather under sixteen hundred voters on a scot and old story, and Newark had its full share of them. The register The humours of an election of the ancient sort are a very eloquence and argument by daract aginence, of which haly paly splendours the old braids of the club silently supplemented and disply its beauty and its glory. Annul these oratorical other ensign to totters served only to unfold their own retugo and triumphant hope, and the blast that tore every the tyranmous strength of France, menkind had found sure or cry throno on the continent had erumbled into dust bene th mation il moderation und national power, nuder u fielu u ben to found that he see before him, the symbol of It was no trivial banner of a party chib, it was the red candlatio in reply speedly put it in it more glowing colours. ganot out. Abnorot tanour riselt do ante electrication address expressive of their conviction that the good old Red Indice presented their here with a baimer of red silk, and mi surfused with the radiant atmosphere of Olympus before this foung man. The rather rotten borough became tiously to one of his own supporters, There is a great future fluent of speakers Wilde dier hearing bim said sentenuntiring combitint, and of course the readiest and most his Ho proved a dib cent and prepossessing can asset, an jet for one of the most ardueus of all forms of the buttle of religious proceupations, and not unfitted him by single showed that his double first class lus love of books, his time come into his own ighin The young student soon in the long struggle it was felt that the duke neuld this the sorgeant did not play his eards skilfully, and protty early of speech and shall of fence His Red club worked all milly, exhibited from the first hour of the fight tremendous gufts a mero schoolboy, and fiercely assailed as a slavery man was already on the ebb Air Gladstone though mecked as went to the woolsack as Lord Truto Reform at Newark a lawyer of ment and enmence, who eighteen years later between Mr Gladstone and Serjeant Wilde, the sitting whig, the tory, on our present occasion seemed safe, and the fightlay to the top of the pell, a tory being his colleague Handley, the whigs gave the duke a beating, and brought their man political history In the high tide of agitation for reform mo m galetommi gaisedan ne sain sid of oveg bas ciation of a venishing principlo became a sort of landmark,

7881

with his own adieu to Newark, besought the people most and nour and a half. . . . He went into matters connected with but little that I said. The serjeant then spoke for was flat work, as they were no more than patient, and agreed a hearing, and I spoke for perhaps an hour or more, but it the most part upon Handley. . . . The serjeant obtained me While he was doing this the popular wrath vented itself for the mayor cast up the numbers and declared the poll. tells his father, 'we went to the town hall at 9 A.M., when 726 for the fallen Wilde. 'Yesterday' (Dec. 13, 1832), he it with 887 votes, against 798 for his colleague Handley, and closed on the second day, Gladstone appeared at the head of At length the end came. At the nomination the show of hands was against the reds, but when the poll was taken and to bed and not to sleep.' played a rubber of whist, and about twelve or one I got speeches and songs until say ten o'clock; then he always wine all jumbled together; then a dinner of 30 or 40, with crowd, band and flags, and innumerable glasses of beer and morning and worked at it for about nine hours, with a great I live Red, and I will die Red.' 'We started on the canvass,' says one who was with Mr. Gladstone, 'at eight in the of party government, who cried stoutly, 'I was born Red, honest type, the life-blood of electioneering and the salvation duke's interest, there was a good force of the staunch and pounds. Apart from these black arts, and apart from the independent electors to the tune of a couple of thousand ship, sent in bills for meat and liquor supplied to free and colours of the rainbow and in every kind of strange partnersalmon, horses, bulls, boars, lions, and eagles, of all the ington, as well as half the animal kingdom, the swan and from Robin Hood to Lord Nelson and the Duke of Wellside or other, and when the time came, our national heroes The inns great and small were thrown joyously open on one patriotic red plumpers. Large tea-parties attracted red ladies. happening accidentally to be among them no fewer than ten and each musician received fifteen shillings a day, there the candidate knew little until after. There was a red band energetically to bear with their disappointment like men, and expressed his frienell with great depth of feeling.

11

BOOF

Afficated to tears himself, he affected others also. In the evening near fifty dined here [Clinton Arms] and the betoning near fifty dined manifested. The new member is beginn his first speech as a member of parliament is follows.

man but because both the man a hom the duke has sent, and the me to parliament, not merely because I am the Duke of Newcastics matural course of things to exercise a certain influence. You return duties ubich the possession of that property entails, ought in the possessing so large a property bere, and futhfully discharging the the duke in political sentiment, you likewise admit that one Duko of Noncastlus men, simply but because, coinciding with Why do you return me to parliament? Not because Lim the threaten their destruction, at all bazards, and to all extremities metituitions of this country are to be definided against those who and I my humble one, entertained the same persuasion, that the bond of union with him than this that he in his exalted sphere, public principle, and upon that ground alone I own no other norld I met the Duke of Newcastle upon the broad ground of n perpet of jetter or by word of month, exposed to the view of the no reluctance to see every sentiment which ever passed between us, exist between me and that nobleman and for my part should have incline to exagoerate than to extenuate such connection as does sententive of the Duke N Newtratile. Now I should rather reproached nith being not your representative but the repreopened before me, I cannot hut concerve that I shall often be Gentlemen, m looking forward to the field which is now

The election was of course pointed to by rejoining conservatives is a proof the more of that reaction which the interior and chart, and in the largh present and catolic field because those was led way by the bubble reform to support those who by specious mashow, quadite tenter had decided their cycs, delication had a subsided, their cycs, delication had a subsided, their cycs, delication had to its in the propert to its high place in the estern of the trench of order and course that in the color and the trench of order and your limit its of order and you will be course the infinites of the order and you will be described by the interior of the trench of order and sold government. Of course the infinites of the old ya of sold government.

duke himself, ire sour men

letters under old fashioned formalities of phrase yet beat with a marked and living pulse of genuine interest, solicitude, sympathy, inselfishness and innon

117

As always, he sought refreshment from turmoil that was only moderately congenial to him, in reading and writing Among much else he learns Shelley by heart, but his devotion to Wordsworth is unshaken 'One remarkable similarity provails between Wordsworth and Shelley, the quality of combining and connecting everywhere external nature with internal and unseen mind But how different are they in applications It frets and irritates the one, it is the key to the peacefulness of the other' Two books of Paradise Re-gained he finds 'very objectionable ou religious grounds,' the books presumably where Milton has been convicted of Arian heresy Ho still has energy enough left for more mundane things, to write a succession of articles for the Liverpool Standard and he finds time to recerd his joy (December 7) over five Eton first elasses' at Oxford Then, by and by, the election accounts come in. The arrangement had been made that the expenses were not to exceed a theusand pounds, of which the duke was to contribute one half, and John Gladstone the other half. It new appeared that twice as much would not suffice. The new member flung hunself with all his soul into a struggle with his committee against the practice of opening public houses and the exer-bitant demands that came of it. Open houses he protested meant profligate expenditure and orgunzed drunktuness, they were not a pecuniary question, but a question of right and wrong In the afternoon of the second day of polling his agent had said to him, speaking about special constables, that he scarcely knew how they could be got if wanted for the thought nearly every man in the town was drunk. It was in vain that the committee assured him of the dis was in vain that the committee assured into it to use couraging truth that a certain proportion of the voters could not be get to the poll without a treatfast, and an observer from another planet might perhaps have asked himself whether all this was so remarkal le an improvement on the

'I think the paper,' he said, 'if it proves anything proves (1)
That generals and not ministers are the proper judges of those weights in the political scales which express the likelihood of war and peace; (2) That there is very little difference between absolute neutrality and actual war. I advise that Granville should see it.'

On July 25 the Times divulged the text of a projected agreement in 1869 (it was in truth 1867) between the French and Prussian governments in five articles, including one that the incorporation of Belgium by France would not be objected to by Prussia. The public was shocked and startled, and many were inclined to put down the document for a forgery and a hoax. As a matter of fact, in substance it was neither. The Prussian ambassador a few days before had informed Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville personally and in strict secrecy, that the draft of such a project existed in the handwriting of M. Benedetti. This private communication was taken by Mr. Gladstone to have been made with the object of prompting him to be the agent in producing the evil news to the world, and thus to prejudice France in the judgment of Europe. He thought that no part of his duty, and took time to consider it, in the expectation that it was pretty sure to find its way into print by some other means, as indeed soon happened. 'For the sake of peace,' Bismarck explained to Lord Granville (July 28, 1870), 'I kept the secret, and treated the propositions in a dilatory manner.' When the British ambassador on one occasion had tried to sound him on the suspected designs of France, Bismarck answered, 'It is no business of mine to tell French secrets.'

There were members of the cabinet who doubted the expediency of England taking any action. The real position of affairs, they argued, was not altered: the draft treaty only disclosed what everybody believed before, namely that France sought compensation for Prussian aggrandizement, as she had secured it for Italian aggrandizement by taking Savoy and Nice. That Prussia would not object, provided the compensations were not at the expense of people who spoke German, had all come out at the time of the Luxemburg affair. If France and Prussia agreed, how could we help come, he said, when Russia might resume aggressive schemes on Turkey, he believed that neutralisation would mean nothing but a series of pitfalls much deeper than people expected.1 These pitfalls now came into full view. On the last day of October Prince Gortchakoff addressed a circular to the Powers, announcing that his imperial master could 'no longer eonsider himself bound to the terms of the treaty of March 1856, in so far as these limit his rights of sovereignty in the Black Sea.' On the merits there was very little real dispute in Europe. As Lord Granville once wrote to Mr. Gladstone: 'There was no doubt about Germany having at Paris, and subsequently, always taken the Russian view. France made an intimation to the same effect very soon after the conclusion of the treaty. And Austria later. Italy did the same, but not in so decided a manner. . . . I have frequently said in public that with the exception of ourselves and the Turks, all the eo-signatories of the treaty of Paris had expressed views in favour of modifying the article, previous to Prince Gortchakoffs declaration.'2

To have a good case on the merits was one thing, and to force it at the sword's point was something extremely different. As Mr. Gladstone put it in a memorandum that became Lord Granville's despatch, 'the question was not whether any desire expressed by Russia ought to be earefully examined in a friendly spirit by the co-signatory powers, but whether they are to accept from her an announcement that by her own act, without any consent from them, she has released herself from a solemn eovenant.'3 Mr. Gladstone, not dissenting on the substance of the Russian elaim, was outraged by the form. The only parallel he ever found to Gortchakoff's proceedings in 1870 was a certain claim, of which we shall soon see something, made by America in 1872. 'I have had half an idea,' he wrote to Lord Granville, 'that it might be well I should see Brunnow

¹ Hansard, May 6, 1856. See also May 24, 1855, and Aug. 3, 1855.
² Bismarck, in his Reflections, takes credit to himself for having come to an understanding with Russia on this question at the outbreak of the Franco-German war.

[&]quot; The whole pith of the despatch was yours.'—Granville to Mr. Gladstone, Nov. 18, 1870.

Belgium, unless indeed Enrope joined? But then what chance was there of Russia and Austria joining against France and -Prussia for the sake of Belgium, in which neither of them had any direct interest. At the same time ministers knew that the public in England expected them to do something, though a vote for men and money would probably suffice. The cabinet, however, advanced a step beyond a parliamentary vote. On July 30 they met and took a decision to which Mr. Gladstone then and always after attached high importance. England proposed a treaty to Prussia and France, providing that if the armies of either violated the nentrality of Belgium, Great Britain would co-operate with the other for its defence, but without engaging to take part in the general operations of the war. The treaty was to hold good for twelve months after the conclusion of the war. Bismarek at once came into the engagement. France loitered a little, but after the battle of Worth made no more difficulty, and the instrument was signed on August 9.

The mind of the government was described by Mr. Gladstone in a letter to Bright (August 1):—

Although some members of the cabinet were inclined on the outbreak of this most miserable war to make military preparations, others, Lord Granville and I among them, by no means shared that disposition, nor I think was the feeling of parliament that way inclined. But the publication of the treaty has altered all this, and has thrown upon us the necessity either of doing something fresh to secure Belgium, or else of saying that under no circumstances would we take any step to secure her from absorption. This publication has wholly altered the feeling of the House of Commons, and no government could at this moment venture to give utterance to such an intention about Belgium. But neither do we think it would be right, even if it were safe, to announce that we would in any case stand by with folded arms, and see actions done which would amount to a total extinction of public right in Europe.

The idea of an arrangement that will the second

[the Russian ambassador] either with you or alone. All know the mischief done by the Russian idea of Lord Aber-coden, and the opposition are in the habit of studiously representing me as his double, or his heir in pacific traditions. This I do not conceive to be true, and possibly I might undeceive Brunnow a little.'

In this country, as soon as the news of the circular was made known, the public excitement was intense. Consols instantly dropped heavily. Apart from the form of the Russian claim, the public still alert upon the eastern question, felt that the question was once more alive. As Mr. Gladstone had said to Lord Granville (Oct. 4, 1870), 'Everybody at a time like this looks out for booty; it will be hard to convince central Europe that Turkey is not a fair prize.' From France Lord Lyons wrote to Mr. Gladstone (Nov. 14) that the Russian declaration was looked upon with complacency, because it might lead to a congress, and at all events it might, by causing a stir among the neutrals, give a check to Prussia as well as to Russia.

Lord Granville wrote to Mr. Gladstone, who was at Hawarden (Nov. 21):—

I am very sorry to hear that you are not well. Of course, you must run no risk, but as soon as you can you will, I hope, come up and have a cabinet. Childers has been here. He tells me there is a perfect howl about ministers not meeting. He is more quiet in his talk than I hear some of our colleagues are. But he says if there is to be war, every day lost is most injurious. I have told him that it is impossible to say that we may not be driven into it by Russia, or by other foreign powers, or by our own people; that we must take care of our dignity; but if there ever was a cabinet which is bound not to drift into an unnecessary war, it is ours.

Mr. Gladstone replied next day:-

I will frankly own that I am much disgusted with a good deal of the language that I have read in the newspapers within the last few days about immediate war with Russia. I try to put a check on myself to prevent the reaction it engenders. Your observation on drifting into war is most just: though I always resort to force made Bright uneasy, and Mr. Gladstone wrote to him again (August 4):—

It will be a great addition to the domestic portion of the griefs of this most unhappy war, if it is to be the cause of a political severance between you and the present administration. To this I know you would justly reply that the claims of conviction are paramount. I hope, however, that the moment has not quite arrived. . . . You will, I am sure, give me credit for good faith when I say, especially on Lord Granville's part as on my own, who are most of all responsible, that we take this step in the interest of peace. . . . The recommendation set up in opposition to it generally is, that we should simply declare we will defend the neutrality of Belgium by arms in case it should be attacked. Now the sole or single-handed defence of Belgium would be an enterprise which we incline to think Quixotic; if these two great military powers combined against it-that combination is the only serious danger; and this it is which by our proposed engagements we should I hope render improbable to the very last degree. I add for myself this confession of faith. If the Belgian people desire, on their own account, to join France or any other country, I for one will be no party to taking up arms to prevent it. that the Belgians, whether they would or not, should go 'plump' down the maw of another country to satisfy dynastic greed, is another matter. The accomplishment of such a crime as this implies, would come near to an extinction of public right in Europe, and I do not think we could look on while the sacrifice of freedom and independence was in course of consummation.

II

By the end of the first week of August the storm of war had burst upon the world. 'On the 2nd of August, in the insignificant affair of Saarbrück, the Emperor of the French assumed a feeble offensive. On the 4th, the Prussians replied energetically at Wissemburg. And then what a torrent, what a deluge of events! In twenty-eight days ten battles were fought. Three hundred thousand men were sent to the hospitals, to captivity, or to the grave. The German enemy had penetrated into the interior of France, over a distance of a thought Clarendon's epithet in this one ease inapplicable as well as unadvisable. I know, however, nothing more like drifting into war than would be a resort to any military measures whatever, except with reference either to some actual fact or some well defined contingency. . .

П

The courses open to the British Government in the face of the circular were these. They might silently or with a protest acquiesce. Or they might declare an offensive war (much deprecated by Turkey herself) against a nation that had peculiar advantages for defence, and for an object that every other signatory power thought in itself a bad object. Third, they might, in accordance with a wonderfully grand scheme suggested to ministers, demand from Germany, all flushed as she was with military pride, to tell us plainly whether she was on our side or Russia's; and if the German answer did not please us, then we should make an offensive alliance with France, Austria, Italy, and Turkey, checking Russia in the east and Germany in the west. A fourth plan was mutely to wait, on the plea that whatever Russia might have said, nothing had been done. The fifth plan was a conference. This was hardly heroic enough to please everybody in the cabinet. At least it saved us from the insanity of a war that would have intensified European confusion, merely to maintain restraints considered valuable by nobody. The expedient of a conference was effectively set in motion by Bismarck, then pre-occupied in his critical Bavarian treaty and the siege of Paris. On November 12, Mr. Odo Russell left London for Versailles on a special mission to the Prussian king. The intrepidity of our emissary soon secured a remarkable success, and the episode of Bismarck's intervention in the business was important.

Mr. Odo Russell had three hours' conversation with Count Bismarck on November 21. Bismarck told him that the Russian circular had taken him by surprise; that though he had always thought the treaty of 1856 too hard upon Russia, he entirely disapproved both of the manner and time chosen for forcing on a revision of it; that he could not hundred and fifty miles of territory, and had stretched forth everywhere as he went the strong hand of possession. The Emperor was a prisoner, and had been deposed with general consent; his family wanderers, none knew where; the embryo at least of a republic, born of the hour, had risen on the ruins of the empire, while proud and gorgeous Paris was awaiting with divided mind the approach of the conquering monarch and his countless host.' This was Mr. Gladstone's description of a marvellous and shattering hour.

Talleyrand was fond in the days of 1815 at Vienna, of applying to any diplomatist who happened to agree with him the expression, 'a good European.' He meant a statesman who was capable of conceiving the state-system of the western world as a whole. The events of August made the chief minister of Austria now exclaim, 'I see no longer any Europe.' All the notions of alliance that had so much to do with the precipitation of the war were dissipated. Italy, so far from joining France, marched into Rome. Austria ostentatiously informed England that she was free from engagements. The Czar of Russia was nephew of the Prussian king and German in his leanings, but Gortchakoff, his minister, was jealous of Bismarck, and his sympathies inclined to France, and Czar and minister alike nursed designs in the Black Sea. With such materials as these Mr. Pitt himself with all his subsidies could not have constructed a fighting coalition. Even the sons of stricken France after the destruction of the empire were a divided people. For side by side with national defence against the invader, republican and monarchic propagandism was at work, internecine in its temper and scattering baleful seeds of civil war.

'Many,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Chevalier in September, 'seem so over-sanguine as to suppose that it is in our power at any moment, by friendly influence of reasoning, to solve the problem which has brought together in the shock of battle the two greatest military powers of Europe. . . . I do not see that it is an offence on our part not to interfere when the belligerents differ so widely, when we have not the interfere nor even answer the circular, but to prevent the outbreak of another war he would recommend conferences at Constantinople. The conversation broke off at four o'clock in the afternoon, with this unpromising cast. At ten in the evening it was resumed; it was prolonged until half an hour beyond midnight. 'I felt I knew him better,' Mr. Russell in an unofficial letter tells Lord Granville (Nov. 30), 'and could express more easily all that I had determined to say to convince him that unless he could get Russia to withdraw the circular, we should be compelled with or without allies to go to war.' Bismarck remained long obstinate in his professed doubts of England going to war; but he gradually admitted the truth of the consequences to which a pacific acceptance of 'the Russian kick must inevitably lead. And so he came round to the British point of view, and felt that in our place he could not recede.'

¹ Gleanings, iv. p. 197.

It was not hard to see Bismarck's interests. The mischief to Germany of another European war before Paris had fallen; the moral support to be derived by the Tours government from a revival of the old Anglo-French alliance; the chances of Beust and other persons fishing in the troubled waters of an extended European conflict; the vital importance of peace to the reconstruction of Germany—these were the disadvantages to his own country and policy, of a war between England and Russia; these worked the change in his mind between afternoon and midnight, and led him to support the cause of England and peace against Gortchakoff and his circular. Characteristically, at the same time he strove hard to drive a bargain with the English agent, and to procure some political advantages in exchange for his moral support. 'In politics,' he said, 'one hand should wash the other'

declaration of the kind but would quietly build men-of-war in the Black Sea and wait until they were questioned on the subject. Then they might reply they knew nothing about it, but would make inquiries and so let the matter drag on. That might continue for a long time, and finally people would get accustomed to it.'—Busch, Bismarck: Some Secret Pages of his History, i. pp. 312-13.

¹ Bismarck's private opinion was this:—'Gortchakoff is not carrying on in this matter a real Russian policy (that is, one in the true interests of Russia), but rather a policy of violent aggression. People still believe that Russian diplomats are particularly crafty and clever, full of artifices and stratagems, but that is not the case. If the people at St. Petersburg were clever they would not make any hope of bringing them together, and when we cannot adopt without reserve the language and claims of either.' Material responsibility and moral responsibility both pointed to a rigid equity between the combatants, and to strict neutrality. The utmost to be done was to localise the war; and with this aim, the British cabinet induced Italy, Austria, Russia, and smaller powers to come to a common agreement that none of them would depart from neutrality without a previous understanding with the rest. This league of the neutrals, though negative, was at least a shadow of collective action, from which good might come if the belligerents should some day accept or invite mediation. To this diplomatic neutrality the only alternative was an armed neutrality, and armed neutrality has not always served pacific ends.

To the German contention at one stage after the overthrow of the empire, that the Empress was still the only authority existing legally for France, Mr. Gladstone was energetically opposed. 'It embodied,' he said, 'the doctrine that no country can have a new government without the consent of the old one.' 'Ought we,' he asked Lord Granville (Sept. 20), 'to witness in silence the promulgation of such a doctrine, which is utterly opposed to the modern notions of public right, though it was in vogue fifty years back, and though it was acted on with most fatal consequences by the Prussians of eighty years back.' Then as for mediation, whether isolated or in common, he saw no hope in it. He said to the Duke of Argyll (Sept. 6), 'I would not say a word ever so gently. I believe it would do great mischief. As at present advised, I see but two really safe grounds for mediation, (1) a drawn battle; (2) the request of both parties.' Ever since 1862, and his error in the American war—so he now wrote to Lord Granville,— 'in forming and expressing an opinion that the Southerners had virtually established their independence, I have been very fearful of giving opinions with regard to the proper course for foreign nations to pursue in junctures, of which, after all, I think they have better means of forming a judgment than foreigners can possess.'

(eine Hand die andere waschen muss). In Mr. Odo Russell, however, he found a man who talked the language, kept the tone and was alive to all the arts of diplomatic business, and no handwashing followed. When Mr. Russell went to his apartment in the Place Hoche at Versailles that night, he must have felt that he had done a good day's work.

In the following year, papers were laid before Parliament, and attention was drawn to the language used by Mr. Russell to Bismarck, in the pregnant sentence about the question being of a nature in its present state to compel us with or without allies, to go to war with Russia.1 Mr. Gladstone, when directly challenged, replied (Feb. 16) that the agent had used this argument without specific authority or instruction from the government, but that the duty of diplomatic agents required them to express themselves in the mode in which they think they can best support the proposition of which they wish to procure acceptance. Mr. Odo Russell explained to Mr. Gladstone (Feb. 27) that he was led to use the argument about England being compelled to go to war with or without allies by these reasons: that we were bound by a definite treaty to regard any retractation of the stipulations of March 30, 1856, as a cause of war;2 that Gortchakoff's assumption of a right to renounce provisions directly touching Russian interests seemed to carry with it the assumption of a right to renounce all the rest of the treaty; that Mr. Gladstone's government had declared (Nov. 10) that it was impossible to sanction the course announced by Gortchakoff; that, therefore, France being otherwise engaged, and Austria being unprepared, we might be compelled by our joint and several obligations under the tripartite treaty, to go to war with Russia for proceedings that we pronounced ourselves unable to sanction; finally, that he had never been instructed to state to Prussia, that the question was not one compelling us ever to go to war, notwithstanding our treaty engagements. What was Mr. Gladstone's reply to this I do not find, but Lord Granville

¹ Correspondence respecting the ² The tripartite treaty of England, treaty of March 30, 1856, No. 76, France, Austria, of April 15, 1856. pp. 44, 45, c. 245.

In the middle of September Thiers, in the course of his valiant mission to European courts, reached London. 'Yesterday,' Mr. Gladstone writes (Sept. 14), 'I saw Thiers and had a long conversation with him; he was very clear and touching in parts. But the purpose of his mission is vague. He seems come to do just what he can.' The vagueness of Thiers did but mirror the distractions of France. Not even from his ingenious, confident, and fertile mind could men hope for a clue through the labyrinth of European confusions. Great Britain along with four other powers recognised the new government of the Republic in France at the beginning of February 1871.

It was about this time that Mr. Gladstone took what was for a prime minister the rather curious step of volunteering an anonymous article in a review, upon these great affairs in which his personal responsibility was both heavy and direct.1 The precedent can hardly be called a good one, for as anybody might have known, the veil was torn aside in a few hours after the Edinburgh Review containing his article appeared. Its object, he said afterwards, was 'to give what I thought needful information on a matter of great national importance, which involved at the time no interest of party whatever. If such interests had been involved, a rule from which I have never as a minister diverted would have debarred me from writing.' Lord Granville told him that, 'It seemed to be an admirable argument, the more so as it is the sort of thing Thiers ought to have said and did not.' The article made a great noise, as well it might, for it was written with much eloquence, truth, and power, and was calculated to console his countrymen for seeing a colossal European conflict going on, without the privilege of a share in it. One passage about happy England-happy especially that the wise dispensation of Providence had cut her off by the streak of silver sea from continental dangers-rather irritated than convinced. The production of such an article under such circumstances

¹ To be found in Gleanings, iv. In republishing it, Mr. Gladstone says, 'This article is the only one ever written by me, which was meant for the time to be in substance, as well as in form, anonymous.' That was in 1878. Two years later he contributed an anonymous article, 'The Conservative Collapse,' to the Fortnightly Review (May 1880).

had very sensibly written to him some weeks before (Dec. 8, 1870):—

I am afraid our whole success has been owing to the belief that we would go to war, and to tell the truth, I think that war in some shape or other, sooner or later, was a possible risk after our note. In any case, I would reassure nobody now. Promising peace is as unwise as to threaten war. A sort of instinct that the bumps of combativeness and destructiveness are to be found somewhere in your head, has helped us much during the last five months.

Ш

Having undertaken to propose a conference, Bismarck did the best he could for it. The British cabinet accepted on condition that the conference was not to open with any previous assumption of Gortchakoff's declaration, and they objected to Petersburg as the scene of operations. Mr. Gladstone in some notes prepared for the meeting of his colleagues (Nov. 26), was very firm on the first and main point, that 'Her Majesty's government could enter into no conference which should assume any portion of the treaty to have been already abrogated by the discretion of a single Power, and it would be wholly out of place for them, under the present circumstances, to ask for a conference, as they were not the parties who desire to bring about any change in the treaty.' Russia made difficulties, but Bismarek's influence prevailed. The conference assembled not Petersburg but in London, and subject to no previous assumption as to its results.1

The close of a negotiation is wont to drop the curtain over embarrassments that everybody is glad to forget; but the obstacles to an exact agreement were not easily overcome. Lord Granville told Mr. Gladstone that no fewer than thirteen or fourteen versions of the most important protocol were tried before terms were reached. In the end Lord Granville's conclusion was that, as no just rights had been sacrificed, it was a positive advantage that Russia should be gratified by the removal of restraints naturally galling to her pride.

¹ Russell to Lord Granville, c. 245, ² Sorel's Guerre Franco-Allemande, No. 78, p. 46. ¹ Sorel's Guerre Franco-Allemande, ii. chap. 4.

was a striking illustration of Mr. Gladstone's fervid desire—the desire of a true orator's temperament—to throw his eager mind upon a multitude of men, to spread the light of his own urgent conviction, to play the part of missionary with a high evangel, which had been his earliest ideal forty years before. Everybody will agree that it was better to have a minister writing his own articles in a respectable quarterly, than doctoring other people's articles with concomitants from a reptile fund.

m

On the vital question of the annexation of Alsace and Lorraine, Mr. Gladstone's view was easy to anticipate. could not understand how the French protests turned more upon the inviolability of French soil, than on the attachment of the people of Alsace and North Lorraine to their country. The abstract principle he thought peculiarly awkward in a nation that had made recent annexations of her own. Upon all his correspondents at home and abroad, he urged that the question ought to be worked on the basis of the sentiments of the people concerned, and not upon the principle of inviolability. He composed an elaborate memorandum for the cabinet, but without effect. On the last day of September, he records:—'Sept. 30: Cabinet 21-6. I failed in my two objects. 1. An effort to speak with the other neutral Powers against the transfer of Alsace and Lorraine without reference to the populations. 2. Immediate release of Fenian prisoners."

To Mr. Bright, who was still prevented by illness from attending cabinets, and who had the second of the two objects much at heart, he wrote the next day:—

I send for your private perusal the inclosed mem, which I proposed to the cabinet yesterday, but could not induce them to adopt. It presupposes the concurrence of the neutral Powers. They agreed in the opinions, but did not think the expression of them timely. My opinion certainly is that the transfer of territory and inhabitants by mere force calls for the reprobation of Europe, and that Europe is entitled to utter it, and can utter it with good effect.

The conference opened at the foreign office on Dec. 17, and held its final meeting on March 13. Delay was caused by the difficulty of procuring the attendance of a representative of France. Jules Favre was appointed by the government at Bordeaux, but he was locked up in Paris, and he and Bismarck could not agree as to the proper form of safe-conduct. What was even more important, the governing men in France could not agree upon his instructions; for we must remember that all this time along with the patriotic struggle against the Prussians, there went on an internal struggle only a degree less ardent between republicans and monarchists. It was not until the final meeting of the conference that the Duc de Broglie was accredited as representative of his country.1 At the first formal meeting a special protocol was signed recording it as 'an essential principle of the law of nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a treaty, nor modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers by means of an amicable arrangement.'

To give a single signatory Power the right of forbidding a change desired by all the others, imposes a kind of perpetuity on treaty stipulations, that in practice neither could nor ought to be insisted upon. For instance it would have tied fast the hands of Cavour and Victor Emmanuel in the Italian transactions which Mr. Gladstone had followed and assisted with so much enthusiasm, for Austria would never have assented. It is, moreover, true that in the ever recurring eras when force, truculent and unabashed, sweeps aside the moral judgments of the world, the meré inscription of a pious opinion in a protocol may seem worth little trouble. Yet it is the influence of good opinion, tardy, halting, stumbling, and broken, as it must ever be, that upholds and quickens the growth of right. The good rules laid down in conferences and state-papers may look tame in the glare of the real world of history as it is. Still, if we may change the figure, they help to dilute the poisons in the air.

1 That this failure to take advantage of the conference was an error on the part of France is admitted by modern French historians. Hanometers and the statement of the statemen taux, France Contemporaine, i. p.

The ground taken by him in the cabinet was as follows: - CI

A matter of this kind cannot be regarded as in principle a 12 question between the two belligerent, only, but involves considerations of legitimate interest to all the Powers of Europe. It appears to hear on the Belgian question in particular. It is also a principle likely to be of great consequence in the eventual settlement of the Eastern question. Quite apart from the subject of mediation, it cannot be right that the neutral Powers should remain silent, while this principle of consulting the wishes of the population is trampled down, should the actual sentiment of Alsace and Lorraine be such as to render that language applicable. The mode of expressing any view of this matter is doubtless a question requiring much consideration. The decision of the cabinet was that the time for it had not yet come. Any declaration in the sense described would, Mr. Gladstone thought, entail, in fairness, an obligation to repudiate the present claim of France to obtain peace without surrendering feither an inch of her territory or a stone of her fortresses."

Mr. Bright did not agree with him, but rather favoured the principle of inviolability. In November Mr. Gladstone prepared a still more elaborate memorandum in support of a protest from the neutral Powers. The Dake of Argyll put what was perhaps the general view when he wrote to Mr. Gladstone (Nov. 25, 1870), that he had himself never argued in favour of the German annexation of Alsace and Lorraine, but only against our having any right to oppose it otherwise than by the most friendly dissuasion.' The Duke held that the consent of populations to live under a particular government is a right subject to a great many qualifications, and it would not be easy to turn such a doctrine into the base of an official remonstrance. After all, he said, the instincts of nations stand for something in this world. The German did not exceed the ancient acknowledged right of nations in successful wars, when he said to Alsace and Lorraine, 'Conquest in a war forced upon me by the people of which you form a part, gives me the right to annex, if on other

In England opinion veered round after Sedan. The disappearance of the French empire had effectively dispelled the vivid suspicions of aggression. The creation of the empire of a united Germany showed a new Europe. The keen word of an English diplomatist expressed what was dawning in men's minds as a new misgiving. 'Enrope,' he said, 'has lost a mistress and got a master.' Annexation wore an ngly look. Meetings to express sympathy with France in her struggle were held in London and the provinces. Still on the whole the general verdict seemed to be decisively in favour of a resolute neutrality, for in fact, nobody who knew anything of the state of Enrope could suggest a policy of British intervention that would stand an hour of debate.

One proposal favoured by Mr. Gladstone, and also, I remember, commended by Mill, was the military neutralisation of Alsace and Lorraine, and the dismantling of the great border fortresses, without withdrawing the inhabitants from their French allegiance. The idea was worked ont in a paniphlet by Count Gasparin. On this paniphlet Mr. Max Müller put what Mr. Gladstone called the fair question, whether its author was likely to persuade the Enropean powers to guarantee border neutrality. 'I will try to give you a fair answer,' Mr. Gladstone said (Jan. 30, 1871). 'You will not think it less fair because it is individual and unofficial; for a man must be a wretch indeed, who could speak at this most solemn juncture, otherwise than from the bottom of his heart. First then, I agree with you in disapproving the declaration, or reputed declaration, of Lord Derby (then Stanley) in 1867, about the Luxemburg guarantee. I have in parliament and in my present office, declined or expressly forborne to recognise that declaration. Secondly, as to the main question. It

¹ Lord Stanley on the Luxembury Guarantee, June 14, 1867.—The guarantee now given is collective only. That is an important distine tion. It means this, that in the event of a violation of neutrality, all the powers who have signed the treaty a legal construction upon it—to see grounds I deem it expedient, and for strategic reasons I do so deem it.'

Mr. Gladstone, notwithstanding his cabinet, held to his view energetically expressed as follows:—

If the contingency happen, not very probable, of a sudden accommodation which shall include the throttling of Alsace and part of Lorraine, without any voice previously raised against it, it will in my opinion be a standing reproach to England. There is indeed the Russian plan of not recognising that in which we have had no part; but it is difficult to say what this comes to.

On December 20 he says to Lord Granville what we may take for a last word on this part of the case:—'While I more and more feel the deep culpability of France, I have an apprehension that this violent laceration and transfer is to lead us from bad to worse, and to be the beginning of a new series of European complications.'

While working in the spirit of cordial and even eager loyalty to the prime minister, Lord Granville disagreed with him upon the question of diplomatic action against annexation. Palmerston, he said to Mr. Gladstone in October, 'wasted the strength derived by England in the great war by his brag. I am afraid of our wasting that which we at present derive from moral causes, by laying down general principles when nobody will attend to them, and when in all probability they will be disregarded. My objection to doing at present what you propose is, that it is impossible according to my views to do so without being considered to throw our weight into the French scale against Germany, with consequent encouragement on one side and irritation on the other.'

Like Thiers, Mr. Gladstone had been leaning upon the concurrence of the neutral Powers, and active co-operation at St. Petersburg. Russian objects were inconsistent with the alienation of Germany, and they made a fatal bar to all schemes for lowering the German terms. This truth of the situation was suddenly brought home to England in no palatable way.

1871.

BOOK

is great. It is difficult. But I should not despair. I may add I should desire to find it practicable; for I think it would be a condition fair to both parties, and one on which Germany would have an absolute title to insist. 'Some of the most excusable errors ever committed,' he said, in closing the letter, 'have also been the most ruinous in their consequences. The smallest in the forum of conscience, they are the greatest in the vast theatre of action. May your country, justly indignant and justly exultant, be preserved from committing one of these errors.' Three months later, when all was at an end, he repeated the same thought:-

The most fatal and in their sequel most gigantic errors of men are also frequently the most excusable and the least gratuitous. They are committed when a strong impetus of right carries them up to a certain point, and a residue of that impetus, drawn from the contact with human passion and infirmity, pushes them beyond it. They vault into the saddle; they fall on the other side. The instance most commonly present to my mind is the error of England in entering the Revolutionary war in 1793. Slow sometimes to go in, she is slower yet to come out, and if she had then held her hand, the course of the revolution and the fate of Europe would in all likelihood have been widely different. There might have been no Napoleon. There might have been no Sedan.

The changes in the political map effected by these dire months of diplomacy and war were almost comparable in one sense to those of the treaty of Münster, or the treaty of the Pyrenees, or the treaties of Vienna, save that those great instruments all left a consolidated Europe. Italy had crowned her work by the acquisition of Rome. Russia had wiped out the humiliation of 1856. Prussia, after three wars in six years, had conquered the primacy of a united Germany. Austria had fallen as Prussia rose. France had fallen, but she had shaken off a government that had no root in the noblest qualities of her people.

in concert with others that these arrangements are maintained. But if the other powers join with us, it is certain that there will be no viola-

CHAPTER VI

THE BLACK SEA

(1870-1871)

'You are always talking to me of principles. As if your public law were anything to me; I do not know what it means. What do you suppose that all your parchments and your treaties signify to me?' ALEXANDER I. to TALLEYRAND.

Ar the close of the Crimean war in 1856 by the provisions of the treaty of Paris, Russia and Turkey were restrained from constructing arsenals on the coast of the Euxine, and from maintaining ships of war on its waters. statesman believed that the restriction would last, any more than Napoleon's restraint on Prussia in 1808 against keeping up an army of more than forty-two thousand men could Palmerston had this neutralisation more at heart than anybody else, and Lord Granville told the House of Lords what durability Palmerston expected for it:-

General Ignatieff told me that he remarked to Lord Palmerston, 'These are stipulations which you cannot expect will last long,' and Lord Palmerston replied, 'They will last ten years.' A learned civilian, a great friend of mine, told me he heard Lord Palmerston talk on the subject, and say, 'Well, at all events they will last my life.' A noble peer, a colleague of mine, an intimate friend of Lord Palmerston, says Lord Palmerston told him they would last seven years.1

In 1856 Mr. Gladstone declared his opinion, afterwards often repeated, that the neutralisation of the Black Sea, popular as it might be in England at the moment, was far from being a satisfactory arrangement.2 Were the time to

¹ House of Lords, Feb. 14, 1871. impossible.' 'The most inept conclusions of the peace of Paris.'—Bisabsurd, and therefore in the long run marck, Reflections, ii. p. 114.

CHAPTER VII

'DAY'S WORK OF A GIANT'

(1870 - 1872)

We have not been an idle government. We have had an active life, and that is substantially one of the conditions of a happy life. . . . I am thankful to have been the leader of the liberal party at a period of the history of this country, when it has been my privilege and my duty to give the word of advance to able condintors and trusty and gallant adherents.—GLADSTONE.

THE most marked administrative performance of Mr. Gladstone's great government was the reform and reorganization of the army. In Mr. Cardwell he was fortunate enough to have a public servant of the first order; not a political leader nor a popular orator, but one of the best disciples of Peel's school; sound, careful, active, firm, and with an enlightened and independent mind admirably fitted for the effective despatch of business. Before he had been a month at the war office, the new secretary of state submitted to Mr. Gladstone his ideas of a plan that would give us an effective force for defence at a greatly reduced eost. The reorganization of the army was one of the results of that great central event, from which in every direction such momentous consequences flowed—the victory of Prussian arms at Sadowa. The victory was a surprise, for even Lord Clyde, after a close inspection of the Prussian army, had found no more to report than that it was a first-rate militia. Sadowa disclosed that a soldier, serving only between two and three years with the colours, could yet show himself the most formidable combatant in Europe. The principle of Cardwell's plan was that short enlistment is essential to a healthy organization of the army, and this reform it was that produced an efficient reserve, the necessity for which had duke doing what he liked with his own. Mr. Gladstone still stood to it that a system of entertainment that ended in producing a state of general intoxication, was the most demoralising and vicious of all forms of outlay, and the Newark worthies were bewildered and confounded by the gigantic dialectical and rhetorical resources of their incensed representative. The fierce battle lasted, with moments of mitigation, over many of the thirteen years of the connection. Of all the measures that Mr. Gladstone was destined in days to come to place upon the statute book, none was more salutary than the law that purified corrupt practices at elections.¹

CHAP.

Ær. 61.

On his birthday at the close of this eventful year, here is his entry in his diary:—'On this day I have completed my twenty-third year. . . . The exertions of the year have been smaller than those of the last, but in some respects the diminution has been unavoidable. In future I hope circumstances will bind me down to work with a rigour which my natural sluggishness will find it impossible to elude. I wish that I could hope my frame of mind had been in any degree removed from earth and brought nearer to heaven, that the habit of my mind had been imbued with something of that spirit which is not of this world. I have now familiarised myself with maxims sanctioning and encouraging a degree of intercourse with society, perhaps attended with much risk. . . . Nor do I now think myself warranted in withdrawing from the practices of my fellow men except when they really involve an encouragement of sin, in which case I do certainly rank races and theatres. . . . ' 'Periods like these,' he writes to his friend Gaskell (January 3, 1833), 'grievous generally in many of their results, are by no means unfavourable to the due growth and progress of individual character. I remember a very wise saying of Archidamus in Thucydides, that the being educated εν τοῖς ἀναγκαιοτάτοις brings strength and efficacy to the character.'2

In one of his letters to his father at this exciting epoch

C

VOL. T

¹ Sir Henry James's Act (1883). from man, except that he turns out ² Thuc. i. 84, § 7.—'We should best who is trained in the sharpest remember that man differs little school.'

Mr Gladstone says, that before the sudden opening now made for him, what he had marked out for himself was 'a good many years of silent reading and inquiry.' That blessed dream was over, his own temperament and outer en cunistances, both of them made its realisation impossible. but in a sense he clung to it all his days. He entered at Lincoln's Inn (January 25), and he dined pretty frequently in hall down to 1939, meeting many old Eton and Oxford acquaintances, more genuine law students than himself He kent thirteen terms but was never called to the bar. If ho had intended to undergo a legal training, the design was ended by Newark After residing for a short time in lodgings in Jermyn Street, he took quarters at the Albany (March 1833) which remained his London home for six years 'I am gotting on rapidly with my furnishing,' ho tells his father, 'and I shall be able. I feel confident, to do it all, including plate, within the liberal limits which you allow I cannot warmly enough thank you for the terms and footing on which you propose to place me in the chambers, but I really fear that after this year my allowance in all will be greater not only than I have any title to, but than I ought to accept without blushing' Ho became a member of the Oxford and Cambridge Club the previous month, and now was 'cleeted without my will (but not more than without it) a member of the Carkon Club. He would not go to dinner parties on Sundays, not even with Sir Robert Peol was closely attentive to the numer duties of social life, if duties they be, ho was a strict observer of the etiquette of calls, and on some afternoons ho notes that he made a dozen or fourteen of them. He frequented musical parties where his fine voice, now reasonably well trained, made him a welcome guest, and he goes to public concerts where he finds Pasta and Schroder splendid. His irrepressible desire to oxp and himself in writing or in speech found a vent in constant articles in the Liverpool Standard, neither better nor worse than the ordinary paventha of a keen young college been one of the lessons of the Crimean war. A second, but still a highly important element, was the reduction of the whole force serving in the colonies from fifty thousand men to less than half that number.1 'To this change,' said Mr. Cardwell, 'opposition will be weak, for the principle of colonial self-reliance is very generally assented to. The idea, as Lord Wolseley says, that a standing army during peace should be a manufactory for making soldiers rather than either a costly receptacle for veterans, or a collection of perfectly trained fighters, 'had not yet taken hold of the military mind in England.'2 The details do not concern us here, and everybody knows the revolution effected by the changes during Mr. Gladstone's great administration in the composition, the working, and the professional spirit of the army.

I Proposed by Sir B. Ingle and Tamere. He was on the contribute seconded by George Denisio, after from PAI to PAI and he with the wards the military Architecture of from the Club at the erd of PAI.

Army reform first brought Mr. Gladstone into direct collision with reigning sentiment at court. In spite of Pym and Cromwell and the untoward end of Charles I. and other salutary lessons of the great rebellion, ideas still lingered in high places that the sovereign's hand bore the sword, and that the wearer of the crown through a commander-in-chief had rights of control over the army, not quite dependent on parliament and secretary of state. The Queen had doubted the policy of disestablishing the church in Ireland, but to disestablish the commander-in-chief came closer home, and was disliked as an invasion of the personal rights of the occupant of the throne. This view was rather firmly pressed, and it was the first of a series of difficultiesalways to him extremely painful, perhaps more painful than any other-that Mr. Gladstone was called upon in his longcareer to overcome. The subject was one on which the temper of a reforming parliament allowed no compromise, even if the prime minister himself had been inclined to yield. As it was, by firmness, patience, and that tact which springs not from courtiership but from right feeling, he succeeded, and in the June of 1870 the Queen approved an adequate amount of violent language out of doors against the principle of a hereditary legislature.1

¹ The number of men was reduced from £3,388,023 to duced from 49,000 in 1868 to 20,941 £1,905,538.
in 1870; at the same time the military expenditure on the colonies by T. H. Ward (1887), i. p. 211.

The results of the general election two years later as they affected party, are an instructive comment on all this trepidation and alarm. In one only of the three kingdoms the ballot helped to make a truly vital difference; it dislodged the political power of the Irish landlord. In England its influence made for purity, freedom, and decency, but it developed no new sources of liberal strength. On this aspect of things the first parliamentary precursor of the ballot made remarks that are worth a few lines of digression. 'You will feel great satisfaction,' his wife said to Grote one morning at their breakfast, 'at seeing your once favourite measure triumph over all obstacles.' 'Since the wide expansion of the voting element,' the historian replied, 'I confess that the value of the ballot has sunk in my estimation. don't, in fact, think the elections will be affected by it one way or another, as far as party interests are concerned.' 'Still,' his interlocutor persisted, 'you will at all events get at the genuine preference of the constituency.' 'No doubt; but then, again, I have come to perceive that the choice between one man and another among the English people, signifies less than I used formerly to think it did. The English mind is much of one pattern, take whatsoever class you will. The same favourite prejudices, amiable and otherwise; the same antipathies, coupled with ill-regulated though benevolent efforts to eradicate human evils, are wellnigh universal. A House of Commons cannot afford to be above its own constituencies in intelligence, knowledge, or patriotism.'2 In all this the element of truth is profound enough. In every change of political machinery the reforiner promises and expects a new heaven and a new earth; then standing forces of national tradition, character, and institution assert their strength, our millennium lags, and the chilled enthusiast sighs. He is unreasonable, as are all those who expect more from life and the world than life and

¹ The first parliamentary election by ballot in England was the return duchy.

of Mr. Childers at Pontefract (Aug. Life of Grote, pp. 312, 313.

order in council that put an end to the dual control of the army, defined the position of the commander-in-chief, and removed him corporeally from the horse guards to the war office in Pall Mall.¹ This, however, by no means brought all the military difficulties to an end.

ÆT

One particular incident has a conspicuous place on the political side of Mr. Gladstone's life. Among the elements in the scheme was the abolition of the practice of acquiring military rank by money purchase. Public opinion had been mainly roused by Mr. Trevelyan, who now first made his mark in that assembly where he was destined to do admirable work and achieve high eminence and popularity. An Act of George III. abolished selling of offices in other departments, but gave to the crown the discretion of retaining the practice in the army, if so it should seem fit. This discretion had been exercised by the issue of a warrant sanctioning and regulating that practice; commissions in the army were bought and sold for large sums of money, far in excess of the sums fixed by the royal warrant; and vested interests on a large scale grew up in consequence. The substitution, instead of this abusive system, of promotion by selection, was one of the first steps in army reform. effective reorganization was possible without it. As Mr. Gladstone put it, the nation must buy back its own army from its own officers. No other proceeding in the career of the ministry aroused a more determined and violent opposition. It offended a powerful profession with a host of parliamentary friends; the officers disliked liberal politics, they rather disdained a civilian master, and they fought with the vigour peculiar to irritated caste.

The first question before parliament depended upon the Commons voting the money to compensate officers who had acquired vested interests. If that was secure, there was nothing to hinder the crown, in the discretion committed to it by the statute, from cancelling the old warrant. Instead of this, ministers determined to abolish purchase by bill. Obstruction was long and sustained. The principle of the bill was debated and re-debated on every amendment in the world have to give. Yet here at least the reformer has not failed. The efficacy of secret voting is negative if we will, but it averts obvious mischiefs alike from old privileged orders in states and churches and from new.

¹ Hansard, Feb. 21 and March 23, 1871.

111

In finance the country looked for wonders. Ministers were called the cabinet of financiers. The cabinet did, in fact, contain as many as five men who were at one time or another chancellors of the exchequer, and its chief was recognised through Europe as the most successful financier of the agc. No trailing cloud of glory, as in 1853 or 1860, attended the great ministry, but sound and substantial results were achieved, testifying to a thrifty and skilful management, such as might have satisfied the ambition of a generation of chancellors. The head of the new government promised retrenchment as soon as the government was formed. He told his constituents at Greenwich (Dec. 21, 1868) that he was himself responsible for having taken the earliest opportunity of directing the public mind to the subject of expenditure at an opening stage of the late election; for 'although there may be times when the public mind may become comparatively relaxed in regard to the general principles of economy and thrift, it is the special duty of public men to watch the very beginnings of evil in that department. It is a very easy thing to notice these mischiefs when they have grown to a gigantic size; but it commonly happens that when financial error has arisen to those dimensions, the case has become too aggravated for a remedy.' He reminded them of the addition that had been made to the standing charges of the country in the ordinary and steadily recurring annual estimates presented to parliament. He said that he knew no reason why three millions should have been added during the two years of tory government to the cost of our establishments:-

It is one thing. I am very well aware, to put on three millions; it is another thing to take them off. When you put three millions on to the public expenditure, you create a number of new relation a number of new offices, a number of new claims, a number of committee, and Mr. Gladstone reported that 'during his whole parliamentary life, he had been accustomed to see class interests of all kinds put themselves on their defence under the supposition of being assailed, yet he had never seen a case where the modes of operation adopted by the professing champions were calculated to leave such a painful impression on the mind.' Credible whispers were heard of the open hostility of high military personages. In one of the debates of this time upon the army (Mar. 23, 1871), speakers freely implied that the influence of what was called the horse guards was actively adverse to reform. Mr. Gladstone, taking this point, laid it down that 'military authorities without impairing in the slightest degree the general independence of their political opinions, should be in full harmony with the executive as to the military plans and measures which it might propose; and that only on this principle could the satisfactory working of our institutions be secured.

The correspondence with the Queen was copious. In one letter, after mentioning that parliament had been persuaded to extend the tenure of the commander-in-chief's office beyond five years, and to allow the patronage and discipline of the army to be vested in him, though the secretary of state was responsible, Mr. Gladstone proceeds:—

It would have been impossible to procure the acquiescence of parliament in these arrangements, unless they had been accompanied with the declaration of Mr. Cardwell, made in the name of the cabinet, and seen and approved by your Majesty, that 'it is of course necessary for the commander-in-chief to be in harmony with the government of the day' (Feb. 21, 1871), and with a similar declaration of Mr. Gladstone on March 23, 1871, also reported to and approved by your Majesty, that while all political action properly so called was entirely free, yet the military plans and measures of the government must always have the energetic co-operation of the military chiefs of the army.

The end was of course inevitable.1 The bill at last passed expectations. And you can't, and what is more, you ought not to, destroy all these in a moment. And, therefore, the work of retrenchment must be a well-considered and a gradual work. But I ask you to look at the names of the men who have been placed in charge of the great spending departments of the country. The study, the idea that has governed the formation of the present administration has been to place able and upright men in charge of the public purse-men of administrative experience. men of proved ability, men, lastly, holding their seats in the House of Commons, and, therefore, immediately responsible to the representatives of the people. It would not become me to promise what we can do; but this I can tell you, that my friends connected with the various departments most concerned in the public expenditure have, even before the early moment at which I speak, directed their very first attention to this subject, and that I, for one, shall be as deeply disappointed as you can be, if in the estimates which it will be our duty to present in February you do not already perceive some results of their opening labours.

At the end of the second volume, remarks by Mr. Glidstone on these the reader will find some interesting points. See Appendix.

One of Mr. Gladstone's first letters to a colleague was addressed to Mr. Lowe, containing such hints and instructions upon treasury administration as a veteran pilot might give about lights, buoys, channels, currents, to a new captain. 'No man wants so much sympathy,' he said, 'as the chancellor of the exchequer, no man gets so little. Nor is there any position so lamentable for him as to be defeated in proposing some new charge on the public conceived or adopted by himself. He is like an ancient soldier wounded in the back. Whereas even defeat in resisting the raids of the House of Commons on the public purse is honourable, and always turns out well in the end.' He sent Mr. Lowe a list of the subjects that he had tried in parliament without success, and of those that he had in his head but was not able to take in hand. They make a fine example of an active and reforming mind. What commonly happened, in cases of this kind, in my time, was as follows:—The opposition waited for a development of discontent and resistance among some small fraction of liberal members.

¹ See Appendix.

the Commons, and then an exciting stage began. In the Callords it was immediately confronted by a dilatory resolution.

In view of some such proceeding, Mr. Gladstone (July 15) wrote to the Queen as to the best course to pursue, and here he first mentioned the step that was to raise such clamour:—

As the government judge that the illegality of over-regulation prices cannot continue, and as they can only be extinguished by putting an end to purchase, what has been chiefly considered is how to proceed with the greatest certainty and the smallest shock, and how to seeme as far as may be for the officers all that has hitherto been asked on their behalf. With this view, the government think the first step would be to abolish the warrant under which prices of commissions are fixed. As the resolution of the House of Lords states the unwillingness of the House to take part in abolishing purchase until certain things shall have been done, it would not be applicable to a case in which, without its interposition, purchase would have been already abolished.

Two days later (July 17) the Lords passed what Sir Roundell Palmer called 'their ill-advised resolution.' July 18 the cabinet met and resolved to recommend the cancelling of the old warrant regulating purchase, by a new warrant abolishing purchase. It has been said or implied that this proceeding was forced imperiously upon the Queen. I find no evidence of this. In the language of Lord Halifax, the minister in attendance, writing to Mr. Gladstone from Osborne (July 19, 1871), the Queen 'made no sort of difficulty in signing the warrant' after the case had been explained. In the course of the day she sent to tell Lord Halifax, that as it was a strong exercise of her power in apparent opposition to the House of Lords, she should like to have some more formal expression of the advice of the cabinet than was contained in an ordinary letter from the prime minister, dealing with this among other matters. Ministers agreed that the Queen had a fair right to have their advice on such a point of executive action on her part, recorded in a formal and deliberate submission of their opinion. The advice was at once clothed in the definite form of a minute.

When this was compact in itself, or was at all stimulated of by constituencies, they sent out habitually strong party whips, and either heat me, or forced me to withdraw in order to avoid beating, or exposing our men to local disadvantage. This game, I hope, will not be quite so easy now.'

The first two of Mr. Lowe's budgets were on the lines thus traced beforehand. The shilling duty on a quarter of corn was abolished—'an exceeding strong case,' as Mr. Gladstone called it-taxes on conveyances were adjusted, and the duty on fire insurance was removed. The only notable contribution to the standing problem of widening the base of taxation was the proposal to put a tax on matches.1 This was a notion borrowed from the United States, and much approved by Mr. Wells, the eminent free-trade financier of that country. In England it was greeted with violent disfavour. It was denounced as reactionary, as violating the first principles of fiscal administration, and as the very worst tax that had been proposed within recent memory, for is not a match a necessary of life, and to tax a necessary of life is to go against Adam Smith and the books. The money, it was said, ought to have been got either by raising the taxes on tea and sugar, or else by putting the shilling duty back on corn again, though for that matter, ten, sngar, and corn are quite as much necessaries of life as, say, two-thirds of the matches used.2 No care, however, was given to serious argument; in fact, the tax was hardly argued at all. Some hundreds of poor women employed at a large match factory in the east end of London trooped to protest at Westminster, and the tax was quickly dropped. It was perhaps unlucky that the proposal happened to be associated with Mr. Lowe, for his uncomplimentary criticisms on the working class four or five years before were neither forgotten nor forgiven. Latin pun that he meant to print on the proposed halfpenny match stamp, ex luce lucellum, 'a little gain out of a little

¹ Writing to Mr. Lowe on his budget proposals, Mr. Gladstone says (April 11, 1871):—'The lueifer matches I hope and think you would carry, but I have little information, and that old. I advise that on this Glyn be consulted as to the feeling in the House of Commons. I am sceptical as to the ultimate revenue of one million.'

² See The Match Tax: a Problem in Finance. By W. Stanley Jevons (London: Stanford, 1871). A searching defence of the impost.

On July 20 Mr. Gladstone announced to a crowded and anxious House the abolition of purchase by royal warrant. The government, he said, had no other object but simplicity and despatch, and the observance of constitutional usage. Amid some disorderly interruptions, Mr. Disraeli taunted the government with resorting to the prerogative of the crown to get out of a difficulty of their own devising. Some radicals used the same ill-omened word. After a spell of obstruction on the ballot bill, the bitter discussion on purchase revived, and Mr. Disraeli said that what had occurred early in the evening was 'disgraceful to the House of Commons,' and denounced 'the shameful and avowed conspiracy of the cabinet' against the House of Lords. The latter expression was noticed by the chairman of committee and withdrawn, though Mr. Gladstone himself thought it the more allowable of the two.

In a letter to his brother-in-law, Lord Lyttelton, Mr. Gladstone vindicated this transaction as follows:—

July 26, '71.—I should like to assure myself that you really have the points of the case before you. 1. Was it not for us an indispensable duty to extinguish a gross, wide-spread, and most mischievous illegality, of which the existence had become certain and notorious? 2. Was it not also our duty to extinguish it in the best manner? 3. Was not the best manner that which, (a) made the extinction final; (b) gave the best, i.e. a statutory, title for regulation prices; (c) granted an indemnity to the officers; (d) secured for them compensation in respect of over-regulation prices? 4. Did not the vote of the House of Lords stop us in this best manner of proceeding? 5. Did it absolve us from the duty of putting an end to the illegality? 6. What method of putting an end to it remained to us, except that which we have adopted?

Sir Roundell Palmer wrote, 'I have always thought and said that the issuing of such a warrant was within the undoubted power of the crown. . . . It did and does appear to me that the course which the government took was the least objectionable course that could be taken under the whole circumstances of the case.' I can find nothing more clearly light,' was good enough to divert a college common room, but it seemed flippant to people who expected to see the bread taken out of their mouths.

¹ Memorials, Personal and Political, vol. i. pp. 193, 194.

On the other side of the national account Mr. Gladstone was more successful. He fought with all his strength for a reduction of the public burdens, and in at least one of these persistent battles with colleagues of a less economising mind than himself, he came near to a breach within the walls of his cabinet. In this thankless region he was not always zealously seconded. On Dec. 14, 1871, he enters in his diary: 'Cabinet, 3-7. For two-and a half hours we discussed army estimates, mainly on reduction, and the chancellor of exchequer did not speak one word.' The result is worth recording. When Mr. Gladstone was at the exchequer the charge on naval, military, and civil expenditure had been reduced between 1860 and 1865 from thirty-eight millions to thirty-one. Under the Derby-Disraeli government the figure rose in two or three years to thirty-four millions and three-quarters. By 1873 it had been brought down again to little more than thirty-two millions and a quarter.1 That these great reductions were effected without any sacrifice of the necessary strength and efficiency of the forces, may be inferred from the fact that for ten years under successive administrations the charge on navy and army underwent no substantial augmentation. The process had been made easier, or made possible, by the necessity under which the German war laid France, then our only rival in naval force, to reduce her expenditure upon new ships. The number of seamen was maintained, but a reduction was effected in the inefficient vessels in the foreign squadrons; two costly and almost useless dockyards were suppressed (much to the disadvantage of Mr. Gladstone's own constituents), and great abuses were remedied in the dockyards that were left. In the army reduction was made possible without lessening the requisite strength, by the withdrawal of troops from Canada, New Zealand, and the Cape. This was due to the wise policy of Lord Granville and Mr. Gladstone. of the increased cost of education, of army purchase, of the

¹ See a speech in the House of Commons by Mr. Childers, April 24, 1873.

and more forcibly said upon this case than the judgment of Freeman, the historian—a man who combined in so extraordinary a degree immense learning with precision in political thought and language, and added to both the true spirit of manly citizenship:—

I must certainly protest against the word 'prerogative' being used, as it has so often been of late, to describe Mr. Gladstone's conduct with regard to the abolition of purchase in the army. By prerogative I understand a power not necessarily contrary to law, but in some sort beyond law-a power whose source must be sought for somewhere else than in the terms of an act of parlia-But in abolishing purchase by a royal warrant Mr. Gladstone acted strictly within the terms of an act of parliament, an act so modern as the reign of George III. He in truth followed a course which that act not only allowed but rather suggested. . . . I am not one of those who condemn Mr. Gladstone's conduct in this matter; still I grant that the thing had an ill look. The difference I take to be this. Mr. Gladstone had two courses before him: he might abolish purchase by a royal warrant—that is, by using the discretion which parliament had given to the crown; or he might bring a bill into parliament to abolish purchase. . . . What gave the thing an ill look was that, having chosen the second way and not being able to carry his point that way, he then fell back on the first way. I believe that it was better to get rid of a foul abuse in the way in which it was got rid of, than not to get rid of it at all, especially as the House of Commons had already decided against it. Still, the thing did not look well. might seem that by electing to bring a bill into parliament Mr. Gladstone had waived his right to employ the royal power in the matter. . . . I believe that this is one of those cases in which a strictly conscientious man like Mr. Gladstone does things from which a less conscientious man would shrink. Such a man, fully convinced of his own integrity, often thinks less than it would be wise to think of mere appearances, and so lays himself open to the imputation of motives poles asunder from the real ones.1

These last words undoubtedly explain some acts and tendencies that gave a handle to foes and perplexed friends.

¹ E. A. Freeman, in Pall Mall Gazette, February 12, 1874.

CHAPTER VIII

AUTUMN OF 1871. DECLINE OF POPULARITY

(1871 - 1872)

For the present at least the reformation will operate against the reformers. Nothing is more common than for men to wish, and call loudly too, for a reformation, who when it arrives do by no means like the severity of its aspect. Reformation is one of those pieces which must be put at some distance in order to please. Its greatest favourers love it better in the abstract than in the substance.

BURKE.

In July, 1871, Mr. Gladstone paid a Sunday visit to Tennyson among the Surrey hills. They had two interesting days, 'with talk ranging everywhere.' The poet read the Holy Grail, which Mr. Gladstone admired. They discussed the Goschen parish council plan, and other social reforms; Lacordaire and liberal collectivism; politics and the stormy times ahead. Mr. Gladstone assured them that he was a conservative, and feared extreme measures from the opposition. 'A very noble fellow,' Tennyson called him, 'and perfectly unaffected.' 1 Mr. Gladstone, for his part, records in his diary that he found 'a characteristic and delightful abode. In Tennyson are singularly united true greatness, genuine simplicity, and some eccentricity. But the latter is from habit and circumstance, the former is his nature. wife is excellent, and in her adaptation to him wonderful. His son Hallam is most attractive.'

After a laborious and irksome session, 'in which we have sat, I believe, 150 hours after midnight,' the House rose (Aug. 21). Mr. Gladstone spent some time at Whitby with his family, and made a speech to his eldest son's constituents (Sept. 2) on the ballot, and protesting against

¹ Life of Tennyson, ii. p. 108.

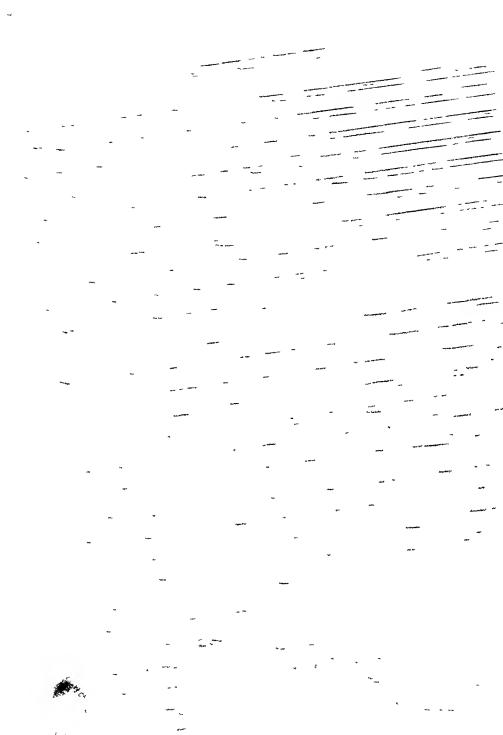

H

Next let us turn to reform in a different field. All the highest abstract arguments were against secret voting. To have a vote is to have power; as Burke said, 'liberty is power, when men act in bodies'; but the secret vote is power without responsibility. The vote is a trust for the commonwealth; to permit secreey makes it look like a right conferred for a man's own benefit. You enjoin upon him to give his vote on public grounds; in the same voice you tell him not to let the public know how he gives it. Secreey saps the citizen's conrage, promotes evasion, tempts to downright lying. Remove publicity and its checks, then all the mean motives of mankind-their malice, petty rivalries, pique, the prejudices that men would be ashamed to put into words even to themselves-skulk to the polling booth under a disguising cloak. Secreey, again, prevents the statesman from weighing or testing the forces in character, stability, persistency, of the men by whom a majority has been built up, and on whose fidelity his power of action must depend. This strain of argument was worked out by J. S. Mill and others, and drew from Mr. Bright, who belonged to a different school of liberals, the gruff saying, that the worst of great thinkers is that they so often think wrong.

Though the abstract reasoning might be unanswerable, the concrete case the other way was irresistible. Experience showed that without secrecy in its exercise the suffrage was not free. The farmer was afraid of his landlord, and the labourer was afraid of the farmer; the employer could tighten the screw on the workman, the shopkeeper feared the power of his best customers, the debtor quailed before his creditor, the priest wielded thunderbolts over the faithful. Not only was the open vote not free; it exposed its possessor to so much bullying, molestation, and persecution, that his possession came to be less of a boon than a nuisance.

For forty years this question had been fought. The ballot actually figured in a clause of an early draft of the Reform bill of 1832. Grote, inspired by James Mill whose vigorous the high landmark in the controversy, brought it before variament in an annual service. parliament in an annual motion. When that admirable man quitted parliament to finish his great history of Greece, the torch was still borne onwards by other hands. Ballot was one of the five points of the charter. At nearly every meeting for parliamentary reform between the Crimean war and Disraeli's bill of 1867, the ballot was made a cardinal point. General opinion fluctuated from time to time, and in the sixties journals of repute formally dismissed it as a dead political idea. The extension of the franchise in 1867 brought it to life again, and Mr. Bright led the van in the election of 1868 by declaring in his address that he regarded the ballot as of the first importance. 'Whether I look,' he said, to the excessive cost of elections, or to the triunit which so often attends them, or to the mijust and cruel pressure which is so frequently brought to bear upon the less independent class of voters. I am persuaded that the true interest of the public and of freedom will be served by the system of secret and free voting.' J. S. Mill had argued that the voter should name his candidate in the polling booth, just as the judge does his duty in a court open to the public eye. No, replied Bright, the jury-room is as important as the judge's bench, and yet the jury-room is treated as secret, and in some countries the verdict is formally given by ballot. Some scandals in the way of electoral intimidation did much to ripen public opinion. One parliamentary committee in 1868 brought evidence of this sort to light, and another committee recommended secret voting as the cure.

¹ Representative Government, chap. x.

O1

Among those most ardent for the change from open to secret voting, the prime minister was hardly to be included. 'I am not aware,' he wrote to Lord Shaftesbury (Dec. 11, 1871), 'of having been at any time a vehement opponent of the ballot. I have not been accustomed to attach to it a vital importance, but at any time, I think, within the last twenty or twenty-five years I should have regarded it as the legitimate complement of the present suffrage.' In the first speech he made as prime minister at Greenwich (Dec.

¹ The reader may remember his stripling letters, -above p. 99.

vindicating the ballot bill, laughing at various prescriptions of social quackery—until at the close of a speech nearly two hours long, he retired amid sustained hurricanes of earnest applause. Well might be speak of rather an excess of physical effort, to say nothing of effort of mind.

On his return to Hawarden he had a visit from Mr. Bright, whom he carnestly hoped to bring back into the cabinet.1

Nor. 13.—Hawarden. Two long conversations with Mr. Bright, who arrived at one. 14.—Some five hours in conversation with Mr. Bright; also I opened my proposal to him, which he took kindly though cautiously. My conversation with him yesterday evening kept me awake till four. A most rare event; but my brain assumes in the evening a feminine susceptibility, and resents any unusual strain, though, strange to say, it will stand a debate in the H. of C. 15.—Forenoon with Bright, who departed, having charmed everybody by his gentleness. Began the cutting of a large beech.

To Lord Granville.

Nov. 15, 1871.—Bright has been here for forty-eight hours, of which we passed I think more than a fourth in conversation on Everything in and everything out of the cabinet I public affairs. told him as far as my memory would serve, and I think we pretty well boxed the political compass. On the whole I remained convinced of two things: first, that his heart is still altogether with us; secondly, that his health, though requiring great care, is really equal to the moderate demands we should make upon him. truth is I was quite as much knocked up with our conversation as he was, but then I had the more active share. In the whole range of subjects that we travelled over, we came to no point of sharp difference, and I feel confident that he could work with the cabinet as harmoniously and effectually as before. In saying this I should add that I told him, with respect to economy, that I thought we should now set our faces in that direction. him that we should not expect of him ordinary night attendance in the House of Commons, and that his attendance in the cabinet

¹ Mr. Bright had retired from the cabinet on account of ill-health in December 1870.

21, 1868) he said that there were two subjects that could not be overlooked in connection with the representation of the people. 'One of them is the security afforded by the present system for perfect freedom in the giving of the vote, which vote has been not only not conferred as a favour, but imposed as a duty by the legislature on the members of the community. I have at all times given my vote in favour of open voting, but I have done so before, and I do so now, with an important reservation, namely, that whether by open voting or by whatsoever means, free voting must be secured.'

A bill providing for vote by ballot, abolishing public nominations and dealing with corrupt practices in parliamentary elections was introduced by Lord Hartington in 1870. Little progress was made with it, and it was eventually withdrawn. But the government were committed to the principle, and at the end of July Mr. Gladstone took the opportunity of explaining his change of opinion on this question, in the debate on the second reading of a Ballot bill brought in by a private member. Now that great numbers who depended for their bread upon their daily labour had acquired the vote, he said, their freedom was threatened from many quarters. The secret vote appeared to be required by the social conditions under which they lived, and therefore it had become a necessity and a duty to give effect to the principle.

Yet after the cabinet had decided to make the ballot a

Yet after the cabinet had decided to make the ballot a ministerial measure, the head of the cabinet makes a rather pensive entry in his diary:—'July 27, 1870.—H. of C. Spoke on ballot, and voted in 324-230 with mind satisfied, and as to feeling, a lingering reluctance.' How far this reluctance was due to misgivings on the merits of the ballot, how far to the doubts that haunt every ministerial leader as to the possibilities of parliamentary time, we do not know. The bill, enlarged and reintroduced next year, was entrusted to the hands of Mr. Forster—himself, like Mr. Gladstone, a latish convert to the principle of secret voting—and by Forster's persistent force and capacity for hard and heavy labour after some eighteen days in committee, it passed through the House of Commons.

ÆT

After obstruction had been at last broken down, other well-known resources of civilisation remained, and the Lords threw out the bill. It was novel, they said; it was dangerous, it had not been considered by the country or parliament (after eighteen days of committee and forty years of public discussion), it was incoherent and contradictory, and to enact vote by ballot was inevitably to overthrow the monarchy. Even the mightiest of American orators had said as much. 'Above all things,' Daniel Webster had adjured Lord Shaftesbury, 'resist to the very last the introduction of the ballot; for as a republican, I tell you that the ballot can never co-exist with monarchical institutions.'

The rejection by the Lords stimulated popular insistence. At Whitby in the autumn (Sept. 2), Mr. Gladstone said the people's bill had been passed by the people's House, and when it was next presented at the door of the House of Lords, it would be with an authoritative knock. He told Lord Houghton that he was sorry to see the agitation apparently rising against the House of Lords, though he had a strong opinion about the imprudence of its conduct on the Army bill, and especially on the Ballot bill. 'There is no Duke of Wellington in these days. His reputation as a domestic statesman seems to me to rest almost entirely on his leadership of the peers between 1832 and 1841.'

The bill was again passed through the Commons in 1872. Mr. Gladstone was prepared for strong measures. The cabinet decided that if the House of Lords should hold to what the prime minister styled 'the strange provision for optional secrecy,' the government would withdraw the bill and try an autumn session, and if the Lords still hardened their hearts, 'there would remain nothing but the last alternative to consider,'—these words, I assume, meaning a dissolution. Perhaps the opposition thought that a dissolution on the ballot might give to the ministerial Antæus fresh energy. This time the Lords gave way, satisfied that the measure had now at last been more adequately discussed,—the said discussion really consisting in no more than an

¹ In the House of Lords only 48 peers voted for the bill Many of the whigs abstained.

wing Stants

politician. He was confident that whether estimated by their numbers, their wealth, or their respectability, the conservatives indubitably held in their hands the means and elements of permanent power. He discharges a fusillade from Roman history against the bare idea of vote by ballot, quotes Cicero as its determined enemy, and ascribes to secret suffrage the fall of the republic. He quotes with much zest a sentence from an ultra-radical journal that the life of the West Indian negro is happiness itself compared with that of the poor inmate of our spinning-mills. He scores a good point for the patron of Newark, by an eloquent article on the one man who had laboured to retrieve the miserable condition of the factory children, and ends with a taunting reminder to the reformers that this one man, Sadler, was the nominee of a borough-monger, and that

It need not be said that his church-going never flagged. In 1840 his friend, the elder Acland, interested himself in forming a small brotherhood, with rules for systematic exercises of devotion and works of mercy. Mr. Gladstone was one of the number. The names were not published, nor did any one but the treasurer know the amounts given. The pledge to personal and active benevolence seems not to have been strongly operative, for at the end of 1845 (Dec. 7) Mr. Gladstone writes to Hope in reference to Acland's scheme:—'The desire we then both felt passed off, as far as I am concerned, into a plan of asking only a donation and subscription. Now it is very difficult to satisfy the demands of duty to the poor by money alone. On the other hand, it is extremely hard for me-and I suppose possibly for youto give them much in the shape of time and thought, for both with me are already tasked up to and beyond their powers . . . I much wish we could execute some plan which without demanding much time would entail the discharge of borough-monger the Duke of Newcastle.

style, and by the fact that Macaulay beat him at Leeds in 1832. But he deserves our honourable recollection on the ground mentioned by Mr. Gladstone, as a man of indefatigable and effective zeal in one of the best of causes.

¹ Sadler is now not much more than a name, except to students of the history of social reform in England, known to some by a couple of articles of Macaulay's, written in that great man's least worthy and least agreeable

some humble and humbling office. If you thought with me—and I do not see why you should not, except to assume the reverse is prying myself a compliment—let us go to work, as in the young days of the college plan but with a more direct and less ambitious purpose? Of this we may see something later. At a great service at St. Paul's, he notes the glory alike of sight and sound as 'possessing that remarkable criterion of the sublime, a grand result from a combination of simple elements. Edward Irving did not attract; 'a scene pregnant with melanchely instruction.' He was immensely struck by Melvill whom some of us have heard pronounced. struck by McIvill whom some of us have heard pronounced by the generation before us to be the most pursant of all the by the generation before us to be the most pursant of all the men in his calling 'His sentiments,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'are manly in tone, he deals powerfully with all his subjects, his language is flowing and unbounded, his imagery varied and intensely strong. Vigorous and lofty as are his conceptions, he is not, I think, less remarkable for soundness and healthiness of mind'. Such a passage shows among other things how the diarist was already teaching himself to analyse the art of oratory. I may note one rather curious habit no doubt practised with a view to training in the art of speech. Besides listening to as many sermons as possible, he was also for a long time fond of reading them aloud especially. Dr. Arnold's, in rather a peculiar way 'My plan is' he says, to strongthen or qualify or omit. 'My plan is' he says, to strongthen or qualify or omit expressions as I go along

.

In an autolographical note written in the late days of his life when he had become the only commoner left who had sat in the old burned House of Commons he says —

I took my s at at the opening of 1833 provided inquestionally with a large stock of schoolboy bashfulness. The first time that his ness required no to go to the arm of the chair to say sone thing to the Speaker, Maniers Sutting—the first of reven when still pet I have been—selo was senething of a Keare. I recorder the resistant is me belief of the frame of timel in which schoolbow stateled for his marker. But apart for manie, lental wished to have three months' tenure of the judgeship, and that we agreed with you that this would have been only a sham.'

Cockburn, the chief justice of the Queen's bench, opened fire on Mr. Gladstone (Nov. 10) in a long letter of rather over-heroic eloquence, protesting that a colourable appointment to a judgeship for the purpose of getting round the law seriously compromised the dignity of the judicial office, and denouncing the grievous impropriety of the proceeding as a mere subterfuge and evasion of the statute. Mr. Gladstone could be extremely summary when he chose, and he replied in three or four lines, informing the chief justice that as the transaction was a joint one, and as 'the completed part of it to which you have taken objection, was the official act of the lord chancellor,' he had transmitted the letter for his consideration. That was all he said. The chancellor for his part contented himself with half a dozen sentences, that his appointment of Collier to the puisne judgeship had been made with a full knowledge of Mr. Gladstone's intention to recommend him for the judicial committee; that he thus 'acted advisedly and with the conviction that the arrangement was justified as regards both its fitness and its legality'; and that he took upon himself the responsibility of thus concurring with Mr. Gladstone, and was prepared to vindicate the course pursued. This curt treatment of his Junius-like composition mortified Cockburn's literary vanity, and no vanity is so easily stung as that of the amateur.

Collier, when the storm was brewing, at once wrote to Mr. Gladstone (Nov. 13) proposing to retain his judgeship to the end of the term, then to resign it, and act gratuitously in the privy council. He begged that it might not be supposed he offered to do this merely as matter of form. 'Though I consider the objection to my appointment wholly baseless, still it is not pleasant to me to hold a salaried office, my right to which is questioned.' 'I have received your letter,' Mr. Gladstone replied (Nov. 14), 'which contains the offer that would only be made by a high-spirited man, impatient of suspicion or reproval, and determined to place himself beyond it. . . . I have not a grain of inclination stone ever sat upon the green benches. Ho read his blue books did his duty by election committees and on the first occasion when in consequence of staying a little too long at a dinner at the Duke of Hamiltons he missed a division his self repreach was almost as sharp as if he had fallen into mortal sin. This is often enough the way with virtuous young members but Mr. Gladstones realous ideal of parliamentary duty lasted and both at first and always he was a singular union of deep meditative seriousness with untiring animation assiduity and practical energy and force working over a wide field definitely mapped.

In the assembly where he was one day to rank among the most powerful orators ever inscribed upon its golden roll he first opened his lips in a few words on a Nowark petition (April 30) and shortly after (May 21) he spoke two or three minutes on an Edinburgh petition A little later the question of slavery where he lines every inch of the ground brought him to a serious ordeal In May, Stanley as colonial secret iry introduced the proposals of the government for the graduil abolition of colonial slavery Abolition was to be preceded by an interinediate stage designated as apprenticeship to last for twelve years and the planters were to be helped through the difficulties of the transition by a loan of fifteen millions. In the course of the proceedings the intermediate period wis shortened from twelve years to seven and the lorn of lifteen millions was transformed into a free Lift of tventy. To this scheme John Gladstone whose indonutable energy made him the leading at the of the West Indian interest was consistently opposed, and he naturally became the mark of abolitionist attack The occasion of Mr Coludston a first speech a is an attack by Lord Howick on the manager of John Gladstene's Demorars tates whom he denounced as the murderer of shires'an attack made will out notice to the two sons of the incriminated proprietor sitting in front of him. He d clared that the slaves on the Vr elenhoop engar plantat is were systematically verted to death in end r to in reaso the en p. Mr Gladstone tried in sain to catch the eve of the Charmen or Mar "O and the rest day Ic wishel trepial to recede from the course marked out, and if you had proposed to abandon the appointment, I should have remonstrated.'

What Mr. Gladstone called 'a parliamentary peppering' followed in due course. It was contended that the statute in spirit as in letter exacted judicial experience, and that formal passing through a court was a breach of faith with parliament. As usual, lawyers of equal eminence were found to contend with equal confidence that a fraud had been put upon the law, and that no fraud had been put upon it; that the law required judicial status not experience, and on the other hand that what it required was experience not status. Lord Hatherley and Roundell Palmer were all the virtues, whether public or private, personified; they were at the top of the legal ladder; and they agreed in Palmer's deliberate judgment, that—after other judges with special fitness had declined the terms offered by parliament—in nominating the best man at the bar who was willing to take a vacant puisne judgeship upon the understanding that he should be at once transferred to the judicial committee, the government were innocent of any offence against either the spirit or substance of the law.1

Yet the escape was narrow. The government only missed censure in the Lords by a majority of one. In the Commons the evening was anxious. You will see, says Mr. Bruce (Feb. 20, 1872), 'that we got but a small majority last night. The fact is that our victory in the Lords made men slack about coming to town, and Glyn got very nervous in the course of the evening. However, Palmer's and Gladstone's speeches, both of which were excellent, improved the feeling, and many who had announced their intention to go teeling, and many who had announced their intention to go away without voting, remained to support us.' At one moment it even looked as if the Speaker might have to give a casting vote, and he had framed it on these lines:—'I have concluded that the House while it looks upon the course taken by government as impolitic and injudicious, is not prepared at the present juncture to visit their conduct with direct parliamentary censure.' In the end, ministers had a exist, under the system of slavery, and that this was 'a substantial reason why the British legislature and public should set themselves in good earnest to provide for its extinction. He admitted, too, that we had not fulfilled our Christian obligations by communicating the inestimable benefits of our religion to the slaves in our colonies, and that the belief among the early English planters, that if you made a man a Christian you could not keep him a slave, had led them to the menstrous conclusion that they ought not to impart Christianity to their slaves Its extinction was a consummation descutly to be desired and in good carnest to be forwarded, but immediate and inconditioned cinancipation without a previous advance in character, must place the negre in a state where he would be his own worst enemy, and so must crown all the wrongs already done to him by cutting off the last hope of rising to a higher level in social existence. At some later period of his hife Mr Gladstone read a corrected report of his first speech, and found its tone much less than satisfactory 'But of course,' he adds allowance must be made for the enermous and most blessed change of opinion since that day on the subject of negro slavery I must say henever, that even before this time I had come to entertain little or no confidence in the proceedings of the resident agents in the West Indies. 'I can now see plantly enough, he said sixty years later, the said defects the real illiberalism of my opinions on that subject. Let they were not alliberal as compared with the ideas of the times and as declared in parliament in 1533 they obtained the commendation of the liberal leaders'

¹ Selborne's Memorials, i. p. 200.

² Brand papers.

they obtained in commandation of the inegral relates. It is fur to remember that Pitt Fox Granville and Grey while eager to bring the slave trade to an instant end habitually disclaimed is a calumny any intention of enumer pating the blacks on the sugar relands. In 1807 when the foul blot of the trade was abolished evon Willerforce him self discouraged attempts to alsolish slavery, though the noble philanthrop it seem advanced to the full length of his own principles. Pecl in 1831 would have nothing to do as the either mind date cmaing them or gradual. It gath has put his view on deliberate record that the movement of the

wished to have three months' tenure of the judgeship, and that we agreed with you that this would have been only a sham.'

Cockburn, the chief justice of the Queen's bench, opened fire on Mr. Gladstone (Nov. 10) in a long letter of rather over-heroic eloquence, protesting that a colourable appointment to a judgeship for the purpose of getting round the law seriously compromised the dignity of the judicial office, and denouncing the grievous impropriety of the proceeding as: mere subterfuge and evasion of the statute. Mr. Gladstor could be extremely summary when he chose, and he repli in three or four lines, informing the chief justice that as transaction was a joint one, and as 'the completed part to which you have taken objection, was the official act of lord chancellor,' he had transmitted the letter for his sideration. That was all he said. The chancellor part contented himself with half a dozen sentences, appointment of Collier to the puisne judgeship I made with a full knowledge of Mr. Gladstone's in recommend him for the judicial committee; the "acted advisedly and with the conviction that tl ment was justified as regards both its fitness and; and that he took upon himself the responsibility curring with Mr. Gladstone, and was prepared the course pursued. This curt treatment of ? composition mortified Cockburn's literary vanity is so easily stung as that of the amate Collier, when the storm was brewing, at c

Gladstone (Nov. 13) proposing to retain his end of the term, then to resign it, and the privy council. He begged that it might be offered to do this merely as matter consider the objection to my appointristill it is not pleasant to me to hold right to which is questioned. 'I have made by a patient of suspicion or reproval, himself beyond it. . . I have r

Besides his speeches he gave a full number of party votes, some of them interesting enough in view of the vast career before him I think the first of them all was in the majority of 428 against 40 upon O'Connell's amendment for repeal,— an occasion that came vividly to his memory on the ove of his momentous change of policy in 1886. Ho voted for the worst clauses of the Irish Coercion bill, including the court-martial clause He fought steadily against the admission of Jews to parliament Ho fought against the admission of dissenters without a test to the universities, which he described as sommaries for the established church Ho supported the existing corn law. He said 'No' to the property tax and 'Ayo' for retaining the house and window taxes Ho resisted a motion of Humo's for the abolition of military and naval sinceures (February 14), and another motion of the same oxeollent man's for the abolition of all flogging in the army save for mutiny and drunkenness. He voted against the publication of the division lists He voted with ministers both against shortor parliaments, and (April 25) against the hallot, a cardinal reform carried by his own government forty years later. On the other hand he voted (July 5) with Lord Ashloy against postponing his bonoficent policy of factory legislation, but he did not vote either way a fortuight later when Althorp sensibly reduced the limit of ten hours work in factories from the impracticable age of eighteen proposed by Ashley, to the age of thirteen Ho supported a bill against work on Sundays

Υ.

A page or two from his diary will carry us succinctly enough over the rest of the first and second years of his parliamentary life

July 21, 1833, Sun I ig — . . . Wrote some lines and proce also, Unished Strype Read Abbott and Suraner aloud. Thought for some hours on my own future destiny, and took a solitary walk to and about Kensineton Gardens. July 23 —diead R. illien sees. Raps of the Lock, and faust of ferbory report. July 25. —West to be all fast with off Mr. Wilberfore, in trade of by the some life is cheerful and servere, a beautiful power of old age in wight of important and servere, a beautiful power of old age in wight of im-operations at Oxford; the Oriel men were aware of his operative in seeking incorporation, and the vice-chancellor and everybody else concerned knew all about it. Mr. Gladstone, when squalls began to blow, wrote to Mr. Harvey (Feb. 26, '72) that he was advised that the presentation was perfectly valid.

The attack in parliament was, as such attacks almost always are, much overdone. Mr. Gladstone, it appeared, was far worse than Oliver Cromwell and the parliament of the great rebellion; for though those bad men forced three professors upon Oxford between 1648 and 1660, still they took care that the intruders should all be men trained at Oxford and graduates of Oxford. Who could be sure that the prime minister would not next appoint an ultramontane divine from Bologna, or a Greek from Corfu? Such extravagances did as little harm as the false stories about Mr. Harvey being jobbed into the living because he had been at Eton with Mr. Gladstone and was his political supporter. As it happened he was a conservative, and Mr. Gladstone knew nothing of him except that a number of most competent persons had praised his learning. In spite of all this, however, and of the technical validity of the appointment, we may wish that the rector's doubts had not been overruled. A worthy member regaled the House by a story of a gentleman staying in the mansion of a friend; one morning he heard great noise and confusion in the yard; looking out he saw a kitchenmaid being put on a horse, and so carried round and round the yard. When he went downstairs he asked what was the matter, and the groom said, 'Oh, sir, 'tis only that we're going to take the animal to the fair to sell, and we want to say he has earried a lady.' The apologue was not delieate, but it eonveyed a common impression. 'Gladstone spoke,' says Mr. Bruce (March 9, 1872), 'with great vigour and eloquence on the Ewelme case; but I think that, with the best possible intentions, he had placed himself in a wrong position.'

IV

In 1872 the wide popularity of the government underwent a marked decline. The award at Geneva caused lively long annual spell for the remaining eighteen years of his father's life

On the morning of his arrival, he notes, 'I rode to the mill of Kincairn to see Mackay who was shet last night. He was suffering much and seemed near death. Read the Holy Scriptures to him (Psalins 51, 69, 71, Isaiali 55, Joh 14, Col 3) Left my prayer book. The visit was repeated daily until the poor man's death a week later Apart from such ealls of duty, books are his main interest. He is greatly delighted with Hamilton's Men and Manners in America. Alfieri's Antigone he dishkes as having the faults of both ancient and modern draina He grinds away through Gifford's Pitt, and reads Hallam's Middle Ages 'My method has usually been, 1, to read over regularly, 2, to glance again over all I have read, and analyse' He was just as little of the lounger in his lighter reading Schiller's plays ho went through with attention, finding it 'a good plan to read along with history, historical plays of the suno events for material illustration, as well as aid to the memory.' He read Scott's chapters on Mary Stuart in his history of Scotland, 'to enable me better to appreciate the admirable judgment of Schiller (in Mazut Stuart) both where he has adhered to history and where he has gone beyond it. He finds fault with the Temistocle of Metastasio, as 'too humane,' 'History should not be violated without a reason. It may be set aside to fill up poetical versimilatude. If history assigns a causo inadequato to its effect, or an offeet inadequate to its cause, poetry may supply the deficiency for the sake of an impressive whole. But it is too much to over at a narrative and call it a historical play.' Then camo a trage stroke in real life

Offer 6, 1873.—Post hour to-day brought me a restar holy announcement—the death of Arthur Hallar. This is telligence was deeply appressing even to ray self the disposition. I from no him, for rayalf, my curlest near freed, for my fellow even iron one who would have odored his eye and country, as in full of beauty and of power, activing after so that it all star lard of which it is presently in a to expect an exact 1. When shall I see his like to Yet this disposition has a tail pain, I selected a his majority of twenty-seven, and reached their homes at three in the morning with reasonably light hearts.

III

The ecclesiastical case of complaint against Mr. Gladstone was of a similar sort. By an act of parliament passed in 1871 the Queen was entitled to present to the rectory of Ewelme, but only a person who was a member of convocation of the university of Oxford. This limitation was inserted by way of compensation to the university for the severance of the advowson of the rectory from a certain chair of divinity. The living fell vacant, and the prime minister offered it (June 15) to Jelf of Christ Church, a tory and an evangelical. By Jelf it was declined. Among other names on the list for preferment was that of Mr. Harvey, a learned man who had published an edition of Irenæus, a work on the history and theology of the three creeds, articles on judaism, jansenism, and jesuitism, and other productions of merit. As might perhaps have been surmised from the nature of his favourite pursuits, he was not a liberal in politics, and he had what was for the purposes of this preferment the further misfortune of being a Cambridge man. To him Mr. Gladstone now offered Ewelme, having been advised that by the process of formal incorporation in the Oxford convocation the requirement of the statute would be satisfied. Mr. Harvey accepted. He was told that it was necessary that he should become a member of convocation before he could be appointed. little later (Aug. 1) he confessed to the prime minister his misgivings lest he should be considered as an 'interloper in succeeding to the piece of preferment that parliament had appropriated to bona-fide members of the university of Oxford.' These scruples were set aside, he was incorporated as a member of Oriel in due form, and after forty-two days of residence was admitted to membership of convocation, but whether to such plenary membership as the Ewelme statute was taken to require, became matter of dispute. All went forward, and the excellent man was presented and instituted to his rectory in regular course. There was no secret about ficence of his expositions must be them very strongly in the min ls of his hearers. In ordinary works great attention would be excited by the very infrequent occurrence of the very brilliant expressions and illustrations with which he cloys the palate. His gems he like paving stones. He does indeed seem to be an adminible man

Of Edinburgh his knowledge soon became intunate. His father and mother took him to that city, as we have seen, in 1814 He spent a spring there in 1828 just before going to Oxford and he recollected to the end of his life a sermon of Dr Andrew Thomson's on the Repent ance of Judas a great and striling subject,' Some erroumstance or another brought him into relations with Chalmers that repened into friendship We used to have walks together Mr Gladstone remembered, chiefly out of the town by the Dean Bridge and along the Queensferry road On one of our walks together, Chalmers took me down to see one of his districts by the water of I cith, and I remember we went into one or more of the cettages lie wont in with smiling countenance, greeting and being greek d by the people and sat down But he had nothing to say Ho was exactly like the Duke of Wellington who said of hunself that he had no small talk. His whole mind was always full of some great subject and he could not deviate from it. He sat similing among the people, but he had no small talk for them and they had no large talk. So after some time we came away he ple sed to have been with the people and they proud to have had the Doctor with them?
For Chalmers he never lost a warm approximan often expressed in admirable words-one of natures nobles, his warner grandeur, his rich and glowing cloquence his absorbed and absorbing cornestness above all his singular sumplicity and detachment from the world' Among other memories 'There was a quant old shop at the Borbe of which used to interest me very much. It was kept by a bookseller, Mr Thomas Nelson. I remember being amused by a reply he made to me one day when I went in and asked for Booth's Reign of Grace. He half turned his I call mands I hep et of an interview with Mrg fells eteror a 1900 in and at 1 Map 2, 0 et 1800 capacity from supporting a government which is liberal and Conservative.

Here is a sketch from the Aberdare papers of the temper and proceedings of the session:—

April 19.—We have had a disastrous week—three defeats, of which much the least damaging was that on local taxation, where we defended the public purse against a dangerous raid. There is no immediate danger to be apprehended from them. But these defeats lower prestige, encourage the discontented and envious, and animate the opposition. I think that Gladstone, who behaved yesterday with consummate judgment and temper, is personally very indifferent at the result. He is vexed at the ingratitude of men for whom he has done such great things which would have been simply impossible without him, and would not be unwilling to leave them for a while to their own guidance, and his feeling is shared by many of the ministry. Our measures must for the most part be taken up by our successors, and we should of course be too happy to help them. But I don't see the end near, although, of course, everybody is speculating.

Yet business was done. Progress of a certain kind was made in the thorny field of the better regulation of public houses, but Mr. Gladstone seems never to have spoken upon it in parliament. The subject was in the hands of Mr. Bruce, the home secretary, an accomplished and amiable man of the purest public spirit, and he passed his bill; but nothing did more to bring himself and his colleagues into stern disfavour among the especially pagan strata of the population. An entry or two from Mr. Bruce's papers will suffice to show Mr. Gladstone's attitude:—

Home Office, Dec. 9, 1869.—I am just returned from the cabinet, where my Licensing bill went through with flying colours. I was questioned a great deal as to details, but was ready, and I think that Gladstone was very well pleased.

Jan. 16, 1871.—I called upon Gladstone yesterday evening. He was in high spirits and full of kindness. He said that he had told Cardwell that I must be at the bottom of the abuse the press was pouring upon him, as I had contrived to relieve myself

Christian Ethics 26th, London -A busy day, yet of little palvable profit Read two important Demerara papers At the levee House 51 11 Wished to speak, but deterred by the extremely ill disposition to hear. Much sickened by their unfairness in the judicial character, more still at my own wretched feebleness and fears April 1 - Dined at Sir R Peel's Herries, Sir G Murray, Chantrey, etc Sir R Peel very kind in his manner to us May 29 -Mignet's Introduction [to 'the History of the Spanish succession,' one of the masterpieces of historical litera ture | June 4 -Bruce to breakfast Paper Mignet and analysis Burke Harvey committee 1 Ancient music concert Dined at Lincoln's Inn House 111 127 Rode June 6 -Paradise Lost Began Leibnitz's Tentamina Theodicea June 11 -Read Pitt's speeches on the Union in January, 1799, and Grattan on Catholic petition in 1805 15th -Read some passages in the latter part of Corinne, which always work strongly on me 18th - Coming home to dine, found Remains of A H H Yesterday a bridal at a friend s. to-day a sad memorial of death. Tis a sad subject, a very sad one to me I have not seen his like The memory of him reposes gently in my inmost heart, a fountain of tears which soften and fertilise it in the midst of pursuits whose tendency is to dry up the sources of emotion by the fever of excitement I read his memoir His father had done me much and undeserved kindness there 20th -- Most of my time went in thinking con fusedly over the university question Very anxious to speak, tortured with nervous anticipations, could not get an opportunity Certainly my inward experience on these occasions ought to make me humble Herbert's maiden speech very successful I ought to be thankful for my miss, perhaps also because my mind was so much oppressed that I could not, I fear, have unfolded my inward convictions What a world it is, and how does it require the Divine power and aid to clotho in words the profound and

¹ Daniel Whittle Harvey was an eloquent member of parliament whom the benchers of his nin refused to call to the lar on the ground of certain charges against his probity. The House appointed a committee of which Mr. Cladstone was a member to inquire late of the committee of t

charges O Connell was chairman and they acquitted Harvey will out however affecting the decision of the benchers Mr Oladstone was the only member of the committee who did not concur in its final judgment See his article on Dai iel O Connell in the Nineteenth Century, Jan 1889 irritation. The most active nonconformists were in active revolt. The Licensing bills infuriated the most powerful of all trade interests. The Collier case and the Ewelme case seemed superfluous and provoking blunders. A strong military section thirsted for revenge on the royal warrant. Mr. Goschen's threatened bill on local rating spread vague terrors. Individual ministers began to excite particular odium.

As time went on, the essentially composite character of a majority that was only held together by Mr. Gladstone's personality, his authority in the House, and his enormous strength outside, revealed itself in awkward fissures. The majority was described by good critics of the time as made up of three sections, almost well defined enough to deserve the name of three separate parties. First were the whigs, who never forgot that the prime minister had been for half his life a tory; who always suspected him, and felt no personal attachment to him, though they valued his respect for property and tradition, and knew in any case that he was the only possible man. Then came the middle-class liberals, who had held predominance since 1832, who were captivated by Mr. Gladstone's genius for finance and business, and who revered his high moral ideals. Third, there was the left wing, not strong in parliament but with' a certain backing among the workmen, who thought their leader too fond of the church, too deferential to the aristocracy, and not plain enough and thorough enough for a reforming age. The murmurs and suspicions of these hard and logical utilitarians of the left galled Mr. Gladstone as ungrateful. Phillimore records of him at this moment:-

Feb. 21, 1872.—Gladstone in high spirits and in rather a conservative mood. 29.—Gladstone sees that the time is fast coming when he must sever himself from his extreme supporters. He means to take the opportunity of retiring on the fair plea that he does not like to oppose those who have shown such great confidence in him, or to join their and his opponents. The plea seems good for retirement, but not for refraining in his individual

Robert Peel caused me much gratification by the way in which he spoke to inc of my speech, and particularly the great warmth of his manner. He told me he cheered me loudly and I said in return that I had heard his voice under me while speaking and was much encouraged thereby. He ends the note already eited (Sept. 6, 1897) on the old House of Commons which was burned down this year, with what he calls a curious incident concerning Sir Robert Peel, and with a sentence or two upon the government of Lord Grey —

Cohbett made a motion alike wordy and absurd, praying the king to remove him [Peel] from the privy council as the author of the act for the re establishment of the gold standard in 1819 The entire House was against him, except his colleague Fielden of Oldham, who made a second teller 1 After the division I think Lord Althorp at once rose and moved the expunction of the proceedings from the votes or journals, a severe rehuko to the mover Sir Robert in his speech said, 'I am at a less, sir, to conceive what can be the cause of the strong hostility to me which the honourable gentleman exhibits I never conferred on him an obligation' This stroke was not original But what struck me at the time as singular was this, that notwithstanding the state of feeling which I have described, Sn R Peel was greatly excited in dealing with one who at the time was little more than a contemptible antagonist. At that period shirt collars were made with 'gills' which came up upon the cheek, and Peel's gills were so scaked with perspiration that they actually lay down upon his neck-cloth

In one of these years, I think 1833, a motion was made by some political economist for the abolition of the eori I ws I (an absolute and literal ignoramus) was much struck and staggered with it. But Sir James Graham—who knew more of economic and trade matters, I think, than the rest of the cabinet of 1841 all put together—made a reply in the sense of protection, whether high or low I cannot now say. Put I remember perfectly well that this speech of his built me up again for the moment and enabled me (I believe) to vote with the government.

 $^{^{1}}$ Seo Cobbett's Life by Edward 1 ningham seems to have voted for the Sm th, n p 287. Attwood of Lir 1 motion is still dangerous. There are occasional earthquakes, and ever and anon the dark rumblings of the sea.

ÆT

On midsummer day he essayed at the Crystal Palace a higher flight, and first struck the imperialist note. agreed that distant colonies could only have their affairs administered by self-government. 'Self-government, when it was conceded, ought to have been conceded as part of a great policy of imperial consolidation. It ought to have been accompanied by an imperial tariff, by securities for the people of England, for the enjoyment of the unappropriated lands which belonged to the sovereign as their trustee, and by a military code which should have precisely defined the means and the responsibilities by which the colonies should have been defended, and by which, if necessary, this country should call for aid from the colonies themselves. It ought further to have been accompanied by the institution of some representative council in the metropolis which would have brought the colonies into constant and continuous relations with the home government.' He confessed that he had himself at one time been so far caught by the subtle views of the disintegrationists, that he thought the tie was broken. Opinion in the country was at last rising against disintegration. The people had decided that the empire should not be destroyed. 'In my judgment,' he said, 'no minister in this country will do his duty who neglects any opportunity of reconstructing as much as possible our colonial empire, and of responding to those distant sympathies which may become the source of incalculable strength and happiness to this land.' Toryism now sought three great objects: 'the maintenance of our institutions, the preservation of our empire, and the improvement of the condition of the people.' The time was at hand when England would have to decide between national and cosmopolitan principles, and the issue was no mean one. 'You must remember,' he concluded, 'that in fighting against liberalism or the continental system, you are fighting against those who have the advantage of power-against those who have been high in place for nearly half a century. You have nothing to trust to but your own energy and the sublime instinct of an ancient people.'

CHAPTER II

THE NEW CONSERVATION AND OFFICE

(1834 1845)

I CONSIDER the Reform bill a final and irrevocable settlement of a great constitutional question II by adopting the spirit of the Reform bill it be meant that we are to live in a perpetual vortex of agitation, that public men can only support themselves in public estimation by adopting every popular impression of the day, by promising the instant redress of anything that anybody may call an abuse I will not undertake to adopt it. But if the spirit of the Reform bill implies merely a careful review of institutions civil and ecclesiastical undertaken in a friendly temper, the correction of proved abuses and the redress of real girevances then, etc etc.

Preliations of the reform that any other products and the redress of real girevances then, etc etc.

THE autumn of 1834 was spent at Fasque An observant eyo followed political affairs, but hardly a word is said about them in the diary A stiff battle was kept up against electioneering iniquities at Newark Riding boating, shooting were Mr Gladstone's pastimes in the day, billiards singing, backgammon, and a rubber in the evening Sport was not without compunction which might well, in an age that counts itself humane, be expected to come oftener 'Had to kill a wounded partridge, he records 'and felt after it as if I had shot the albatross It might be said This should be more or less' And that was true. He was always a great walker He walked from Montrose, some thirteen or fourteen miles off, m two hours and three quarters, and another time he does six miles in seventy minutes. Nor does he over walk with an unobserving mind. At Lochingar 'Saw Highland women from Strathspey coming down for harvest with heavy loads some with babies over these wild rough paths through wind and storm. Ah with what labour does a largo portion of mankind subsist while we fare of it. 'Some one minister,' he added, 'is sure to be assailed. You caught it in the autumn, and now poor Cardwell is having a hard time of it.' I went with him afterwards to the Chapel Royal, which he never fails to attend.

Dec. 14.—We have a cabinet to-day, when I hope to have my Licensing bill in its main principles definitely settled. Unfortunately Gladstone cares for nothing but 'free trade' [in the sale of liquor], which the House won't have, and I cannot get him really to interest himself in the subject.

This is Speaker Brand's account of the general position:—

Throughout the session the opposition, ably led by Disraeli, were in an attitude of watchfulness. He kept his eye on the proceedings of the government day by day on the Alabama treaty. Had that treaty failed, no doubt Disraeli would have taken the sense of the House on the conduct of the government. For the larger part of the session the Alabama question hung like a cloud over the proceedings, but as soon as that was settled, the sky cleared. It has been a good working session. . . Of the two leading men, Gladstone and Disraeli, neither has a strong hold on his followers. The radicals below the right gangway are turbulent and disaffected, and the same may be said of the independent obstructives below the left gangway. . . . B., E., H., L. avowedly obstruct all legislation, and thus bring the House into discredit.

It was now that Mr. Disraeli discerned the first great opportunity approaching, and he took the field. At Manchester (April 3) he drew the famous picture of the government, one of the few classic pieces of the oratory of the century:—

Extravagance is being substituted for energy by the government. The unnatural stimulus is subsiding. Their paroxysms end in prostration. Some take refuge in melancholy, and their eminent chief alternates between a menace and a sigh. As I sit opposite the treasury bench, the ministers remind me of one of those marine landscapes not very unusual on the coasts of South America. You behold a range of exhausted volcanoes. Not a flame flickers upon a single pallid crest. But the situation writes occasional verses, including the completion of 'some stanzas of December 1832 on "The Human Heart," but I am not impudent enough to call them by that name.'

In the midst of days well filled by warm home feeling, reasonable pleasure, and vigerous animation of intellect came the summons te action. On November 18, a guest arrived with the astonishing news that ministers were out. The king had dismissed the Melheurne government, partly because he did not believe that Lord John Russell could take the place of Althorp as leader of the Commons, partly because like many eleverer judges ho was sick of them, and partly because, as is perhaps the case with more calinets than the world supposes, the ministers were sick of one another, and King William knew it. Mr. Gladsteno in 18751 described the dismissal of the whigs in 1834 as the indiscreet preceeding of an honest and well-meaning man, which gave the conservatives a mementary tenure of effico without power, but preveked a streng reaction in favour of the liberals, and greatly prelonged the predominance which they were en the point of lesing through the play of natural causes 2 Sir Rebert Peel was summened in het haste from Rome, and after a journey of twelve days ever alpine snews. eight nights out of the twelve in a carriage, on December 9 he reached Lenden, saw the king and kissed hands as first lord of the treasury. Less than two years before, he had said, 'I feel that between me and office there is a wider gulf than there is perhaps hotween it and any other man in the Heuse.'

Mr. Gladstone meanwhile at Fasque worked off some of his natural excitement which he notes as invading even Sundays, by the composition of a political tract. The tract has disappeared down the gulf of time. December 11 was his father's seventieth birthday, his strength and energy wonderful and giving promise of many nore.' Within the week the fated message from the new prime had never been put to my friends, and I asked whether I should conside any part of what he had said as contingent upon the answer I might receive from them He said no, that he would williagly take that risk At first, he thought I had suspicions about the Duke of Newcastle, and assured me that he would be much pleased, of which I said I felt quite persuaded This inquiry, however, served the double purpose of discharging my own duty. and drawing out something about the dissolution He said to me, 'You will address your constituents upon vacating your seat, and acquaint them of your intention to solicit a renewal of their con fidence whenever they are called upon to exercise their franchise, which I tell you confidentially,' he added, 'will be very soon' I would have given a hundred pounds to he then and there in a position to express my hopes and fears! But it is, then, you see certain that we are to have it, and that they will not meet the present parliament Most bitterly do I lament it

^{225,} indicate that Melbourne had spontaneously given the king good reasons for cashiering him and his collections.

Mr Gladstone at a later date (July 25, 1835) recorded that he had reason to believe from a conversation with a tory friend who was in many party secrets that the Duke of Wellington set their candidates in motion all over the country before Sir Roberts return. Active measures and of course expense, had so generally begun so much impatience for the dissolution had been excited and the anticipations had been permitted for so long a time to continue and to spread, as to preclude the possibility of delay.

The appointment of the young member for Newark was noted at the time as an innovation upon a semi-secred social usage. Sir Robert Inglis said to him 'You are about the youngest lord who was ever placed at the treasury on his own account, and not because he was his father son' The prime immister, no doubt, rejoieed in finding for the public service a young man of this high promise, sprung out of the same class, and bred in the same academic must be injurious to the principles that he professes But I cmay be overborne 1 y the violent people of his own party whom he will not I c able to control? Ashley a Life of Palmerston (1879) 1, p 313 recollection of this kind, I found it most difficult to believe with any reality of belief, that such a poor and insignificant creature as I, could really belong to, really form a part of, an assembly which, notwithstanding the prosaic character of its entire visible equipment, I felt to be so august. What I may term its corporeal conveniences were, I may observe in passing, marvellously small. I do not think that in any part of the building it afforded the means of so much as washing the hands. The residences of members were at that time less distant: but they were principally reached on foot. When a large House broke up after a considerable division, a copious dark stream found its way up Parliament Street, Whitehall and Charing Cross.

¹ Lor l Palmerston doubte l (Nov 20 1834) whether Peel would dis solve 'I think his own bias will rather be to abide by the decision of this House of Commons and try to propriate at by great professions of reform The effect of a dissolution

I remember that there occurred some case in which a constituent (probably a maltster) at Newark sent me a communication which made oral communication with the treasury, or with the chancellor of the exchequer (then Lord Althorp), convenient. As to the means of bringing this about, I was puzzled and abashed. Some experienced friend on the opposition bench, probably Mr. Gonlburn, said to me, There is Lord Althorp sitting alone on the treasury bench, go to him and tell him your business. With such encouragement I did it. Lord Althorp received me in the kindest manner possible, alike to my pleasure and my surprise.

The exact composition of the first reformed House of Commons was usually analysed as tories 144; reformers 395; English and Scotch radicals 76; Irish repealers 43. Mr. Gladstone was for counting the decided conservatives as 160 and reckoning as a separate group a small party who had once been tories and now ranked between conservative opposition and whig ministers. The Irish representatives he divided between 28 tories, and a body of 50 who were made up of ministerialists, conditional repealers, and tithe extinguishers. He heard Joseph Hume, the most effective of the leading radicals, get the first word in the reformed parliament, speaking for an hour and perhaps justifying O'Connell's witty saying that Hume would have been an excellent speaker, if only he would finish a sentence before beginning the next but one after it.

No more diligent member of parliament than Mr. Glad-

Arrived in London (Jan 8) before 8 PM Good travelling' On reckoning up his movements he finds that, though not at all fond of travelling for the sake of going from place to place, he has had in 1834 quite 2400 miles of it

Before the dissolution, Sir H Hardinge had told him that the conservatives would not be over 340 nor under 300, but by the middle of the month things looked less prosperous. The reaction against the whigs had not yet reached full flood, the royal dismissal of the administration was unpopular, moderate people more especially in Scotland could not stand a government where the Duke of Wellington, the symbol of a beinghted and stubborn toryism, was seen over Peel's shoulder "At present," Mi Gladstone writes, 'the case is, even in my view, hopeful, in that of most here it is more. And certainly, to have this very privilege of entertaining a deliberate and reasonable hope, to think that notwithstanding the ten pound clause, a moderate parliament may be returned, in fine, to believe that we have now some prospect of surviving the Reform bill without a bloody revolution, is to me as surprising as delightful, it seems to me the greatest and mest providential mency with which a nation was ever visited.

To day I'am going to dine with the lord chancellor [Lyndburst] having received a card to that effect last night'

It was at this dinner that Mr Gladstone had his first opportunity of making a remarkable acquaintance. In his diary be mentions as present three of the judges, the flower of the beneh, as he supposes, but he says not a word of the man of the strangest destiny there, the author of Vavian Grey. Disraeli himself, in a lotter to his sister, names 'young Gladstone,' and others, but condemns the feast as rather dull, and declares that a swan very white and tender, and stuffed with trufflies, was the best company at the table. What Mr Gladstone carried away in his memory was a sage lesson of Lyndhurst's, by which the two men of genius at his table were in time to show themselves extremely competent to profit—'Never defend jourself before a popular assemblage except with and by re-

but saw no good opportunity. 'The emotions through which one passes, at least through which I pass, in anticipating such an effort as this, are painful and humiliating. The utter prostration and depression of spirit; the deep sincerity, the burdensome and overpowering reality of the feeling of mere feebleness and incapacity, felt in the inmost heart, yet not to find relief by expression, because the expression of such things goes for affectation,—these things I am unequal to describe, yet I have experienced them now.' On June 3, the chance came. Here is his story of the day: 'Began le miei Prigioni. West India meeting of members at one at Lord Sandon's. Resolutions discussed and agreed upon; . . . dined early. Re-arranged my notes for the debate. Rode. House 5 to 1. Spoke my first time, for 50 minutes. My leading desire was to benefit the cause of those who are now so sorely beset. The House heard me very kindly, and my friends were satisfied. Tea afterwards at the Carlton.' The speech was an uncommon success. Stanley, the minister mainly concerned, congratulated him with more than those conventional compliments which the good nature of the House of Commons expects to be paid to any decent beginner. 'I never listened to any speech with greater pleasure;' said Stanley, himself the prince of debaters and then in the most brilliant part of his career, 'the member for Newark argued his case with a temper, an ability, and a fairness which may well be cited as a good model to many older members of this House. His own leader, though he spoke later, said nothing in his speech about the new recruit, but two days after Mr. Gladstone mentioned that Sir R. Peel came up to him and praised Monday night's affair. King William wrote to Althorp: 'he rejoices that a young member has come forward in so promising a manner, as Viscount Althorp states Mr. W. E. Gladstone to have done.'

Apart from its special vindication in close detail of the state of things at Vreedenhoop as being no worse than others, the points of the speech on this great issue of the time were familiar ones. He confessed with shame and pain that cases of cruelty had existed, and would always

¹ Memoir of Althorp, p. 471.

From Sir Robert the new under-secretary made his way, in fear and trembling, to his new chief, Lord Aherdeen.

Distinction of itself naturally and properly rather alarms the young. I had heard of his high character; int I had also heard of him as a man of cold manners, and close and even haughty reserve. It was dark when I entered his room, so that I saw his figure rather than his countenance. I do not recollect the matter of the conversation, hut I well remember that, hefore I had been three minutes with him, all my apprehensions had neited away like snow in the sun. I came away from that interview conscious indeed of his dignity, but of a dignity so tempered by a peculiar purity and gentleness, and so associated with impressions of his kindness and even friendship, that I believe I thought more about the wonder of his being at that time so misunderstood by the outer world, than about the new duties and responsibilities of my office.

Time only deepened these impressions. It is not hard for a great party chief to win the affection and regard of his junior colleague, and where good fortune has brought togother a congenial pair, no friendship outside the home can be more valuable, more delightful, alike to veteran and to tire. Of all the host of famous or considerable men with whom he was to come into official and other relations, none over, as we shall see, held the peculiar place in Mr. Gladstone's esteem and reverence of the two statesmen under whose auspices he new first entered the enchanted circle of public office. The promotion was a remarkable stride. He was only five-and-twenty, his parliamentary existence had barely covered two years, and he was wholly without powerful family connection. 'You are aware,' Peel wrote to John Gladstone, of the sacrifice I have made of personal feeling to public duty, in placing your son in one of the most important offices-that of representative of the colonial department in the House of Commons, and thus relinquishing his valuable aid in my own immediate department.
Wherever he may be placed, he is sure to distinguish himself.'s

¹ Lord Stanmore's Earl of Aberdeen (1893), p. m. 2 Parker's Peel, ii. p 267.

middle class for the abolition of slavery was virtuous, but it of was not wise. It was an ignorant movement. The history of the abolition of slavery by the English and its consequences, would be a narrative of ignorance, injustice, blundering, waste, and have, not easily paralleled in the history of mankind.'

A week later Lord Howick proposed to move for papers relating to Vreedenhoop. Lord Althorp did not refuse to grant them, but recommended him to drop his motion, as Mr. Gladstone insisted on the equal necessity of a similar return for all neighbouring plantations. Howick withdrew his motion, though he afterwards asserted that ministers had declined the return, which was not true. When Buxton moved to reduce the term of apprenticeship, Mr. Gladstone voted against him. On the following day Stanley, without previous intimation, announced the change from twelve years to seven. 'I spoke a few sentences,' Mr. Gladstone enters in his diary, 'in much confusion: for I could not easily recover from the sensation caused by the sudden overthrow of an entire and undoubting reliance.'

The question of electoral seandals at Liverpool, which naturally excited lively interest in a family with local ties so strong, came up in various forms during the session, and on one of these oceasions (July 4) Mr. Gladstone spoke upon it, 'for twenty minutes or more, anything but satisfactorily to myself.' Nor can the speech now be called satisfactory by any one else, except for the enunciation of the sound maxim that the giver of a bribe deserves punishment quite as richly as the receiver. Four days later he spoke for something less than half an hour on the third reading of the Irish Church Reform bill. 'I was heard,' he tells his father, 'with kindness and indulgence, but it is, after all, uphill work to address an assembly so much estranged in feeling from one's self.' Peel's speech was described as temporising, and the deliverance of his young lieutenant was temporising too, though firm on the necessary principle, as he called it, of which the world was before long to hear so much from him, that the nation should be exed for the support of a national church.

¹ Lord George Bentinck, chapter xviii. p. 324.

Feb 4 or 5 - Charles Canning told mo Peel had offered him the vacant lordship of the treasury, through his mother They were, he said, very much gratified with the manner in which it had been done, though the offer was declined, upon the ground stated in the reply, that though he did not anticipate any discrepancy in political sentiments to separate him from the present government, yet he should prefer in some senso deserving an official station by parliamentary conduct Peels letter was written at some length, very friendly, without any statesmanlike reserve or sensitive attention to nicety of style. In the last paragraph it spoke with amiable embarrassment of Mr Canning, stating that his 'respect, regard, and admiration' (I think even), apparently interrupted by circumstances, continued fresh and vivid, and that those very circumstances made him more desirous of thus publicly testifying his real sentiments

March 30 - Wished to speak on Irish church No opioi tunity Wrote on it A noble minded speech from Sir J Graham March 31 - Spoke on the Irish church-under forty minutes I cannot help here recording that this matter of speak ing is really my strongest religious exercise On all occasion, and to-day, especially, was forced upon me the humiliating senso of my mahility to exercise my reason in the face of the H of C, and of the necessity of my utterly failing, unless God gave me the strength and language It was after all a poor performance, but would have been poorer had He never been in my thoughts as a present and powerful aid But this is what I am as yet totally incompetent to effect-to realise, in speaking, anything, however small, which at all satisfies my mind Debating seems to moless difficult, though unattained But to hold in serene contemplative action the mental faculties in the turbid excitement of debate, so as to see truth clearly and set it forth such as it is, this I cannot attain to

As regards my speech in the Irish church debate, he tells his father (April 2), it was received by the House, and have heen estimated, in a mauner extremely gratifying to me. As regards satisfaction to myself in the manner of its execution, I cannot say so much. Backed by a numerous and warm hearted party, and strong in the consciousness of a good cause, I did not mortality. Heard him pray with his family. Blessing and honour Ca are upon his head. July 30.—L'Allemagne. Bulwer's England. Parnell. Looked at my Plato. Rode. House. July 31.—Hallam breakfasted with me. . . . Committee on West India bill finished. . . . German lesson. August 2.-Worked German several hours. Read half of the Bride of Lammermoor. L'Allemagne. Rode. House. August 3.—German lesson and worked alone. . . . Attended Mr. Wilberforce's funeral; it brought solemn thoughts, particularly about the slaves. This a burdensome question. German kept up steadily for many days.] August 9.—House.... voted in 48 to 87 against legal tender clause. . . . Read Tasso. August 11.—St. Jamës's morning and afternoon. Read Bible. Abbott (finished) and a sermon of Blomfield's aloud. Wrote a paraphrase of part of chapter 8 of Romans. August 15 .- Committee 1-31. Rode. Plato. Finished Tasso, canto 1. Antislavery observations on bill. German vocabulary and exercise. August 16.— $2\frac{3}{4}$ - $3\frac{1}{2}$ Committee finished. German lesson. Finished Plato, Republic, bk. v. Preparing to pack. August 17.—Started for Aberdeen on board Queen of Scotland at 12. August 18th.—Rose to breakfast but uneasily. Attempted reading, and read most of Baxter's narrative. Not too unwell to reflect. August 19th.-Remained in bed. Read Goethe and translated a few lines. Also Beauties of Shakespere. In the evening it blew: very ill though in bed. Could not help admiring the crests of the waves even as I stood at cabin window. August 20.—Arrived 8 A.M.—56 hours.

His father met him, and in the evening he and his brother found themselves at the new paternal seat. In 1829 John Gladstone, after much negotiation, had bought the estate of Fasque in Kincardineshire for £80,000, to which and to other Scotch affairs he devoted his special and personal attention pretty exclusively. The home at Seaforth was broken up, though relatives remained there or in the neighbourhood. For some time he had a house in Edinburgh for private residence—the centre house in Atholl Crescent. They used for three or four years to come in from Kincardineshire, and spend the winter months in Edinburgh. Fasque was his home for the rest of his days. This was W. E. Gladstone's first visit, followed by at least one

A few days later Mr. Gladstone dined with an official party at the fallen minister's:-

Sir R. Peel made a very nice speech on Lincoln's proposing and our drinking his health. The following is a slight and had sketch :- 'I really can hardly call you gentlemen alone. I would rather address you as my warm and attached friends in whom I have the fullest confidence, and with whom it has afforded me the greatest satisfaction to be associated during the struggle which has just been brought to a close. In undertaking the government, from the first I have never expected to succeed; still it was my conviction that good might he done, and I trust that good has been effected. I believe we have shown that even if a conservative government he not strong enough to carry on the public affairs of this country, at least we are so strong that we . ought to he able to prevent any other government from doing any serious mischief to its institutions We meet now as we met at the heginning of the session, then perhaps in somewhat finer dresses, but not, I am sure, with kindlier feelings towards each other.'

The rest of the session Mr. Gladstone passed in his usual pursuits, reading all sorts of books, from the correspondence of Leibnitz with Bossuet, and Alexander Knox's Remains, dewn to Rousseau's Confessions. As to the last of these he searcely knew whether to read on or to throw it aside, and, in fact, he seems only to have persevered with that strange romance of a wandering soul for a day or two. Besides promiseuous reading, he performed some scribbling, including a sonnet, recorded in his diary with notes of wondering exclamation. His family were in London for most of May, his mother in bad health; no other engagement over interrupted his sedulous attendance on her every day, reading the Biblo to her, and telling the news about levees and drawingrooms, a great dinner at Sir Robert Peel's, and all the rest of his business and recreations. In the House he did little between the fall of the ministry and the close of the session. He once wished to speak, but was shut out by the length of other speeches. 'So,' he moralises, 'I had two useful lessons instead of one. For the sense of helplessness which always and not (in my mind) a bare or rash hope that his soul rests with God in Jesus Christ. . . . I walked upon the hills to muse upon this very monrhful event, which cuts me to the heart. Alas for his family and his intended bride. October 7th.—My usual occupations, but not without many thoughts upon my departed friend. Bible. Alfieri, Wallenstein, Plato, Gifford's Pitt, Biographia Literaria. Rode with my father and Helen. All objects lay deep in the softness and solemnity of antunnal decay. Alas, my poor friend was cut off in the spring of his bright existence.

December 13, Edinburgh.—Breakfast with Dr. Chalmers. His modesty is so extreme that it is oppressive to those who are in his company, especially his juniors, since it is impossible for them to keep their behaviour in due proportion to his. He was on his own subject, the Poor Laws, very eloquent, earnest and impressive. Perhaps he may have been hasty in applying maxims drawn from Scotland to a more advanced stage of society in England. December 17.—Robertson's Charles V., Plato, began book 10. Chalmers. Singing-lesson and practice. Whist. Walked on the Glasgow road, first milestone to fourth and back in 70 minutesthe returning three miles in about 333. Ground in some places rather muddy and slippery. December 26 .- A feeble day. successive callers and conversation with my father occupied the morning. Read a good allowance of Robertson, an historian who leads his reader on, I think, more pleasantly than any I know. The style most attractive, but the mind of the writer does not set forth the loftiest principles. December 29th, Sunday.—Twenty-four years have I lived. . . . Where is the continuous work which ought to fill up the life of a Christian without intermission? . . . I have been growing, that is certain; in good or evil? Much fluctuation; often a supposed progress, terminating in finding myself at, or short of, the point which I deemed I had left behind me. Business and political excitement a tremendous trial, not so much alleviating as forcibly dragging down the soul from that temper which is fit to inhale the air of heaven. - Jan. 8, 1834, Edinburgh.-Breakfast with Dr. Chalmers. Attended his lecture 2-3. . . . More than ever struck with the superabundance of Dr. C.'s gorgeous language, which leads him into repetitions, until the stores of our tongue be exhausted on each particular point. Yet the variety and magnilong-continued groaning.1 Four years later Mr. Gladstone heard words from Lord John Russell on this point, that began to change his mind. 'Often do I think,' he wroto to Lord Russell in 1870, 'of a saying of yours more than thirty years back which struck me ineffaceably at tho time. You said. "The true key to our Irish debates was this; that it was not properly borne in mind that as England is inhabited by Englishmen, and Scotland by Scotchmen, so Ireland is inhabited by Irishmen."'2 visitin 1836-spoke against Mr Glad. arrival. stone for an hour in the open air, and

1 O'Connell paid Newark a short much as they had been before his 2 Walpole, Life of Lord John then left the town, loth he and it Russell, n. p. 455.

me, and remarked with a peculiar twinkle in his eye, "Ay, c man, but ye're a young chiel to be askin' after a book like that."

On his way south in January 1834, Mr. Gladstone stays with relatives at Seaforth, 'where even the wind howling upon the window at night was dear and familiar'; and a few days later finds himself once more within the ever congenial walls of Oxford.

January, 19. Sunday.—Read the first lesson in morning chapel. A most masterly sermon of Pusey's preached by Clarke. Lancaster in the afternoon on the Sacrament. Good walk. Wrote [family letters.] Read Whyte. Three of Girdlestone's Sermons. ing on adult baptism (some clever and singularly insufficient reasoning). Episcopal pastoral letter for 1832. Doane's Ordination sermon, 1833, admirable,—Wrote some thoughts. Jan. 20.—Sismondi's Italian Republics. Dined at Merton, and spent all the evening there in interesting conversation. I was Hamilton's guest [afterwards Bishop of Salisbury]. It was delightful, it wrings joy even from the most unfeeling heart, to see religion on the increase as it is here. Jan. 23rd.—Much of to-day, it fell out, spent in conversation of an interesting kind, with Brandreth and Pearson on eternal punishment; with Williams on baptism; with Churton on faith and religion in the university; with Harrison on prophecy and the papacy. . . . Jan. 24.— Began Essay on Saving Faith, and wrote thereon. Jan. 29th. -Dined at Oriel. Conversation with Newman chiefly on church matters. . . , I excuse some idleness to myself by the fear of doing some real injury to my eyes. [After a flight of three or four days to London, he again returns for a Sunday in Oxford.] Feb. 9.—Two university sermons and St. Peter's. Round the meadows with Williams. Dined with him, common room. Tea and a pleasant conversation with Harrison. Began Chrysostom de Sacerdotio, and Cecil's Friendly Visit. [Then he goes back to town for the rest of the session.] Feb. 12, London.—Finished Friendly Visit, beautiful little book. Finished Tennyson's poems. Wrote a paper on ήθικὴ πίστις in poetry. Recollections of Robert Hall. 13th.-With Doyle, long and solemn conversation on the doctrine of the Trinity. . . . Began Wardlaw's hoped. To these ho added as he went along the Génie du Christianisme, Bolingbroke, Baeon's Essays, Don Quixote, the Annals of Tacitus, Le Bas' Life of Laud ('semewhat too Laudish, though right au fond'; unlike Lawson's Laud, 'a most intemperate book, the foam swallows up all the facts'), Childe Harold, Jerusalem Delivered ('beautiful in its kind, but how can its author be placed in the same category of genius as Dante?'), Pollok's Course of Time ('much talent, little culture, insufficient power to digest and construct his subject or his versification; his politics radical, his religious sentiments generally sound, though perhaps hard').

In the evenings he read aloud to his father the Faery Queen and Shakespeare. On Sundays he read Chillingworth and Jewel, and, above all, he dug and delved in St. Augustine. He drew a sketch of a project touching Peculiarities in Religion. For several days he was writing something on polities. Then an outline or an essay on our colonial system. For he was no reader of the lounging, sauntering, passively recoptive species; he went ferward in a sedulous process of import and export, a mind actively at work on all the topics that passed before it.

At the beginning of the year 1836 he was invited to pay, a visit to Drayton, where he found only Lord Harrowby—a link with the great mon of an earlier generation, for he had acted as Pitt's second in the duel with Tierney, and had been foreign secretary in Pitt's administration of 1804; might have been prime minister in 1827 if he had liked; and he headed the Waverers who secured the passing of the Reform bill by the Lords. Other guests followed, the host rather contracting in freedom of conversation as the party expanded.

I cannot record anything continuous, Mr. Gladstone writes in his memorandum of the visit, but commit to paper several opinions and expressions of Sir R. Peel, which bore upon interesting and practical questions. That Fox was not a man of settled, reasoned, political principle. Lord Harrowby added that he was thrown mysterious thoughts on those subjects most connected with the human soul—thoughts which the mind does not command as a mistress, but entertains reverentially as honoured guests... content with only a partial comprehension, hoping to render it a progressive one, but how difficult to define in words a conception, many of whose parts are still in a nascent state with no fixed outline or palpable substance. July 2.—... Guizot. Cousin. Bossuet (Hist. Univ.). Rode. Committee and House. Curious detail from O'Connell of his interview with Littleton. $10th.-7\frac{1}{4}$ A.M. $7\frac{1}{2}$ in an open chaise to Coggeshall and back with O'Connell and Sir G. Sinclair, to examine Skingley [a proceeding arising from the Harvey committee,] which was done with little success.

1 Parker's Feel, in p. 321.

The conversation of the great Liberator was never wholly forgotten, and it was probably his earliest chance of a glimpse of the Irish point of view at first hand.

July 11.—No news till the afternoon and then heard on very good authority that the Grey government is definitely broken up, and that attempts at reconstruction have failed. Cousin, Sismondi, Education evidence. Letters. House. 21st.—To-day not for the first time felt a great want of courage to express feelings strongly awakened on hearing a speech of O'Connell. To have so strong an impulse and not obey it seems unnatural; it seems like an inflicted dumbness. 28th.—Spoke 30 to 35 minutes on University bill, with more ease than I had hoped, having been more mindful or less unmindful of Divine aid. Divided in 75 v. 164. [To his father next day.] You will see by your Post that I held forth last night on the Universities bill. The House I am glad to say heard me with the utmost kindness, for they had been listening previously to an Indian discussion in which very few people took any interest, though indeed it was both curious and interesting. But the change of subject was no doubt felt as a relief, and their disposition to listen set me infinitely more at my ease than I should otherwise have been. 29th.—Pleasant house dinner at Carlton. Lincoln got up the party. Sir R. Peel was in good spirits and very agreeable.

It was on this occasion that he wrote to his mother,—'Sir vol. I.

exertion he mixes at 66 or 67 a constant attention to husiness. Sir R. Peel mentioned to me to-night a very remarkable example of his [the duke's] perhaps excessive precision. Whenever he signs a draft on Coutts's, he addresses to them at the same time a note apprising them that he has done so. This perfect facility of transition from one class of occupation to their opposites, and their habitual intermixture without any apparent encroachments on either side, is, I think, a very remarkable evidence of self-command, and a mental power of singular ntility. Sir Robert is also, I conceive, a thrifty dealer with his time, but in a man of his age [Peel now 48] this is less beyond expectation.

He said good bye on the last night with regret. In themidst of the great company he found time to read Bossuet on Variations, remarking rather oddly, 'some of Bossuot's theology seems to me very good.'

On Jan. 30th is the entry of his journey from Liverpool, 'I to 4 to Hawarden Castle.' [I suppose his first visit to his future home.] Got to Chester (Feb. 1) five minutes after the mail had started. Got on by Albion. Outside all night; frost; rain; arrived at Albany 112. Feb. 4th .- Session opens. Voted in 243-284. A good opportunity for speaking, but in my weakness did not use it. Feb. 8th .- Stanley made a noble speech. Voted in 243 to 307 for abolition of Irish corporations. Pendnlums and Nothingarisns all against us. Sunday.-Wroto on Hypocrisy. On Worship. Attempted to explain this to the servants at night. Newman's Sermons and J. Taylor. Trench's Poems. March 2nd,-Read to my deep sorrow of Anstice's death on Monday. His friends, his young widow, the world can spare him ill; so says at least the flesh. Stapleton. Paradiso, VII. VIII. Calls. Rode. Wrote. Dined at Lord Ashburton's. House. Statistical Society's Proceedings. Verses on Anstice's death. March 22nd .- House 51-91. Spoke 50 minutes [on negro apprenticeship; seo p. 145]; kindly heard, and I should thank God for being made able to speak even thus indifferently. March 23rd. . . . Late, having been

¹ The Standard marks at 'as a brilliant and triumphant argument—one the reformed House of Commons.'

The year 1833 was, as measured by quantity and in part by quality, a splendid year of legislation. In 1834 the Government and Lord Althorp far beyond all others did themselves high honour by the new Poor Law Act, which rescued the English peasantry from the total loss of their independence. Of the 658 members of Parliament about 480 must have been their general supporters. Much gratitude ought to have been felt for this great administration. But from a variety of causes, at the close of the session 1834 the House of Commons had fallen into a state of cold indifference about it.

He was himself destined one day to feel how soon parliamentary reaction may follow a sweeping popular triumph.

Wordsworth came in to breakfast the other day before his time. I asked him to excuse me while I had my servant to prayers; but he expressed a hearty wish to be present, which was delightful. He bas laboured long; if for himself, yet more for men, and over all. I trust for God. Will he ever be the bearer of evil thoughts to any mind? Glory is gathering round his later years on earth, and his later works especially indicate the spiritnal ripening of his noble soul. I heard hut few of his opinions; hut these are some. He was charmed with Trench's poems; liked Alford; thought Shelley had the greatest native powers in poetry of all the men of this age. In reading Die Braut son Korinth translated, was more horrified than enchained, or rather altogether the first. dered how any one could translate it or the Faust, but spoke as knowing the original. Thought little of Murillo as to the mind of painting; said he could not have painted Paul Veronese's 'Marriage of Cana,' Considered that old age in great measure disqualified him by its rigid fixity of habits from judging of the works of young poets-I must say that ho was hero even over liberal in self-depreciation. He defended the make of the steamhoat as more poetical than otherwise to the eye (see Sonnets 1). Thought Coleridge admired Ossian only in youth, and himself admired the spirit which Macpherson professes to embody.

Sergeant Talfourd dined here to meet Wordsworth yesterday. Wordsworth is vehement against Byron. Saw in Shelley the lowest form of irreligion, but a later progress towards better things. Named the discrepancy between his erecd and his imagination as the marring idea of his works, in which description I could not concur. Spoke of the entire revolution in his own poetical taste. We were agreed that a man's personal character ought to be the basis of his politics. He quoted his sonnet on the contested election [what sonnet is this t], from which I ventured to differ as regards its assuming nutriment for the heart to he inherent in politics. He described to me his views; that the Reform Act had, as it were, brought out too prominently a particular muscle of the national frame: the strength of the towns; that the cure was to be found in a large further enfransumptuously every day!' This was the ready susceptibility to humane impression in the common circumstance of life, the eye stirring the emotions of the feeling heart, that nourished in him the soul of true oratory, to say nothing of feeding the roots of statesmanship. His bookmindedness is unabated. He began with a resolution to work at least two hours every morning before breakfast, and the resolution seems to have been manfully kept, without prejudice to systematic reading for a good many hours of the day besides. For the first time, rather strange to say, he read St. Augustine's Confessions, and with the delight that might have been expected. He finds in that famous composition 'a good deal of prolix and fanciful, though acute speculation, but the practical parts of the book have a wonderful force, and inimitable sweetness and simplicity.' In other departments of religion, he read Archbishop Leighton's life and Hannah More's, Arnold's Sermons and Milner's Church History and Whewell's Bridgewater Treatise. Once more he analyses the Novum Organum and the Advancement of Learning, and he reads or re-reads Locke's Essay. He studies political science in the two great manuals of the old world and the new, in the Politics of Aristotle and the Prince of Machiavelli. He goes through three or four plays of Schiller; also Manzoni, and Petrarch, and Dante at the patient rate of a couple of cantos a day; then Boccaccio, from whom, after a half-dozen of the days, he willingly parts company, only interested in him as showing a strange state of manners and how religion can be dissociated from conduct. In modern politics he reads the memoirs of Chatham, and Brougham on Colonial Policy, of which he says that 'eccentricity, paradox, fast and loose reasoning and (much more) sentiment, appear to have entered most deeply into the essence of this remarkable man when he wrote his Colonial Policy, as now; with the rarest power of expressing his thoughts, has he any fixed law to guide them?' On Roscoe's Leo X. he remarks how interesting and highly agreeable it is in style, and while disclaiming any right to judge its fidelity and research, makes the odd observation that it has in some degree subdued the leaven of its author's unitarianism.

^{1 &#}x27;Motions and Means on Land and Sea at War,' v. 248. Steamboats, Viducts, and Railways.

19th.—Began Cicero's Tusculan Questions. . . . 25th.—Aug. Cir. Dei. I am now in Book xiv. Cic. Tusc. finished. Book ii. Purgatorio, ii.v. A dose of whist. Still snow and rain. 26th.—Aug. Cicero. Billiards. Purgatorio, vi.-viii. Began Dryden's Fables. My eyes are not in their best plight, and I am obliged to consider type a little. Jan. 3rd, 1837.—Breakfasted with Dr. Chalmers. How kind my father is in small matters as well as great—thoughtfully sending carriage. 13th, Glaspow.—The pavilion astoaishing, and the whole effect very grand. Near 3500. Sir R. Peel spoke 1 h, 55 m. Explicit and bold; it was a very great effort. I kept within 15 min.—quite long enough. 14th.—7½ 5½ mail to Carlislo. On all night. 15th.—Wetherby at 7½. Leeds 10½. Church there. Walked over to Wakefield. Church there Evening at Thornes. [Milnes Gaskell's.] 17th.—To Nowark. Very good meeting. Spoke 2 hour.

In this speech, after the regulation denunciation of the reckless wickedness of O'Connell, he set about demonstrating the change that had taken place in the character of public feeling during the last few years. He pointed out that at the dissolution of 1831 the conservativo members of the House of Commons amounted perhaps to 50. In 1835 they saw this small dispirited band grow into a resolute and formidable phalanx of 300. The cry was: 'Resolute attachment to the institutions of the country.' One passage in the speech is of interest in the history of his attitude on toleration. Sir William Moleswerth had been invited to come forward as candidate for the representation of Leeds. A report spread that Sir William was not a believer in the Christian articles of faith. Somebody wrote to Molesworth, to know if this was truo. He answered, that the question whether he was a believer in the Christian religion was one that no man of liberal principles ought to propose to another, or could propose without being guilty of a dereliction of duty. On this incident, Mr. Gladstone said that he would ask, 'Is it not a time for serious reflection among moderate and candid men of all parties, when such a question was actually thought impertinent interference? Surely they would say with him, that mon who have no belief in tho minister arrived; the case is apt to quicken the pulse of even the most serene of politicians, and we may be sure—that Mr. Gladstone with the keen vigour of five-and-twenty tingling in his veins was something more or less than serene.

Dec. 17.—Locke, and Russell's Modern Europe in the morning. Went to meet the post, found a letter from Peel desiring to see me, dated 13th. All haste; ready by 4—no place! Reluetantly deferred till the morning. Wrote to Lineoln, Sir R. Peel, etc. . . . A game of whist. This is a serious eall. I got my father's advice to take anything with work and responsibility. 18th.—Off at 7.40 by mail. I find it a privation to be unable to read in a coach. The mind is distracted through the senses, and rambles. Nowhere is it to me so incapable of continuous thought. . . . Newcastle at 9\frac{1}{4} P.M. 19th.—Same again. At York at 6\frac{1}{4} A.M. to 7. Ran to peep at the minster and bore away a faint twilight image of its grandeur. 20th.—Arrived safe, thank God, and well at the Bull and Mouth 5\frac{3}{4} A.M. Albany soon. To bed for 2\frac{1}{4} hours. Went to Peel about eleven.

He writes to his father the same day-

My interview with him was not more than six or eight minutes, but he was extremely kind. He told me his letter to me was among his first; that he was prompted only by his own feelings towards me and some more of that kind; that I might have a seat either at the admiralty or treasury boards, but the latter was that which he intended for me; that I should then be in immediate and confidential communication with himself; and should thereby have more insight into the general concerns of government; that there was a person very anxious for the seat at the treasury, who would go to the admiralty if I did not; but that he meant to go upon the principle of putting every one to the post for which he thought them most fit, so far as he could, and therefore preferred the arrangement he had named. As he distinctly preferred the treasury for me, and assigned such reasons for the preference, it appeared to me that the question was quite settled, and I immediately closed with his offer. I expressed my gratitude for the opinions of me which he had expressed; and said I thought it my duty to mention that. the question of my re-election at Newark upon a single vacancy lasted till near 12 Music excellent. Spoke 11 hours, I am told, proh pudor /1

Back at Fasque, only a day too late for the Twelfth, he found the sport bad and he shot badly, but he enjoyed the healthful walks on the hill His employments were euriously mixed 'Sept. 8th -In the bog for snipe with Sir J Mackenzie Read Timous Began Byron's Life My eyes refused progress Verses 15th - Snipe shooting with F in the bog Began Criticas 22nd -Haddo Otter hunt ing, sens esito Finished Plato's Laws Hunting too in the library' The mental dispersion of country house visiting never affects either multifarious reading or multifarious writing Spanish grammar, Don Quixote in the original, Crabbe Don Juan, alternate with Augustine de peccatorum remissione or de utilitate Credendi ('beautiful and useful'). He works at an essay of his own upon Justification, at adversaria on Aristotle's Ethics, at another essay upon In this speech he dealt with an attack made upon him by his oppo-uent Poulett Thomson afterwards Lord Sydenham on the question of negro-slavery —

I have had some obloquy east upon me by Mr Thomson in refer to the block of the er ce to the part which I took in the

"it is that of negro slavers lie should try me in opposition to Lord Stanley, and did Lord Stanley com-plain. It is well known that he tited that the only two speeches which were decid dly hostile to that measure were delivered !) two gentlemen who hold off ce under l'er ma on the contrary, his lordship was pleased to express candidly his high approbation of my sentiments, and my in livi lual exertions for the settle ment of that matter Does Mr Thom son mean to say that the great con servative body in parliam at has offered opposition to that measure Who, I would ask, conflueted the correspondence of the government tart question. Will any man who knows the character of Lord Bathurst -will uny man who knows the char acter of Mr Stellen the under secretary for the colonia—the chosen assistant of the noile lord in that ministry of which he was no main portant member—will any man say that Mr Stephen who was all along the advocate of the slaves with his liberal and enlightened views ever cised an influence less than nu ler Lord Stanley? Does Mr Thomson presume to state that Lord Aberdeen was guilts of neglect to the slaves" When I all that the question under went a considerable discussion last year, in the House of Commons when all parties and all interests were fairly represented and the best d sposition was evince I to assist the proper working of the measure and to alter some parts that were con silered injurious to the slaves and traditions as his own.1 The youthful minister's path was happily smoothed at Newark. This time blues and reds called a grand truce, divided the honours, and returned Mr. Gladstone and Sovered Will Mr. Gladstone and Sergeant Wilde without a contest. The question that excited most interest in the eanvass was the new poor law. Mr. Gladstone gave the fallen ministers full credit for their measure. Most of their bills, he said, were projected from a mere craving for popularity, but in the case of the poor law they aeted in defiance of the public press and many of their own friends. On the other hand, he defended the new government as the government of a truly reforming party, pointing to the commercial changes made by Lord Liverpool's administration, to the eorporation and test Acts, and to catholic emancipation. Who could deny that these were changes of magnitude settled in peaceful times by a parliament unreformed? Who could deny that Sir Robert Peel had long been a practical reformer of the law, and that the Duke of Wellington had carried out great retrenehments? Let them then rally round throne and altar, and resist the wild measures of the destructives. The red hero was drawn through the town by six greys, with postillions in silk jackets, amid the music of bands, the elash of bells, and the cheers of the erowd. When the red procession met the blue, mutual congratulations took the place of the old insult and defiance, and at five o'eloek each party sat down to its own feast. The reds drank toasts of a spirited, loyal and constitutional charaeter, many admirable speeches were made which the ehronicler regrets that his limits will not allow him to report,—regrets unshared by us—and soon after eleven Mr. Gladstone eseaped. After a day at Clumber, he was speedily on his way to Londón. 'Off at 102 P.M. Missed the High Flyer at Tuxford, broke down in my chaise on the way to Newark; no injury, thanks to God. Remained 2½ hours alone; overtaken by the Wellington at 31 A.M.

Greville, on the other hand, grumbled at Pcel, for taking high birth and connections as substitutes for other qualities, because he made ing 'Gladstone, who is a very clever man' to the other and more re-Sidney Herbert secretary at the sponsible post.

within the tory ranks.¹ It was at a meeting held at Peel's on December 6, 1837, that Lord Stanley for the first time appeared among the conservative members.

The distractions produced in Canada by mismanagement and misapprehension in Downing Street had already given trouble during the very short time when Mr. Gladstone was under-secretary at the colonial office; but they now broke into the flame of open revolt. The perversity of a foolish king and weakness and disunion among his whig ministers lad brought about a catastrophe. At the beginning of the session (1838) the government introduced a bill suspending the constitution and conferring various absolute powers on Lord Durham as governor general and high commissioner. It was in connection with this proposal that Mr. Gladstone seems to have been first takon into the confidential consultations of the leaders of his party

The sage marshalling and manœuvring of the parliamentary squads was embarrassed by a move from Sir William Molesworth, of whom we have just been hearing, the editor of Hobbes, and one of the group nicknamed philosophic radicals with whom Mr Gladstone at this stage seldom or never agreed 'Tho new school of morals.' ho called them, 'which taught that success was the only eriterion of morit,"-a delineation for which he would have been severely handled by Bontham or James Mill Molesworth gave notice of a vote of censure on Lord Glenelg, the colonial minister, that is, he selected a single member of the cabinet for condemnation, on the ground of acts for which all the other ministers were collectively just as responsible. For this discrimination the only precedent sceins to be Fox's motion against Lord Sandwich in 1779 Mr. Gladstone's memorandum: completes or modifies the account of the dilemma of the conservative leader, already known from Sir Robert Peel's papers,3 and the reader will find it elsewhere. It was the right of a conservative opposition to challenge a whig ministry; yet to fight under radical colours was odious and intolerable. On the other hand ho torting the attack; the hearers, in the pleasure which the assault gives them, will forget the previous charge.' As Disraeli himself put it afterwards. Never complain and never explain.

¹ Parker's Peel, ii pp. 336 9.
² See Appendix.
³ Parker, ii. pp. 332 367.

II.

One afternoon, a few days later, while he was grappling at the treasury with a file of papers on the mysteries of superannuation, Mr. Gladstone was again summoned by the prime minister, and again (Jan. 26) he writes to his father:—

I have had an important interview with Sir R. Peel, the result of which is that I am to be under-secretary for the colonies. I will give you a hurried and imperfect sketch of the conversation. He began by saying he was about to make a great sacrifice both of his own feelings and convenience, but that what he had to say he hoped would be gratifying to me, as a mark of his confidence and regard. 'I am going to propose to you, Gladstone, that you should be, for you know Wortley has lost his election, under-secretary of state for the colonies, and I give you my word that I do not know six offices which are at this moment of greater importance than that to which is attached the representation of the colonial department in the House of Commons, at a period when so many questions of importance are in agitation.' I expressed as well as I could, and indeed it was but ill, my unfeigned and deep sense of his kindness, my hesitation to form any opinion of my own competency for the office, and at the same time my general desire not to shrink from any responsibility which he might think proper to lay upon me. He said that was the right and manly view to take. . . . He adverted to my connection with the West Indies as likely to give satisfaction to persons dependent on those colonies, and thought that others would not be displeased. In short, I cannot go through it all, but I can only say that if I had always heard of him that he was the warmest and freest person of all living in the expression of his feelings, such description would have been fully borne out by his demeanour to me. When I came away he took my hand and said, 'Well, God bless you, wherever you are.'

anticipations of entire success' (March 22). Six days later he was appointed a member of the apprenticeship committee which at ouce began to investigate the coorplaints from Jamaica. Mr. Gladstone acted as the representative of the planters on the committee, and he paid very close attention to the proceedings during two sessions. the spring of 1833 a motion was made to accelerate by two years the end of the apprenticeship system on the slave plantations of the West Indies. Brougham had been raising a tempest of humano sentiment by mere than one of his most magnificent speeches. The leading men on both sides in parliament were openly and strongly against a disturbance of the settlement, but the feeling in the constitueneics was hot, and in liberal and tory eamp alike members in fear and trembling tried to make up their minds. George Grey made an effective ease for the law as it steed, and Peel spoke on the same side; but it was agreed that Mr. Gladstone by his union of fervour, elevation, and a complete mastery of the facts of the case, went deeper than either. Even unwilling witnesses 'felt bound to admit the great ability he displayed.' His address was completely that of an advocate, and he did not even affect to look on both sides of the question, expressing his joy that the day had at length arrived when he could meet the charges against the planters and enter upon their defence.

March 30th.—Spoke from 11 to 1. Received with the greatest and most affecting kindness from all parties, both during and after. Through the debate I felt the most painful depression. Except Mr. Plumptre and Lord John Russell, all who spoke damaged the question to the utmost possible degree. Prayer extract for the moment was wrung from me in my necessity; I hope it was not a blasphemous prayer, for support in pleading the cause of justice.... I am Intli insensible even in the moment of delight to such pleasures as this kind of occasion affords. But this is a dangerous state; indifference to the world is not love of God.

In writing to him upon this speech, Mr. Stephen, his former ally at the colonial office, addressed an admonition, which is worth recalling both for its own sake and because it hits by HI

Mr. Gladstone's first spell of office was little more than momentary. The liberal majority, as has so often happened, was composite, but Peel can hardly have supposed that the sections of which it was made up would fail to coalesce, and coalesce pretty soon, for the irresistible object of ejecting ministers who were liked by none of them, and through whose repulse they could strike an avenging blow against the king. Ardent subalterns like Mr. Gladstone took more vehement views. The majority at once beat the government (supported by the group of Stanleyites, fifty-three strong) in the contest for the Speaker's chair. Other repulses followed. 'The division,' writes Mr. Gladstone to his father, with the honourable warmth of the young party man, 'I need not say was a disappointment to me; but it must have been much more so to those who have ever thought well of the parliament. Our party mustered splendidly. Some few, but very, very few, of the others appear to have kept away through a sense of decency; they had not virtue enough to vote for the man whom they knew to be incomparably the best, and against whom they had no charge to bring. No more shameful act I think has been done by a British House of Commons.'

Not many days after fervently deprecating a general resignation, an ill-omened purpose of this very course actually flitted across the mind of the young undersecretary himself. A scheme was on the anvil for the education of the blacks in the West Indies, and a sudden apprehension startled Mr. Gladstone, that his chief might devote public funds to all varieties of denominational religious teaching. Any plan of that kind would be utterly opposed to what with him, as we shall soon discover, was then a fundamental principle of national polity. Happily the fatal leap was not needed, but if either small men like the government whips, or great men like Peel and Aberdeen, could have known what was passing, they would have shaken grave heads over this spirit of unseasonable scruple at the very start of the race in a brilliant man with all his life before him.

earnest he was about the negroes, hy strenuously pressing his father to allow him to go to the West Indies and view the state of things there for himself. Perhaps by prudent instinct his father disapproved, and at last spoke decidedly against any project of the kind.

The question of the education of the people was rising into political prominence, and its close relations with the claims of the church sufficed to engago the active interest of so zealous a son of the church as Mr. Gladstone. From a very early stage we find him moving for returns, serving on education committees in parliament, corresponding onergetically with Manning, Acland, and others of like mind in and out of parliament. Primary education is one of the few subjects on which the fossils of extinct opinion neither interest ner instruct. It is enough to mark that Mr. Gladstone's position in the forties was that of the ultra-churchman of the time, and such as no church-ultra now dreams of fighting for. We find him 'objecting to any infringement whatever of the principle on which the established church was founded-that of confining the pecuniary support of the state to one particular religious denomination.'1

To Dr. Hook (March 12, 1838), he speaks of 'a safe and precious interval, perhaps the last to those who are desirous of placing the education of the people under the efficient control of the clergy.' The aims of himself and his allies were to plant training schools in every diocese; to connect these with the cathedrals through the chapters; to license the teachers by the bishops after examination.

Writing to Manning (Feb. 22, 1839), he compares control by government to the 'little lion cub in the Agamennon,' which after being in its primoval season the delight of the young and amusement of the old, gradually revealed its parent stock, and grow to be a creature of hugo mischief in the household.* He describes & divergence of view among

In life's beginnings mild thear to sire and kind to child... But in time he showed. The habit of his blood. —Gladatone in Transiations, p. 53.

Hansard, June 20, 1839.
 Agam. 696-716.
 Even so belike might one
 A lion suckling nurse,
 Like a foster son,
 To his home a future curse.

find it difficult to grapple with the more popular parts of the C question; but I fell miserably short of my desires in touching upon the principles which the discussion involved, and I am sure that it must be long before I am enabled in any reasonable sense to be a speaker according even to the conception which I have formed in my own mind.

A few days later, he received the congratulations of a royal personage:—·

In the evening, dining at Lord Salisbury's, I was introduced to the Duke of Cumberland, who was pleased to express himself favourably of my speech. He is fond of conversation, and the common reputation which he bears of including in his conversation many oaths, appears to be but too true. Yet he said he had made a point of sending his son to George the Fourth's funeral, thinking it an excellent advantage for a boy to receive the impression which such a scene was calculated to convey. The duke made many acute remarks, and was, I should say, most remarkably unaffected and kind. These are fine social qualities for a prince, though, of course, not the most important—'My dear Sir,' and thumps on the shoulder after a ten minutes' acquaintance. He spoke broadly and freely—much on the disappearance of the bishops' wigs, which he said had done more harm to the church than anything else!

On the same night the catastrophe happened. After a protracted and complex struggle Lord John Russell's proposal for the appropriation of the surplus revenues of the Irish church was carried against ministers. The following day Peel announced his resignation.

Though his official work had been unimportant, Mr. Gladstone had left an excellent impression behind him among the permanent men. When he first appeared in the office, Henry Taylor said, 'I rather like Gladstone, but he is said to have more of the devil in him than appears.' A few weeks were enough to show him that 'Gladstone was far the most considerable of the rising generation, having besides his abilities an excellent disposition and great strength of character.' James Stephen thought well of him, but doubted if he had pugnacity enough for public life.

12 center to temper to The second section is the

- - - -

· - - ·

possesses me in prospect of a speech is one very useful lesson; and being disappointed after having attained some due state of excitement and anticipation is another.'

In June at a feast at Newark, which, terrible to relate, lasted from four o'clock to eleven, Mr. Gladstone gave them nearly an hour, not to mention divers minor speeches. father 'expressed himself with beautiful and affectionate truth of feeling, and the party sympathised.' His own speech deserves to be noted as indicating the political geography for three or four years to come. The standing dish of the tory opposition of the period was highly-spiced reproach of the ministers for living on the support of O'Connell, and Newark was regaled with an ample meal. Mr. Gladstone would not enter into a detail of the exploits, character, political opinions of that Irish gentleman; he would rather say what he thought of him in his presence than in his absence, because he could unfortunately say nothing of him but what was bad. 'This is not the first period in English history,' Mr. Gladstone noted down at that time, 'in which a government has leaned on the Roman catholic interest in Ireland for support. Under the administration of Strafford and at the time of the Scotch revolt, Charles I. was enthusiastically supported by the recusants of the sister isle, and what was the effect? The religious sympathies of the people were touched then and they were so now with the same consequence, in the gradual decline of the party to whom the suspicion attaches in popular fervour and estimation.' Half a century later he may have recalled this early fruit of historic observation. Meanwhile, in his Newark speech, he denounced the government for seeking to undo the mischief of the Irish alliance by systematic agitation. But it was upon the church question, far deeper and more vital than municipal corporations, that the fate of the government should be decided. Then followed a vindication of the church in Ireland. 'The protestant faith is held good for us, and what is good for us is also good for the population of Ireland.' That most disastrous of all our false commonplaces was received at Newark, as it has been received so many hundreds of times ever since all over

June 13th.—Sir R. Peel dined at Mr. Dugdale's. After dinner he spoke of Wilberforce; believed him to be an excellent man independently of the book, or would not have been favourably impressed by the records of his being in society, and then going home and describing as lost in sin those with whom he had been enjoying himself. Upon the other hand, however, he would have exposed himself to the opposite reproach had he been more secluded, morosely withdrawing himself from the range of human sympathies. He remembered him as an admirable speaker; agreed that the results of his life were very great (and the man must be in part measured by them). He disapproved of taking people to task by articles in the papers, for votes against their party.

July 18th.—I complimented the Speaker yesterday on the time he had saved by putting an end to discussions upon the presentation of petitions. He replied that there was a more important advantage; that those discussions very greatly increased the influence of popular feeling on the deliberations of the House; and that by stopping them he thought a wall was erected against such influence—not as strong as might be wished. Probably some day it might be broken down, but he had done his best to raise it. His maxim was to shut out as far as might be all extrinsic pressure, and then to do freely what was right within doors.

This high and sound way of regarding parliament underwent formidable changes before the close of Mr. Gladstone's career, and perhaps his career had indirectly something to do with them. But not, I think, with intention. In 1838 he cited with approval an exclamation of Roebuck's in the House of Commons, 'We, sir, are or ought to be the élite of the people of England for mind: we are at the head of the mind of the people of England.'

Mr. Gladstone's position in parliament and the public judgment, as the session went on, is sufficiently manifest from a letter addressed to him at this time by Samuel Wilberforce, four years his senior, henceforth one of his nearest friends, and always an acute observer of social and political forces. 'It would be an affectation in you, which you are above,' writes the future bishop (April 20, 1838), 'not to know that few young men have the weight you have

CHAPTER III

PROGRESS IN PUBLIC LIFE

(1835-1838)

Les hommes en tout ne s'éclairent que par le tâtonnement de l'expérience. Les plus grands génies sont eux-mêmes entraînés par leur siècle.—Turgor.

Men are only enlightened by feeling their way through experience. The greatest geniuses are themselves drawn along by their age.

In September (1835), after long suffering, his mother died amid tender care and mournful regrets. Her youngest son was a devoted nurse; her loss struck him keenly, but with a sense full of the consolations of his faith. To Gaskell he writes: 'How deeply and thoroughly her character was imbued with love; with what strong and searching processes of bodily affliction she was assimilated in mind and heart to her Redeemer; how above all other things she sighed for the advancement of His kingdom on earth; how few mortals suffered more pain, or more faithfully recognised it as one of the instruments by which God is pleased to forward that restoring process for which we are placed on earth.'

Then the world resumed its course for him, and things fell into their wonted ways of indefatigable study. His scheme for week-days included Blackstone, Mackintosh, Aristotle's Politics—'a book of immense value for all governors and public men'—Dante's Purgatorio, Spanish grammar, Tocqueville, Fox's James II., by which he was disappointed, not seeing such an acuteness in extracting and exhibiting the principles that govern from beneath the actions of men and parties, nor such a grasp of generalisation, nor such a faculty of separating minute from material particulars, nor such an abstraction from a debater's modes of thought and forms of expression, as he should have

CHAPTER IV

THE CHURCH

(1888)

A remion and a movement certainly among the most remarkable in the Christendom of the last three and a half centuries; probably more remarkable than the movement associated with the name of Port Royal, for that has passed away and left hardly a trace behind; but this has left ineffaceable marks upon the English church and nation.—Gladstone (1891).

It was the affinity of great natures for great issues that made Mr. Gladstone from his earliest manhood onwards take and hold fast the affairs of the churches for the objects of his most absorbing interest. He was one and the same man, his genius was one. His persistent incursions all through his long life into the multifarious doings, not only of his own anglican communion, but of the Latin church of the west, as well as of the motley Christendom of the cast, puzzled and vexed political whippers-in, wire-pullers, newspaper editors, leaders, colleagues; they were the despair of party caucuses; and they made the neutral man of the world smile, as eccentricities of genius and rather singularly chosen recreations. All this was, in truth, of the very essence of his character, the manifestation of its profound unity.

The quarrel upon church comprehension that had perplexed Elizabeth and Burleigh, had distracted the councils of Charles 1. and of Cromwell, had bewildered William of Orange and Tillotson and Burnet, was once more aglow with its old heat. The still mightier dispute, how wide or how narrow is the common ground between the church of England and the church of Rome, broke into fierce flame.

into opposition and whiggism by the insult of Lord North. his own doctrines, both as originally declared, and as resumed when finally in office, were of a highly toned spirit of government. That Brougham was the most powerful man he had ever known in the H. of C.; that no one had ever fallen so fast and so far. That the political difficulties of England might be susceptible of cure, and were not appalling; but that the state of Ireland was to all appearance hopeless. That there the great difficulty lay in procuring the ordinary administration of justice; that the very institution of juries supposed a common interest of the juror and the state, a condition not fulfilled in the present instance; that it was quite unfit for the present state of society in Ireland. Lord Harrowby thought that a strong conservative government might still quell agitation. And Sir R. Peel said Stanley had told him that the whig government were on the point of suceeeding in putting a stop to the resistance to payment of tithe, when Lord Althorp, alarmed at the expense already incurred, wrote to stop its collection by the military. We should probably live to see the independence of Poland established.

The Duke of Wellington and others arrived later in the day. It was pleasing to see the deference with which he was received as he entered the library; at the sound of his name everybody rose; he is addressed by all with a respectful manner. He met Peel most cordially, and seized both Lady Peel's hands. I now recollect that it was with glee Sir R. Peel said to me on Monday, 'I am glad to say you will meet the duke here,' which had reference, I doubt not, partly to the anticipated pleasure of seeing him, partly to the dissipations of unworthy suspicions. reported that government are still labouring at a church measure without appropriation. Jan. 20.—The Duke of Wellington appears to speak little; and never for speaking's sake, but only to convey an idea, commonly worth conveying. He receives remarks made to him very frequently with no more than 'Ha,' a convenient, suspensive expression, which acknowledges the arrival of the observation and no more. Of the two days which he spent here he hunted on Thursday, shot on Friday, and to-day travelled to Strathfieldsay, more, I believe, than 100 miles, to entertain a party of friends to dinner. With this bodily reform was never heard of.1 This dreamless composure was rudely broken. The repeal of the test and corporation Acts in 1828 first roused the church; and her sons rubbed their eyes when they beheld parliament bringing frankly to an end the odious monopoly of office under the crown, all corporate office, all magistracy, in men willing to take the communion at the altar of the privileged establishment. The next year a deadlier blow fell after a more embittered fight—the admission of Roman catholics to parliament and place. The Reform bill of 1832 followed. Even when half spent, the forces that had been gathering for many years in the direction of parliamentary reform, and had at last achieved more than one immense result, rolled heavily forward against the church. The opening of parliament and of close corporations was taken to involve an opening to correspond in the grandest and closest of all corporations. correspond in the grandest and closest of all corporations. The resounding victory of the constitutional bill of 1832 was followed by a drastic handling of the church in Ireland, and by a proposal to divert a surplus of its property to purposes not ecclesiastical. A long and peculiarly unedifying crisis ensued. Stanley and Graham, two of the most eminent members of the reforming whig cabinet, on this proposal at once resigned. The Grey ministry was thus split in 1834, and the Peel ministry ejected in 1835, on the ground of the absolute inviolability of the property of the Irish church. The tide of reaction set slowly in The shock Irish church. The tide of reaction set slowly in. The shock in political party was in no long time followed by shock after shock in the church. As has happened on more than one occasion in our history, alarm for the church kindled the conservative temper in the nation. Or to put it in another way, that spontaneous attachment to the old order of things with all its symbols, institutes, and deep associa-tions, which the radical reformers had both affronted and ignored, made the church its rallying-point. The three years of tortuous proceedings on the famous Appropriation clause—proceedings that political philosophers declared to have disgraced this country in the face of Europe, and that were certainly an ignominy and a scandal in a party called awake last night till between 4 and 5, as usual after speaking. How useful to make us feel the habitual unremembered blessing of sound sleep. . . . April 7th .- Gerus. Lib. c. xi. . . . Dr. Pusey here from 12 to 3 about elinrch building. Rode. At night 11 to 2 perusing Henry Taylor's proofs of The Statesman, and writing notes on it, presumptuous enough. . . . Gerus, xii. Re-perused Taylor's sheets. A batch of calls. Wrote letters. Bossuet. Dined at Henry Taylor's, a keen intellectual exercise, and thus a place of danger, especially as it is exercise seen. . . . 9th,-Spedding at breakfast. Gerus, xiii. Finished Locke on Understanding. It appears to me on the whole a much overrated, though, in some respects, a very useful book. . . . May 16th .- Mr. Wordsworth, H. Taylor and Doyle to breakfast. Sat till 123. Conversation on Shelley, Trench, Teunyson; travelling, copyright, etc. 30th.-Milues, Blakesley, Taylor, Cole, to breakfast. Church meeting at Archbishop of Armagh's. Ancient music rehearsal. House 6-81 and 91-12. June 1st.—Read Wordsworth. . . . House 5-12. Spoke about 45 minutes [on Tithes and Church (Ireland) bill]. I had this pleasure in my speech, that I never rose more intent upon telling what I believe to be royal truth; though I did it very ill, and further than ever below the idea which I would nevertheless hold before my mind. 3rd.-West Indies Committee 1-4. Finished writing out my speech and sent it. Read Wordsworth. . . . Saw Sir R. Peel. Dined at Sergeant Talfourd's to meet Wordsworth. . . . 5th.—St. James's, Communion. Dined at Lincoln's Inn. St. Sepulchre's. Wrote. Jer. Taylor, Newman Began Nicole's Préjugés. Arnold aloud. 8th.—Wordsworth, since he has been in town, has breakfasted twice and dined once with Intercourse with him is, upon the whole, extremely pleasing. I was sorry to hear Sydney Smith say that he did not see very much in him, nor greatly admire his poems. He even adverted to the London Sonnet as ridiculous. Sheil thought this of the line:

¹ Newman, Essays, ii. p. 428.

'Dear God! the very houses seem asleep.'

I ventured to call his attention to that which followed as carrying out the idea:

'And all that mighty heart is lying still.'

Of which I may say omne tulit punctum.

and conscience free from 'secular chains' and 'hireling wolves.'

Strange social conditions were emerging on every side. The factory system established itself on a startling scale. Huge aggregates of population collected with little regard to antique divisions of diocese and parish. Colonies over the sea extended in boundaries and numbers, and churchmen were zealous that these infant societies should be blessed by the same services, rites, ecclesiastical ordering and exhortation, as were believed to elevate and sanctify the parent community at home. The education of the people grew to be a formidable problem, the field of angry battles and campaigns that never end. Trade, markets, wages, hours, and all the gaunt and haggard economics of the labour question, added to the statesman's load. Pauperism was appalling. In a word, the need for social regeneration both material and moral was in the spirit of the time. Here were the hopes, vague, blind, unmeasured, formless, that had inspired the wild clamour for the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill. The whig patricians carried away the prizes of great office, though the work had been done by men of a very different stamp. It was the utilitarian radicals who laid the foundations of social improvement in a reasoned creed. With admirable ability, perseverance, unselfishness, and public spirit, Bentham and his disciples had regenerated political opinion, and fought the battle against debt, pauperism, class-privilege, class-monopoly, abusive patronage, a monstrous criminal law, and all the host of sinister interests.1 As in every reforming age, men approached the work from two sides. Evangelical religion divides with rationalism the glory of more than one humanitarian struggle. Brougham, a more potent force than we now realise, plunged with the energy of a Titan into a thousand projects, all taking for granted that ignorance is the disease and useful knowledge the universal healer, all of them secular, all dealing with man from the outside, none touching imagination or the heart. March-of-mind became to many almost as wearisome a cry as wisdom-of-our-ancestors had been. According chisement, I fancy, of the country chiefly; that you would thus extend the base of your pyramid and so give it strength. He _ wished the old institutions of the country preserved, and thought this the way to preserve them. He thought the political franchise upon the whole a good to the mass-regard being had to the state of human nature; against me. 11th.—Read Browning's Paracelsus. Went to Richmond to dine with the Gaskells. two hours' walk home at night. 16th.—Wrote two sonnets. Finished and wrote out Braut von Korinth. Shall I ever dare to make out a counterpart? 21st.—Breakfast at Mr. Hallam's to meet Mr. Wordsworth and Mr. Rogers. Wordsworth spoke much and justly about copyright. Conversation with Talfourd in the evening, partly about that subject. Began something on egotism. 24th.—Breakfast with Mr. Rogers, Mr. Wordsworth only there. Very agreeable. Rogers produced an American poem, the death of Bozzaris, which Wordsworth proposed that I should read to them: of course I declined, so even did Rogers. But Wordsworth read it through in good taste, and doing it justice.

¹ See Sir Leslie Stephen's English Utilitarians, ii. p. 42.

Fasque in time for Aug. 12; out on the hill, but unlucky with a sprained ankle, and obliged to give up early. Aug. 15th.— Wrote (long) to Dr. Chalmers. Orator. Sept. 20th.—Milner, finished Vol. ii. Cic. Acad. Wraxall. Began Goethe's Iphigenie. Wrote. Oct. 7th.—Milner. Wraxall. A dinner-party. Wrote out a sketch for an essay on Justification. Singing, whist, shooting. Copied a paper for my father. 12th.—A day on the hill for roe. 14 guns. [To Liverpool for public dinner at the Amphitheatre.] 18th.—Most kindly heard. Canning's début everything that could be desired. I thought I spoke 35 minutes, but afterwards found it was 55. Read Marco Visconti. 21st .- Operative dinner at Amphitheatre. Spoke perhaps-16 or 18 minutes. 28th.—Haddo [Lord Aberdeen's]. Finished Marco Visconti, a long bout, but I could not let it go. Buckland's opening chapters. On the whole satisfactory. 30th.—Lord Aberdeen read prayers in the evening with simple and earnest pathos. - Nov. 10th .- Wilhelm Meister, Book i., and there I mean to leave it, unless I hear a better report of the succeeding one than I could make of the first. Next day, recommenced with great anticipations of delight the Divina Commedia. 13th.—Finished Nicole De l'Unité. August. De Civ. [Every day at this time.]

other creations of the heart and brain and will of man? Were its bishops mere officers, like high ministers of mundane state, or were they, in actual historic truth as in supposed theological necessity, the direct lineal successors of the first apostles, endowed from the beginning with the mystical prerogatives on which the efficacy of all sacramental-rites depended? What were its relations to the councils of the first four centuries, what to the councils of the fifteenth century and the sixteenth, what to the Fathers? The Scottish presbyterians held the conception of a church as strongly as anybody; 1 but England, broadly speaking, had never been persuaded that there could be a church without bishops.

In the answers to this group of hard questions, terrible divisions that had been long muffled and huddled away burst into view. The stupendous quarrel of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries again broke out. To the erastian lawyer the church was an institution erected on principles of political expediency by act of parliament. To the school of Whately and Arnold it was a corporation of divine origin, devised to strengthen men in their struggle for goodness and holiness by the association and mutual help of fellowbelievers. To the evangelical it was hardly more than a collection of congregations commended in the Bible for the diffusion of the knowledge and right interpretation of the Scriptures, the commemoration of gospel events, and the linking of gospel truths to a well-ordered life. To the high anglican as to the Roman catholic, the church was something very different from this; not a fabric reared by man, nor in truth any mechanical fabric at all, but a mystically appointed channel of salvation, an indispensable element in the relation between the soul of man and its creator. a member of it was not to join an external association, but to become an inward partaker in ineffable and mysterious graces to which no other access lay open. Such was the Church Catholic and Apostolic as set up from the beginning, divine revelation are not the men to govern this nation, of be they whigs or radicals.' Long, extraordinary, and not inglorious, was the ascent from such a position as this, to the principles so nobly vindicated in the speech on the Affirmation bill in 1883.

1 'Nowhere that I know of,' the Duke of Argyllonec wrote in friendly remonstrance with Mr. Gladstone, 'is the doctrine of a separate society being of divine foundation, so dogmatically expressed as in the Scotch Confession; the 39 articles are less definite on the subject.'

At the end of January he is back in London, arranging books and papers and making a little daylight in his chaos. 'What useful advice might a man who has been buon pezzo in parliament give to one going into it, on this mechanical portion of his business.' The entries for 1837 are none of them especially interesting. Every day in the midst of full parliamentary work, social engagements, and public duties outside of the House of Commons, he was elaborating the treatise on the relations of church and state, of which we shall see more in our following chapter. At the beginning of the session he went to a dinner at Peel's, at which Lord Stanley and some of his friends were present—a circumstance noted as a sign of the impending fusion between the whig seceders of 1834 and the conservative party. Sir Robert seems to have gone on extending his confidence in him.

I visited Sir Robert Peel (March 4th) about the Canada question, and again by appointment on the 6th, with Lord Aberdeen. On the former day he said, 'Is there any one else to invite?' I suggested Lord Stanley. He said, perhaps he might be inclined to take a separate view. But in the interval he had apparently thought otherwise. For on Monday he read to Lord Aberdeen and myself a letter from Stanley written with the utmost frankness and in a tone of political intimacy, saying that an engagement as chairman of a committee at the House would prevent his meeting us. The business of the day was discussed in conversation, and it was agreed to be quite impossible to support the resolution on the legislative council in its existing terms, without at least a protest. Peel made the following remark: 'You have got another Ireland growing up in every colony you possess.'

A week later he was shocked by the death of Lady Canning. 'Breakfast with Gaskell' (March 23rd), 'and thence to Lady Canning's funeral in Westminster Abbey. We were but

My dear and noble mother was a woman of warm piety but broken health, and I was not directly instructed by her. But I was brought up to believe that Doyly and Mant's Bible (then a standard book of the colour ruling in the church) was heretical, and that every unitarian (I suppose also every heathen) must, as matter of course, be lost forever. This deplorable servitude of mind oppressed me in a greater or less degree for a number of years. As late as in the year (I think) 1836, one of my brothers married a beautiful and in every way charming person, who had been brought up in a family of the unitarian profession, yet under a mother very sineerely religious. I went through much mental difficulty and distress at the time, as there had been no express renunciation [by her] of the ancestral creed, and I absurdly busied myself with devising this or that religious test as what if accepted might suffice.1

So, as will be seen, the first access of churchlike ideas to my mind by no means sufficed to expel my inherited and bigoted misconception, though in the event they did it as I hope effectively. But I long retained in my recollection an observation made to me in (I think) the year 1829, by Mrs. Benjamin Gaskell of Thornes, near Wakefield, a seed which was destined long to remain in my mind without germinating. I fell into religious conversation with this excellent woman, the mother of my Eton friend Gaskell, herself an unitarian like her lusband. to me, Surely we cannot entertain a doubt as to the future condition of any person truly united to Christ by faith and love, whatever may be the faults of his opinions. Here she supplied me with the key to the whole question. At this hour I feel grateful to her accordingly, for the scope of her remark is very wide; and it is now my rule to remember her in prayer before the altar.

There was nothing at Eton to subvert this frame of mind; for nothing was taught us either for it or against it. But in the spring and summer of 1828, I set to work on Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, and read it straight through. Intercourse with my elder sister Anne had increased my mental interest in religion, and she, though generally of evangelical sentiments, had an opinion that

¹ A little sheaf of curious letters on this family episode survives.

Rationalism, and to save his eyes, spins verse enough to fill a decent volume of a hundred and fifty pages. He makes a circuit of calls upon the tenants, taking a farming lecture from one, praying by the sick-bed of another.

In November he was again in London to be sworn of the new parliament, and at the end of the month he had for the first time an interview on business with the Duke of Wellington-of interest as the collocation of two famous names. The immediate subject was the Cape of Good Hope. His reception of me was plain but kind. He came to the door of his room. "Will you come in? How do you do? I am glad to see you." We spoke a little of the Cape. He said with regard to the war—and with sufficient modesty that he was pretty well aware of the operations that had taken place in it, having been at the Cape, and being in some degree able to judge of those matters. He said, "I suppose it is there as everywhere else, as we had it last night about Ireland and the House of Lords. They won't use the law, as it is in Canada, as it is in the West Indies. They excite insurrection everywhere (I, however, put in an apology for them in the West Indies), they want to play the part of opposition; they are not a government, for they don't maintain the law." He appointed me to return to him to-morrow.

The result of the general election was a slight improvement in the position of the conservatives, but they still mustered no more than 315 against 342 supporters of the ministry, including the radical and Irish groups. If Melbourne and Russell found their team delicate to drive, Peel's difficulties were hardly less. Few people, he wrote at this moment, can judge of the difficulty there has frequently been in maintaining harmony between the various branches of the conservative party. The great majority in the Lords and the minority in the Commons consisted of very different elements; they included men like Stanley and Graham, who had been authors and advocates of parliamentary reform, and men who had denounced reform as treason to the constitution and ruin to the country. Even the animosities of 1829 and catholic emancipation were only half quenched manner James Hope, whom I had known but slightly at Eton or Oxford, made a carefully considered change of the same kind; which also became the occasion of a fast friendship. Both these intimacies led me forward; Hope especially had influence over me, more than I think any other person at any period of my life.

When I was preparing in 1837-8 The State in its Relations with the Church, he took a warm interest in the work, which, during my absence on the continent, he corrected for the press. His attitude towards the work, however, included a desire that its propositions should be carried further. The temper of the times among young educated men was working in the same direction. I had no low churchmen among my near friends, except Walter Farquhar. Anstice, a great loss, died very early in his beautiful married life. While I was busy about my book, Hope made known to me Palmer's work on the Church, which had just appeared. I read it with care and great interest. It took hold upon me; and gave me at once the clear, definite, and strong conception of the church which, through all the storm and strain of a most critical period, has proved for me entirely adequate to every emergency, and saved me from all vacillation. I did not, however, love the extreme rigour of the book in its treatment of non-episcopal communions. It was not very long after this, I think in 1842, that I reduced into form my convictions on the large and important range of subjects which recent controversy had brought into prominence. I conceive that in the main Palmer completed for me the work which inspection of the prayer-book had begun.

Before referring further to my 'redaction' of opinions, I desire to say that at this moment I am as closely an adherent to the doctrines of grace generally, and to the general sense of Saint Augustine, as at the date from which this narrative set out. I hope that my mind has dropped nothing affirmative. But I hope also that there has been dropped from it all the damnatory part of the opinions taught by the evangelical school; not only as regards the Roman catholic religion, but also as to heretics and heathers; nonconformists and presbyterians I think that I always let off pretty easily. . . .

¹ Marrying Walter Scott's granddaughter (1847) he was named Hope-Scott after 1853.

could not vote for Molesworth; because he thought him unjust; but he could not vote against him, because that would _ imply confidence in the Canadian policy of ministers. A certain conservative contingent would not acquiesce in support of ministers against Molesworth, or in tame resort to the previous question. Again, Peel felt or feigned an apprehension that if by aggressive action they beat the government, a conservative ministry must come in, and ho did not think that such a ministry could last. Even at this risk, it became clear that the only way of avoiding the difficulty was an amendment to Molesworth's motion from the official opposition. Mr. Gladstone spoke (Mar. 7), and was described as making his points with admirable precision and force, though 'with something of a provincial manner, like the rust to a piece of powerful steel machinery that has not worked into polish.' The debate, on which such mighty issues were thought to hang, lasted a couple of nights with not more than moderate spirit. At the close the amendment was thrown out by a majority of twenty-nine for ministers. The general result was to moderate the impatience of the Carlton Club men, who wished to see their party in, on the one hand; and of the radical men, who did not object to having the whigs out, on the other. It showed that neither administration nor opposition was in a station of supreme command.

Ш

At the end of March Mr. Gladstone produced the strongest impression that he had yet made in parliament, and he now definitely took his place in the front rank. It was on the old embarrassment of slavery. Reports from the colonies showed that in some at least, and more particularly in Jamaica, the apprenticeship system had led to harsher treatment of the negroes than under slavery. As it has been well put, the bad planters regarded their slave-apprentices as a bad farmer regards a farm near the end of an expiring term. In 1836 Buxton moved for a select committee to inquire into the working of the system. Mr. Gladstone defended it, and he warned parliament against 'incautious and precipitate done a little earlier for France; they had opened, broadened, deepened the issues and meanings of European history; they had reminded us that history is European; that it is quite unintelligible if treated as merely local. He would say, moreover, that thought should recognise thought and mind always welcome mind; and the Oxford men had at least brought argument, learning, and even philosophy of a sort, to break up the narrow and frigid conventions of reigning system in church and college, in pulpits and professorial chairs. They had made the church ashamed of the evil of her ways, they had determined that spirit of improvement from within 'which, if this sect-ridden country is ever really to be taught, must proceed pari passu with assault from without.'

One of the ablest of the Oxford writers talking of the non-jurors, remarks how very few of the movements that are attended with a certain romance, and thus bias as for a time in their favour, will stand full examination; they so often reveal some gross offence against common sense.2 Want of common sense is not the particular impression left by the Tractarians, after we have put aside the plausible dialectic and winning periods of the leader, and proceed to look at the effect, not on their general honesty but on their intellectual integrity, of their most peculiar situation and the methods which they believed that situation to impose. Nobody will be so presumptuous or uncharitable as to deny that among the divines of the Oxford movement were men as pure in soul, as fervid lovers of truth, as this world ever possessed. On the other hand it would be nothing short of a miracle in human nature, if all that dreadful tangle of economies and reserves, so largely practised and for a long time so insidiously defended, did not familiarise a vein of subtlety, a tendency to play fast and loose with words, a perilous disposition to regard the non-natural conse of language as if it were just as good as the natural, a villingacis to be satisfied with a hare and rigid logical consistency of expr don, without respect to the interpretation that was cure to be pur upon their expression by the heater and the requirement of the state of the Bully of Letters & State

anticipation what was to be one of the most admirable traits in the mighty parliamentarian to whom it was written. 'It _ seems to me, says Stephen, that this part of your speech establishes nothing more than the fact that your opponents are eapricious in the distribution of their sympathy, which is, after all, a reproach and nothing more. reproach is not only not your strength, but it is the very thing in the disuse of which your strength consists; and indulging as I do the hope that you will one day occupy one of the foremost stations in the House of Commons, if not the first of all, I cannot help wishing that you may also be the founder of a more magnanimous system of parliamentary tacties than has ever yet been established, in which recrimination will be condemned as unbefitting wise men and good Christians.' In an assembly for candid deliberation modified by party spirit, this is, I fear, almost as much a counsel of perfection as it would have been in a school of Roman gladiators, but at any rate it points the better way. The speech itself has a close, direct, sinewy quality, a complete freedom from anything vague or involved; and shows for the first time a perfect mastery of the art of handling detail upon detail without an instant of tediousness, and holding the attention of listeners sustained and unbroken. It was a remonstrance against false allegations of the mis-behaviour of the planters since the emancipating act, but there is not a trace of backsliding upon the great issue. 'We joined in passing the measure; we declared a belief that slavery was an evil and demoralising state, and a desire to be relieved from it; we accepted a price in composition for the loss which was expected to accrue.'

Neither now nor at any time did Mr. Gladstone set too low a value on that great dead-lift effort, not too familiar in history, to heave off a burden from the conscience of the nation, and set back the bounds of cruel wrong upon the earth. On the day after this performance, the entry in his diary is—'In the morning my father was greatly overcome, and I could hardly speak to him. 'Now is the time to turn this attack into measures of benefit for the negroes.' More than once in the course of the spring he showed how much in priest-craft, and mariolatry, was wrought to madness by a clergyman who should describe himself, as did R. H. Froude, as a catholic without the popery, and a church of England man without the protestantism. The plain man knew that he was not himself clever enough to form any distinct idea of what such talk meant. But then his help-lessness only deepened his conviction that the more distinct his idea might become, the more intense would his aversion be, both to the thing meant and to the surpliced conjuror who, as he bitterly supposed, was by sophistic tricks trying hard to take him in.

Other portents were at the same time beginning to disturb the world. The finds and the theories of geologists made men uncomfortable, and brought down sharp anathemas. Wider speculations on cosmic and creative law came soon after, and found their way into popular reading. In prose literature, in subtler forms than the verse of Shelley, new dissolving elements appeared that were destined to go far. Schleiermacher, between 1820 were destined to go far. Schleiermacher, between 1820 and 1830, opened the sluices of the theological deep, whether to deluge or to irrigate. In 1830 an alarming note was sounded in the publication by a learned clergyman of a history of the Jews. We have seen (p. 56) how Mr. Gladstone was horrified by it. Milman's book was the beginning of a new rationalism within the fold. A line of thought was opened that seemed to make the history of religious ideas more interesting than their truth. The special claims of an accepted creed were shaken by disclosing an unmistakeable family likeness to creeds abhorred. A helief was deemed to be accounted for and its abhorred. A belief was deemed to be accounted for and its sanctity dissolved, by referring it historically to human origins, and showing it to be only one branch of a genealogical trunk. Historic explanation became a graver peril than direct attack.

IV

The first skirmish in a dire conflict that is not even now over or near its end happened in 1836. Lord Melbourne re-

¹ The Vestiges of Creation appeared in 1844.

them on the question whether the clergyman should have this choice as to 'admitting the children of dissenters without at once teaching them the catechism.' How Mr. Gladstone went he does not say, nor does it matter. He was not yet thirty. He accepted his political toryism on authority and in good faith, and the same was true of his views on church policy. He could not foresee that it was to be in his own day of power that the cub should come out full grown lion.

His work did not prevent him from mixing pretty freely with men in society, though he seems to have thought that little of what passed was worth transcribing, nor in truth had Mr. Gladstone ever much or any of the rare talent of the born diarist. Here are one or two miscellanea which must be made to serve:

April 25/38.—A long sitting and conversation with Mr. Rogers after the Milnes' marriage breakfast. He spoke unfavourably of Bulwer; well of Milnes' verses; said his father wished them not to be published, because such authorship and its repute would elash with the parliamentary career of his son. thought a great author would undoubtedly stand better in parliament from being such; but that otherwise the additament of authorship, unless on germane subjects, would be a hindrance. He quoted Swift on women. . . . He has a good and tender opinion of them; but went nearly the length of Maurice (when mentioned to him) that they had not that specific faculty of understanding which lies beneath the reason. Peel was odd, in the contrast of a familiar first address, with slackness of manner afterwards. The Duke of Wellington took the greatest interest in the poor around him at Strathfieldsay, had all of eloquence except the words. Mr. Rogers quoted a saying about Brougham that he was not so much a master of the language as mastered by it. I doubt very much the truth of this. Brougham's management of his sentences, as I remember the late Lady Canning observing to me, is surely most wonderful. He never loses the thread, and yet he habitually twists it into a thousand varieties of intricate form. He said, when Stanley came out in public life, and at the age of thirty, he was by far the cleverest young man of the day; and at sixty he would be the same, still by far the cleverest young man of the day.

of the day in the twin hemispheres of theology and church polity.¹ Newman applauded the book for its magnificence of design, and undoubtedly it covers much ground, including a stiff rejection of Locke's theory of toleration, and the assertion of the strong doctrine that the Christian prince has a right by temporal penalties to protect the church from the gathering together of the froward and the insurrection of wicked doers. It has at least the merit, so far from universal in the polemics of that day, of clear language, definite propositions, and formal arguments capable of being met by a downright yes or no.² The question, however, that has often slumbered yet never dies, of the right relations between the Christian prince or state and the Christian church, was rapidly passing away from logicians of the cloister.

Note to page 167.

'Hawarden, Chester, November 9, 1856.—My Lord Bishop,—Your lord-ship will probably be surprised at receiving a letter from me, as a stranger. The simple purpose of it is to discharge a debt of the smallest possible importance to you, yet due I think from me, by expressing the regret with which I now look back on my concurrence in a vote of the University of Oxford in the year 1836, condemnatory of some of your lordship's publications. I did not take actual part in the vote; but upon reference to a journal boot at the time. I find that my absence was owing to an accident

Oxford in the year 1836, condemnatory of some of your lordship's publications. I did not take actual part in the vote; but upon reference to a journal kept at the time, I find that my absence was owing to an accident.

'For a good many years past I have found myself ill able to master books of an abstract character, and I am far from pretending to be competent at this time to form a judgment on the merits of any propositions then at issue. I have learned, indeed, that many things which, in the forward precipitancy of my youth, I should have condemned, are either in reality sound, or lie within the just limits of such discussion as especially bents an University. But that which (after a delay, due, I think, to the cares and pressing occupations of political life) brought back to my mind the injustice of which I had unconsciously been guilty in 1836, was my being called upon, as a member of the Council of King's College in London, to concur in a measure similar in principle with respect to Mr. Maurice; that is to say, in a condemnation couched in general terms which did not really declare the point of imputed guilt, and against which perfect innocence could have no defence. I resisted to the best of my power, though ineffectually, the grievous wrong done to Mr. Maurice, and urged that the charges should be made distinct, that all the best means of investigation should be brought to bear on them, ample opportunity given for defence, and a reference then made, if needful, to the Ilishop in his proper expacity. But the majority of laymen in the Council were mexorable. It was only, as I have said, after mature reflection that I came to perceive the bearing of the case on that of 1836, and to find that I came to perceive the bearing of the case on that of 1836, and to find that I had not on that occasion, now so remote, felt and acted in a different manner.

'I beg your lordship to accept this expression of my cordial regret, and to allow me to subscribe myself, very respectfully, your absolute and humble

errent, W. E. Glibstore, ??

See his article in the Nuclearth Contern for August, 1804, where he call. Palmer's book the most powerful and least available defence of the traition of the anglican church from the sixteenth century downwards.

See Charely, Oxford Macmed,

^{19. 214-6.}This letter is printed in the Life of Hange leavism, p. 109.

in the H. of C. and are gaining rapidly throughout the country. . . . I want to urge you to look calmly before you, . . . and act now with a view to then. There is no height to which you may not fairly rise in this country. If it pleases God to spare us violent convulsions and the loss of our liberties, you may at a future day wield the whole government of this land; and if this should be so, of what extreme moment will your past steps then be to the real usefulness of your high station.

ments. The rooms in Hanover Square were crowded to suffocation by intense audiences mainly composed of the governing class. Princes of the blood were there, high prelates of the church, great nobles, leading statesmen, and a throng of members of the House of Commons, from both sides of it. The orator was seated, but now and again in the kindling excitement of his thought, he rose unconsciously to his feet, and by ringing phrase or ardent gesture roused a whirlwind of enthusiasm such that vehement bystanders assure us it could not be exceeded in the history of human eloquence.1 In Chalmers' fulminating energy, the mechanical polemics of an appropriation clause in a parliamentary bill assume a passionate and living air. He had warned his northern flock, 'should the disaster ever befall us, of vulgar and upstart politicians becoming lords of the ascendant, and an infidel or demi-infidel government wielding the destinies of this mighty empire, and should they be willing at the shrines of their own wretched partizanship to make sacrifice of those great and hallowed institutions which were consecrated by our ancestors to the maintenance of religious truth and religious liberty,—should in particular the monstrous proposition ever be entertained to abridge the legal funds for the support of protestantism,—let us hope that there is still enough, not of fiery zeal, but of calm, resolute, enlightened principle in the land to resent the outrageenough of energy and reaction in the revolted sense of this great country to meet and overbear it.'

The impression made by all this on Mr. Gladstone he has himself described in an autobiographic note of 1897:—

The primary idea of my early politics was the church. With this was connected the idea of the establishment, as being everything except essential. When therefore Dr. Chalmers came to London to lecture on the principle of church establishments, I attended as a loyal hearer. I had a profound respect for the lecturer, with whom I had had the honour of a good deal of acquaintance during winter residences in Edinburgh, and some correspondence by letter. I was in my earlier twenties, and he in the H. of C. and are gaining rapidly throughout the country. . . . I want to urge you to look calinly before you, . . . and act now with a view to then. There is no height to which you may not fairly rise in this country. If it pleases God to spare us violent convulsions and the loss of our liberties, you may at a future day wield the whole government of this land; and if this should be so, of what extreme moment will your past steps then be to the real usefulness of your high station.

¹ Hanna's Life of Chalmers, iv. pp. 37-46.

whole man upon it. But unfortunately I do not believe he has ever , looked in the face the real doctrine of the visible church and the apostolical succession, or has any idea what is the matter at issue.

Mr. Gladstone says he could not stand the undisputed currency in conservative circles of a theory like this, and felt that the occasion ought to be seized for further entrenching the existing institution, strong as it seemed in fact, by more systematic defences in principle and theory. He sat down to the literary task with uncommon vigour and persistency. His object was not merely to show that the state has a conscience, for not even the newest of new Machiavellians denies that a state is bound by some moral obligations though in history and fact it is true that

Earth is sick, And Heaven is weary, of the hollow words Which States and Kingdoms utter when they talk Of truth and justice.¹

But the obligation of conscience upon a state was not Mr. Gladstone's only point. His propositions were, that the state is cognisant of the difference between religious truth and religious error; that the propagation of this truth and the discouragement of this error are among the ends for which government exists; that the English state did recognise as a fundamental duty to give an active and exclusive support to a certain religion; and finally that the condition of things resulting from the discharge of this duty was well worth preserving against encroachment, from whatever quarter encroachment might threaten.

On July 23rd, the draft of his book was at last finished, and he dispatched it to James Hope for free criticism, suggestions, and revision. The 'physical state of the Ms.,' as Mr. Gladstone calls it, seems to have been rather indefensible, and his excuse for writing 'irregularly and confusedly, considering the pressure of other engagements'—an excuse somewhat too common with him—was not quite so valid as he seems to have thought it. 'The defects,' writes Hope, 'are such as must almost necessarily occur when a great

¹ Excursion, v.

Then by and by these familiar contests of ancient tradition, thus quickened in the eternal ebb and flow of human things into fresh vitality, were followed by a revival, with new artillery and larger strategy, of a standing war that is roughly described as the conflict between reason and faith, between science and revelation. The controversy of Laudian divines with puritans, of Hoadly with non-jurors, of Hanoverian divines with deists and free-thinkers, all may seem now to us narrow and dry when compared with such a drama, of so many interesting characters, strange evolutions; and multiple and startling climax, as gradually unfolded itself to Mr. Gladstone's ardent and impassioned gaze.

His is not one of the cases, like Pascal, or Baxter, or Rutherford, or a hundred others, where a man's theological history is to the world, however it may seem to himself, the most important aspect of his career or character. not the place for an exploration of Mr. Gladstone's strictly theological history, nor is mine the hand by which such exploration could be attempted. In the sphere of dogmatic faith, apart from ecclesiastical politics and all the war of principles connected with such politics, Mr. Gladstone, by the time when he was thirty, had become a man of settled questions. Nor was he for his own part, with a remarkable exception in respect of one particular doctrine towards the end of his life, ever ready to re-open them. What is extraordinary in the career of this far-shining and dominant character of his age, is not a development of specific opinions on dogma, or discipline, or ordinance, on article or sacrament, but the fact that with a steadfast tread he marched along the high anglican road to the summits of that liberalism which it was the original object of the new anglicans to assault and overthrow.

The years from 1831 to 1840 Mr. Gladstone marked as an era of a marvellous uprising of religious energy throughout the land; it saved the church, he says. Not only in Oxford but in England he declares that party spirit within the church had fallen to a low ebb. Coming hurricanes were not foreseen. In Lord Liverpool's government patronage was Christmas Eve,' he says, 'I found Gladstone in the throng, and I accosted him, as we had met, though we had never been introduced to each other. We talked and walked together in St. Peter's during the best part of an afternoon. He is both a clever and an amiable man. At Rome, as the state of his eye-sight forbade too close resort to picture galleries and museums, he listened to countless sermons, all carefully recorded in his diary. Dr. Wiseman gave him a lesson in the missal. On his birthday he went with Manning to hear mass with the pope's choir, and they were placed on the bench behind the cardinals. At St. Peter's he recalled that there his first conception of the unity of the church had come into his mind, and the desire for its attainment—'an object in every human sense hopeless, but not therefore the less to be desired, for the horizon of human hope is not that of divine power and That idea has been upon the whole, I believe, the ruling one of my life during the period that has since elapsed.' On January 19, he bade 'a reluctant adieu to the mysterious city, whither he should repair who wishes to renew for a time the dream of life.'

A few years later Mr. Gladstone noted some differences between English and Italian preaching that are of interest:—

The fundamental distinction between English and Italian preaching is, I think, this: the mind of the English preacher, or reader of sermons, however impressive, is fixed mainly upon his composition, that of the Italian on his hearers. The Italian is a man applying himself by his rational and persuasive organs to men, in order to move them; the former is a man applying himself, with his best ability in many cases, to a fixed form of matter, in order to make it move those whom he addresses. The action in the one case is warm, living, direct, immediate, from heart to heart; in the other it is transfused through a medium comparatively torpid. The first is surely far superior to the second in truth and reality. The preacher bears an awful message. Such messengers, if sent with authority, are too much identified with, and possessed by, that which they carry, to view it objectively during its delivery, it absorbs their very being and reforming—were among the things that helped most to prepare the way for the fall of the whigs and the conservative triumph of 1841. Within ten years from the death of Canning the church transfixed the attention of the politician. The Duke of Wellington was hardly a wizard in political foresight, but he had often a good soldier's eye for things that stood straight up in front of him. 'The real question,' said the duke in 1838, 'that now divides the country and which truly divides the House of Commons, is church or no church. People talk of the war in Spain, and the Canada question. But all that is of little moment. The real question is church or no church.'

The position of the tory party as seen by its powerful recruit was, when he entered public life, a state of hopeless defeat and discomfiture. 'But in my imagination,' wrote Mr. Gladstone, 'I cast over that party a prophetic mantle and assigned to it a mission distinctly religious as the champion in the state field of that divine truth which it was the office of the Christian ministry to uphold in the church. Neither then did I, nor now can I, see on what ground this inviolability could for ā moment be maintained, except the belief that the state had such a mission.' He soon discovered how hard it is to adjust to the many angles of an English political party the seamless mantle of ecclesiastical predominance.

The changes in the political constitution in 1828, in 1829, and in 1832, carried with them a deliberate recognition that the church was not the nation; that it was not identical with the parliament who spoke for the nation; that it had no longer a title to compose the governing order; and—a more startling disclosure still to the minds of churchmen—that laws affecting the church would henceforth be made by men of all churches and creeds, or even men of none. This hateful circumstance it was that inevitably began in multitudes of devout and earnest minds to produce a revolution in their conception of a church, and a resurrection in curiously altered forms of that old ideal of Milton's austere and lofty school—the ideal of a purely spiritual association that should leave each man's soul tend to show there is considerable soreness, at which, _ God knows, I am not surprised; but I have not sought nor desired it.' The Germans on the whole approved. Bunsen was exuberant; there was nobody, he said, with whom he so loved συμφιλοσοφείν καὶ συμφιλολογείν; people have too much to do about themselves to have time to seek truth on its own account; the greater, therefore, the merit of the writer who forces his age to decide, whether they will serve God or Baal. Gladstone is the first man in-England as to intellectual power, he cried, and he has heard higher tones than any one else in this land. The Crown Prince of Prussia sent him civil messages, and meant to have the book translated. Rogers, the poet, wrote that his mother was descended from stout nonconformists, that his father was perverted to his mother's heresies, and that therefore he himself could not be zealous in the cause; but, however that might be, of this Mr. Gladstone might be very sure, that he would love and admire the author of the book as much as ever. The Duke of Newcastle expected much satisfaction; meanwhile declared it to be a national duty to provide churches and pastors; parliament should vote even millions and millions; then dissent would uncommonly soon disappear, and a blessing would fall upon the land. Dr. Arnold told his friends how much he admired the spirit of the book throughout, how he liked the substance of half of it, how erroneous he thought the other half. Wordsworth pronounced it worthy of all attention, doubted whether the author had not gone too far about apostolical descent; but then, like the sage that he was, the poet admitted that he must know a great deal more ecclesiastical history, be better read in the Fathers, and read the book itself over again, before he could feel any right to criticise.1

has contrived to insert a piece of you (first Oration it must be) in a work of his own on Church and State, which makes some figure at present! I know him for a solid, serious, silent-minded man; but how with his Coleridge shovel-hattism he has contrived to relate himself to you, there

¹ Carlyle wrote to Emerson (Feb. 8, 1839): One of the strangest things about these New England Orations (Emerson's) is a fact I have heard, but not yet seen, that a certain W. Gladstone, an Oxford crack scholar, tory M.P., and devout churchman of great talent and hope, to some eager innovators, dogma and ceremony were to go, the fabrics to be turned into mechanics' institutes, the clergy to lecture on botany and statistics. The reaction against this dusty dominion of secularity kindled new life in rival schools. They insisted that if society is to be improved and civilisation saved, it can only be through improvement in the character of man, and character is moulded and inspired by more things than are dreamed of by societies for useful knowledge. The building up of the inward man in all his parts, faculties, and aspirations, was seen to be, what in every age it is, the problem of problems. This thought turned the eyes of many-of Mr. Gladstone first among themto the church, and stirred an endeavour to make out of the church what Coleridge describes as the sustaining, correcting, befriending opposite of the world, the compensating counterforce to the inherent and inevitable defects of the state as a state. Such was the new movement of the time between 1835 and 1845. 'It is surprising,' said Proudhon, the trenchant genius of French socialism in 1840 and onwards, 'how at the bottom of our politics we always found theology.' It is true at any rate that the association of political and social change with theological revolution was the most remarkable of all the influences in the first twenty years of Mr. Gladstone's public Then rose once more into active prominence the supreme debate, often cutting deep into the labours of the modern statesman, always near to the heart of the speculations of the theologian, in many fields urgent in its interest alike to ecclesiastic, historian and philosopher, the inquiry: what is a church? This opened the sluices and let out the floods. What is the church of England? ask that question was to ask a hundred others. Creeds, dogmas, ordinances, hierarchy, parliamentary institution, judicial tribunals, historical tradition, the prayer-book, the Bible—all these enormous topics sacred and profane, with all their countless ramifications, were rapidly swept into a tornado of such controversy as had not been seen in England since the Revolution. Was the church a purely human creation. changing with time and circumstance, like all the Author and critic exchanged magnanimous letters worthy of two great and honourable men. Not the least wonderful thing about Macaulay's review is that he should not have seen how many of his own most trenchant considerations told no more strongly against Mr. Gladstone's theory, than they told against that whig theory of establishment which at the end of his article he himself tried to set up in its place.

Praise indeed came, and praise that no good man could have treated with indifference, from men like Keble, and it came from other quarters whence it was perhaps not quite so welcome, and not much more dangerous. He heard (March 19) that the Duke of Sussex, at Lord Durham's, had been strongly condemning the book; and by an odd contrast just after, as he was standing in conversation with George Sinclair, O'Connell with evident purpose came up and began to thank him for a most valuable work; for the doctrine of the authority of the church and infallibility in essentials—a great approximation to the church of Rome—an excellent sign in one who if he lived, etc. etc. It did not go far enough for the Roman catholic Archbishop of Tuam; but Dr. Murray, the Archbishop of Dublin, was delighted with it; he termed it an honest book, while as to the charges against romanism Mr. Gladstone was misinformed. 'I merely said I was very glad to approximate to any one on the ground of truth; i.e. rejoiced when truth immediately wrought out, in whatever degree, its own legitimate result of unity. O'Connell said he claimed half of me. . . . Count Montalembert came to me to-day (March 23rd), and sat long, for the purpose of ingenuously and kindly impugning certain statements in my book, viz. (1) That the peculiar tendency of the policy of romanism before the reformation went to limit in the mass of men intellectual exercise upon religion. (2) That the doctrine of purgatory adjourned until after death, more or less, the idea and practice of the practical work of religion. (3) That the Roman catholic church restricts the reading of the scriptures by the Christian people.

The letters are given in full in Gleanings, vii. p. 106. See also Trevelyan's Macaulay, chap. viii.

and of this immense mystery, of this saving agency, of this incommensurable spiritual force, the established church of England was the local presence and the organ.

The noble restlessness of the profounder and more penetrating minds was not satisfied, any more than Bossuet had been, to think of the church as only an element in a scheme of individual salvation. They sought in it the comprehensive solution of all the riddles of life and time. Newman drew in powerful outline the sublime and sombre anarchy of human history.

This is the enigma, this the solution in faith and spirit, in which Mr. Gladstone lived and moved. In him it gave to the energies of life their meaning, and to duty its foundation. While poetic voices and the oracles of sages-Goethe, Scott, Wordsworth, Shelley, Byron, Coleridge-were drawing men one way or another, or else were leaving the void turbid and formless, he in the midst of doubts, distractions, and fears, saw a steadfast light where the Oxford men saw it; in that concrete representation of the unseen Power that, as he believed, had made and guides and · rules the world, in that Church Catholic and Apostolic which alone would have the force and the stoutness necessary to serve for a breakwater against the deluge. Yet to understand Mr. Gladstone's case, we have ever to remember that what is called the catholic revival was not in England that which the catholic counter-revolution had been on continent of Europe, primarily a political movement. workings were inward, in the sphere of the mind, in thought and faith, in idealised associations of historic grandeur.1

11

The reader has already been told how at Rome and in Naples in 1832, Mr. Gladstone was suddenly arrested by the new idea of a church, interweaving with the whole of human life a pervading and equalised spirit of religion. Long years after, in an unfinished fragment, he began to trace the golden thread of his religious growth:—

My environment in my childhood was strictly evangelical.

¹ On this, see Fairbairn's Catholicism, Roman and Anglican, pp. 114-5.

lost ground, and of bringing back the nation to unity in her communion. A notable projection from the ivory gate,

'Sed falsa ad cœlum mittunt insomnia manes.'1

From these points of view the effort seems contemptible. But I think that there is more to be said. The land was overspread with a thick curtain of prejudice. The foundations of the historic church of England, except in the minds of a few divines, were obscured. The evangelical movement, with all its virtues and merits, had the vice of individualising religion in a degree perhaps unexampled, and of rendering the language of holy scripture about Mount Sion and the kingdom of heaven little better than a jargon. . . . To meet the demands of the coming time, it was a matter of vital necessity to cut a way through all this darkness to a clearer and more solid position. Immense progress has been made in that direction during my lifetime, and I am inclined to hope that my book imparted a certain amount of stimulus to the public mind, and made some small contribution to the needful process in its earliest stage.

In the early pages of this very book, Mr. Gladstone says, that the union of church and state is to the church of secondary though great importance; her foundations are on the holy hills and her condition would be no pitiable one, should she once more occupy the position that she held before the reign of Constantine.2 Faint echo of the unforgotten lines in which Dante cries out to Constantine what woes his fatal dower to the papacy had brought down on religion and mankind.3 In these sentences lay a germ that events were speedily to draw towards maturity, a foreshadowing of the supreme principle that neither Oxford nor any other place had yet taught him, 'the value of liberty as an essential condition of excellence in human things.'

This revelation only turned his zeal for religion as the paramount issue of the time and of all times into another channel. Feeling the overwhelming strength of the tide that was running against his view of what he counted vital aspects of the

¹ Aeneid, vi. 896. But through the ivory gate the shades send to the upper air apparitions that do but cheat us.

Chapter i. p. 5.
 Inferno, xix., 115-7.

the standard divines of the English church were of great value. Hooker's exposition of the case of the church of England came to me as a mere abstraction; but I think that I found the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration, theretofore abhorred, impossible to reject, and the way was thus opened for further changes.

In like manner at Oxford, I do not donbt that in 1830 and 1831 the study of Bishop Butler laid the ground for new modes of thought in religion, but his teaching in the sermons on our moral nature was not integrated, so to speak, until several years later by larger perusal of the works of Saint Angustine. I may, however, say that I was not of a mind ill disposed to submit to anthority.

The Oxford Movement, properly so called, began in the year 1833, but it had no direct effect upon me. I did not see the Tracts, and to this hour I have read but few of them. Indeed, my first impressions and emotions in connection with it were those of indignation at what I thought the rash intemperate censures pronounced by Mr. Hurrell Froude upon the reformers. My chief tie with Oxford was the close friendship I had formed in 1830 with Walter Hamilton. His character always loving and loved had, not very greatly later, become deeply devout. But I do not think he at this time sympathised with Newman and his friends; and he had the good sense, in conjunction with Mr. Denison, afterwards bishop, to oppose the censure upon Dr. Hampden, to which I foolishly and ignorantly gave in, without, however, being an active or important participator.

But the blow struck by the prayer-book in 1832 set my mind in motion, and that motion was never arrested. I found food for the new ideas and tendencies in various quarters, not least in the religious writings of Alexander Knox, all of which I perused. Moreover, I had an inclination to ecclesiastical conformity, and obedience as such, which led me to concur with some zeal in the plans of Bishop Blomfield. In the course of two or three years, Manning turned from a strongly evangelical attitude to one as strongly anglican, and about the same time converted his acquaintance with me into a close friendship. In the same world, who resigned himself to politics, but whose desire had been , for the ministry of God. The remains of this desire operated unfortunately. They made me tend to glorify in an extravagant manner and degree not only the religious character of the state, which in reality stood low, but also the religious mission of the conservative party. There was in my eyes a certain element of Antichrist in the Reform Act, and that act was cordially hated, though the leaders soon perceived that there would be no step backward. It was only under the second government of Sir Robert Peel that I learned how impotent and barren was the conservative office for the church, though that government was formed of men able, upright, and extremely well-disposed. It was well for me that the unfolding destiny carried me off in a considerable degree from political ecclesiasticism of which I should at that time have made a sad mess. Providence directed that my mind should find its food in other pastures than those in which my youthfulness would have loved to seek it. I went beyond the general views of the tory party in state churchism, . . . it was my opinion that as to religions other than those of the state, the state should tolerate only and not pay. So I was against salaries for prison chaplains not of the church, and I applied a logic plaster to all difficulties. . . . So that Maeaulay . . . was justified in treating me as belonging to the ultra section of the tories, had he limited himself to ecclesiastical questions.

VOL. I.

¹ Afterwards Bishop of Salisbury.

In 1840, when he received Manning's imprimatur for Church Principles, he notes how hard the time and circumstances were in which he had to steer his little bark. 'But the polestar is clear. Reflection shows me that a political position is mainly valuable as instrumental for the good of the church, and under this rule every question becomes one of detail only.' By 1842 reflection had taken him a step further:—

I now approach the mezzo del cammın; my years glide away. It is time to look forward to the close, and I do look forward. My life . . . has two prospective objects, for which I hope the performance of my present public duties may, if not qualify, yet extrinsically enable me. One, the adjustment of certain relations

The Tractarian movement is by this time one of A the most familiar chapters in our history, and it has had singular good fortune in being told by three masters of the most winning, graphic and inclodious English prose of the century to which the tale belongs.1 Whether we call it by the ill name of Oxford counterreformation or the friendlier name of eatholie revival, it remains a striking landmark in the varied motions of English religious thought and feeling for the three-quarters of a century since the still unfinished journey first began. In its early stages, the movement was exclusively theological. Philanthropic reform still remained with the evangelieal school that so powerfully helped to sweep away the slave trade, eleansed the prisons, and aided in humanising the criminal law. It was they who 'helped to form a eonseience, if not a heart, in the callous bosom of English politics,' while the very foremost of the Oxford divines was scouting the fine talk about black men, because they 'concentrated in themselves all the whiggery, dissent, eant and abomination that had been ranged on their side.'2 Nor can we forget that Shaftesbury, the leader in that beneficent crusade of human mercy and national wisdom which ended in the deliverance of women and children in mines and factories, was also a leader of the evangelical party.

The Tractarian movement, as all know, opened, among other sources, in antagonism to utilitarian liberalism. Yet J. S. Mill, the oracle of rationalistic liberalism in Oxford and other places in the following generation, had always much to say for the Tractarians. He used to tell us that the Oxford theologians had done for England something like what Guizot, Villemain, Michelet, Cousin had but there is a pervading sense of soundness about it which Newman, great as he was, never inspired?

¹ The Apologia of its leader; Froude, Short Studies, vol. iv.; and Dean Church's Oxford Movement, 1833-45, a truly fascinating book—called by Mr. Gladstone a great and noble book. 'It has all the delicacy,' he says, 'the insight into the human mind, heart, and character, which were Newman's great endowment; great as he was, never inspired.'

² See Dr. Fairbairn's Catholicism, Roman and Anglican, p. 292. Pusey speaks of our 'paying twenty millions for a theory about slavery,' (Liddon, Life of Puscy, iii. p. 172).

The second secon

encelled at the experience of the encelled and the encelled and the encelled at the encelled at the encelled a 化二甲酚二酚 化硫化铁 化氯化甲基甲酚 化电影 化二烷基 化二烷基 电电流 and the control of t The control of Control of Republic Republic Annual September 1981 of the September 1981 and the September in and the control of And we go the same and share the same of the same week to said the best Grand and the second of the se grant and the company of the state were strong the book to the state The same of the contract of the contract of the contract of the same of the sa en programment in the contract of the contract o graphic contraction of the con with the control of and the first of the production of the state et in Anna in the control of the control en la lata de la transferación de la completa de l ng ang kanang menganggan pengganggan penggan penggan penggan penggan penggan penggan penggan penggan penggan p Ranggan penggan pengga and the second section of the section of the second section of the section of the second section of the section of th en anno estado en estado en entre en estado en entre en entre de la decembra en estado en estado en estado en e man reference to smooth and a first term of the many of the many of the figure of the first of the gramma and the source of the s reader. The strain of their position in all these respects C made Newman and his allies no exemplary school. Their example has been, perhaps rightly, held to account for something that was often under the evil name of sophistry suspected and disliked in Mr. Gladstone himself, in his speeches, his writings, and even in his public acts.

The services of the services o

$1000 (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915) (1915)

It is true that to the impartial eye Newman is no worse than teachers in antagonistic sects; he is, for instance, no subtler than Maurice. The theologian who strove so hard in the name of anglican unity to develop all the catholic elements and hide out of sight all the calvinistic, was not driven to any hardier exploits of verbal legerdemain, than the theologian who strove against all reason and clear thinking to devise common formulæ that should embrace both catholic and calvinistic explanations together, or indeed anything else that anybody might choose to bring to the transfusing alchemy of his rather smoky crucible. Nor was the third, and at that moment the strongest, of the church parties at Oxford and in the country, well able to fling stones at the other two. What better right, it was asked, had low churchmen to shut their eyes to the language of rubrics, creeds, and offices, than the high churchmen had to twist the language of the articles?

The confusion was grave and it was unfathomable. Newman fought a skilful and persistent fight against liberalism, as being nothing else than the egregious doctrine that there is no positive truth in religion, and that one creed is as good as another. Dr. Arnold, on the other hand, denounced Newmanism as idolatry; declared that if you let in the little finger of tradition, you would soon have in the whole monster, horns and tail and all; and even complained of the English divines in general, with the noble exceptions of Butler and Hooker, that he found in them a want of believing or disbelieving anything because it was true or false, as if that were a question that never occurred to them.¹ The plain man, who was but a poor master either of theology or of the history of the church of England, but who loved the prayer-book and hated confession, convents,

¹ Stanley's Life of Arnold, ii. p. 56 n.

CHAPTER VI

CHARACTERISTICS

(1840)

Be inspired with the belief that life is a great and noble calling; not a mean and grovelling thing that we are to shuffle through as we can, but an elevated and lofty destiny.—GLADSTONE.¹

It is the business of biography to depict a physiognomy and not to analyse a type. In our case there is all the more reason to think of this, because type hardly applies to a figure like Mr. Gladstone's, without any near or distant parallel, and composed of so many curious dualisms and Truly was it said of Fénelon, that half unforeseen affinities. of him would be a great man, and would stand out more clearly as a great man than does the whole, because it would be simpler. So of Mr. Gladstone. We are dazzled by the endless versatility of his mind and interests as man of action, scholar, and controversial athlete; as legislator, administrator, leader of the people; as the strongest of his time in the main branches of executive force, strongest in persuasive force; supreme in the exacting details of national finance; master of the parliamentary arts; yet always living in the noble visions of the moral and spiritual idealist. This opulence, vivacity, profusion, and the promise of it all in these days of early prime, made an awakening impression even on his foremost contemporaries. The impression might have been easier to reproduce, if he had been less infinitely mobile. 'I cannot explain my own foundation,' Fénelon said; 'it escapes me; it seems to change every hour.' How are we to seek an answer to the same question in the history of Mr. Gladstone?

¹ Hawarden Grammar School, Sept. 19, 1877.

commended for the chair of divinity at Oxford Dr. Hampden, a divine whose clumsy handling of nice themes had brought him, much against his intention, under suspicion of unsound doctrine, and who was destined eleven years later to find himself the centre of a still louder uproar. Evangelicals and Tractarians flew to arms, and the two hosts who were soon to draw their swords upon one another, now for the first time, if not the last, swarmed forth together side by side against the heretic. What was rather an affront than a penalty was inflicted upon Hampden by a majority of some five to one of the masters of arts of the university, and in accord with that majority, as he has just told us, though he did not actually vote, was Mr. Gladstone. Twenty years after, when he had risen to be a shining light in the world's firmament, he wrote to Hampden to express regret for the injustice of which in this instance 'the forward precipitancy of youth' had made him guilty.1 The case of Hampden gave a sharp actuality to the question of the relations of church and crown. The particular quarrel was of secondary importance, but it brought home to the high churchmen what might be expected in weightier matters than the affair of Dr. Hampden from whig ministers, and confirmed the horrible apprehension that whig ministers might possibly have to fill all the regius chairs and all the sees for a whole generation to come.

Not less important than the theology of the Oxford divines in its influence on Mr. Gladstone's line of thought upon things ecclesiastical was the speculation of Coleridge on the teaching and polity of a national church. His fertile book on Church and State was given to the world in 1830, four years before his death, and this and the ideas proceeding from it were the mainspring, if not of the theology of the movement, at least of Mr. Gladstone's first marked contribution to the stirring controversies of the time. He has described the profound effect upon his mind of another book, the Treatise on the Church of Christ, by William Palmer of Worcester College (1838), and to the end of his life it held its place in his mind among the most masterly performances

¹ The letter will be found at the end of the chapter.

CHAPTER VI

CHARACTERISTICS

(1840)

Be inspired with the belief that life is a great and noble calling; not a mean and grovelling thing that we are to shuffle through as we can, but an elevated and lofty destiny.—GLADSTONE.¹

It is the business of biography to depict a physiognomy and not to analyse a type. In our case there is all the more reason to think of this, because type hardly applies to a figure like Mr. Gladstone's, without any near or distant parallel, and composed of so many curious dualisms and unforeseen affinities. Truly was it said of Fénelon, that half of him would be a great man, and would stand out more clearly as a great man than does the whole, because it would be simpler. So of Mr. Gladstone. We are dazzled by the endless versatility of his mind and interests as man of action, scholar, and controversial athlete; as legislator, administrator, leader of the people; as the strongest of his time in the main branches of executive force, strongest in persuasive force; supreme in the exacting details of national finance; master of the parliamentary arts; yet always living in the noble visions of the moral and spiritual idealist... This opulence, vivacity, profusion, and the promise of it all in these days of early prime, made an awakening impression even on his foremost contemporaries. The impression might have been easier to reproduce, if he had been less infinitely 'I cannot explain my own foundation,' Fénelon said; 'it escapes me; it seems to change every hour.' How are we to seek an answer to the same question in the history of Mr. Gladstone?

¹ Hawarden Grammar School, Sept. 19, 1877.

CHAPTER V

HIS FIRST BOOK

(1838-1839)

The union [with the State] is to the Church of secondary though great importance. Her foundations are on the holy hills. Her charter is legibly divine. She, if she should be excluded from the precinct of government, may still fulfil all her functions, and carry them out to perfection. Her condition would be anything rather than pitiable, should she once more occupy the position which she held before the reign of Constantine. But the State, in rejecting her, would actively violate its most solemn duty, and would, if the theory of the connection be sound, entail upon itself a curse.—GLADSTONE (1838).

According to Mr. Gladstone, a furore for church establishment came down upon the conservative squadrons between 1835 and 1838. He describes it as due especially to the activity of the presbyterian established church of Scotland before the disruption, and especially to the 'zealous and truly noble propagandism of Dr. Chalmers, a man with the energy of a giant and the simplicity of a child.' In 1837, Mr. Gladstone says in one of the many fragments written when in his later years he mused over the past, 'we had a movement for fresh parliamentary grants to build churches in Scotland. The leaders did not seem much to like it, but in Scotland. The leaders did not seem much to like it, but had to follow. I remember dining at Sir R. Peel's with the Scotch deputation. It included Collins, a church bookseller of note, who told me that no sermon ought ever to fall short of an hour, for in less time than that it was not possible to explain any text of the Holy Scripture.'

In the spring of 1838, the mighty Chalmers was persuaded to cross the border and deliver in London half a dozen discourses to vindicate the cause of ecclesiastical establishCHA V. ÆT.

purpose, sprang his leading and most effective qualities. He was never very ready to talk about himself, but when asked what he regarded as his master secret, he always said, 'Concentration.' Slackness of mind, vacuity of mind, the wheels of the mind revolving without biting the rails of the subject, were insupportable. Such habits were of the family of faintheartedness, which he abhorred. Steady practice of instant, fixed, effectual attention, was the key alike to his rapidity of apprehension and to his powerful memory. In the orator's temperament exertion is often followed by a reaction that looks like indolence. This was never so with him. By instinct, by nature, by constitution, he was a man of action in all the highest senses of a phrase too narrowly applied and too narrowly construed. The currents of daimonic energy seemed never to stop, the vivid susceptibility to impressions never to grow dull. He was an idealist, yet always applying ideals to their purposes in act. Toil was his native element; and though he found himself possessed of many inborn gifts, he was never visited by the dream so fatal to many a well-laden argosy, that genius alone does all. There was nobody like him when it came to difficult business, for bending his whole strength to it, like a mighty archer stringing a stiff bow.

Sir James Graham said of him in these years that Gladstone could do in four hours what it took any other man sixteen to do, and he worked sixteen hours a day. When I came to know him long years after, he told me that he thought when in office in the times that our story is now approaching, fourteen hours were a common tale. Nor was it mere mechanic industry; it was hard labour, exact, strenuous, engrossing, rigorous. No Hohenzollern soldier held with sterner regularity to the duties of his post. Needless to add that he had a fierce regard for the sanctity of time, although in the calling of the politician it is harder than in any other to be quite sure when time is well spent, and when wasted. His supreme economy here, like many other virtues, carried its own defect, and coupled with his constitutional eagerness and his quick susceptibility, it led at all periods of his life to some hurry. The tumult of near his sixties [he was 58], with a high and merited fame for C eloquence and character. He subscribed his letters to me 'respectfully' (or 'most respectfully') yours, and puzzled me extremely in the effort to find out what suitable mode of subscription to use in return. Unfortunately the basis of his lectures was totally unsound. Parliament as being Christian was bound to know and establish the truth. But not being made of theologians, it could not follow the truth into its minuter shadings, and must proceed upon broad lines. Fortunately these lines were ready to hand. There was a religious system which, taken in the rough, was truth. This was known as protestantism: and to its varieties it was not the business of the legislature to have regard. On the other side lay a system which, taken again in the rough, was not truth but error. This system was known as popery. Parliament therefore was bound to establish and endow some kind of protestantism, and not to establish or endow poperv.

In a letter to Manning (May 14, 1838) he puts the case more bluntly:—

Such a jumble of church, un-church, and anti-church principles as that excellent and eloquent man Dr. Chalmers has given us in his recent lectures, no human being ever heard, and it can only be compared to the state of things—

Ante mare et terras et quod tegit omnia cœlum.1

He thinks that the State has not cognisance of spirituals, except upon a broad simple principle like that which separates popery from protestantism, namely that protestantism receives the word of God only, popery the word of God and the word of man alike—it is easy, he says, such being the alternatives, to judge which is preferable. He flogged the apostolical succession grievously, seven bishops sitting below him: London, Winchester, Chester, Oxford, Llandaff, Gloucester, Exeter, and the Duke of Cambridge incessantly bobbing assent; but for fear we should be annoyed he then turned round on the cathedrals plan and flogged it with at least equal vigour. He has a mind keenly susceptible of what is beautiful, great, and good; tenacious of an idea when once grasped, and with a singular power of concentrating the in quietude or movement, always a man with a purpose and never the loiterer or lounger, never apathetic, never a sufferer from that worst malady of the human soul—from cheerlessness and cold.

Ovid, Met. i. 5.—Chaos, before sea and land and all-covering skies.

We need not take him through a phrenological table of elements, powers, faculties, leanings, and propensities. Very early, as we shall soon see, Mr. Gladstone gave marked evidence of that sovereign quality of Courage which became one of the most signal of all his traits. He used to say that he had known three men in his time possessing in a supreme degree the virtue of parliamentary courage—Peel, Lord John Russell, and Disraeli. To some other contemporaries for whom courage might be claimed, he stoutly denied it. Nobody ever dreamed of denying it to him, whether parliamentary courage or any other, in either its active or its passive shape, éither in daring or in fortitude. He had even the courage to be prudent, just as he knew when it was prudent to be bold. He applied in public things the Spenserian line, 'Be bold, be bold, and everywhere be bold,' but neither did he forget the iron door with its admonition, 'Be not too bold.' The great Condé, when complimented on his courage, always said that he took good care never to call upon it unless the occasion were absolutely necessary. more did Mr. Gladstone go out of his way to summon courage for its own sake, but only when spurred by duty; then he knew no faltering. Capable of much eircumspection, yet soon he became known for a man of lion heart.

Nature had bestowed on him many towering gifts. Whether Humour was among them, his friends were wont to dispute. That he had a gaiety and sympathetic alacrity of mind that was near of kin to humour, nobody who knew him would deny. Of playfulness his speeches give a thousand proofs; of drollery and fun he had a ready sense, though it was not always easy to be quite sure beforehand what sort of jest would hit or miss. For irony, save in its lighter forms as weapon in debate, he had no marked taste or turn. But he delighted in good comedy, and he reproached me severely for caring less than one ought to do for the Merry Wives of Windsor. Had he Imagination? In its high subject is handled piecemeal and at intervals; and I should recommend, with a view to remedying them, that you procure the whole to be copied out in a good legible hand with blank pages, and that you read it through in this shape once connectedly, with a view to the whole argument, and again with a view to examining the structure of each part.' 1 Hope took as much trouble with the argument and structure of the book as if he were himself its author. For many weeks the fervid toil went on.

The strain on his eyesight that had embarrassed Mr. Gladstone for several months now made abstinence from incessant reading and writing necessary, and he was ordered to travel. He first settled with his sister at Ems (August 15th), whither the proofs of his book with Hope's annotations followed, nor did he finally get rid of the burden until the middle of September. The tedium of life in hotels was almost worse than the tedium of revising proofs, and at Milan and Florence he was strongly tempted to return home, as the benefit was problematical; it was even doubtful whether pictures were any less trying to his eyes than books. made the acquaintance of one celebrated writer of the time. 'I went to see Manzoni,' he says, 'in his house some six or eight miles from Milan in 1838. He was a most interesting man, but was regarded, as I found, among the more fashionable priests in Milan as a bacchettone [hypocrite]. In his own way he was, I think, a liberal and a nationalist, nor was the alliance of such politics with strong religious convictions uncommon among the more eminent Italians of those days.'

October found him in Sicily,2 where he travelled with Sir Stephen Glynne and his two sisters, and here we shall soon see that with one of these sisters a momentous thing came to pass. It was at Catania that he first heard of the publication of his book. A month or more was passed in Rome in company with Manning, and together they visited Wiseman, Manning's conversion still thirteen years off. Macaulay too, now eight-and-thirty, was at Rome that winter.

¹ Memoirs of J. R Hope-Scott, account of their ascent of Mount i. p. 150, where an adequate portion of the correspondence is to be found.

² He wrote an extremely graphic account of their ascent of Mount Etna, which has since found a place in Murray's handbook for Sicily.

superadded ungrudging labour. Later in life he proffered to a correspondent a set of suggestions on the art of speaking:-

1. Study plainness of language, always preferring the simpler word. 2. Shortness of sentences. 3. Distinctness of articulation. 4. Test and question your own arguments beforehand, not waiting for critic or opponent. 5. Seek a thorough digestion of, and familiarity with, your subject, and rely mainly on these to prompt the proper words. 6. Remember that if you are to sway an audience you must besides thinking out your matter, watch them all along.—(March 20, 1875.)

The first and second of these rules hardly fit his own style. Yet he had seriously studied from early days the devices of a speaker's training. I find copied into a little note-book many of the precepts and maxims of Quintilian on the making of an orator. So too from Cicero's De Oratore, including the words put into the mouth of Catulus, that nobody can attain the glory of eloquence without the height of zeal and toil and knowledge.1 Zeal and toil and knowledge, working with an inborn faculty of powerful expression-here was the double -He never forgot the Ciceronian truth that the orator is not made by the tongue alone, as if it were a sword sharpened on a whetstone or hammered on an anvil; but by having a mind well filled with a free supply of high and various matter.2 His eloquence was 'inextricably mixed up with practice.' An old whig listening to one of his budget speeches, said with a touch of bitterness, 'Ah, Oxford on the surface, but Liverpool below.' No bad combination. once had a lesson from Sir Robert Peel. Mr. Gladstone, being about to reply in debate, turned to his chief and said: 'Shall I be short and concise?' 'No,' was the answer, 'be long and diffuse. It is all important in the House of Commons to state your case in many different ways, so as to produce an effect on men of many ways of thinking.'

In discussing Macaulay, Sir Francis Baring, an able and unbiassed judge, advised a junior (1860) about patterns for all its energies, they are their message, and they see nothing CH extrinsic to themselves except those to whose hearts they desire to bring it. In truth, what we want is the following of nature, and her genial development. (March 20. Palm Sunday, '42).

¹ Book ii. § 89, 363.

² Non enim solum acuenda nobis suavitate, copia, varietate. Cicero, neque procudenda lingua est, sed onerandum complendumque pectus

11

It was the end of January (1839) before Mr. Gladstone arrived in London, and by that time his work had been out for six or seven weeks.1 On his return we may be sure that his book and its fortunes were the young author's most lively interest. Church authorities and the clergy generally, so far as he could learn, approved, many of them very warmly. The Bishop of London wrote this, and the Archbishop of Canterbury said it. It is easy to understand with what interest and delight the average churchman would welcome so serious a contribution to the good cause, so bold an effort by so skilled a hand, by lessons from history, by general principles of national probity and a national religion, and by well-digested materials gathered, as Hooker gathered his, 'from the characteristic circumstances of the time,' to support the case for ecclesiastical privilege. Anglicans of the better sort had their intellectual self-respect restored in Mr. Gladstone's book, by finding that they need no longer subsist on the dregs of Eldonian prejudice, but could sustain themselves in intellectual dignity and affluence by large thoughts and sonorous phrases upon the nature of human society as a grand whole.² Even unconvinced whigs who quarrelled with the arguments, admitted that the torics had found in the young member for Newark a well-read scholar, with extraordinary amplitude of mind, a man who knew what reasoning meant, and a man who knew how to write.

The first chapter dealing with establishment drew forth premature praise from many who condemned the succeeding chapters setting out high notions as to the church. From both universities he had favourable accounts. 'From Scotland they are mixed; those which are most definite him?' Lord Coleridge inquired of Mr. Gladstone whether he ever felt nervous in public speaking: 'In opening a subject often,' Mr. Gladstone answered, 'in reply never.' Yet with this inborn readiness for combat, nobody was less addicted to aggression or provocation. It was with him a salutary maxim that, if you have unpalatable opinions to declare, you should not make them more unpalatable by the way of expressing them. In his earlier years he did not often speak with passion. 'This morning,' a famous divine once said, 'I preached a sermon all flames.' Mr. Gladstone sometimes made speeches of that cast, but not frequently, I think, until the seventies. Meanwhile he impressed the House by his nobility, his sincerity, his simplicity; for there is plenty of evidence besides Mr. Gladstone's case, that simplicity of character is no hindrance to subtlety of intellect.

¹ Of the first edition some 1500 or ² Memoirs of J. R. Hope-Scott, i. 1750 copies were sold. p. 172.

Contemporaries in these opening years describe his parliamentary manners as much in his favour. His countenance, they say, is mild and pleasant, and has a high intellectual expression. His eyes are clear and quick. His eyebrows are dark and rather prominent. There is not a daudy in the House but envies his fine head of jet-black hair. Mr. Gladstone's gesture is varied, but not violent. When he rises, he generally puts both his hands behind his back, and having there suffered them to embrace each other for a short time, he unclasps them, and allows them to drop on either side. They are not permitted to remain long in that locality before you see them again closed together, and hanging down before him.1 Other critics say that his air and voice are too abstract, and 'you catch the sound as though he were communing with himself. It is as though you saw a bright picture through a filmy veil. His countenance, without being strictly handsome, is highly intellectual. His pale complexion, slightly tinged with olive, and dark hair, cut rather close to his head, with an eye of remarkable depth, still more impress you with the abstracted character of his disposition. The expression of his face would be sombre were it not for the striking eye, which has a remarkable fascination. His triumples as a debater are achieved not by the aid of the

¹ The Birlish Secure, by Jomes Grant, vol. 11, pp. 52-32.

His political leaders had as yet not spoken a word. On February 9th, Mr. Gladstone dined at Sir Robert Peel's. 'Not a word from him, Stanley, or Graham yet, even to acknowledge my poor book; but no change in manner, certainly none in Peel or Graham.' Monckton Milnes had been to Drayton, and told how the great man there had asked impatiently why anybody with so fine a career before him should go out of his way to write books. 'Sir Robert Peel,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'who was a religious man, was wholly anti-church and unclerical, and largely undogmatic. I feel that Sir R. Peel must have been quite perplexed in his treatment of me after the publication of the book, partly through his own fault, for by habit and education he was quite incapable of comprehending the movement in the church, the strength it would reach, and the exigencies it would entail. Lord Derby, I think, early began to escape from the erastian yoke which weighed upon Peel. Lord Aberdeen was, I should say, altogether enlightened in regard to it and had cast it off: so that he obtained from some the sobriquet (during his ministry) of "the presby-terian Puseyite." Even Mr. Gladstone's best friends trembled for the effect of his ecclesiastical zeal upon his powers of political usefulness, and to the same effect was the general talk of the town. The common suspicion that the writer was doing the work of the hated Puseyites grew darker and spread further. Then in April came Macaulay's article in the Edinburgh, setting out with his own incomparable directness, pungency, and effect, all the arguments on the side of that popular antagonism which was rooted far less in specific reasoning than in a general antisacerdotal instinct that lies deep in the hearts of Englishmen. John Sterling called the famous article the assault of an equipped and practised sophist against a crude young platonist, who happens by accident to have been taught the hard and broken dialect of Aristotle rather than the deep, continuous, and musical flow of his true and ultimate master.

VOL. I.

is the mystery. True men of all There is more than one reference creeds, it would seem, are brothers.

-Correspondnce of Carlyle and Emeron, i. p. 217.

There is more than one reference to Emerson in Mr. Gladstone's book, c.g. i. pp. 25, 130.

transactions of all others the most apt to produce irritation—not an accent of impatience or dispute escapes him, though the guarded firmness of his language marks the steadfast self-control. We may say of Mr. Gladstone that nobody ever had less to repent of from that worst waste in human life that comes of unkindness. Kingsley noticed, with some wonder, how he never allowed the magnitude and multiplicity of his labours to excuse him from any of the minor charities and courtesies of life.

Active hatred of cruelty, injustice, and oppression is perhaps the main difference between a good man and a bad one; and here Mr. Gladstone was sublime. Yet though anger burned fiercely in him over wrong, nobody was more chary of passing moral censures. What he said of himself in 1842, when he was three and thirty, held good to the end:—

Nothing grows upon me so much with lengthening life as the sense of the difficulties, or rather the impossibilities, with which we are beset whenever we attempt to take to ourselves the functions of the Eternal Judge (except in reference to ourselves where judgment is committed to us), and to form any accurate idea of relative merit and demerit, good and evil, in actions. The shades of the rainbow are not so nice, and the sands of the sea-shore are not such a multitude, as are all the subtle, shifting, blending forms of thought and of circumstances that go to determine the character of us and of our acts. But there is One that seeth plainly and judgeth righteously.

This was only one side of Mr. Gladstone's many silences. To talk of the silences of the most copious and incessant speaker and writer of his time may seem a paradox. Yet in this fluent orator, this untiring penman, this eager and most sociable talker at the dinner-table or on friendly walks, was a singular faculty of self-containment and reserve. Quick to notice, as he was, and acutely observant of much that might have been expected to escape him, he still kept as much locked up within as he so liberally gave out. Bulwer Lytton was at one time, as is well known, addicted to the study of mediceval magic, occult power, and the conjunctions of the heavenly bodies; and among other figures he one day spoke of the evils; I contended we had a balance of good, and that the idea of duty in individuals was more developed here than in pure Roman catholic countries.'

Æ

All was of no avail. 'Scarcely had my work issued from the press,' wrote Mr. Gladstone thirty years later, 'when I became aware that there was no party, no section of a party, no individual person probably, in the House of Commons, who was prepared to act upon it. I found myself the last man on a sinking ship.' Exclusive support to the established religion of the country had been the rule; 'but when I bade it live, it was just about to die. It was really a quickened, not a deadened conscience, in the country, that insisted on enlarging the circle of state support.' The result was not wholly unexpected, for in the summer of 1838 while actually writing the book, he records that he 'told Puscy for himself alone, I thought my own church and state principles within one stage of being hopeless as regards success in this generation.'

Another set of fragmentary notes, composed in 1894, and headed 'Some of my Errors,' contains a further passage that points in a significant direction:—

Oxford had not taught me, nor had any other place or person, the value of liberty as an essential condition of excellence in human things. True, Oxford had supplied me with the means of applying a remedy to this mischief, for she had undoubtedly infused into my mind the love of truth as a dominant and supreme motive of conduct. But this it took long to develop into its proper place and function. It may, perhaps, be thought that among these errors I ought to record the publication in 1838 of my first work, The State in its Relation with the Church. Undoubtedly that work was written in total disregard or rather ignorance of the conditions under which alone political action was possible in matters of religion. It involved me personally in a good deal of embarrassment. . . . In the sanguine fervour of youth, having now learned something about the nature of the church and its office, and noting the many symptoms of revival and reform within her borders, I dreamed that she was capable of recovering secular things, he never lost the breath of what was to him a diviner aether. Habitually he strove for the lofty uplands where political and moral ideas meet. Even in those days he struck all who came into contact with him by a goodness and elevation that matched the activity and power of his mind. His political career might seem doubtful, but there was no doubt about the man. One of the most interesting of his notes about his own growth is this:—

¹ Chapter of Autobiography, 1868.—Gleanings, vii. p. 115.

There was a singular slowness in the development of my mind, so far as regarded its opening into the ordinary aptitudes of the man of the world. For years and years well into advanced middle life, I secm to have considered actions simply as they were in themselves, and did not take into account the way in which they would be taken and understood by others. I'did not perceive that their natural or probable effect upon minds other than my own formed part of the considerations determining the propriety of each act in itself, and not unfrequently, at any rate in public life, supplied the decisive criterion to determine what ought and what ought not to be done. In truth the dominant tendencies of my mind were those of a recluse, and I might, in most respects with ease, have accommodated myself to the education of the cloister. All the mental apparatus requisite to constitute the 'public 'man' had to be purchased by a slow experience and inserted piecemeal into the composition of my character.

Lord Malmesbury describes himself in 1844 as curious to see Mr. Gladstone, 'for he is a man much spoken of as one who will come to the front.' He was greatly disappointed at his personal appearance, 'which is that of a Roman catholic ecclesiastic, but he is very agreeable.' Few men can have been more perplexed, and few perhaps more perplexing, as the social drama of the capital was in time unfolded to his gaze. There he beheld the glitter of rank and station, and palaces, and men and women bearing famous names; worlds within worlds, high diplomatic figures, the partisan leaders, the constant stream of agitated rumours about weighty affairs in England and Europe; the keen play of ambition, passions, interests, under easy manners and fugitive church as a national institution, he next flew to the new task of working out the doctrinal mysteries that this institution _ embodied, and with Mr. Gladstone to work out a thing in his own mind always meant to expound and to enforce for the minds of others. His pen was to him at once as sword and as buckler; and while the book on Church and State, though exciting lively interest, was evidently destined to make no converts in theory and to be pretty promptly east aside in practice, he soon set about a second work on Church Principles. It is true that with the tenacious instinct of a born controversialist, he still gave a good deal of time to constructing buttresses for the weaker places that had been discovered by enemies or by himself in the earlier edifice, and in 1841 he published a revised version of Church and State. 1 But ecclesiastical discussion was by then taking a new shape, and the fourth edition fell flat. Of Church Principles, we may say that it was stillborn. Lockhart said of it, that though a hazy writer, Gladstone showed himself a considerable divine, and it was a pity that he had entered parliament instead of taking orders. The divinity, however, did not attract. The public are never very willing to listen to a political layman discussing the areana of theology, and least of all were they inclined to listen to him about the new-found arcana of anglo-catholic theology. As Macaulay said, this time it was a theological treatise, not an essay upon important questions of government; and the intrepid reviewer rightly sought a more fitting subject for his magician's gifts in the dramatists of the Restoration. Newman said of it, 'Gladstone's book is not open to the objections I feared; it is doctrinaire, and (I think) somewhat self-confident; but it will do good.'

¹ Malmesbury, Memoirs of an Ex-Minister, i. p. 155.

111

A few sentences more will set before us the earliest of his transitions, and its gradual dates. He is writing about the first election at Newark:—

It was a curious piece of experience to a youth in his twenty-third year, young of his age, who had seen little or nothing of the

¹ It was translated into German and published, with a preface by Tholuck, in 1843.

the imperious nature of the subjects, their weight and force, demanding the entire strength of a man and all his faculties, leave him no residue, at least for the time, to apply to self-regard; no more than there is for a swimmer swimming for his life. He must, too, in retrospect feel himself to be so very small in comparison with the themes and the interests of which he has to treat. It is a further advantage if his occupation be not mere debate, but debate ending in work. For in this way, whether the work be legislative or administrative, it is continually tested by results, and he is enabled to strip away his extravagant anticipations, his fallacious conceptions, to perceive his mistakes, and to reduce his estimates to the reality. No politician has any excuse for being vain.

Like the stoic emperor, Mr. Gladstone had in his heart the feeling that the man is a runaway who deserts the exercise of civil reason.

IV

All his activities were in his own mind one. This, we can hardly repeat too often, is the fundamental fact of Mr. Gladstone's history. Political life was only part of his religious life. It was religion that prompted his literary life. It was religious motive that, through a thousand avenues and channels stirred him and guided him in his whole conception of active social duty, including one pitiful field of which I may say something later. The liberalism of the continent at this epoch was in its essence either hostile to Christianity or else it was indifferent; and when men like Lamennais tried to play at the same time the double part of tribune of the people and catholic theocrat, they failed. The old world of pope and priest and socialist and red cap of liberty fought on as before. In England, too, the most that can be said of the leading breed of the political reformers of that half century, with one or two most notable exceptions, is that they were theists, and not all of them were even so much as theists.1 If liberalism had continued to run in the grooves cut by Bentham, James Mill, Grote, and the rest, Mr. Glad-of the church to the state. Not that I think the action of the CH latter can be harmonised to the laws of the former. We have passed the point at which that was possible. . . . But it would be Et. much if the state would honestly aim at enabling the church to develop her own intrinsic means. To this I look. The second is, unfolding the catholic system within her in some establishment or machinery looking both towards the higher life, and towards the external warfare against ignorance and depravity.

¹ The noble anti-slavery movement directly connected with evangelimust be excepted, for it was very calism.

In the autumn of 1843, Mr. Gladstone explains to his father the relative positions of secular and church affairs in his mind, and this is only a few months after what to most men is the absorbing moment of accession to cabinet and its responsibilities. 'I contemplate secular affairs,' he says, 'chiefly as a means of being useful in church affairs, though I likewise think it right and prudent not to meddle in church matters for any small reason. I am not making known anything new to you. . . . These were the sentiments with which I entered public life, and although I do not at all repent of [having entered it, and] am not disappointed in the character of the employments it affords, certainly the experience of them in no way and at no time has weakened my original impressions.' At the end of 1843 he reached what looked like a final stage:—

Of public life. I certainly must say, every year shows me more and more that the idea of Christian politics cannot be realised in the state according to its present conditions of existence. For purposes sufficient, I believe, but partial and finite, I am more, than content to be where I am. But the perfect freedom of the new covenant can only, it seems to me, be breathed in other air; and the day may come when God may grant to me the application of this conviction to myself.

plored areas—intellectual curiosity in a word—Oxford had done none of all this for him. In every field of thought and life he started from the principle of authority; it fitted in with his reverential instincts, his temperament, above all, his education.

The lifelong enthusiasm for Dante should on no account in this place be left out. In Mr. Gladstone it was something very different from casual dilettantism or the accident of a scholar's taste. He was always alive to the grandeur of Goethe's words, Im Ganzen, Guten, Schönen, resolut zu leben, 'In wholeness, goodness, beauty, strenuously to live.' But it was in Dante-active politician and thinker as well as poet—that he found this unity of thought and coherence of life, not only illuminated by a sublime imagination, but directly associated with theology, philosophy, politics, history, sentiment, duty. Here are all the elements and interests that lie about the roots of the life of a man, and of the general civilisation of the world. This ever memorable picture of the mind and heart of Europe in the great centuries of the catholic age,—making heaven the home of the human soul, presenting the natural purposes of mankind in their universality of good and evil, exalted and mean, piteous and hateful, tragedy and farce, all commingled as a living whole,—was exactly fitted to the quality of a genius so rich and powerful as Mr. Gladstone's in the range of its spiritual intuitions and in its masculine grasp of all the complex truths of mortal nature. So true and real a book is it, he once said,—such a record of practical humanity and of the discipline of the soul amidst its wonderful poetical intensity and imaginative power. In him this meant no spurious revivalism, no flimsy and fantastic affectation. It was the real and energetic discovery in the vivid conception and commanding structure of Dante, of a light, a refuge, and an inspiration in the labours of the actual world. 'You have been good enough,' he once wrote to an Italian correspondent (1883), 'to call that supreme poet "a solemn master "for me. These are not empty words. The reading of Dante is not merely a pleasure, a tour de force, or a lesson; it is a vigorous discipline for the heart, the intellect, the whole man. In the of the church to the state. Not that I think the action of the latter can be harmonised to the laws of the former. We have passed the point at which that was possible. . . . But it would be much if the state would honestly aim at enabling the church to develop her own intrinsic means. To this I look. The second is, unfolding the catholic system within her in some establishment or machinery looking both towards the higher life, and towards the external warfare against ignorance and depravity.

In the autumn of 1843, Mr. Gladstone explains to his father the relative positions of secular and church affairs in his mind, and this is only a few months after what to most men is the absorbing moment of accession to cabinet and its responsibilities. 'I contemplate secular affairs,' he says, 'chiefly as a means of being useful in church affairs, though I likewise think it right and prudent not to meddle in church matters for any small reason. I am not making known anything new to you. . . . These were the sentiments with which I entered public life, and although I do not at all repent of [having entered it, and] am not disappointed in the character of the employments it affords, certainly the experience of them in no way and at no time has weakened my original impressions.' At the end of 1843 he reached what looked like a final stage:—

Of public life, I certainly must say, every year shows me more and more that the idea of Christian politics cannot be realised in the state according to its present conditions of existence. For purposes sufficient, I believe, but partial and finite, I am more than content to be where I am. But the perfect freedom of the new covenant can only, it seems to me, be breathed in other air; and the day may come when God may grant to me the application of this conviction to myself.

was never an 'equalitarian,' but the passion for simplicity he had—simplicity in life, manners, feeling, conduct, the relations of men to men; dislike of luxury and profusion and all the fabric of artificial and factitious needs. It may well be that he went no further for all this than the Sermon on the Mount, where so many secret elements of social volcano slumber. However we may choose to trace the sources and relations of Mr. Gladstone's general ideas upon the political problems of his time, what he said of himself in the evening of his day was at least true of its dawn and noon. 'I am for old customs and traditions,' he wrote, 'against needless change. I am for the individual as against the state. I am for the family and the stable family as against the state.' He must have been in eager sympathy with Wordsworth's line taken from old Spenser in these very days, 'Perilous is sweeping change, all chance unsound.'1 Finally and above all, he stood firm in 'the old Christian faith.' Life was to him in all its aspects an application of Christian teaching and example. If we like to put it so, he was steadfast for making politics more human, and no branch of civilised life needs humanising more.

Here we touch the question of questions. At nearly every page of Mr. Gladstone's active career the vital problem stares us in the face, of the correspondence between the rule of private morals and of public. Is the rule one and the same for individual and for state? From these early years onwards, Mr. Gladstone's whole language and the moods that it reproduces,—his vivid denunciations, his sanguine expectations, his rolling epithets, his aspects and appeals and points of view,—all take for granted that right and wrong depend on the same set of maxims in public life and private. The puzzle will often greet us, and here it is enough to glance at it. In every stateman's case it arises; in Mr. Gladstone's it is cardinal and fundamental.

To say that he had drawn prizes in what is called the lottery of life would not be untrue; but just as true is it

¹ 'Blest statesman he, whose mind's unselfish will' (1838).—Knight's Wordsworth, viii. p. 101.

His physical vitality—his faculties of free energy, endurance, elasticity—was a superb endowment to begin with. We may often ask for ourselves and others: How many of a man's days does he really live? However men may judge the fruit it bore, Mr. Gladstone lived in vigorous activity every day through all his years. Time showed that he was born with a frame of steel. Though, unlike some men of heroic strength,-Napoleon for example-he often knew fatigue and weariness, yet his organs never failed to answer the call of an intense and persistent Will. As we have already seen, in early manhood his eyes gave him much trouble, and he both learned by heart and composed a good deal of verse by way of sparing them. He was a great walker, and at this time he was a sportsman, as his diary has shown. 'My object in shooting, ill as I do it, is the invigorating and cheering exercise, which does so much for health (1842).' One day this year (Sept. 13, '42) while out shooting, the second barrel of a gun went off while he was reloading, shattering the forefinger of his left hand. The remains of the finger the surgeons removed. 'I have hardly ever in my life,' he says, 'had to endure serious bodily pain, and this was short.' In 1845, he notes, 'a hard day. What a mercy that my strength, in appearance not remarkable, so little fails me.' In the autumn of 1853 he was able to record, 'Eight or nine days of bed illness, the longest since I had the searlet fever at nine or ten years old.' It was the same all through. His bodily strength was in fact to prove extraordinary, and was no secondary clement in the long and strenuous course now opening before him.

Not seeond to vigour of physical organisation—perhaps, if we only knew all the secrets of mind and matter, even connected with this vigour—was strength and steadfastness of Will. Character, as has been often repeated, is completely fashioned will, and this superlative requirement, so indispensable for every man of action in whatever walk and on whatever scale, was eminently Mr. Gladstone's. From force of will, with all its roots in habit, example, conviction,

- our business; which continually presents occasions requiring His iaid and guidance.
 - 7. Turning again to ordinary duty, I know no precept more wide or more valuable than this: cultivate self-help; do not seek nor like to be dependent upon others for what you can yourself supply; and keep down as much as you can the standard of your wants, for in this lies a great secret of manliness, true wealth, and happiness; as, on the other hand, the multiplication of our wants makes us effeminate and slavish, as well as selfish.
 - 8. In regard to money as well as to time, there is a great advantage in its methodical use. Especially is it wise to dedicate a certain portion of our means to purposes of charity and religion, and this is more easily begun in youth than in after life. The greatest advantage of making a little fund of this kind is that when we are asked to give, the competition is not between self on the one hand and charity on the other, but between the different purposes of religion and charity with one another, among which we ought to make the most careful choice. It is desirable that the fund thus devoted should not be less than one-tenth of our means; and it tends to bring a blessing on the rest.
 - 9. Besides giving this, we should save something, so as to be before the world, i.e. to have some preparation to meet the accidents and unforescen calls of life as well as its general future.

Fathers are generally wont to put their better mind into counsels to their sons. In this instance the counsellor was the living pattern of his own maxims. His account-books show in full detail that he never at any time in his life devoted less than a tenth of his annual incomings to charitable and religious objects. The peculiarity of all this half-mechanic ordering of a wise and virtuous individual life, was that it went with a genius and power that 'moulded a mighty State's decrees,' and sought the widest 'process of the suns.'

VI

Once more, his whole temper and spirit turned to practice. His thrift of time, his just and regulated thrift in money, his hatred of waste, were only matched by his eager and

II

Æ

His physical vitality—his faculties of free energy, endurance, elasticity—was a superb endowment to begin with. We may often ask for ourselves and others: How many of a man's days does he really live? However men may judge the fruit it bore, Mr. Gladstone lived in vigorous activity every day through all his years. Time showed that he was born with a frame of steel. Though, unlike some men of heroic strength,-Napoleon for example-he often knew fatigue and weariness, yet his organs never failed to answer the call of an intense and persistent Will. As we have already seen, in early manhood his eyes gave him much trouble, and he both learned by heart and composed a good deal of verse by way of sparing them. He was a great walker, and at this time he was a sportsman, as his diary has shown. 'My object in shooting, ill as I do it, is the invigorating and cheering exercise, which does so much for health (1842).' One day this year (Sept. 13, '42) while out shooting, the second barrel of a gun went off while he was reloading, shattering the forefinger of his left hand. The remains of the finger the surgeons removed. 'I have hardly ever in my life,' he says, 'had to endure serious bodily pain, and this was short.' In 1845, he notes, 'a hard day. What a mercy that my strength, in appearance not remarkable, so little fails me.' In the autumn of 1853 he was able to record, 'Eight or nine days of bed illness, the longest since I had the scarlet fever at nine or ten years old.' It was the same all through. bodily strength was in fact to prove extraordinary, and was no secondary element in the long and strenuous course now opening before him. -

Not second to vigour of physical organisation—perhaps, if we only knew all the secrets of mind and matter, even connected with this vigour—was strength and steadfastness of Will. Character, as has been often repeated, is completely fashioned will, and this superlative requirement, so indispensable for every man of action in whatever walk and on whatever scale, was eminently Mr. Gladstone's. From force of will, with all its roots in habit, example, conviction, minister, Mr. Stanley. I took to colonial subjects principally, and in 1837 was commended for treating them liberally by Lord Russell. Then Sir R. Peel carried me into trade, and before I had been six months in office, I wanted to resign because I thought his corn law reform insufficient. In ecclesiastical policy I had been a speculator; but if you choose to refer to a speech of Sheil's in 1844 on the Dissenters' Chapels bill, you will find him describing me as predestined to be a champion of religious equality. All this seems to show that I have changed under the teaching of experience.

And much later he wrote of himself:-

The stock in trade of ideas with which I set out on the career of parliamentary life was a small one. I do not think the general tendencies of my mind were even in the time of my youth illiberal. It was a great accident that threw me into the anti-liberal attitude, but having taken it up I held to it with energy. It was the accident of the Reform bill of 1831. For teachers or idols or both in politics I had had Mr. Burke and Mr. Canning. I followed them in their dread of reform, and probably caricatured them as a raw and unskilled student caricatures his master. This one idea on which they were anti-liberal became the master-key of the situation, and absorbed into itself for the time the whole of politics. This, however, was not my only disadvantage. I had been educated in an extremely narrow churchmanship, that of the evangelical party. This narrow churchmanship too readily embraced the idea that the extension of representative principles, which was then the essential work of liberalism, was associated with irreligion; an idea quite foreign to my older sentiment on behalf of Roman catholic emancipation. (Autobiographic note, July 22, 1894.)

Notwithstanding his humility, his willingness within a certain range to learn, his profound reverence for what he took for truth, he was no more ready than many far inferior men to discern a certain important rule of intellectual life that was expressed in a quaint figure by one of our old business, he says one year in his diary, 'follows and whirls me day and night.' He speaks once in 1844 of 'a day restless as the sea.' There were many such. That does not mean, and has nothing to do with, 'proud precipitance of soul,' nor haste in forming pregnant resolves. Here he was deliberate enough, and in the ordinary conduct of life even minor things were objects of scrutiny and calculation, far beyond the habit of most men. For he was low-lander as well as highlander. But a vast percentage of his letters from boyhood onwards contain apologies for haste. More than once when his course was nearly run, he spoke of his life having been passed in 'unintermittent hurry,' just as Mill said, he had never been in a hurry in his life until he entered parliament, and then he had never been out of a hurry.

¹ See below, p. 323.

It was no contradiction that deep and constant in him, along with this vehement turn for action, was a craving for tranquil collection of himself that seemed almost monastic. To Mrs. Gladstone he wrote a couple of years after their marriage (Dec. 13, 1841):—

Yoù interpret so indulgently what I mean about the necessity of quiescence at home during the parliamentary session, that I. need not say much; and yet I think my doctrine must seem so strange that I wish again and again to state how entirely it is different from anything like disparagement, of George for example. It is always relief and always delight to see and to be with you; and you would, I am sure, be glad to know, how near Mary [Lady Lyttelton] comes as compared with others to you, as respects what I can hardly describe in few words, my mental rest, . when she is present. But there is no man however near to me, with whom I am fit to be habitually, when hard worked. I have told you how reluctant I have always found myself to detail to my father on coming home, when I lived with him, what had been going on in the House of Commons. Setting a tired mind to work is like making a man run up and down stairs when his limbs are weary.

If he sometimes recalls a fiery hero of the Iliad, at other times he is the grave and studious benedictine, but whether for services rendered, without being understood to sanction all that they have said or done, and thus becoming involved in controversy or imputation about them. 'I am often amazed, he goes on, at the construction put upon my acts. and words; but experience has shown me that they are commonly put under the microscope, and then found to contain all manner of horrors like the animalcules in Thames water.' This microscope was far too valuable an instrument in the contentions of party, ever to be put aside; and the animalcules duly magnified to the frightful size required, were turned into first-rate electioneering agents. Even without party microscopes, those who feel most warmly for Mr. Gladstone's manifold services to his country, may often wish that he had inscribed in letters of gold over the door of the Temple of Peace, a certain sentence from the wise oracles of his favourite Butler. 'For the conclusion of this,' said the bishop, 'let me just take notice of the danger of over-great refinements; of going beside or beyond the plain, obvious first appearances of things, upon the subject of morals and religion.'1 Nor would he have said less of politics. It is idle to ignore in Mr. Gladstone's style an over-refining in words, an excess of qualifying propositions, a disproportionate impressiveness in verbal shadings without real difference. Nothing irritated opponents more. They insisted on taking literary sin for moral obliquity, and because men could not understand, they assumed that he wished to mislead. Yet if we remember how carelessness in words, how the slovenly combination under the same name of things entirely different, how the taking for granted as matter of positive proof what is at the most only possible or barely probable—when we think of all the mischief and folly that has been wrought in the world by loose habits of mind that are almost as much the master vice of the head as selfishness is the master vice of the heart, men may forgive Mr. Gladstone for what passed as sophistry and subtlety, but was in truth scruple of conscience in that region where lack of scruple half spoils the world.

This peculiar trait was connected with another that sometimes amused friends, but always exasperated foes. Among literary and poetic form he rose to few conspicuous flights— such, for example, as Burke's descent of Hyder Ali upon the Carnatic—in vast and fantastic conceptions such as arose from time to time in the brain of Napoleon, he had no part or lot. But in force of moral and political imagination, in bold, excursive range, in the faculty of illuminating practical and objective calculations with lofty ideals of the strength of states, the happiness of peoples, the whole structure of good government, he has had no superior among the rulers of England. His very ardour of temperament gave him imagination; he felt as if everybody who listened to him in a great audience was equally fired with his own energy of sympathy, indignation, conviction, and was transported by the same emotion that thrilled through himself. All this, however, did not fully manifest itself at this time, nor for some years to come.

¹ First Sermon, Upon Compassion.

Strength of will found scope for exercise where some would not discover the need for it. In native capacity for righteous Anger he abounded. The flame soon kindled, and it was no fire of straw; but it did not master him. Mrs. Gladstone once said to me (1891), that whoever writes his life must remember that he had two sides—one impetuous, impatient, irrestrainable, the other all self-control, able to dismiss all but the great central aim, able to put aside what is weakening or disturbing; that he achieved this self-mastery, and had succeeded in the struggle ever since he was three or four and twenty, first by the natural power of his character, and second by incessant wrestling in prayer—prayer that had been abundantly answered.

Problems of compromise are of the essence of the parliamentary and cabinet system, and for some years at any rate he was more than a little restive when they confronted him. Though in the time to come he had abundant difference with colleagues, he had all the virtues needed for political cooperation, as Cobden, Bright, and Mill had them, nor did he ever mistake for courage or independence the unhappy preference for having a party or an opinion exclusively to one's self. 'What is wanted above all things,' he said, 'in the business of joint counsel, is the faculty of making many or with what I might have known that my hearers were all the time supposing me to mean. Hope-Scott once wrote to him (November 24, 1841): 'We live in a time in which accurate distinctions, especially in theology, are absolutely unconsidered. The "common sense" or general tenor of questions is what alone the majority of men are guided by. And I verily believe that semi-arian confessions or any others turning upon nicety of thought and expression, would be for the most part considered as fitter subjects for scholastic dreamers than for earnest Christians.' In politics at any rate, Bishop Butler was wiser.

The explanation of what was assailed as inconsistency is perhaps a double one. In the first place he started on his journey with an intellectual chart of ideas and principles not adequate or well fitted for the voyage traced for him by the spirit of his age. If he held to the inadequate ideas with which Oxford and Canning and his father and even Peel had furnished him, he would have been left helpless and useless in the days stretching before him. The second point is that the orator of Mr. Gladstone's commanding school exists by virtue of large and intense expression; then if circumstances make him as vehement for one opinion to-day as he was vehement for what the world regards as a conflicting opinion yesterday, his intellectual self-respect naturally prompts him to insist that the opinions do not really clash, but are in fact identical. You may call this a weakness if you choose, and it certainly involved Mr. Gladstone in much unfruitful and not very edifying exertion; but it is at any rate better than the front of brass that takes any change of opinion for matter-of-course expedient, as to which the least said will be soonest mended. And it is better still than the disastrous self-consciousness that makes a man persist in a foolish thing to-day, because he chanced to say or do a foolish thing yesterday.

VIII

In this period of his life, with the battle of the world still to come, Mr. Gladstone to whose grave temperament everything, little or great, was matter of deliberate reflection, of the parliamentary aspirant:- Gladstone is to my mind a much better model for speaking; I mean he is happier in joining great eloquence and scleetion of words and rhetorie, if you will, with a style not a bit above debate. It does not smell of the oil. Of eourse there has been plenty of labour, and that not of to-day but during a whole life.' Nothing eould be truer. Certainly for more than the first forty years of his parliamentary existence, he cultivated a style not above debate, though it was debate of incomparable force and brilliance. When simpletons say, as if this were to dispose of every higher claim for him, that he worked all his wonders by his gifts as orator, do they ever think what power over such an assembly as the House of Commons signifies? Here—and it was not until he had been for thirty years and more in parliament that he betook himself largely to the efforts of the platform-here he was addressing men of the world, some of them the flower of English education and intellectual accomplishment; experts in all the high practical lines of life, bankers, merchants, lawyers, captains of industry in every walk; men trained in the wide experience and high responsibilities of public office; lynx-eyed rivals and opponents. this the seene, or were these the men, for the triumphs of the barren rhetorician and the sophist, whose words have no true relation to the facts? Where could general mental strength be better tested? As a matter of history most of those who have held the place of leading minister in the House of Commons have hardly been orators at all, any more than Washington and Jefferson were orators. Mr. Gladstone conquered the house, because he was saturated with a subject and its arguments; because he could state and enforce his case; because he plainly believed every word he said, and earnestly wished to press the same belief into the minds of his hearers; finally because he was from the first an eager and a powerful athlete. The man who listening to his adversary asks of his contention, 'Is this true?' is a lost debater; just as a soldier would be lost who on the day of battle should bethink him that the enemy's eause might after all perhaps be just. The debater does not ask, 'Is this true?' he asks, 'What is the answer to this? How can I most surely floor fully intoxicating; it comes like a spark to the tow if once we give it, as it were, admission within us. (1838.)

Ær.

N

There are those to whom vanity brings more of pain than of pleasure; there are also those whom it oftener keeps in the background, than thrusts forward. The same man who to-day volunteers for that which he is not called upon to do, may to-morrow flinch from his obvious duty from one and the same cause,—vanity, or regard to the appearance he is to make, for its own sake, and perhaps that vanity which shrinks is a more subtle and far-sighted, a more ethereal, a more profound vanity than that which presumes. (1842.)

A question of immense importance meets us in cthical inquiries, as follows: is there a sense in which it is needful, right, and praiseworthy, that man should be much habituated to look back upon himself and keep his eye upon himself; a self-regard, and even a self-respect, which are compatible with the self-renunciation and self-distrust which belong to Christianity? In the observance of a single distinction we shall find, perhaps, a secure and sufficient We are to respect our responsibilities, not ourselves. We are to respect the duties of which we are capable, but not our capabilities simply considered. There is to be no complacent selfcontemplation, beruminating upon self. When self is viewed, it must always be in the most intimate connection with its purposes. How well were it if persons would be more careful, or rather, more conscientious, in paying compliments. How often do we delude another, in subject matter small or great, into the belief that he has done well what we know he has done ill, either by silence, or by so giving him praise on a particular point as to imply. approbation of the whole. Now it is undoubtedly difficult to observe politeness in all cases compatibly with truth; and politeness though a minor duty is a duty still. (1838.)

If truth permits you to praise, but binds you to praise with a qualification, observe how much more acceptably you will speak, if you put the qualification first, than if you postpone it. For example: 'this is a good likeness; but it is a hard painting,' is surely much less pleasing, than 'this is a hard painting; but it is a good likeness.' The qualification is generally taken to be more genuinely the sentiment of the speaker's mind, than the main passions, as with Sir James Graham, or with Mr. Sheil; not of prejudice and fallacy, as with Robert Peel; not with imagination and high seductive colouring, as with Mr. Macaulay; but—of pure reason. He prevails by that subdued earnestness which results from deep religious feelings, and is not fitted for the more usual and more stormy functions of a public speaker.'

III

We are not to think of him as prophet, seer, poet, founder of a system, or great born man of letters like Gibbon, Macaulay, Carlyle. Of these characters he was none, though he had warmth and height of genius to comprehend the value of them all, and—what was more curious—his oratory and his acts touched them and their work in such a way that men were always tempted to apply to him standards that belonged to them. His calling was a different one, and he was wont to appraise it lower. His field lay 'in' working the institutions of his country.' Whether he would have played a part as splendid in the position of a high ruling ecclesiastic, if the times had allowed such a personage, we cannot tell; perhaps he had not 'imperious immobility' enough. Nor whether he would have made a judge of the loftier order; perhaps his mind was too addicted to subtle distinctions, and not likely to give a solid adherence to broad principles of law. A superb advocate? An evangelist, as irresistible as Wesley or as Whitefield? What matters it? All agree that more magnificent power of mind was never placed at the service of the British Senate.

His letters to his father from 1832 onwards show all the interest of a keen young member in his calling, though they contain few anecdotes, or tales, or vivid social traits. 'Of political gossip,' he admits to his father (1843), 'you always find me barren enough.' What comes out in all his letters to his kinsfolk is his unbounded willingness to take trouble in order to spare others. Even in prolonged and intricate money transactions, of which we shall see something later—to us as an admonition from without, but as an instinct from They should not be adopted by effort or upon a process within. of proof, but they should be simply the translation into speech of the habitual tone to which all tempers, affections, emotions, are set. In the Christian mood, which ought never to be intermitted, the sense of this conviction should recur spontaneously; it should be the foundation of all mental thoughts and acts, and the measure to which the whole experience of life, inward and outward, is referred. The final state which we are to contemplate with hope, and to seek by discipline, is that in which our will shall be one with the will of God; not merely shall submit to it, not merely shall follow after it, but shall live and move with it, even as the pulse of the blood in the extremities acts with the central movement of the heart. And this is to be obtained through a double process; the first, that of checking, repressing, quelling the inclination of the will to act with reference to self as a centre; this is to mortify it. The second, to cherish, exercise, and expand its new and heavenly power of acting according to the will of God, first, perhaps, by painful effort in great feebleness and with many inconsistencies, but with continually augmenting regularity and force, until obedience become a necessity of second nature. .

Anatomy of Parliament, November 1840. 'Contemporary Orators,' in Fraser's Magazine.

Resignation is too often conceived to be merely a submission not unattended with complaint to what we have no power to avoid. But it is less than the whole of a work of a Christian. Your full triumph as far as that particular occasion of duty is concerned will be to find that you not merely repress inward tendencies to murmur—but that you would not if you could alter what in any matter God has plainly willed. . . . Here is the great work of religion; here is the path through which sanctity is attained, the highest sanctity; and yet it is a path evidently to be traced in the course of our daily duties. . . .

When we are thwarted in the exercise of some innocent, laudable, and almost sacred affection, as in the case, though its scale be small, out of which all of this has grown, Satan has us at an advantage, because when the obstacle occurs, we have a sentiment that the feeling baffled is a right one, and in indulging a rebellious temper we flatter ourselves that we are merely as it were indulgent amused himself by casting the horoscope of Mr. Gladstone (1860). To him the astrologer's son sent it. Like most of such things, the horoscope has one or two ingenious hits and a dozen nonsensical misses. But one curious sentence declares Mr. Gladstone to be 'at heart a solitary man.' Here I have often thought that the stars knew what they were about.

Whether Mr. Gladstone ever became what is called a good judge of men it would be hard to say. Such characters are not common even among parliamentary leaders. They do not always care to take the trouble. The name is too commonly reserved for those who think dubiously or downright ill of their fellow-creatures. Those who are accustomed to make most of knowing men, do their best to convince us that men are hardly worth knowing. This was not Mr. Gladstone's way. Like Lord Aberdeen, he had a marked habit of believing people; it was part of his simplicity. His life was a curious union of ceaseless contention and inviolable charity—a true charity, having nothing in common with a lazy spirit of unconcern. He knew men well enough, at least, to have found out that none gains such ascendency over them as he who appeals to what is the nobler part in human nature. Nestors of the whigs used to wonder how so much imagination, invention, courage, knowledge, diligence—all the qualities that seem to make an orator and a statesmancould be neutralised by the want of a sound overruling judg-They said that Gladstone's faculties were like an army without a general, or a jury without guidance from the bench. Yet when the time came, this army without a general won the crowning victories of the epoch, and for twenty years the chief findings of this jury without a judge proved to be the verdicts of the nation.

It is not easy for those less extraordinarily constituted, to realise the vigour of soul that maintained an inner life in all its absorbing exaltation day-after day, year after year, decade after decade, amid the ever-swelling rush of urgent secular affairs. Immersed in active responsibility for momentous their own account—and all these are common passions enough in strong natures as well as weak—then his view of himself was just. I think he had none of it. Ambition in a better sense, the motion of a resolute and potent genius to use strength for the purposes of strength, to clear the path, dash obstacles aside, force good causes forward—such a quality as that is the very law of the being of a personality so vigorous, intrepid, confident, and capable as his.

¹ Lord Lansdowne to Senior (1855), in Mrs. Simpson's Many Memories, p. 226.

pleasantry; gross and sordid aims, as King Hudson was soon to find out, masked by exterior refinement; so much kindness with a free spice of criticism and touches of ill-nature; so much of the governing force of England still gathered into a few great houses, exclusive and full of pride and yet, after the astounding discovery that in spite of the deluge of the Reform bill they were still alive as the directing class, always so open to political genius if likely to climb, and help them to climb, into political power. These were the last high days of the undisputed sway of territorial aristocracy in England. The artificial scene was gay and captivating; but much in it was well fitted to make serious people wonder. Queen Victoria was assuredly not of the harsh fibre of the misanthropist in Molière's fine comedy; yet she once said a strange and deep thing to an archbishop. 'As I get older,' she said, 'I cannot understand the world. I cannot comprehend its littlenesses. When I look at the frivolities and littlenesses, it seems to me as if they were all a little mod.'

This was the stage on which Mr. Gladstone, with 'the dominant tendencies of a recluse' and a mind that might easily have been 'accommodated to the cloister,' came to play his part,—in which he was 'by a slow experience' to insert piecemeal the mental apparatus proper to the character of the public man. Yet it was not among the booths and merchandise and hubbub of Vanity Fair, it was among strata in the community but little recognised as yet, that he was to find the field and the sources of his highest power. His view of the secular world was never fastidious or unmanly. Looking back upon his long experience of it he wrote (1894):—

That political life considered as a profession has great dangers for the inner and true life of the human being, is too obvious. It has, however, some redeeming qualities. In the first place, I have never known, and can hardly conceive, a finer school of temper than the House of Commons. A lapse in this respect is on the instant an offence, a jar, a wound, to every member of the assembly; and it brings its own punishment on the instant, like the sins of the Jews under the old dispensation. Again, I think acquainted with, as we have already seen; but his mind was far too closely filled with transcendentalisms of his own to offer much hospitality to the serene and beautiful transcendentalism of Emerson. He read Oliver Twist and Nicholas Nickleby, and on the latter he makes a characteristic comment—'the tone is very human; it is most happy in touches of natural. pathos. No church in the book, and the motives are not those of religion.' So with Hallam's History of Literature, 'Finished (Oct. 10, 1839) his theological chapter, in which I am sorry to find amidst such merits, what is even far more grievous than his anti-church sarcasms, such notions on original sin as in iv. p. 161.' He found Chillingworth's Religion of Protestants 'a work of the most mixed merits,' an ambiguous phrase which I take to mean not that its merits were various, but that they were much mixed with those demerits for which the puritan Cheynell baited the unlucky latitudinarian to death. About this time also he first began Father Paul's famous history of the Council of Trent, a work that always stood as high in his esteem as in Macaulay's, who liked Sarpi the best of all modern historians.

¹ Life of Archbishop Benson, ii. p. 11.

To the great veteran poet of the time Mr. Gladstone's fidelity was unchanging, even down to compositions that the ordinary Wordsworthian gives up:—

Read aloud Wordsworth's Cumberland Beggar and Peter Bell. The former is generally acknowledged to be a noble poem. The same justice is not done to the latter; I was more than ever struck with the vivid power of the descriptions, the strong touches of feeling, the skill and order with which the plot upon Peter's conscience is arranged, and the depth of interest which is made to attach to the humblest of quadrupeds. It must have cost great labour, and is an extraordinary poem, both as a whole and in detail.

Let not the scorner forget that Matthew Arnold, that admirable critic and fine poet, confesses to reading Peter Bell with pleasure and edification.

In the political field he moved steadily on. Sir R. Peel spoke to him (April 19, 1839) in the House about the debate and wished him to speak after Sheil, if Graham, who stone would never have grown to be a liberal. He was not only a fervid practising Christian; he was a Christian steeped in the fourth century, steeped in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Every man of us has all the centuries in him, though their operations be latent, dim, and very various; in his case the roots were as unmistakable as the leafage, the blossom, and the fruits. A little later than the date with which we are now dealing (May 9, 1854)—and here the date matters little, for the case was always the same—he noted what in hours of strain and crisis the Bible was to him:—

On most occasions of very sharp pressure or trial, some word of scripture has come home to me as if borne on angels' wings. Many could I recollect. The Psalms are the great storehouse. Perhaps I should put some down now, for the continuance of memory is not to be trusted 1. In the winter of 1837, Psalm 128. This came in a most singular manner, but it would be a long story to tell. 2. In the Oxford contest of 1847 (which was very harrowing) the verse-'O Lord God, Thou strength of my health, Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.' 3. In the Gorham contest, after the judgment: 'And though all this be come upon us, yet do we not forget Thee; nor behave ourselves frowardly in Thy covenant. Our heart is not turned back; neither our steps gone out of Thy way. No not when Thou hast smitten us into the place of dragons: and covered us with the shadow of death.' 4. On Monday, April 17, 1853 [his first budget speech], it was: 'O turn Thee then unto me, and have mercy upon me: give Thy strength unto Thy servant, and help the son of Thine handmaid.' Last Sunday [Crimean war budget] it was not from the Psalms for the day: 'Thou shalt prepare a table before me against them that trouble me; Thou hast anointed my head with oil and my cup shall be full.'

In that stage at least he had shaken off none of the grip of tradition, in which his book and college training had placed him. His mind still had greater faith in things because Aristotle or Augustine said them, than because they are true. If the end of education be to teach independence of mind, the Socratic temper, the love of pushing into unex-

¹ Paruta, i. p. 64.

à flavour of dictatorship, ran the ministers (May 6th) within five votes of defeat on a cardinal stage.

'I was amused,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'with observing yesterday the differences of countenance and manner in the ministers whom I met on my ride. Ellice (their friend) would not look at me at all. Charles Wood looked . but askance and with the hat over the brow. Grey shouted, "Wish you joy!" Lord Howick gave a remarkably civil and smiling nod; and Morpeth a hand salute with all his might, as we crossed in riding. On Monday night after the division, Peel said just as it was known and about to be announced, "Jamaica was a good horse to start."' Of his own share in the performance, Mr. Gladstone only says that he spoke a dry speech to a somewhat reluctant House. 'I cannot work up my matter at all in such a plight. However, considering what it was, they behaved very well. A loud cheer on the announcement of the numbers from our people, in which I did not join.'

To have won the race by so narrow a majority as five seemed to the whigs, wearied of their own impotence and just discredit, a good plea for getting out of office. Peel proceeded to begin the formation of a government, but the operation broke down upon an affair of the bedchamber. He supposed the Queen to object to the removal of any of the ladies of her household, and the Queen supposed him to insist on the removal of them all. The situation was unedifying and nonsensical, but the Queen was not yet twenty, and Lord Melbourne had for once failed to teach a prudent lesson. A few days saw Melbourne back in office, and in office he remained for two years longer.¹

II

In June 1839 the understanding arrived at with Miss Catherine Glynne during the previous winter in Sicily, ripened into a definite engagement, and on the 25th of the following July their marriage took place amid much

¹ For Mr. Gladstone's later view subject, which, he says, 'will proof this transaction, see Gleanings, i. bably never see the light.' p. 39. He composed a letter on the school of Dante I have learned a great part of that mental provision (however insignificant it may be) which has served me to make the journey of human life up to the term of nearly seventy-three years.' He once asked of an accomplished woman possessing a scholar's breadth of reading, what poetry she most lived with. She named Dante But what of Dante?' 'The Paradiso,' she replied. 'Ah, that is right,' he exclaimed, 'that's my test,' In the Paradiso it was, that he saw in beams of crystal radiance the ideal of the unity of the religious mind, the love and admiration for the high unseen things of which the Christian church was to him the sovereign embodiment. The medieval spirit, it is true, wears something of a ghostly air in the light of our new day. This attempt, which has been made many a time before, 'to unify two ages,' did not carry men far in the second half of the nineteenth century. Nevertheless it were an idle dream to think that the dead hand of Dante's century, and all that it represented, is no longer to be taken into account by those who would be governors of men. Meanwhile, let us observe once more that the statesman who had drunk most deeply from the mediceval formtains was yet one of the supreme leaders of his own generation in a notable stage of the long transition from mediaval to modern.

'At Oxford,' he records, 'I read Rousseau's Social Contract which had no influence upon me, and the writings of Burke which had a great deal.' Yet the day came when he too was drawn by the movement of things into the flaming eirele of thought, feeling, phrase, that in romance and polities and all the ways of life Europe for a century associated with the name of Rousseau. There was what men call Rousseau, in a statesman who could talk of men's common 'flesh and blood' in connection with a franchise bill. Indeed one of the strangest things in Mr. Gladstone's growth and career is this unconscious raising of a partially Rousseauite structure on the foundations laid by Burke, to whom Rousseau was of all writers on the nature of man and the ordering of states the most odious and contemptible. We call it strange, though such amalgams of contrary ways of thinking and feeling are more common than careless observers may suppose. Mr. Gladstone has conferred upon me through her.' And the blessing remained radiant and unclouded to the distant end.

At the close of August, after posting across Scotland from Greenock by a route better known now than then to every tourist, the young couple made their way to Fasque, where the new bride found an auspicious approach and the kindest of welcomes. Her 'entrance into her adoptive family was much more formidable than it would be to those who had been less loved, or less influential, or less needed and leant upon, in the home where she was so long a queen.' At Fasque all went as usual. Soon after his arrival, his father communicated that he meant actually to transfer to his sons his Demerara properties—Robertson to have the management. 'This increased wealth, so much beyond my needs, with its attendant responsibility is very burdensome, however on his part the act be beautiful.'

III

The parliamentary session of 1840 was unimportant and dreary. The government was tottering, the conservative leaders were in no hurry to pluck the pear before it was ripe, and the only men with any animating principle of active public policy in them were Cobden and the League against the Corn Law. The attention of the House of Commons was mainly centred in the case of Stockdale and the publication of debates. But Mr. Gladstone's most earnest thoughts were still far away from what he found to be the dry sawdust of the daily politics, as the following lines may show:—

March 16th, 1840.—Manning dined with us. He kindly undertook to revise my manuscript on 'Church Principles.'

March 18th.—Yesterday I had a long conversation with James Hope. He came to tell me, with great generosity, that he would always respond to any call, according to the best of his power, which I might make on him for the behalf of the common cause—he had given up all views of advancement in his profession—he had about £400 a year, and this, which includes his fellowship, was quite sufficient for his wants; his time would be devoted that one of those very prizes was the determined conviction that life is no lottery at all, but a serious business worth taking infinite pains upon. To one of his sons at Oxford he wrote a little paper of suggestions that are the actual description of his own lifelong habit and unbroken practice.

Strathconan, Oct. 7, 1872.—1. To keep a short journal of principal employments in each day: most valuable as an account-book of the all-precious gift of Time.

- 2. To keep also an account-book of receipt and expenditure; and the least troublesome way of keeping it is to keep it with care. This done in early life, and carefully done, creates the habit of performing the great duty of keeping our expenditure (and therefore our desires) within our means.
- 3. Read attentively (and it is pleasant reading) Taylor's essay on Money, which if I have not done it already, I will give you. It is most healthy and most useful reading.
- 4. Establish a minimum number of hours in the day for study, say seven at present, and do not without reasonable cause let it be less; noting down against yourself the days of exception. There should also be a minimum number for the vacations, which at Oxford are extremely long.
- 5. There arises an important-question about Sundays. Though we should to the best of our power avoid secular work on Sundays, it does not follow that the mind should remain idle. There is an immense field of knowledge connected with religion, and much of it is of a kind that will be of use in the schools and in relation to your general studies. In these days of shallow scepticism, so widely spread, it is more than ever to be desired that we should be able to give a reason for the hope that is in us.
- 6. As to duties directly religious, such as daily prayer in the morning and evening, and daily reading of some portion of the Holy Scripture, or as to the holy ordinances of the gospel, there is little need, I am confident, to advise you; one thing, however, I would say, that it is not difficult, and it is most beneficial, to cultivate the habit of inwardly turning the thoughts to God, though but for a moment in the course or during the intervals of

¹ The first chapter in Sir Henry Taylor's Notes from Life (1847).

of the moralist. We shall soon see that this transaction began to make Mr. Gladstone uneasy, as was indeed to be expected in anybody who held that a state should have a conscience. On April 8, 1840, his journal says: 'Read on China. House. . . . Spoke heavily; strongly against the trade and the war, having previously asked whether my speaking out on them would do harm, and having been authorised.' An unguarded expression brought him into a debating scrape, but his speech abounded in the pure milk of what was to be the Gladstonian word:—

I do not know how it can be urged as a crime against the Chinese that they refused provisions to those who refused obedience to their laws whilst residing within their territory. I am not competent to judge how long this war may last, nor how protracted may be its operations, but this I can say, that a war more unjust in its origin, a war more calculated in its progress to cover this country with disgrace, I do not know and I have not read Mr. Macaulay spoke last night in eloquent terms of the British flag waving in glory at Canton, and of the animating effect produced' upon the minds of our sailors by the knowledge that in no country under heaven was it permitted to be insulted. But how comes it to pass that the sight of that flag always raises the spirits of Englishmen? It is because it has always been associated with the cause of justice, with opposition to oppression, with respect for national rights, with honourable commercial enterprise, but now under the auspices of the noble lord [Palmerston] that flag is hoisted to protect an infamous contraband traffic, and if it were never to be hoisted except as it is now hoisted on the coast of China, we should recoil from its sight with horror, and should never again feel our hearts thrill, as they now thrill, with emotion when it. floats magnificently and in pride upon the breeze. . . . Although the Chinese were undoubtedly guilty of much absurd phraseology, of no little ostentatious pride, and of some excess, justice in my opinion is with them, and whilst they the pagans and semi-civilised barbarians have it, we the enlightened and civilised Christians are pursuing objects at variance both with justice and with religion.2

¹ See Lord Palmerston's speech, ² Hansard, 3 S. vol. 53, p. 819. Aug. 10, 1842.

minute attention in affairs of public business. He knew how to be content with small savings of hours and of material resources. He was not downcast if progress were slow. In watching public opinion, in feeling the pulse of a cabinet, in softening the heart of a colleague, even when skies were gloomiest, he was almost provokingly anxious to detect signs of encouragement that to others were imperceptible. He was of the mind of the Roman emperor, 'Hope not for the republic of Plato; but be content with ever so small an advance, and look on even that as a gain worth having.' A commonplace, but not one of the commonplaces that are always laid to heart.

If faith was one clue, then next to faith was growth. The fundamentals of Christian dogma, so far as I know and am entitled to speak, are the only region in which Mr. Gladstone's opinions have no history. Everywhere else we look upon incessant movement; in views about church and state, tests, national schools; in questions of economic and fiscal policy; in relations with party; in the questions of popular government—in every one of these wide spheres of public interest he passes from crisis to crisis. The dealings of church and state made the first of these marked stages in the history of his opinions and his life, but it was only the beginning.

I was born with smaller natural endowments than you, he wrote to his old friend Sir Francis Doylē (1880), and I had also a narrower early training. But my life has certainly been remarkable for the mass of continuous and scarching experience it has brought me ever since I began to pass out of boyhood. I have been feeling my way; owing little to living teachers, but enormously to four dead ones 2 (over and above the four gospels). It has been experience which has altered my politics. My toryism was accepted by me on authority and in good faith; I did my best to fight for it. But if you choose to examine my parliamentary life you will find that on every subject as I came to deal with it practically, I had to deal with it as a liberal elected in '32. I began with slavery in 1833, and was commended by the liberal ledge, Grillion's down to the very end of his life, nearly sixty years ahead, had no more faithful or congenial member.

Marcus Aurelius, ix. p. 29. tells Manning, 'are doctors to the ² Aristotle, Augustine, Dante, speculative man; would they were Butler. 'My four "doctors," he such to the practical too!'

July 1st.—Last evening at Lambeth Palace I had a good deal of conversation with Colonel Gurwood about the Duke of Wellington and about Canada. He told me an anecdote of Lord Seaton which throws light upon his peculiar reserve, and shows it to be a modesty of character, combined no doubt with military habits and notions. When Captain Colborne, and senior officer of his rank in the 21st foot, he [Lord Seaton] was military secretary to General Fox during the war. A majority in his regiment fell vacant, Gen. Fox desired him to ascertain who was the senior captain on the command. 'Captain So-and-so of the 80th (I think).' 'Write to Colonel Gordon and recommend him to his royal highness for the vacant majority.' He did it. The answer came to this effect: 'The recommendation will not be refused, but we are surprised to see that it comes in the handwriting of Captain Colborne, the very man who, according to the rules of the service, ought to have this majority.' General Fox had forgotten it, and Captain Colborne had not reminded him! The error was corrected. He (Gurwood) said he had never known the Duke of Wellington speak on the subject of religion but once, when he quoted the story of Oliver Cromwell on his death-bed, and said: 'That state of grace, in my opinion, is a state or habit of doing right, of persevering in duty, and to fall from it is to cease from acting right.' He always attends the service at 8 A.M. in the Chapel Royal, and says it is a duty which ought to be done, and the earlier in the day it is discharged the better. July 24th. Heard [James] Hope in the House of Lords against the Chapters bill; and he spoke with such eloquence, learning, lofty sentiment, clear and piercing diction, continuity of argument, just order, sagacious tact, and comprehensive method, as one would say would have required the longest experience as well as the greatest natural gifts. Yet he never acted before, save as counsel for the Edinburgh and Glasgow railway. If hearts are to be moved, it must be by this speech. July 27th.—

verdict on him in the words; "That young man's fortune is madé."—Newman's Funeral Sermon on J. R. Hope-Scott in Sermons preached on Various Occasions, p. 269.

^{1 &#}x27;It was the common talk of Oxford how the most distinguished lawyer of the day, a literary man and a critie, on hearing the speech in question, pronounced his prompt

English sages. 'He is a wonderful man,' said the sage, 'that can thread a needle when he is at cudgels in a crowd; and yet this is as easy as to find Truth in the hurry of disputation.'1 . The strenuous member of parliament, the fervid minister fighting the clauses of his bill, the disputant in cabinet, when he passed from man of action to the topics of balanced thought, nice scrutiny, long meditation, did not always succeed in getting his thread into the needle's eye.

As to the problems of the metaphysician, Mr. Gladstone showed little curiosity. Nor for abstract discussion in its highest shape—for investigation of ultimate propositions had he any of that power of subtle and ingenious reasoning which was often so extraordinary when he came to deal with the concrete, the historic, and the demonstrable. A still more singular limitation on the extent of his intellectual curiosity was hardly noticed at this early epoch. The scientific movement, which along with the growth of democracy and the growth of industrialism formed the three propelling forces of a new age,-was not yet developed in all its range. The astonishing discoveries in the realm of natural science, and the philosophic speculations that were built upon them, though quite close at hand, were still to come. Darwin's Origin of Species, for example, was not given to the world Mr. Gladstone watched these things vaguely until 1859. and with misgiving; instinct must have told him that the advance of natural explanation, whether legitimately or not, would be in some degree at the expense of the supernatural. But from any full or serious examination of the details of the scientific movement he stood aside, safe and steadfast within the citadel of Tradition.

He was once asked to subscribe to a memorial of Tyndale, the translator of the Bible,2 and he put his refusal upon grounds that show one source at least of his scruple about words. -He replies that he has been driven to a determination to renounce all subscriptions for the commemoration of ancient worthies, as he finds that he cannot signify gratitude papers. Vinegar, thank God, carries my eyes through so much Ms., and the occupation is deeply interesting, especially on Hallam's account. Our labours were at one time anxious and critical, the two leaders being 1388 and 1390 respectively. At night, however, all was decided. April 4th. 12.2.—Viva voce for fourteen select. At 2½ Seymour was announced scholar to the boys, and chaired forthwith. Hallam, medallist. It was quite overpowering.

VOL. I.

¹ Glanville's Vanity of Dogmatis-He refused to be on a committee for ing.
² See Shaftesbury's Life, iii. p. 495. a memorial to Thirlwall. (1875).

Henry Hallam was the second son of the historian, the junior of Arthur by some fourteen or fifteen years. stone more than a generation later described a touching supplement to his Eton story. 'In 1850 Henry Hallam had attained an age exceeding only by some four years the limit of his brother's life. During that autumn I was travelling post between Turin and Genoa, upon my road to Naples. A family coach met us on the road, and the glance of a moment at the inside showed me the familiar face of Mr. Hallam. I immediately stopped my carriage, descended, and ran after his. On overtaking it, I found the dark clouds accumulated on his brow, and learned with indescribable pain that he was on his way home from Florence, where he had just lost his second and only remaining son, from an attack corresponding in its suddenness and its devastating rapidity with that which had struck down his eldest born son seventeen years before.'

At Fasque, where his autumn sojourn began in September, he threw himself with special ardour into his design for a college for Scotch episcopalians, especially for the training of clergy. He wrote to Manning (Aug. 31, 1840):—

Hope and I have been talking and writing upon a scheme for raising money to found in Scotland a college akin in structure to the Romish seminaries in England; that is to say, partly for training the clergy, partly for affording an education to the children of the gentry and others who now go chiefly to presbyterian schools or are tended at home by presbyterian tutors. I think £25,000 would do it, and that it might be got. I must have my father's sanction before committing myself to it. Hope's intended the papers is a letter from an illustrious man to Mr. c Gladstone—wickedly no better dated by the writer than Saturday, and no better docketed by the receiver than 'T. B. Macaulay, March 1,'—showing that Mr. Gladstone was just as energetic, say in some year between 1835 and 1850, in defending the entire consistency between a certain speech of the dubious date and a speech in 1833, as he ever afterwards showed himself in the same too familiar process. In later times he described himself as a sort of purist in what touches the consistency of statesmen. 'Change of opinion,' he said, 'in those to whose judgment the public looks more; or less to assist its own, is an evil to the country, although a much smaller evil than their persistence in a course which they know to be wrong. It is not always to be blamed. But it is always to be watched with vigilance; always to be challenged and put upon its trial.' To this challenge in his own case—and no man of his day was half so often put upon his trial for inconsistency—he was always most easily provoked to make a vehement reply. In that process Mr. Gladstone's natural habit of resort to qualifying words, and his skill in showing that a new attitude could be reconciled by strict reasoning with the logical contents of old dicta, gave him wonderful advantage. His adversary as he strode confidently along the smooth grass, suddenly found himself treading on a serpent; he had overlooked a condition, a proviso, a word of hypothesis or contingency, that sprang from its ambush and brought his triumph to naught on the If Mr. Gladstone had only taken as much trouble that his hearers should understand exactly what it was that he meant, as he took trouble-afterwards to show that his meaning had been grossly misunderstood, all might have been well. As it was, he seemed to be completely satisfied if he could only show that two propositions, thought by plain men to be directly contradictory, were all the time capable on close construction of being presented in perfect harmony. As if I had a right to look only to what my words literally mean or may in good logic be made to mean, and had no concern at all with what the people meant who used the same words, read, and I extracted from them the chief material of my speeches. I dare say it was sad stuff, furbished up at a moment's notice. We carried the election. Cobden sent me a challenge to attend a public discussion of the subject. Whether this was quite fair, I am not certain, for I was young, made no pretension to be an expert, and had never opened my lips in parliament on the subject. But it afforded me an excellent opportunity to decline with modesty and with courtesy as well as reason. I am sorry to say that, to the best of my recollection, I did far otherwise, and the pith of my answer was made to be that I regarded the Anti-Corn Law League as no better than a big borough-mongering association. Such was my first capital offence in the matter of protection; redeemed from public condemnation only by obscurity.

¹ Gleanings, vii. p. 100, 1868.

The letters are preserved, but a sentence or two from Mr. Gladstone's to Cobden will be enough. 'The phrases whichyou quote from a report in the Times have reference, not to the corn law, but to the Anti-Corn Law League and its operations in Walsall. Complaining apparently of these, you desire me to meet you in discussion, not upon the League but upon the corn law. I cannot conceive two subjects more distinct. I admit the question of the repeal of the corn laws to be a subject fairly open to discussion, although I have a strong opinion against it. But as to the Anti-Corn Law League, I do not admit that any equitable doubt can be entertained as to the character of its present proceedings; and, excepting a casual familiarity of phrase, I adhere rigidly to the substance of the sentiments which I have expressed. I know not who may be answerable for these measures, nor was your name known to me, or in my recollection at the time when I spoke.' Time soon changed all this, and showed who was teacher and who the learner.

By and by the session of 1841 opened, the whigs moving steadily towards their fall, and Mr. Gladstone almost overwhelmed with floods of domestic business. He settled in the pleasant region which is to the metropolis what Delphi was to the habitable earth, and where, if we include in it Downing Street, he passed all the most important years of his life duty and scruple, took early note of minor morals as well as major. Characteristically he found some fault with a sermon of Dr. Wordsworth's upon Saint Barnabas, for hardly pushing the argument for the connection of good manners with Christianity to the full extent of which it is fairly capable. The whole system of legitimate courtesy, politeness, and refinement is surely nothing less than one of the genuine though minor and often unacknowledged results of the gospel scheme. All the great moral qualities or graces, which in their large sphere determine the formation and habits of the Christian soul as before God, do also on a smaller scale apply to the very same principles in the common intercourse of life, and pervade its innumerable and separately inappreciable particulars; and the result of this application is that good breeding which distinguishes Christian civilisation. (March 31, 1844.)

It is not for us to discuss whether the breeding of Plato or Cicero or the Arabs of Cordova was better or worse than the breeding of the eastern bishops at Nicæa or Ephesus. Good manners, we may be sure, hardly have a single master-key, unless it be simplicity, or freedom from the curse of affectation. What is certain is that nobody of his time was a finer example of high good manners and genuine courtesy than Mr. Gladstone himself. He has left a little sheaf of random jottings which, without being subtle or recondite, show how he looked on this side of human things. Here is an example or two:—

There are a class of passages in Mr. Wilberforce's Journals, e.g., some of those recording his successful speeches, which might in many men be set down to vanity, but in him are more fairly I should think ascribable to a singlemindedness which did not inflate. Surely with most men it is the safest rule, to make scanty records of success achieved, and yet more rarely to notice praise, which should pass us like the breeze, enjoyed but not arrested. There must indeed be some sign, a stone as it were set up, to remind us that such and such were occasions for thankfulness; but should not the memorials be restricted wholly and expressly for this purpose? For the fumes of praise are rapidly and fearpetency and for sincerity was so damaged both in the House of Commons and the country, that their doom was certain. The reduction of the duty on slave-grown sugar from foreign

The reduction of the duty on slave-grown sugar from foreign countries was as obnoxious to the abolitionist as it was disadvantageous to the West Indian proprietors, and both of these powerful sections were joined by the corn-grower, well aware that his turn would come next. Many well aware that his turn would come next. Many meetings took place at Sir Robert-Peel's upon the sugar resolutions, and Mr. Gladstone worked up the papers and figures so as to be ready to speak if necessary. At one of these meetings, by the way, he thought it worth while to write down that Peel had the tradesmen's household books upon his desk—a circumstance that he mentioned also to the present writer, when by chance we found ourselves together in the same room fifty years later. On May 10th, his speech on the sugar duties came off in due course. In this speech he took the sound point that the new arrangement must act as an encouragement to the slave trade, 'that monster which, while war, pestilence, and famine were slaying their thousands, slew from year to year with unceasing operation its tens of thousands.' As he went on, he fell upon Macaulay for being member of a cabinet that was thus deserting a cause in which Macaulay's father had been the unseen ally of Wilberforce, and the pillar of his strength,—'a man of profound benevolence, of acute understanding, of indefatigable industry, and of that self-denying temper which is content to work in secret, and to seek for its reward beyond the grave.' Macaulay was the last man to suffer rebuke in silence, and he made a sharp reply on the following day, followed by a magnanimous peace-making behind the Speaker's chair.

Meanwhile the air was thick and loud with rumours. Lord Eliot told Mr. Gladstone in the middle of the debate that there had been a stormy cabinet that morning, and that ministers had at last made up their minds to follow Lord Spencer's advice, to resign and not to dissolve. When the division on the sugar duties was taken, ministers were beaten (May 19) by a majority of 36, after fine performances from Sir Robert, and a good one from Palmerston on the other proposition; and it carries ostensible honesty and manliness to propose first what is the less acceptable. (1835-6.)

To go back to Fénelon's question about his own foundation. 'The great work of religion,' as Mr. Gladstone conceived it, was set out in some sentences of a letter written by him to Mrs. Gladstone in 1844, five years after they were married. In these sentences we see that under all the agitated surface of a life of turmoil and contention, there flowed a deep composing stream of faith, obedience, and resignation, that gave him in face of a thousand buffets, the free mastery of all his resources of heart and brain:-

To Mrs. Gladstone.

13 C. H. Terrace, Sunday evening, Jan. 21, 1844.—Although I have carelessly left at the board of trade with your other letters that on which I wished to have said something, yet I am going to end this day of peace by a few words to show that what you said did not lightly pass away from my mind. There is a beautiful little sentence in the works of Charles Lamb concerning one who had been afflicted: 'he gave his heart to the Purifier, and his will to the Sovereign Will of the Universe.' But there is a speech in the third canto of the Paradiso of Dante, spoken by a certain Piccarda, which is a rare gem. I will only quote this one line:

In la sua volontade è nostra pace.2

The words are few and simple, and yet they appear to me to have an inexpressible majesty of truth about them, to be almost as if they were spoken from the very mouth of God. It so happened that (unless my memory much deceives me) I first read that speech on a morning early in the year 1836, which was one of trial. I was profoundly impressed and powerfully sustained, almost absorbed, by these words. They cannot be too deeply graven upon the In short, what we all want is that they should not come

¹ Rosamund Gray, chap. xi. is in the volume of collected transla² Mr. Gladstone's rendering of the speech of Piccarda (Paradiso, iii. 70) 1835:

'In His Will is our peace. To this all things

By Him created, or by Nature made,

As to a central Sea self-motion brings'

As to a central Sea, self-motion brings.'

the history of party. Thinking quite as much of the Scotch college, the colonial bishoprics, and Tract Ninety, as of sugar duties or the corn law, Mr. Gladstone hastened to Newark. He was delighted with the new colleague who had been provided for him. 'As a candidate,' he writes to his wife, 'Lord John Manners is excellent; his speaking is popular and effective, and he is a good canvasser, by virtue not I think of effort, but of a general kindliness and warmth of disposition which naturally shows itself to every one. Nothing can be more satisfactory than to have such a partner.' In his address Mr. Gladstone only touched on the poor law and the corn law. On the first he would desire liberal treatment for aged, sick, and widowed poor, and reasonable discretion to the local administrators of the law. As to the second, the protection of native agriculture is an object of the first economical and national importance, and should be secured by a graduated scale of duties on foreign grain. 'Manners and I,' he says, 'were returned as protectionists. My speeches were of absolute dulness, but I have no doubt they were sound in the sense of my leaders Peel and Graham and others of the party.' The election offered no new incidents One old lady reproached him for not being content with keeping bread and sugar from the people, but likewise by a new faith, the mysterious monster of Puseyism, stealing away from them the bread of life. He found the wesleyans shaky, partly because they disliked his book and were afraid of the Oxford Tracts, and partly from his refusal to subscribe to their school. Otherwise, flags, bands, suppers, processions, all went on in high ceremonial order as before. Day after day passed with nothing worse than the threat of a blue candidate, but one Sunday morning (June 26) as people came out of church, they found an address on the walls and a dark rumour got affoat that the new man had brought heavy bags of money. For this rumour there was no foundation, but it inspired annoying fears in the good and cheerful hopes in the bad. The time was in any case too short, and at four o'clock on June 29 the poll was found to be, Gladstone 633, Manners 630, Hobhouse 391. His own election safely over, Mr. Gladstone turned to take part in a fierce conon behalf, not of ourselves, but of a duty which we have been interrupted in performing. But our duties can take care of themselves when God calls us away from any of them. . . . To be able to relinquish a duty upon command shows a higher grace than to be able to give up a mere pleasure for a duty. . . .

The resignation thus described with all this power and deep feeling is, of course, in one form of thoughts and words, of symbol and synthesis, or tanother, the foundation of all the great systems of life. A summary of Mr. Gladstone's interpretation of it is perhaps found in a few words used by him of Blanco White, a heterodox writer whose strange spiritual fortunes painfully interested and perplexed 'He cherished,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'with whatever associations, the love of God, and maintained resignation to His will, even when it appears almost impossible to see how he could have had a dogmatic belief in the existence of a divine will at all. There was, in short [in Blanco White], a disposition to resist the tyranny of self; to recognise the rule of duty; to maintain the supremacy of the higher over the lower parts of our nature. This very disposition might with truth no less assured have been assigned to the writer himself. These three bright crystal laws of life were to him like pointer stars guiding a traveller's eye to the celestial pole by which he steers.

When all has been said of a man's gifts, the critical question still stands over, how he regards his responsibility for using them. Once in a conversation with Mr. Gladstone, some fifty years from the epoch of this present chapter, we fell upon the topic of ambition. 'Well,' he said, 'I do not think that I can tax myself in my own life with ever having been much moved by ambition.' The remark so astonished me that, as he afterwards playfully reported to a friend, I almost jumped up from my chair. We soon shall reach a stage in his career when both remark and surprise may explain themselves. We shall see that if ambition means love of power or fame for the sake of glitter, decoration, external renown, or even dominion and authority on of office by a majority of 91, and Peel undertook to form a povernment.

¹ Gleanings, ii. p. 20, 1845.

Aug. 31/41.—In consequence of a note received this morning from Sir Robert Peel I went to him at half-past eleven. The following is the substance of a quarter of an hour's conversation. He said: 'In this great struggle, in which we have been and are to be engaged, the chief importance will attach to questions of finance. It would not be in my power to undertake the business of chancellor of the exchequer in detail; I therefore have asked Goulburn to fill that office, and I shall be simply first lord. I think we shall be very strong in the House of Commons if as a part of this arrangement you will accept the post of vice-president of the board of trade, and conduct the business of that department in the House of Commons, with Lord Ripon as president. I consider it an office of the highest importance, and you will have my unbounded confidence in it.'1

I said, 'of the importance and responsibility of that office at the present time I am well aware; but it is right that I should say as strongly as I can, that I really am not fit for it. I have no general knowledge of trade whatever; with a few questions I am acquainted, but they are such as have come across me incidentally.' He said, 'The satisfactory conduct of an office of that kind must after all depend more upon the intrinsic qualities of the man, than upon the precise amount of his previous knowledge. I also think you will find Lord Ripon a perfect master of these subjects, and depend upon it with these appointments at the board of trade we shall carry the whole commercial interests of the country with us.'

how much of the public trade business was transacted in it. Revenue was then largely involved: and hence, I imagine, it came about that this business was taken over in a great degree by the treasury. I myself have drawn up new tariffs in both, at the B. of T. in 1842 and 1844-5, and at the treasury in 1853 and 1860. Why and how the old B. of T. functions also passed in part to the F. O. I do not so well know.'

[&]quot;At that period the board of trade was the department which administered to a great extent the functions that have since passed principally into the hands of the treasury, connected with the fiscal laws of the country."—Mr. Gladstone at Leeds, Oct. 8, 1881. In 1880, writing to Mr. Chamberlain, then president, he says: "If you were to look back to the records of your department thirty-five and forty years ago, you would find

CHAPTER VII

CLOSE OF APPRENTICESHIP

(1839 - 1841)

What are great gifts but the correlative of great work? We are not born for ourselves, but for our kind, for our neighbours, for our country: it is but selfishness, indolence, a perverse fastidiousness, an unmanliness, and no virtue or praise, to bury our talent in a napkin.—Cardinal Newman.

ALONG with his domestic and parliamentary concerns, we are to recognise the ferment that was proceeding in Mr. Gladstone's mind upon new veins of theology; but it was an interior working of feeling and reflection, and went forward without much visible relation to the outer acts and facts of his life during this period. As to those, one entry in the diary (Feb. 1st, 1839) tells a sufficient tale for the next two years. 'I find I have, besides family and parliamentary concerns and those of study, ten committees on hand: Milbank, Society for Propagation of the Gospel, Church Building Metropolis, Church Commercial School, National Schools inquiry and correspondence, Upper Canada, Clergy, Additional Curates' Fund, Carlton Library, Oxford and Cambridge Club. These things distract and dissipate my mind.' Well they might; for in any man with less than Mr. Gladstone's amazing faculty of rapid and powerful concentration, such dispersion must have been disastrous both to effectiveness and to mental progress. As it is, I find little in the way of central facts to remark in either mental history or public action. He strayed away occasionally from the Fathers and their pastures and dipped into the new literature of the hour, associated with names of dawning popularity. Carlyle he found hard to lay down. Some of Emerson, too, he became my mind. 'I cannot,' I said, 'reconcile it to my sense of right to exact from China, as a term of peace, compensation for the opium surrendered to her.' . . . He agreed that it was best to mention it; observed that in consequence of the shape in which the Chinese affair came into the hands of the new government, they would not be wholly unfettered; seemed to hint that under any other circumstances the vice-president of board of trade need not so much mind what was done in the other departments, but remarked that at present every question of foreign relations and many more would be very apt to mix themselves with the department of trade. He thought I had better leave the question suspended.

I hesitated a moment before coming away and said it was only from my anxiety to review what I had said, and to be sure that I had made a clean breast on the subject of my unfitness for the department of trade. Nothing could be more friendly and warm than his whole language and demeanour. It has always been my hope, that I might be able to avoid this class of public employment. On this account I have not endeavoured to train myself for them. The place is very distasteful to me, and what is of more importance, I fear I may hereafter demonstrate the unfitness I have to-day only stated. However, it comes to me, I think, as a matter of plain duty; it may be all the better for not being according to my own bent and leaning; I must forthwith go to work, as a reluctant schoolboy meaning well.

Sept. 3.—This day I went to Claremont to be sworn in. Whenthe council was constructed, the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Liverpool were first called in to take their oaths and seats; then the remaining four followed, Lincoln, Eliot, Ernest Bruce and I. The Queen sat at the head of the table, composed but dejected—one could not but feel for her, all through the ceremonial. We knelt down to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy and stood up to take (I think) the councillor's oath, then kissed the Queen's hand, then went round the table shaking hands with each member, beginning from Prince Albert who sat on the Queen's right, and ending with Lord Wharncliffe on her left. We then sat at the lower end of the table, excepting Lord E. Bruce, who went to his place behind the Queen as vice-was to speak about 8 or 9, could bring him up. Peel of showed him several points with regard to the committee—which he thought might be urged. 'This is very kind in him as a mark of confidence; and assures me that if, as I suspect, he considers my book as likely to bring me into some embarrassment individually, yet he is willing to let me still act under him, and fight my own battles in that matter as best with God's help I may, which is thoroughly fair. It imposes, however, a great responsibility. I was not presumptuous enough to dream of following Sheil; not that his speech is formidable, but the impression it leaves on the House is. I meant to provoke him. A mean man may fire at a tiger, but it requires a strong and bold one to stand his charge; and the longer I live, the more I feel my own (intrinsically) utter powerlessness in the House of Commons. But my principle is this—not to shrink from any such responsibility when laid upon me by a competent person. Sheil, however, did not speak, so I am reserved and may fulfil my own idea, please God, to-night.'

We come now to 'one of the memorable episodes in this vexed decade of our political history. The sullen demon of slavery died hard. The negro still wore about his neck galling links of the broken chain. The transitory stage of apprenticeship was in some respects even harsher than the bondage from which it was to bring deliverance, and the old iniquity only worked in new ways. The pity and energy of the humane at home drove a perplexed and sluggish government to pass an act for dealing with the abominations of the prisons to which the unhappy blacks were committed in Jamaica. The assembly of that island, a planter oligarchy, resented the new law from the mother country as an invasion of their constitutional rights, and stubbornly refused in their exasperation, even after a local dissolution, to perform duties that were indispensable for working the machinery of administration. The cabinet in consequence asked parliament (April 9th) to suspend the constitution of Jamaica for a term of five years. The tory opposition, led by Peel with all his force, aided by the aversion of a section of the liberals to a measure in which they detected however taken the alarm (so to speak) upon the invitation at that time, and been impressed with the idea that it savoured of cabinet office, I considered and consulted on the Chinese question, which I regarded as a serious impediment to office of that description, and I had provisionally contemplated saying to Peel in case he should offer me Ireland with the cabinet, to reply that I would gladly serve his government in the secretaryship, but that I feared his Chinese measures would hardly admit of my acting in the cabinet. I am very sorry now to think that I may have been guilty of an altogether absurd presumption, in dreaming of the But it was wholly suggested by that invitation. And I still think that there must have been some consultation and decision relating to me in the interval between the meetings and the formation of the new ministry, which produced some alteration. . . . In confirmation of the notion I have recorded above, I am distinct in the recollection that there was a shyness in Peel's manner and a downward eye, when he opened the conversation and made the offer, not usual with him in speaking to me.

In after years, he thus described his position when he went to the board of trade:—

I was totally ignorant both of political economy and of the commerce of the country. I might have said, as I believe was said by a former holder of the vice-presidency, that my mind was in regard to all those matters a 'sheet of white paper,' except that it was doubtless coloured by a traditional prejudice of protection, which had then quite recently become a distinctive mark of conservatism. In a spirit of ignorant mortification I said to myself at the moment: the science of politics deals with the government of men, but I am set to govern packages. In my journal for Aug. 2 I find this recorded: 'Since the address meetings' (which were quasi-cabinets) 'the idea of the Irish secretaryship had nestled imperceptibly in my mind.'1

The vice-presidency was the post, by the way, impudently proposed four years later by the whigs to Cobden, after he had taught both whigs and tories their business. Mr. Gladstone, rejoicing and festivity at Hawarden. At the same time and Ch place, Mary Glynne, the younger sister, was married to Lord Lyttelton. Sir Stephen Glynne, their brother, was the ninth, and as was to happen, the last baronet. mother, born Mary Neville, was the daughter of the second Lord Braybrooke and Mary Grenville his wife, sister of the first Marquis of Buckingham. Hence Lady Glynne was one of a historic clan, granddaughter of George Grenville, the minister of American taxation, and niece of William, Lord Grenville, head of the cabinet of All the Talents in 1806. She was first cousin therefore of the younger Pitt, and the Glynnes could boast of a family connection with three prime ministers, or if we choose to add Lord Chatham who married Hester Grenville, with four.1 'I told her,' Mr. Gladstone recorded on this occasion of their engagement (June 8th), 'what was my original destination and desire in life; in what sense and manner I remained in connection with politics. . . . I have given her (led by her questions) these passages for canons of our living:-

¹ Autobiographic note.

> 'Le fronde, onde s'infronda tutto l'orto Dell' Ortolano eterno, am' io cotanto, Quanto da lui a lor di bene è porto.'2

And Dante again—

'In la sua volontade è nostra pace: Ella è quel mare, al qual tutto si muove.'3

In few human unions have the good hopes and fond wishes of a bridal day been better fulfilled or brought deeper and more lasting content. Sixty long years after, Mr. Gladstone said, 'It would not be possible to unfold in words the value of the gifts which the bounty of Providence

Right Hon. George Grenville, Sir W. Wyndham, . Great, great grandfather.

. Great, great, great grandfather. Lord Chatham, . Great, great granduncle-in-law. . First cousin thrice removed. Mr. Pitt,

Lord Grenville, . . Great granduncle.

. Great granduncle. Mr. Grenville,

² Paradiso, xxvi. 64-6—
'Love for each plant that in the garden grows,

Of the Eternal Gardener, I prove, Proportioned to the goodness he bestows.'—Wright.

³ Ibid. iii. 85. See above, p. 215.

¹ Mr. Gladstone compiled this list of the statesmen in the maternal ancestry of his children:—

paragraph; he had read the works from which a mischievous industry had tried to collect means of defaming their author; he found nothing in them in the most distant manner to affect political co-operation; and he signed his name to the letter, 'with an esteem and regard, which are proof against evil-minded attempts to sow jealousy and discord.'

¹ Parker's Peel, ii. pp. 514-17.

to church objects; in the intermediate region he considered himself as having the first tonsure.

Hope urged strongly the principle, 'Let every man abide in the calling---'I thought even over strongly. My belief is that he foregoes the ministry from deeming himself unworthy. . . . The object of my letter to Hope was in part to record on paper my abhorrence of party in the church, whether Oxford party or any other.

March 18th — To-day a meeting at Peel's on the China question; considered in the view of censure upon the conduct of the administration, and a motion will accordingly be made objecting to the attempts to force the Chinese to modify their old relations with us, and to the leaving the superintendent without military It was decided not to move simultaneously in the Lordsparticularly because the radicals would, if there were a double motion, act not on the merits but for the ministry. Otherwise, it seemed to be thought we should carry a motion. The Duke of Wellington said, 'God! if it is carried, they will go,' that they were as near as possible to resignation on the last defeat, and would not Peel said, he understood four ministers were then stand it again. strongly for resigning. The duke also said, our footing in China could not be re-established, unless under some considerable naval and military demonstration, now that matters had gone so far. He appeared pale and shaken, but spoke loud and a good deal, much to the point and with considerable gesticulation. mind's life I never saw more vigorous.

The Chinese question was of the simplest. British subjects insisted on smuggling opium into China in the teeth of Chinese law. The British agent on the spot began war against China for protecting herself against these malpractices. There was no pretence that China was in the wrong, for in fact the British government had sent out orders that the opium-smugglers should not be shielded; but the orders arrived too late, and war having begun, Great Britain felt bound to see it through, with the result that China was compelled to open four ports, to cede Hong Kong, and to pay an indemnity of six hundred thousand So true is it that statesmen have no concern with pater nosters, the Sermon on the Mount, or the vade mecum VOL. T.

taking the place of fantastic follies about foreign dynasties and the balance of power as the true business of the British statesman. On the eve of entering parliament (September 17, 1832), Mr. Gladstone recounts some articles of his creed at the time to his friend Gaskell, and to modern eyes a curious list it is. The first place is given to his views on the relative merits of Pedro, Miguel, Donna Maria, in respect of the throne of Portugal. The second goes to Poland. The third to the affairs of Lombardy. Free trade comes last. This was still the lingering fashion of the moment, and it died hard.

The new ministry contained an unusual number of men of mark and capacity, and they were destined to form a striking group. At their head was a statesman whose fame grows more impressive with time, not the author or inspirer of large creative ideas, but with what is at any rate next best—a mind open and accessible to those ideas, and endowed with such gifts of skill, vigilance, caution, and courage as were needed for the government of a community rapidly passing into a new stage of its social growth. One day in February 1842, he sent for Mr. Gladstone on some occasion of business. Peel happened not to be well, and in the course of the conversation his doctor called. Sir James Graham who had come in, said to his junior in Peel's absence with the physician, 'The pressure upon him is immense. We never had a minister who was so truly a first minister as he is. He makes himself felt in every department, and is really cognisant of the affairs of each. Lord Grey could not master such an amount of business. Canning could not do it. Now he is an actual minister, and is indeed capax imperii.' Next to Peel as parliamentary leaders stood Graham himself and Stanley. They had both of them sat in the cabinet of Lord Grey, and now found themselves the colleagues of the bitterest foes of Grey's administration. we have seen, Mr. Gladstone pronounces Graham to have known more about economic subjects than all the rest of the government put together. Such things had hitherto been left to men below the first rank in the hierarchy of public office, like Huskisson. Pedro and Miguel held the field.

May 14th.—Consulted [various persons] on opium. All but Sir (R. Inglis were on grounds of prudence against its [a motion _ against the compensation demanded from China] being brought forward. To this majority of friendly and competent persons I have given way, I hope not wrongfully; but I am in dread of the judgment of God upon England for our national iniquity towards It has been to me matter of most painful and anxious consideration. I yielded specifically to this; the majority of the persons most trustworthy feel that to make the motion would, our leaders being in such a position and disposition with respect to it, injure the cause. June 1st. Meeting of the Society for Suppression of the Slave Trade. [This was the occasion of a speech from Prince Albert, who presided.] Exeter Hall crammed is really a grand spectacle. Samuel Wilberforce a beautiful speaker; in some points resembles Macaulay. Peel excellent. June 12th.—This evening I voted for the Irish education grant; on the ground that in its principle, according to Lord Stanley's letter, it is identical practically with the English grant of '33-8, and I might have added with the Kildare Place grant. To exclude doctrine from exposition is in my judgment as truly a mutilation of scripture, as to omit bodily portions of the sacred volume.

His first child and eldest son was born (June 3), and Manning and Hope became his godfathers; these two were Mr. Gladstone's most intimate friends at this period. Social diversions were never wanting. One June afternoon he went down to Greenwich, 'Grillion's fish dinner to the Speaker. 'Great merriment; and an excellent speech from Stanley, "good sense and good nonsense." A modest one from Morpeth. But though we dined at six, these expeditions do not suit me. I am ashamed of paying £2, 10s. for a dinner. But on this occasion the object was to do honour to a dignified and impartial Speaker.' He had been not at all grateful, by the way, for the high honour of admission to Grillion's dining club this year,—'a thing quite alien to my temperament, which requires more soothing and domestic appliances after the feverish and consuming excitements of party life; but the rules of society oblige me to submit.' As it happened, so narrow is man's foreknow-interfered only in the colonial part of it in connection with __ the colonies and the slave trade to Porto Rico and Brazil. We West Indians were now great philanthropists! When Sir Robert Peel assumed the government he had become deeply committed to protection, which in the last two or three years had become the subject of a commanding controversy. I suppose that at Newark I followed suit, but I have no records. On the change of government Peel, with much judgment, offered me the vice-presidentship of the board of trade. On sound principles of party discipline, I took the office at once; and having taken it I set to work with all my might as a worker. In a very short time I came to form a low estimate of the knowledge and information of Lord Ripon; and of the cabinet Sir James Graham, I think, knew most. And now the stones of which my protectionism was built up-began to get uncomfortably loose. When we came to the question of the tariff, we were all nearly on a par in ignorance, and we had a very bad adviser in Macgregor, secretary to the board of trade. But I had the advantage of being able to apply myself with an undivided attention. My assumption of office at the board of trade was followed by hard, steady, and honest work; and every day so spent beat like a battering ram on the unsure fabric of my official protectionism. By the end of the year I was far gone in the opposite sense. I had to speak much on these questions in the session of 1842, but it was always done with great moderation.

II

The case on the accession of the new ministers was difficult. Peel himself has drawn the picture. By incompetent finance, by reckless colonial expenditure, by solving political difficulties through gifts or promises of cash from the British treasury, by war and foreign relations hovering on the verge of war and necessitating extended preparations, the whigs had brought the national resources into an embarrassment that was extreme. The accumulated deficits of five years had become a heavy incubus, and the deficit of 1842-3 was likely to be not less than two and a half millions more. Commerce and manufactures were languishing. Distress

Again went over and got up the subject of opium compensation as it respects the Chinese. I spoke thereon 1½ hours for the liberation of my conscience, and to afford the friends of peace opposite an opportunity, of which they would not avail themselves.

In August he tells Mrs. Gladstone how he has been to dine with 'such an odd party at the Guizots'; Austin, radical lawyer; John Mill, radical reviewer; M. Gaskell, Monckton Milnes, Thirlwall, new Bishop of St. David's, George Lewis, poor law commissioner. Not very ill mixed, however. The host is extremely nice.' An odd party indeed; it comprised four at least of the strongest heads in England, and two of the most illustrious names of all the century in Europe.

In March (1840) Mr. Gladstone and Lord Lyttelton went to Eton together to fulfil the ambitious functions of examiner for the Newcastle scholarship. In thanking Mr. Gladstone for his services, Hawtrey speaks of the advantage of public men of his stamp undertaking such duties in the good cause of the established system of education, 'as against the nonsense of utilitarians and radicals.' The questions ran in the familiar mould in divinity, niceties of ancient grammar. obscurities of classical construction, caprices of vocabulary, and all the other points of the old learning. The general merit Mr. Gladstone found 'beyond anything possible or conceivable' when he was a boy at Eton a dozen years before:—

We sit with the boys (39 in number) and make about ten hours a day in looking over papers with great minuteness. . . . Although it is in quantity hard work, it is lightened by a warm interest, and the refreshment of early love upon a return to this sweet place. It is work apart from human passion, and is felt as a moral relaxation, though it is not one in any other sense. . . . This is a curious experience to me, of jaded body and mind refreshed. I propose for Latin theme a little sentence of Burke's which runs to this effect, 'Flattery corrupts both the receiver and the giver; and adulation is not of more service to the people than to kings.' April 2nd.— The statistics become excessively interesting. Henry Hallam gained, and now stands second [the brother of his dead friend]. April 3rd.—In, 6 hours; out, from 4 to 5 hours more upon the first invasion upon the old tory corn law of 1827. Peel from the beginning appreciated the powers of his keen and zealous lieutenant, and even in the autumn of 1841 he had taken him into confidential counsel. Besides a letter of observations on the general scheme of commercial freedom, Mr. Gladstone prepared for the prime minister a special paper on the corn laws.

The ordinary business of the department soon fell into my hands to transact with the secretaries, one of them Macgregor, a loose-minded free trader, and the other Lefevre, a clear and scientific one. In that autumn I became possessed with the desire to relax the corn law, which formed, I believe, the chief subject of my meditations. Hence followed an important consequence. Very slow in acquiring relative and secondary knowledge and honestly absorbed in my work, I simply thought on and on as to what was right and fair under the circumstances.

In January 1842, as the session approached, they came to close quarters. The details of all the mysteries of protectionist iniquity we may well spare ourselves. Peel, feeling the pulse of his agricultural folk, thought it would never do to give them less than a ten-shilling duty, when the price of wheat was at sixty-two shillings the quarter; while Mr. Gladstone thought a twelve-shilling duty at a price of sixty far too low a relief to the consumer. His eyes were beginning to be opened.

Feb. 2.—I placed in Sir R. Peel's hands a long paper on the corn law in the month of November, which, on wishing to refer to it, he could not find; and he requested me to write out afresh my argument upon the value of a rest or dead level, and the part of the scale of price at which it should arrive; this I did.

On Monday I wrote another paper arguing for a rest between 60/ and 70/ or thereabouts; and yesterday a third intended to show that the present law has been in practice fully equivalent to a prohibition up to 70/. Lord Ripon then told me the cabinet had adopted Peel's scale as it originally stood—and seemed to absence for the winter is a great blow. Were he to be at home I of do not doubt that great progress might be made. In the kirk toil and trouble, double, double, the fires burn and cauldrons bubble: and though I am not sanguine as to very speedy or extensive resumption by the church of her spiritual rights, she may have a great part to play. At present she is very weakly manned, and this is the way I think to strengthen the crew.

¹ The editor of Sir Robert Peel's papers was allowed to print three or four of Mr. Gladstone's letters to his Parker, ii. pp. 497-517, 519, 520.

The scheme expanded as time went on. His father threw himself into it with characteristic energy and generosity, contributing many thousand pounds, for the sum required greatly exceeded the modest figure above mentioned. Gladstone conducted a laborious and sometimes vexatious correspondence in the midst of more important public cares. Plans were mature, and adequate funds were forthcoming, and in the autumn of 1842 Hope and the two Gladstones made what they found an agreeable tour, examining the various localities for a site, and finally deciding on a spot on a mountain-stream, ten miles from Perth, at the very gate of the highlands.' It was 1846 before the college at Glenalmond was opened for its destined purposes.1 We all know examples of men holding opinions with trenchancy, decision, and even a kind of fervour, and yet with no strong desire to spread them. Mr. Gladstone was at all times of very different temper; consumed with missionary energy and the fire of ardent propagandism.

He laboured hard at the fourth edition of his book, sometimes getting eleven hours of work, 'a good day as times go,'—Montesquieu, Burke, Bacon, Clarendon, and others of the masters of civil and historic wisdom being laid under ample contribution. By Christmas he was at Hawarden. In January he made a speech at a meeting held in Liverpool for the foundation of a church union, and a few days later he hurried off to Walsall to help his brother John, then the tory candidate, and a curious incident happened:—

I either provided myself, or I was furnished from headquarters, with a packet of pamphlets in favour of the corn laws. These I

¹ The reader who eares for further particulars may eonsult the Memoirs of J. R. Hope-Scott, i. pp. 248, 281-8; and ii. p. 291.

I have been much struck (he wrote, Feb. 26) throughout the private discussions connected with the new project of a corn law, by the tenacity with which Sir Robert Peel, firstly by adhering in every point to the old arrangements where it seemed at all possible, and since the announcement of the plan to parliament, by steadily resisting changes in any part of the resolutions, has narrowed the ground and reduced in number the points of attack, and thus made his measure practicable in the face of popular excitement and a strong opposition. 'Until we were actually in the midst of the struggle, I did not appreciate the extraordinary sagacity of his parliamentary instinct in this particular. He said yesterday to Lord Ripon and to me, 'Among ourselves, in this room, I have no hesitation in saying, that if I had not had to look to other than abstract considerations. I would have proposed a lower protection. But it would have done no good to push the matter so far as to drive Knatchbull out of the cabinet after the Duke of Buckingham, nor could I hope to pass a measure with greater reductions through the House of Lords.'

When Lord John Russell proposed an amendment substituting an eight shilling duty for a sliding scale, Peel asked Mr. Gladstone to reply to him. 'This I did (Feb. 14, 1842),' he says, 'and with my whole heart, for I did not yet fully understand the vicious operation of the sliding scale on the corn trade, and it is hard to see how an eight-shilling duty could even then have been maintained.'

III

The three centres of operations were the corn bill, then the bill imposing the income-tax, and finally the reform of the duties upon seven hundred and fifty out of the twelve hundred articles that swelled the tariff. The corn bill was the most delicate, the tariff the most laborious, the incometax the boldest, the most fraught alike with peril for the hour and with consequences of pith and moment for the future. It is hardly possible for us to realise the general horror in which this hated impost was then enveloped. The fact of Brougham procuring the destruction of all the public books and papers in which its odious accounts were recorded, in London.1 Though he speaks of being overwhelmed by (domestic business, and he was undoubtedly hard beset by all the demands of early housekeeping, yet he very speedily recovered his balance. He resisted now and always as jealously as he could those promiscuous claims on time and attention by which men of less strenuous purpose suffer the effectiveness of their lives to be mutilated. 'I well know,' he writes to his young wife who was expecting him to join her at Hagley, 'you would not have me come on any conditions with which one's sense of duty could not be quieted, and would (I hope) send me back by the next train. These delays are to you a practical exemplification of the difficulty of reconciling domestic and political engagements. The case is one that scarcely admits of compromise; the least that is required in order to the fulfilment of one's duty is constant bodily presence in London until the fag-end of the session is fairly reached.'

Here are a few examples of the passing days:-

March 12th, 1841.—Tracts for the Times, No. 90; ominous. March 13th.—Went to see Reform Club. Sat to Bradley 21-4. London Library committee. Carlton Library committee. Corrected two proof-sheets. Conversed an hour and a half with Mr. Richmond, who came to tea, chiefly on my plan for a picture-life of Christ. Chess with C. [his wife.] March 14th (Sunday).—Communion (St. James's), St. Margaret's afternoon. Wrote on Ephes. v. 1, and read it aloud to servants. March 20th.—City to see Freshfield. What an image, what a Afternoon service in Saint Paul's. crowd of images! Amidst the unceasing din, and the tumult of men hurrying this way and that for gold, or pleasure, or some self-desire, the vast fabric thrusts itself up to heaven and firmly plants itself on soil begrudged to an occupant that yields no lucre. But the city cannot thrust forth its cathedral; and from thence arises the harmonious measured voice of intercession from day to day. The church praying and deprecating continually for the living mass that are dead while they live, from out of the very

¹ His first house was 13 Carlton House Terrace, then his father gave him 6 Carlton Gardens. In 1856 he purchased 11 Carlton House Terrace,

Mr. Gladstone was called upon to handle a mass of questions that were both of extreme complexity in them-selves, and also involved collision with trade interests always easily alarmed, irritated, and even exasperated. With merchants and manufacturers, importers and exporters, brokers and bankers, with all the serried hosts of British trade, with the laws and circumstances of international commerce, he was every day brought into close, detailed, and responsible contact:-Whether the duty on straw bonnets should go by weight or by number; what was the difference between boot-fronts at six shillings per dozen pairs and a 15per cent. duty ad valorem; how to distinguish the regulus of tin from mere ore, and how to fix the duty on copper ore so as not to injure the smelter; how to find an adjustment between the liquorice manufacturers of London and the liquorice growers of Pontefract; what was the special case for muscatels as distinct from other raisins; whether 110 pounds of ship biscuits would be a fair deposit for taking out of bond 100 pounds of wheat if not kiln-dried, or 96 pounds if kilndried; whether there ought to be uniformity between hides and skins. He applies to Cornewall Lewis, then a poor-law commissioner, not on the astronomy of the ancients or the truth of early Roman history, but to find out for a certain series of years past the contract price of meat in workhouses. He listens to the grievances of the lath-renders; of the coopers who complain that casks will come in too cheap; of the coal-whippers, and the frame-work knitters; and he examines the hard predicament of the sawyers, who hold government answerable both for the fatal competition of machinery and the displacement of wood by iron. 'These deputations,' he says, 'were invaluable to me, for by constant close questioning I learned the nature of their trades, and armed with this admission to their interior, made careful notes and became able to defend in debate the propositions of the tariff and to show that the respective businesses would be carried on and not ruined as they said. I have ever since said that deputations are most admirable aids for the transaction of public business, provided the receiver of them is allowed to fix the occasion and the stage at which they appear.'

side. The cabinet, with a tenacity incredible in our own day, owere still for holding on until their whole scheme, with the popular element of cheap bread in it, was fully before the country. Peel immediately countered them by a vote of want of confidence, and this was carried (June 4) by a majority of one:—

On Saturday morning the division in the House of Commons presented a scene of the most extraordinary excitement. While we were in our lobby we were told that we were 312 and the government either 311 or 312. It was also known that they had brought down Lord ---- who was reported to be in a state of total idiocy. After returning to the House I went to sit near the bar, where the other party were coming in. We had all been counted, 312, and the tellers at the government end had counted to 308; there remained behind this unfortunate man, reclining in a chair, evidently in total unconsciousness of what was proceeding. Loud cries had been raised from our own side, when it was seen that he was being brought up, to clear the bar that the whole House might witness the scene, and every one stood up in intense curiosity. There were now only this figure, less human even than an automaton, and two persons, R. Stuart, and E. Ellice pushing the chair in which he lay. A loud cry of 'Shame, Shame,' burst from our side; those opposite were silent. Those three were counted without passing the tellers, and the moment after we saw that our tellers were on the right in walking to the table, indicating that we had won. Fremantle gave out the numbers, and then the intense excitement raised by the sight we had witnessed found vent in our enthusiastic (quite irregular) hurrah with great waving of hats. Upon looking back I am sorry to think how much I partook in the excitement that prevailed; but how could it be otherwise in so extraordinary a case? I thought Lord John's a great speech-it was delivered too under the pressure of great indisposition. He has risen with adversity. He seemed rather below par as a leader in 1835 when he had a clear majority, and the ball nearly at his foot; in each successive year the strength of his government has sunk and his own has risen.

Then came the dissolution, and an election memorable in that the capacity to make such exertions is combined in his case with such purity of heart and integrity of conduct.

More than fifty years later in offering to a severe opponent magnanimous congratulations in debate on his son's successful maiden speech, Mr. Gladstone said he knew how refreshing to a father's heart such good promise must ever be. And in his own instance Peel's generous and considerate letter naturally drew from John Gladstone a worthy and feeling response:—

John Gladstone to Sir R. Peel.

June 17.—The receipt last evening of your kind letter of yesterday filled my eyes with tears of gratitude to Almighty God, for having given me a son whose conduct in the discharge of his public duties has received the full approbation of one, who of all men, is so well qualified to form a correct judgment of his merits. Permit me to offer you my most sincere thanks for this truly acceptable testimonial, which I shall carefully preserve. William is the youngest of my four sons; in the conduct of all of them, I have the greatest cause for thankfulness, for neither have ever caused me a pang. He excels his brothers in talent, but not so in soundness of principles, habits of usefulness, or integrity of My eldest, as you are aware, has again, and in a most satisfactory manner, got into parliament. To have the third also again there, whilst the services of naval men, circumstanced as he is, who seek unsuccessfully for employment, are not required, we are desirous to effect, and wait for a favourable opportunity to accomplish. Whenever we may succeed, I shall consider my cup to be filled, for the second is honourably and usefully engaged as a merchant in Liverpool, occupying the situation I held there for so many years.

It was while they were in office that Peel wrote from Windsor to beg Mr. Gladstone to sit for his portrait to Lucas, the same artist who had already painted Graham for him. 'I shall be very glad of this addition to the gallery of the eminent men of my own time.'

It was evident that Mr. Gladstone's admission to the cabinet could not be long deferred, and in the spring of the test in which Sir Stephen Glynne was candidate for the representation of Flintshire, but 'bribery, faggotry, abduction, personation, riot, factious delays, landlord's intimidations, partiality of authorities,' carried the day, and to the bitter dismay of Hawarden, Sir Stephen was narrowly beaten. One ancient dame, overwhelmed by the defeat of the family that for eighty years she had idolised, cried aloud to Mrs. Gladstone, 'I am a great woman for thinking of the Lord, but O, my dear lady, this has put it all out of my head.' The election involved him in what would now be thought a whimsical correspondence with one of the Grosvenor family, who complained of Mr. Gladstone for violating the sacred canons of electioneering etiquette by canvassing Lord Westminster's tenants. 'I did think,' says the wounded patrician, 'that interference between a landlord with whose opinions you were acquainted and his tenants was not justifiable according to those laws of delicacy and propriety which I considered binding in such cases.'

At last he was able to snatch a holiday with his wife and child by the seaside at Hoylake, which rather oddly struck him as being like Pæstum without the temples. He read away at Gibbon and Dante until he went to Hawarden, partly to consider the state of its financial affairs; as to these something is to be said later. 'Walked alone in the Hawarden grounds,' he says one day during his stay; 'ruminated on the last-named subject [accounts], also on anticipated changes [in government]. I can digest the crippled religious action of the state; but I cannot be a party to exacting by blood opium compensation from the Chinese.' Then to London (Aug. 18). He attended the select party meetings at Sir Robert Peel's and Lord Aberdeen's. Dining at Grillion's he heard Stanley, speaking of the new parliament, express a high opinion of Roebuck as an able man and clear speaker, likely to make a figure; and also of Cobden as a resolute perspicacious man, familiar with all the turns of his subject; and when the new House assembled, he had made up his mind for himself that 'Cobden will be a worrying man on corn.' This was Cobden's first entry into the House. At last the whigs were put out intimated that the Duke of Wellington had surrendered his opinion (I think) upon the boundary question; and he referred to the change in his own views, and said that in future he questioned whether he could undertake the defence of the corn laws on principle. His words were addressed to a sympathising hearer. My speeches in the House had already excited dissatisfaction if not dismay.

Then came something about the preservation of the two bishoprics in North Wales. To Mr. Gladstone's surprise, Peel reckoned this a more serious matter, as it involved a practical course. After much had been said on the topic, Mr. Gladstone asked for a day or two to consider the question. 'I have to consider with God's help by Monday whether to enter the cabinet or to retire altogether: at least such is probably the second alternative.' He wished to consult Hope and Manning, and they, upon discussion, urged that the point was too narrow on which to join issue with the government. This brought him round. 'I well remember,' he says of this early case of compromise, 'that I pleaded against them that I should be viewed as a traitor, and they observed to me in reply that I must be prepared for that if necessary, that (and indeed I now feel) in these times the very wisest and most effective servants of any cause must necessarily fall so far short of the popular sentiment of its friends, as to be liable constantly to incur mistrust and even abuse. But patience and the power of character overcome all these difficulties. I am certain that Hope and Manning in 1843 were not my tempters but rather my good angels.'2

Peel had been in parliament as long, and almost as long in office, as Mr. Gladstone had lived, but experience of public life enlarges the man of high mind, and Peel, while perhaps he wondered at his junior's bad sense of proportion, changed, and a hostile cry was raised before the death of the Bishop of St. Asaph, when its provisions would come into force. On his death in 1846 the whig ministry gave way and the sees remained separate.

² Mr. Gladstone to Lord Lyttelton,

Dec. 30, 1845.

¹ The question of the Welsh bishopries was one of a certain magnitude in its day. The union of Bangor and St. Asaph had been provided for by parliament in 1836, with a view to form a new see at Manchester. The measure was passed with the general assent of the episeopal bench and the church at large. But sentiment soon

He resumed, 'If there be any other arrangement that you would prefer, my value and "affectionate regard" for you would make me most desirous to effect it so far as the claims of others would permit. To be perfectly frank and unreserved, I should tell you, that there are many reasons which would have made me wish to send you to Ireland; but upon the whole I think that had better not be done. Some considerations connected with the presbyterians of Ireland make me prefer on the whole that we should adopt a different plan.1. Then, if I had had the exchequer, I should have asked you to be financial secretary to the treasury; but under the circumstances I have mentioned, that would be an office of secondary importance and I am sure you will not estimate that I now propose to you by the mere name which it bears.' He also made an allusion to the admiralty of which I do not retain the exact form. But I rather interposed and said, 'My objection on the score of fitness would certainly apply with even increased force to anything connected with the military and naval services of the country, for of them I know nothing. Nor have I any other object in view; there is no office to which I could designate myself. I think it my duty to act upon your judgment as to my qualifications. If it be your deliberate wish to make me vice-president of the board of trade, I will not decline it; I will endeavour to put myself into harness, and to prepare myself for the place in the best manner I can; but it really is an apprenticeship.' He said, 'I hope you will be content to act upon the sense which others entertain of your suitableness for this office in particular, and I think-it will be a good arrangement both with a view to the present conduct of business and to the brilliant destinies which I trust are in store for you.' answered, that I was deeply grateful for his many acts of confidence and kindness; and that I would at once assent to the plan he had proposed, only begging him to observe that I had mentioned my unfitness under a very strong sense of duty and of the facts, and not by any means as a mere matter I then added that I thought I should but ill respond to his confidence if I did not mention to him a subject connected with his policy which might raise a difficulty in grounded on reasons. Therefore no case for interference.

VOL. I. Q

¹ I suppose this points to incombetween protestant Ulster and a patibility in the fevers of the hour Puseyite chief secretary.

(The duke, however, was for issuing a proclamation.) May 20.—Second [cabinet] Repeal. Constabulary tainted.' It would be safe to say of any half dozen consecutive meetings of the Queen's servants, taken at random during the reign, that Ireland would be certain to crop up. Still, protection was the burning question. From one cause or another, said Mr. Gladstone looking back to these times, 'my reputation among the conservatives on the question of protection oozed away with rapidity. It died with the year 1842, and early in 1843 a duke, I think the Duke of Richmond, speaking in the House of Lords, described some renegade proceeding as a proceeding conducted under the banner of the vice-president of the board of trade.' He was not always as careful as Peel, and sometimes came near to a scrape.

In my speech on Lord Howick's motion (Mar. 10, 1843) I was supposed to play with the question, and prepare the way for a departure from the corn law of last year, and I am sensible that I so far lost my head, as not to put well together the various, and, if taken separately, conflicting considerations which affect the question. . . . It so happens that I spoke under the influence of a new and most sincere conviction, having reference to the recent circumstances of commercial legislation abroad, to the effect that it would not be wise to displace British labour for the sake of cheap corn, without the counteracting and sustaining provisions which exchange, not distorted by tariffs all but prohibitory, would supply. . . . This, it is clear, is a slippery position for a man who does not think firmly in the midst of ambiguous and adverse cheering, and I did my work most imperfectly, but I do think honestly. Sir R. Peel's manner, by negative signs, showed that he thought either my ground insecure or my expressions dangerous.

The situation was essentially artificial. There was little secret of the surrender of protection as a principle. In introducing the proposals for the reform of the customs tariff, Peel made the gentlemen around him shiver by openly declaring that on the general principle of free trade there chamberlain. Then the chancellor first and next the Duke of C Buckingham were sworn to their respective offices. C. Greville forgot the duke's privy seal and sent him off without it; the Queen corrected him and gave it. . . Then were read and approved several orders in council; among which was one assigning a district to a church and another appointing Lord Ripon and me to act in matters of trade. These were read aloud by the Queen in a very clear though subdued voice; and she repeated 'Approved' after each. Upon that relating to Lord R. and myself we were called up and kissed hands again. Then the Queen rose, as did all the members of the council, and retired bowing. had luncheon in the same room half an hour later and went off. The Duke of Wellington went in an open carriage with a pair; all our other grand people with four. Peel looked shy all through. I visited Claremont once before, 27 years ago I think, as a child, to see the place, soon after the Princess Charlotte's death. corresponded pretty much with my impressions.

He secured his re-election at Newark on September 14 without opposition, and without trouble, beyond the pressure of a notion rooted in the genial mind of his constituency that as master of the mint he would have an unlimited command of public coin for all purposes whether general or particular. His reflections upon his ministerial position are of much biographic interest. He had evidently expected inclusion in the cabinet:—

Sept. 16.—Upon quietly reviewing past times, and the degree of confidence which Sir Robert Peel had for years, habitually I may say, reposed in me, and especially considering its climax, in my being summoned to the meetings immediately preceding the debate on the address in August, I am inclined to think, after allowing for the delusions of self love, that there is not a perfect correspondence between the tenor of the past on the one hand, and my present appointment and the relations in which it places me to the administration on the other. He may have made up his mind at those meetings that I was not qualified for the consultations of a government, nor would there be anything strange in this, except the supposition that he had not seen it before. Having and was evidently conscious at the close, of what no one could deny, that he had made a deep impression on the House.'

IV

Mr. Gladstone kept pretty closely in step with his leader. From Sir Robert he slowly learned lessons of circumspection that may not seem congenial to his temperament, though for that matter we should remember all through that his temperament was double. He was of opinion, as he told the House of Commons, that a sliding scale, a fixed duty, and free trade were all three open to serious objection. He regarded the defects of the existing law as greatly exaggerated, and he refused to admit that the defects of the law, whatever they might be, were fatal to every law with a sliding-scale. He wished to relieve the consumer, to steady the trade, to augment foreign commerce, and the demand for labour connected with commerce. On the other hand he desired to keep clear of the countervailing evils of disturbing either vast capitals invested in land, or the immense masses of labour employed in agriculture.1 He noted with some complacency, that during the great controversy of 1846 and following years, he never saw any parliamentary speech of his own quoted in proof of the inconsistency of the Peelites Here are a couple of entries from Lord Broughton's diary for 1844:—'June 17. Brougham said 'Gladstone was a d-d fellow, a prig, and did much mischief to the government, alluding to his speech about keeping sugar duties. June 27. Gladstone made a decided agricultural protection speech, and was lauded therefor by Miles—so the rebels were returning to their allegiance.' Gladstone's arguments somebody said, were in favour of free trade, and his parentheses were in favour of protection.

Well might the whole position be called as slippery a one as ever occurred in British politics. It was by the principles of free trade that Peel and his lieutenant justified tariff-reform; and they indirectly sapped protection in general by dwelling on the mischiefs of minor forms of at least, was quick to learn the share of 'packages' in the government of men.

¹ Hansard, February 14, 1842.

Sept. 30.—Closing the month, and a period of two years comprehended within this book, I add a few words. My position is changed by office. In opposition I was frequently called, or sometimes at least, to the confidential councils of the party on a variety of subjects. In office, I shall of course have to do with the department of trade and with little or nothing beyond. There is some point in the query of the Westminster Review: Whether my appointments are a covert satire? But they bring great advantages; much less responsibility, much less anxiety. I could not have made myself answerable for what I expect the cabinet will do in It must be admitted that it presents an odd appearance, when a person whose mind and efforts have chiefly ranged within the circle of subjects connected with the church, is put into office of the most different description. It looks as if the first object were to neutralise his mischievous tendencies. But I am in doubt whether to entertain this supposition would be really a compliment to the discernment of my superiors, or a breach of charity; therefore it is best not entertained.

Paragraphs appeared in newspapers imputing to Mr. Gladstone a strong reprobation of the prime minister's opinions upon church affairs, and he thought it worth while to write to Sir Robert a strong (and most excessively lengthy) disclaimer of being, among other things, an object of hope to unbending tories as against their moderate and cautious leader. 'Should party spirit,' he went on, 'run very high against your commercial measures, I have no doubt that the venom of my religious opinions will be plentifully alleged to have infused itself into your policy even in that direction, . . . and more than ever will be heard of your culpability in taking into office a person of my bigoted and extreme sentiments.' Peel replied (October 19, 1841) with kindness and good sense. He had not taken the trouble to read the history nearer to their own time. They knew that Lord John had a right to revive the unforgotten contrast between Peel's rejection of so-called protestant securities in 1817 and 1825, and the total surrender of emancipation in 1829. Natural forebodings darkened their souls that protectionism would soon share the fate of protestantism, and that capitulation to Cobden was doomed to follow the old scandal of capitulation to O'Connell. They felt that there was something much more dreadful than the mere sting of a parliamentary recrimination, in the contrast between the corn bill of 1842 and Peel's panegyrics in '39, '40, and '41 on the very system which that bill now shattered. On the other side some could not forget that in 1840 the whig prime minister, the head of a party still even at the eleventh hour unregenerated by Manchester, predicted a violent struggle as the result of the Manchester policy, stirring society to its foundations, kindling bitter animosities not easy to quench, and creating convulsions as fierce as those of the Reform bill.

¹ It would appear from the manuscript at the British Museum, that Macaulay's sentence about Mr. Gladstone as the rising hope of the stern

and unbending torics, which later events made long so famous and so tiresome, was a happy afterthought, written in along the margin.

A situation so precarious and so unedifying was sure to lead to strange results in the relations of parties and leaders. In July 1843 the Speaker told Hobhouse that Peel had lost all following and authority; all but votes. Hobhouse meeting a tory friend told him that Sir Robert had got nothing but his majority. 'He won't have that long,' the tory replied. 'Who will make sacrifices for such a fellow? They call me a frondeur, but there are many such. Peel thinks he can govern by Fremantle and a little clique, but it will not do. The first election that comes, out he must go.' Melbourne, only half in jest, was reported to talk of begging Peel to give him timely notice, lest the Queen might take him by surprise. On one occasion Hobhouse wished a secondary minister to tell Sir Robert how much he admired a certain speech. 'I!' exclaimed the minister; 'he would kick me away if I dared to speak to him.' 'A man,' Hobhouse observes, 'who will not take a civil truth from a subaltern is but a sulky fellow after all; there is no true dignity or pride in such reserve.' Oddly enough, Lord John was complaining just as loudly about the same time of his own want of hold upon his party.

CHAPTER VIII

PEEL'S GOVERNMENT

(1842-1844)

In many of the most important rules of public policy Sir R. Peel's government surpassed generally the governments which have succeeded it, whether liberal or conservative. Among them I would mention purity in patronage, financial strictness, loyal adherence to the principle of public economy, jealous regard to the rights of parliament, a single eye to the public interest, strong aversion to extension of territorial responsibilities and a frank admission of the rights of foreign countries as equal to those of their own.—Mr. Gladstone (1880).1

Of the four or five most memorable administrations of the century, the great conservative government of Sir Robert Peel was undoubtedly one. It laid the groundwork of our solid commercial policy, it established our railway system, it settled the currency, and, by no means least, it gave us a good national character in Europe as lovers of moderation, equity, and peace. Little as most members of the new cabinet saw it, their advent definitely marked the rising dawn of an economic era. If you had to constitute new societies, Peel said to Croker, then you might on moral and social grounds prefer cornfields to cotton factories, and you might like an agricultural population better than a manufacturing; as it was, the national lot was east, and statesmen were powerless to turn back the tide. The food of the people, their clothing, the raw material for their industry, their education, the conditions under which women and children were suffered to toil, markets for the products of loom and forge and furnace and mechanic's shop,—these were slowly making their way into the central field of political vision, and ing the Nottingham lace makers and the flax-spinners of the north of Ireland, had become neutral. Only a very limited portion of the trade was any longer subject to restriction, and Mr. Gladstone, after due consultation with superior ministers, proposed a bill for removing the prohibition altogether. He also brought in a bill (April 1844) for the regulation of companies. It was when he was president of the board of trade that the first Telegraph Act was passed. 'I was well aware,' he wrote, 'of the advantage of taking them into the hands of the government, but I was engaged in a plan which contemplated the ultimate acquisition of the railways by the public, and which was much opposed by the railway companies, so that to have attempted taking the telegraphs would have been hopeless. The bill was passed, but the executive machinery two years afterwards broke down.'

¹ Undated fragment of letter to the Queen. Sec Appendix.

Questions that do not fall within the contentions of party usually cut a meagre figure on the page of the historian, and the railway policy of this decade is one of those questions. It was settled without much careful deliberation or foresight, and may be said in the main to have shaped itself. At the time when Mr. Gladstone presided over the department of trade, an immense extension of the railway system was seen to be certain, and we may now smile at what then seemed the striking novelty of such a prospect. Mr. Gladstone proposed a select committee on the subject, guided its deliberations, drew its reports, and framed the bill that was founded upon them. He dwelt upon the favour now beginning to be shown to the new roads by the owners of land through which they were to pass, so different from the stubborn resistance that had for long been offered; upon the cheapened cost of construction; upon the growing disposition to employ redundant capital in making railways, instead of running the risks that had made foreign investment so disastrous. It was not long, indeed, before this very disposition led to a mania that was even more widely disastrous than any foreign investment had been since the days of the

¹ See Speech, Aug. 10, 1843.

Mr. Gladstone's own position is described in an auto- C biographic fragment of his last years:—

When I entered parliament in 1832, the great controversy between protection or artificial restraint and free trade, of which Cobden was the leading figure, did not enter into the popular controversies of the day, and was still in the hands of the philosophers. My father was an active and effective local politician, and the protectionism which I inherited from him and from all my youthful associations was qualified by a thorough acceptance of the important preliminary measures of Mr. Huskisson, of whom he was the first among the local supporters. Moreover, for the first six years or so of my parliamentary life free trade was in no way a party question, and it only became strictly such in 1841 at, and somewhat before, the general election, when the whig government, in extremis, proposed a fixed duty upon corn. My mind was in regard to it a sheet of white paper, but I accepted the established conditions in the lump, and could hardly do otherwise. In 1833 only, the question was debated in the House of Commons, and the speech of the mover against the corn laws made me uncomfortable. But the reply of Sir James Graham restored my peace of mind. I followed the others with a languid interest. Yet I remember being struck with the essential unsoundness of the argument of Mr. Villiers. It was this. Under the present corn law our trade, on which we depend, is doomed, for our manufacturers cannot possibly contend with the manufacturers of the continent if they have to pay wages regulated by the protection price of food, while their rivals pay according to the natural or free trade price. The answer was obvious. 'Thank you. We quite understand you. Your object is to get down the wages of your workpeople.' It was Cobden who really set the argument on its legs; and it is futile to compare any other man with him as the father of our system of free trade.

I had in 1840 to dabble in this question, and on the wrong side of it.¹... The matter passed from my mind, full of churches and church matters, in which I was now gradually acquiring knowledge. In 1841 the necessities of the whig government led to a further development of the great controversy; but I

¹ See above, p. 232.

CHAPTER IX

MAYNOOTH

(1844-1845)

When I consider how munificently the colleges of Cambridge and Oxford are endowed, and with what pomp religion and learning are there surrounded; . . . when I remember what was the faith of Edward III. and of Henry VI., of Margaret of Anjou and Margaret of Richmond, of William of Wykeham and William of Waynefleet, of Archbishop Chiehele and Cardinal Wolsey; when I remember what we have taken from the Roman catholics, King's College, New College, Christ Church, my own Trinity; and when I look at the miserable Dotheboys' Hall which we have given them in exchange, I feel, I must own, less proud than I could wish of being a protestant and a Cambridge man.—Macaulay.

In pursuit of the policy of conciliation with which he was now endeavouring to counter O'Connell, Peel opened to his colleagues in 1844 a plan for dealing with the sum annually voted by parliament to the seminary for the training of catholic clergy at Maynooth. The original grant was made by the Irish parliament, protestant as it was; and was accepted even by anti-catholic leaders after 1800 as virtually a portion of the legislative union with Ireland. Peel's proposal, by making an annual grant permanent, by tripling the amount, by incorporating the trustees, established a new and closer connection between the state and the college. It was one of the boldest things he ever did. What Lord Aberdeen wrote to Madame de Lieven in 1852 was hardly a whit less true in 1845: 'There is more intense bigotry in England at this moment than in any other country in Europe.' Peel said to Mr. Gladstone at the beginning of 1845—'I wish to speak without any reserve, and I ought to tell you, I think it will very probably be fatal to the was terrible. Poor-rates were mounting, and grants-in-aid would extend impoverishment from the factory districts to the rural. 'Judge then,' said Peel, 'whether we can with safety retrograde in manufactures.'

So grave a crisis could only be met by daring remedies. With the highest courage, moral courage no less than political, Peel resolved to ask parliament to let him raise four or five millions a year by income-tax, in order to lower the duties on the great articles of consumption, and by reforming the tariff both to relieve trade, and to stimulate and replenish the reciprocal flow of export and import. That he at this time, or perhaps in truth at any time, had acquired complete mastery of those deeper principles and wider aspects of free trade of which Adam Smith had been the great exponent—principles afterwards enforced by the genius of Cobden with such admirable skill, persistency, and patriotic spirit—there was nothing to show. Such a scheme had no originality in it. Huskisson, and men of less conspicuous name, had ten years earlier urged the necessity of a new general system of taxation, based upon remission of duty on raw materials and on articles of consumption, and upon the imposition of an income-tax. The famous report of the committee on import duties of 1840, often rightly called the charter of free trade, of which Peel, not much to his credit, had at this moment not read a word,2 laid the foundations of the great policy of tariff reform with which the names of Peel and Gladstone are associated in history. The policy advocated in 1830 in the admirable treatise of Sir Henry Parnell is exactly the policy of Peel in 1842, as he acknowledged. After all it is an idle quarrel between the closet strategist and the victorious commander; between the man who first discerns some great truth of government, and the man who gets the thing, or even a part of the thing, actually done.

Mr. Gladstone has left on record some particulars of his own share as subordinate minister not in the cabinet, in this

¹ Parker, ii. pp. 499, 529, 533. ² Ibid., p. 509. Before the end of the session (Aug. 10, 1842) he had learned enough to do more justice to Hume and the committee.

to employ me in any such communications as those to which I have referred, I am at your disposal.' Of this startling offer to transform himself from president of the board of trade into Vatican envoy, Mr. Gladstone left his own later judgment upon record; here it is, and no more needs to be said upon it:—

About the time of my resignation on account of the contemplated increase of the grant to the College of Maynooth, I became possessed with the idea that there was about to be a renewal in some shape of our diplomatic [relations] with the see of Rome, and I believe that I committed the gross error of tendering myself to Sir Robert Peel to fill the post of envoy. I have difficulty at this date (1894) in conceiving by what obliquity of view I could have come to imagine that this was a rational or in any way excusable proposal: and this, although I vaguely think my friend James Hope had some hand in it, seems to show me now that there existed in my mind a strong element of fanaticism. I believe that I left it to Sir R. Peel to make me any answer or none as he might think fit; and he with great propriety chose the latter alternative.

In the autumn of 1844, the prime minister understood that if he proceeded with the Maynooth increase, he would lose Mr. Gladstone. The loss, Peel said to Graham, was serious, and on every account to be regretted, but no hope of averting it would justify the abandonment of a most important part of their Irish policy. Meanwhile, in the midst of heavy labours on the tariff in preparation for the budget of 1845, Mr. Gladstone was sharply perturbed, as some of his letters to Mrs. Gladstone show:—

Whitehall, Nov. 22, '44.—It is much beyond my expectation that Newman should have taken my letter so kindly; it seemed to me so like the operation of a clumsy, bungling surgeon upon a sensitive part. I cannot well comment upon his meaning, for as you may easily judge, what with cabinet, board, and Oak Farm, I have enough in my head to-day—and the subject is a fine and subtle one. But I may perhaps be able to think upon it to night, in the meantime I think yours is a very just conjectural sketch. We have not got in cabinet to-day to the really pinching part of doubt whether any alteration could be made. On his announcing the adoption, I said in a marked manner, 'I am very sorry for it'—believing that it would be virtual prohibition up to 65/ or 66/ and often beyond, to the minimum; and not being able, in spite of all the good which the government is about to do with respect to commerce, to make up my mind to support such a protection. I see, from conversations with them to-day, that Lord Ripon, Peel, and Graham, are all aware the protection is greater than is necessary.

This mood soon carried the vice-president terribly far. On Feb. 5 he met most of the members of the cabinet at Peel's house. He argued his point that the scale would operate as virtual protection up to seventy shillings, and in a private interview with Peel afterwards hinted at retirement. Peel declared himself so taken by surprise that he hardly knew what to say; 'he was thunderstruck'; and he told his young colleague that 'the retirement of a person holding his office, on this question, immediately before his introducing it, would endanger the existence of the administration, and that he much doubted whether in such a case he could bring it on.'

I fear Peel was much annoyed and displeased, for he would not give me a word of help or of favourable supposition as to my own motives and belief. He used nothing like an angry or unkind word, but the negative character of the conversation had a chilling effect on my mind. I came home sick at heart in the evening and told all to Catherine, my lips being to every one else, as I said to Sir R. Peel, absolutely sealed.

'He might have gained me more easily, I think,' Mr. Gladstone wrote years afterwards, 'by a more open and supple method of expostulation. But he was not skilful, I think, in the management of personal or sectional dilemmas, as he showed later on with respect to two important questions, the Factory acts and the crisis on the sugar duties in 1844.' This sharp and unnecessary corner safely turned, Mr. Gladstone learned the lesson how to admire a great master overcoming a legislator's difficulties.

Jan. 9, '45.—Another postponement; but our explanations were as satisfactory as could possibly be made under such circumstances. The tone and manner as kind as at any time-nothing like murmur. At the same time Peel said he thought it right to intimate a belief that the government might very probably be shipwrecked upon the Maynooth question, partly in connection with my retirement, but also as he intimated from the uncertainty whether there might not be a very strong popular feeling against it. He takes upon himself all responsibility for any inconvenience to which the government may possibly be put from the delay and a consequent abrupt retirement, and says I have given him the fullest and fairest notice. . . . I saw Manning for two hours this morning, and let the cat out of the bag to him in part. note from Lockhart saying the Bishop of London had sent his chaplain to Murray to express high approval of the article on Ward—and enclosing the vulgar addition of £63.

Windsor Castle, Jan. 10.—First, owing to the Spanish ambassador's not appearing, Lady Lyttelton was suddenly invited, and fell to my lot to hand in and sit by, which was very pleasant.' I am, as you know, a shockingly bad witness to looks, but she appeared to me, I confess, a little worn and aged. She ought to have at least two months' holiday every year. After dinner the Queen inquired as usual about you, and rather particularly with much interest about Lady Glynne. I told her plainly all I could. This rather helped the Queen through the conversation, as it kept me talking, and she was evidently hard pressed at the gaps. we went to cards, and played commerce; fortunately I was never the worst hand, and so was not called upon to pay, for I had locked. up my purse before going to dinner; but I found I had won 2s. 2d. at the end, 8d. of which was paid me by the Prince. I mean to keep the 2d. piece (the 6d. I cannot identify) accordingly, unless. I lose it again to-night. I had rather a nice conversation with him about the international copyright convention with Prussia. . . .

Whitehall, Jan 11.—I came back from Windsor this morning, very kindly used. The Queen mentioned particularly that you were not asked on account of presumed inconvenience, and sent me a private print of the Prince of Wales, and on my thanking for it through Lady Lyttelton, another of the Princess. Also she himself not readily to forget. The feeling of the occasion he described to Manning:—

Do you know that daily intercourse and co-operation with men upon matters of great anxiety and moment interweaves much of one's being with theirs, and parting with them, leaving them under the pressure of their work and setting myself free, feels, I think, much like dying: more like it than if I were turning my back altogether upon public life. I have received great kindness, and so far as personal sentiments are concerned, I believe they are as well among us as they can be.

One other incident he describes to his wife:--

Peel thought I should ask an audience of the Queen on my retirement, and accordingly at the palace to-day (Feb. 3) heintimated, and then the lord-in-waiting, as is the usage, formally requested it. I saw the Queen in her private sitting-room. she did not commence speaking immediately after the first bow, I' thought it my part to do so; and I said, 'I have had the boldness to request an audience, madam, that I-might say with how much pain it is that I find myself separated from your Majesty's service, and how gratefully I feel your Majesty's many acts of kindness.' She replied that she regretted it very much, and that it was a great loss. I resumed that I had the greatest comfort I could enjoy under the circumstances in the knowledge that my feelings towards her Majesty's person and service, and also towards Sir R. Peel and my late colleagues, were altogether unchanged by my After a few words more she spoke of the state of the country and the reduced condition of Chartism, of which I said I believed the main feeder was want of employment. At the pauses I watched her eye for the first sign to retire. But she asked me about you before we concluded. Then one bow at the spot and another at the door, which was very near, and so it was all over.

Feb. 4.—Ruminated on the dangers of my explanation right and left, and it made me unusually nervous. H. of C. 4½-9. I was kindly spoken of and heard, and I hope attained practically purposes I had in view, but I think the House felt that the last part by taking away the sting reduced the matter to flatness.

Among the deputations of this period Mr. Gladstone always recalled one from Lancashire, as the occasion on which he first saw Mr. Bright:—

The deputation was received not by me but by Lord Ripon, in the large room at the board of trade, I being present. A long line of fifteen or twenty gentlemen occupied benches running down and at the end of the room, and presented a formidable appearance. All that I remember, however, is the figure of a person in black or dark Quaker costume, seemingly the youngest of the band. Eagerly he sat a little forward on the bench and intervened in the discussion. I was greatly struck with him. He seemed to me rather fierce, but very strong and very earnest. I need hardly say this was John Bright. A year or two after he made his appearance in parliament.¹

The best testimony to Mr. Gladstone's share in this arduous task is supplied in a letter written by the prime minister himself to John Gladstone, and that he should have taken the trouble to write it shows, moreover, that though Peel may have been a 'bad horse to go up to in the stable,' his reserve easily melted away in recognition of difficult duty well done:—

Sir Robert Peel to John Gladstone.

Whitehall, June 16, 1842.—You probably have heard that we have concluded the discussions (the preliminary discussions at least) on the subject of the tariff. I cannot resist the temptation, if it be only for the satisfaction of my own feelings, of congratulating you most warmly and sincerely, on the distinction which your son has acquired, by the manner in which he has conducted himself throughout those discussions and all others since his appointment to office. At no time in the annals of parliament has there been exhibited a more admirable combination of ability, extensive knowledge, temper and discretion. Your paternal feelings must be gratified in the highest degree by the success which has naturally and justly followed the intellectual exertions of your son, and you must be supremely happy as a father in the reflection

VOL. I.

¹ Bright was elected for Durham in July 1843.

The point of Mr. Gladstone's reply was in fact an extremely simple and a highly honourable one. While carefully abstaining from laying down any theory of political affairs as under all circumstances inflexible and immutable, yet he thought that one who had borne such solemn testimony as he had borne in his book, to a particular view of a great question, ought not to make himself responsible for a material departure from it, without at least placing himself openly in a position to form a judgment that should be beyond all mistake at once independent and unsuspected. That position in respect of the Maynooth policy he could not hold, so long as he was a member of the cabinet proposing it, and therefore he had resigned, though it was , understood that he would not resist the Maynooth increase itself. All this, I fancy, might easily have been made plain even to those who thought his action a display of overstrained moral delicacy. As it was, his anxiety to explore every nook and cranny of his case, and to defend or discover in it every point that human ingenuity could devise for attack, led him to speak for more than an hour; at the end of which even friendly and sympathetic listeners were left wholly at a loss for a clue to the labyrinth. 'What a marvellous talent is this,' Cobden exclaimed to a friend sitting near him;" here have I been sitting listening with pleasure for an hour to his explanation, and yet I know no more why he left the government than before he began.' 'I could not but know,' Mr. Gladstone wrote on this incident long years after, 'that I should inevitably be regarded as fastidious and fanciful, fitter for a dreamer or possibly a schoolman, than for the active purposes of public life in a busy and moving age.'1

Sir Robert Inglis begged him to lead the opposition to the bill. In the course of the conversation Inglis went back measure totally impossible—when it was proved to me that there were objections in the highest quarters which would not be overcome unless I was prepared to sacrifice much that was dear to me—when it was inti-mated to my noble friend that there was an intention on the part of the highest authorities in the church of England to offer a decided opposition to the measure, and when my noble friend intimated to me that he none iriend intimated to me that he thought, if I persevered in my intention to retire, success was out of the question. It was then I did not hesitate to say that I would not expose others to obloquy or suspicions from which I myself shrunk.'

1 Gleanings with 1 110

1 Gleanings, vii. p. 118.

following year, the head of the government made him the coveted communication:—

Whitehall, May 13, 1843.

My dear Gladstone,—I have proposed to the Queen that Lord Ripon should succeed my lamented friend and colleague, Lord Fitzgerald, as president of the board of control. I, at the same time, requested her Majesty's permission (and it was most readily conceded) to propose to you the office of president of the board of trade, with a seat in the cabinet. If it were not for the occasion of the vacancy I should have had unmixed satisfaction in thus availing myself of the earliest opportunity that has occurred since the formation of the government, of giving a wider scope to your ability to render public service, and of strengthening that government by inviting your aid as a minister of the crown. For myself personally, and I can answer also for every other member of the government, the prospect of your accession to the cabinet is very gratifying to our feelings.—Believe me, my dear Gladstone, with sincere esteem and regard, most truly yours,

At two to-day (May 13), Mr. Gladstone records, I went to Sir R. Peel's on the subject of his letter. I began by thanking him for the indulgent manner in which he had excused my errors, and more than appreciated any services I might have rendered, and for the offer he had made and the manner of it. I said that I went to the board of trade without knowledge or relish, but had been very happy there; found quite enough to occupy my mind, enough responsibility for my own strength, and had no desire to move onwards, but should be perfectly satisfied with any arrange-ment which he might make as to Lord Ripon's successor. He spoke most warmly of service received, said he could not be governed by any personal considerations, and this which he proposed was obviously the right arrangement. I then stated the substance of what I had put in my memorandum, first on the opium question, to which his answer was, that the immediate power and responsibility lay with the East India Company; he did not express agreement with my view of the cultivation of the drug, but said it was a minor subject as compared with other imperial interests constantly brought under discussion;

CHAPTER X

TRIUMPH OF POLICY AND FALL OF THE MINISTER

(1846)

CHANGE of opinion, in those to whose judgment the public looks more or less to assist its own, is an evil to the country, although a much smaller evil than their persistence in a course which they know to be wrong. It is not always to be blamed. But it is always to be watched with vigilance; always to be challenged and put upon its trial.—Gladstone.

Not lingering for the moment on Mr. Gladstone's varied pre-occupations during 1845, and not telling over again the well-known story of the circumstances that led to the repeal of the corn law, I pass rapidly to Mr. Gladstone's part—it was a secondary part—in the closing act of the exciting political drama on which the curtain had risen in 1841. The end of the session of 1845 had left the government in appearance even stronger than it was in the beginning of 1842. Two of the most sagacious actors knew better what this was worth. Disraeli was aware how the ties had been loosened between the minister and his supporters, and Cobden was aware that, in words used at the time, 'three weeks of rain when the wheat was ripening would rain away the corn law.'1

Everybody knows how the rain came, and alarming signs of a dreadful famine in Ireland came; how Peel advised his cabinet to open the ports for a limited period, but without promising them that if the corn duties were ever taken off, they could ever be put on again; how Lord John seized the moment, wrote an Edinburgh letter, and declared for total and immediate repeal; how the minister once was the last man to laugh at force of sincerity and conscience. Men of the other sort, as he knew, were always to be had for the asking. 'He spoke again of the satisfaction of his colleagues, and even said he did not recollect former instances of a single vacancy in a cabinet, on which there was an entire concurrence. I repeated what I had said of his and their most indulgent judgment and took occasion distinctly to apologise for my blunder, and the consequent embarrassment which I caused to him in Feb. 1842, on the corn scale.'

¹ Perhaps I may refer to my Life publication by Mr. Bright. Chapters of Cobden, which had the great xiv. and xv. advantage of being read before

His parliamentary success had been extraordinary. From the first his gifts of reasoning and eloquence had pleased the House; his union of sincerity and force had attracted it as sincerity and force never fail to do; and his industry and acuteness, his steady growth in political stature, substance, and acquisition, had gained for him the confidence of the austerest of leaders. He had reached a seat in the cabinet before he-was thirty-four, and after little more than ten years of parliamentary life. Canning was thirty-seven before he won the same eminence, and he had been thirteen years in the House; while Peel had the cabinet within reach when he was four-and-thirty, and had been in the House almost thirteen years, of which six had been passed in the arduous post of Irish secretary. Mr. Gladstone had shown that he had in him the qualities that make a minister and a speaker of the first class, though he had shown also the perilous quality of a spirit of minute scruple. He had not yet displayed those formidable powers of contention and attack, that were before long to resemble some tremendous projectile, describing a path the law of whose curves and deviations, as they watched its journey through the air in wonder and anxiety for the shattering impact, men found it impossible to calculate.

Mr. Gladstone's brief notes of his first and second cabinets are worth transcribing: the judicious reader will have little difficulty in guessing the topic for deliberation; it figured in the latest of his cabinets as in the earliest, as well as in most of those that intervened. 'May 15.—My first cabinet. On Irish repeal meetings. No fear of breach of the peace, with the most precarious prospects. Peel was most kind, nay fatherly. We held hands instinctively, and I could not but reciprocate with emphasis his 'God bless you.'

¹ See above, p. 253.

I well remember,—Mr. Gladstone wrote in a memorandum of Oct. 4, 1851,—Peel's using language to me in the Duke of Newcastle's house on Sunday, Dec. 21, 1845, which, as I conceive, distinctly intimated his belief that he would be able to carry his measure, and at the same time hold his party together. He spoke with a kind of glee and complacency in his tone when he said, making up his meaning by signs, 'I have not lived near forty years in public life to find myself wholly without the power of foreseeing the course of events in the House of Commons'—in reference to the very point of the success of his government.

One thing is worth noting as we pass. The exact proceedings of the memorable cabinets of November and the opening days of December are still obscure. It has generally been held that Disraeli planted a rather awkward stroke when he taunted Peel with his inconsistency in declaring that he was not the proper minister to propose repeal, and yet in trying to persuade his colleagues to make the attempt before giving the whigs a chance. The following note of Mr. Gladstone's (written in 1851 after reading Sir R. Peel's original memoir on the Corn Act of 1846) throws some light on the question:—

When Sir R. Peel invited me to take office in December 1845 he did not make me aware of the offer he had made to the cabinet in his memorandum, I think of Dec. 2, to propose a new corn law with a lowered sliding duty, which should diminish annually by a shilling until in some eight or ten years the trade would be free. No doubt he felt that after Lord John Russell had made his attempt to form a government, and after, by Lord Stanley's resignation, he had lost the advantages of unanimity, he could not be justified in a proposal involving so considerable an element of protection. It has become matter of history. But as matter of history it is important to show how honestly and perseveringly he strove to hold the balance fairly between contending claims, and how far he was from being the mere puppet of abstract theories.

was no difference of opinion; that all agreed in the rule of that we should buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest; that even if the foreigner were foolish enough not to follow suit, it was still for the interest of this country to buy as cheap as we could, whether other countries will buy from us or no. Even important cabinet colleagues found this too strong doctrine for them.

"On Tuesday night,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'Peel opened the tariff anew, and laid down in a manner which drew great cheering from the opposition, the doctrine of purchasing in the cheapest market. Stanley said to me afterwards, "Peel laid that down a great deal too broadly." Last night he (Lord S.) sat down angry with himself, and turned to me and said, "It does not signify, I cannot speak on these subjects; I quite lost my head." I merely answered that no one but himself would have discovered it.' Yet it was able men, apt to lose their heads in economics, whom Peel had to carry along with him. 'On another night,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'I thought Sir R. Peel appeared in an attitude of conspicuous intellectual greatness, and on comparing notes next day with Sir J. Graham at the palace, I found he was similarly impressed. Sheil delivered a very effective rhetorical speech. Lord Stanley had taken a few notes and was to follow him. Sheil was winding up just as the clock touched twelve. Lord Stanley said to Peel, "It is twelve, shall I follow him? I think not." Peel said, "I do not think it will do to let this go unanswered." He had been quite without the idea of speaking that night. Sheil sat down, and peals of cheering followed. Stanley seemed to hesitate a good deal, and at last said, as it were to himself, "No, I won't, it's too late." In the meantime the adjournment had been moved; but when Peel saw there was no one in the breach, he rose. The cheers were still, a little spitefully, prolonged from the other side. He had an immense subject, a disturbed House, a successful speech, an entire absence of notice to contend against; but he began with power, gathered power as he went on, handled every point in his usual mode of balanced thought and language, secretary of state out of parliament during the corn law crisis, and their petition was suddenly withdrawn. The consequence was that I remained until the resignation of the government in July a minister of the crown without a seat in parliament. This was a state of things not agreeable to the spirit of parliamentary government; and some objection was taken, but rather slightly, in the House of Commons. Sir R. Peel stood fire.' There can be little doubt that in our own day a cabinet minister without a seat in either House of parliament would be regarded, in Mr. Gladstone's words, as a public inconvenience and a political anomaly, too dark to be tolerated; and he naturally felt it his absolute duty to peep in at every chink and cranny where a seat in parliament could be had. A Peelite, however, had not a good chance at a by-election, and Mr. Gladstone remained out of the House until the general election in the year following.1 Lord Lincoln, also a member of the cabinet, vacated his seat, but, unlike his friend, found a seat in the course of the session.

¹ Hansard, May 10, 1842.

Mr. Gladstone's brother-in-law, Lyttelton, was invited to represent the colonial office in the Lords, but had qualms of conscience about the eternal question of the two Welsh bishoprics. 'How could the government of this wonderful empire,' Peel wrote-to Mr. Gladstone, 'be ever constructed, if a difference on such a point were to be an obstruction to union? Might not any one now say with perfect honour and, what is of more importance (if they are not identical), perfect satisfaction to his own conscience, "I will not so far set up my own judgment on one isolated measure against that of a whole administration, to such an extent as to preclude me from co-operation with them at a critical period." This, of course, assumes general accordance of sentiment on the great outlines of public policy.' Wise but if P. would dissolve he would welcome Gladstone to Lincoln—or P. himself; and added privately that he would give P. or G. best bottle of wine in his cellar if he would come to Lincoln and fight him fairly.—

¹ Sibthorp asked Pecl in the H. of C. when Gladstone and Lineoln would appear. Pecl replied that if S. would take the Chiltern Hundreds, G. should stand against him. S. retorted that the Chiltern Hundreds is a place under government, and he would never take place from Peel;

Lord Broughton's Diaries.

protection in particular. They assured the country gentlemen that the sacred principle of a scale was as tenderly cherished in the new plan as in the old; on the other hand they could assure the leaguers and the doubters that the structure of the two scales was widely different. We cannot wonder that honest tories who stuck to the old doctrine, not always rejected even by Huskisson, that a country ought not to be dependent on foreign supply, were mystified and amazed as they listened to the two rival parties disputing to which of them belonged the credit of originating a policy that each of them had so short a time before so scornfully denounced. The only difference was the difference between yesterday and the day before yesterday. The whigs, with their fixed duty, were just as open as the conservatives with their sliding-scale to the taunts of the Manchester school, when they decorated economics by high a priori declaration that the free importation of corn was not a subject for the deliberations of the senate, but a natural and inalienable law of the Creator. Rapid was the conversion. Even Lord Palmerston, of all people in the world, denounced the arrogance and presumptuous folly of dealers in restrictive duties 'setting up their miserable legislation instead of the great standing laws of nature.' Mr. Disraeli, still warmly on the side of the minister, flashed upon his uneasy friends around him a reminder of the true pedigree of the dogmas of free trade. Was it not Mr. Pitt who first promulgated them in 1787, who saw that the loss of the market of the American colonies made it necessary by lowering duties to look round for new markets on the continent of Europe? And was it not Fox, Burke, Sheridan, and the minor whig luminaries, who opposed him, while not a single member of his own government in the House of Lords was willing or able to defend him? But even reminiscences of Mr. Pitt, and oracular descriptions of Lord Shelburne as the most remarkable man of his age, brought little comfort to men sincerely convinced with fear and trembling that free corn would destroy rent, close their mansions and their parks, break up their lives, and beggar the country. They remembered also one or two chapters of

was over, that the Duke of Wellington told Lord John that he thought Peel was tired of party and was determined to destroy it. After the repeal of the corn law was safe, the minister was beaten on the Irish coercion bill by what Wellington called a 'blackguard combination' between the whigs and the protectionists. He resigned, and Lord John Russell at the head of the whigs came in.

'Until three or four days before the division on the coercion bill,' Mr. Gladstone says in a memorandum written at the time, 'I had not the smallest idea, beyond mere conjecture, of the views and intentions of Sir R. Peel with respect to himself or to his government. Only we had been governed in all questions, so far as I knew, by the determination to carry the corn bill and to let no collateral circumstance interfere with that main purpose. . . . He sent round a memorandum some days before the division arguing for resignation against dissolution. There was also a correspondence between the Duke of Wellington and him. The duke argued for holding our ground and dissolving. But when we met in cabinet on Friday the 26th of June, not an opposing voice was raised. It was the shortest cabinet I ever knew. Peel himself uttered two or three introductory sentences. He then said that he was convinced that the formation of a conservative party was impossible while he continued in office. That he had made up his mind to resign. That he strongly advised the resignation of the entire government. Some declared their assent. None objected; and when he asked whether it was unanimous, there was no voice in the negative.' 'This was simply,' as Mr. Gladstone added in later notes, 'because he had very_ distinctly and positively stated his own resolution to resign. It amounted therefore to this,—no one proposed to go on without him.' One other note of Mr. Gladstone's on this grave decision is worth quoting:-

I must put into words the opinion which I silently formed in my room at the colonial office in June 1846, when I got the circulation box with Peel's own memorandum not only arguing in favour of resignation but intimating his own intention to resign, The tariff operations of 1842 worked no swift social of miracle. General stagnation still prevailed. Capital was a drug in the market, but food was comparatively cheap. Stocks were light, and there was very little false credit. In spite of all these favouring conditions, Mr. Gladstone (March 20, 1843) had to report to his chief that 'the deadness of foreign demand keeps our commerce in a state of prolonged paralysis.' Cobden had not even yet convinced them that the true way to quicken foreign demand was to open the ports to that foreign supply, with which they paid us for what they bought from us. Mr. Gladstone saw no further than the desire of making specific arrangement with other countries for reciprocal reductions of import duties.

In one of his autobiographic notes (1897) Mr. Gladstone describes the short and sharp parliamentary crisis in 1844 brought about by the question of the sugar duties, but this may perhaps be relegated to an appendix.²

1.

From 1841 to 1844 Mr. Gladstone's department was engaged in other matters lying beyond the main stream of effort. 'We were anxiously and eagerly endeavouring to make tariff treaties with many foreign countries. Austria, I think, may have been included, but I recollect especially France, Prussia, Portugal, and I believe Spain. And the state of our tariff, even after the law of 1842, was then such as to supply us with plenty of material for liberal offers. Notwithstanding this, we failed in every case. I doubt whether we advanced the cause of free trade by a single inch.'

The question of the prohibition against the export of machinery came before him. The custom-house authorities pronounced it ineffective, and recommended its removal. A parliamentary committee in 1841 had reported in favour of entire freedom. The machine makers, of course, were active, and the general manufacturers of the country, except-

The average price of wheat per shillings, a lower average than for quarter in 1841 was 64 shillings, in any year until 1849.

1842, 57 shillings, and in 1843, 50

2 See Appendix.

and we had some conversation, first on colonial matters. Then he said, 'Well, I think our friend Peel went rather far last night about Cobden, did he not?' I stated to him my very deep regret on reading that passage (as well as what followed about the monopolists), and that, not for its impolicy but for its injustice. All that he said was true, but he did not say the whole truth; and the effect of the whole, as a whole, was therefore untrue. Mr. Cobden has throughout argued the corn question on the principle of holding up the landlords of England to the people, as plunderers and as knaves for maintaining the corn law to save their rents, and as fools because it was not necessary for that purpose. This was passed by, while he was praised for sincerity, eloquence, indefatigable zeal.

On Thursday the 2nd I saw Lord Aberdeen. He agreed in the general regret at the tone of that part of the speech. He said he feared it was designed with a view to its effects, for the purpose of making it impossible that Peel should ever again be placed in connection with the conservative party as a party. said that Peel had absolutely made up his mind never again to lead it, never again to enter office; that he had indeed made up his mind, at one time, to quit parliament, but that probably on the Queen's account, and in deference to her wishes, he had abandoned this part of his intentions. But that he was fixed in the idea to maintain his independent and separate position, taking part in public questions as his views of public interests might from time to time seem to require. I represented that this for him, and in the House of Commons, was an intention absolutely impossible to fulfil; that with his greatness he could not remain there overshadowing and eclipsing all governments, and yet have to do with no governments; that acts cannot for such a man be isolated, they must be in series, and his view of public affairs must coincide with one body of men rather than another, and that the attraction must place him in relations with them. Lord Aberdeen said that Earl Spencer in his later days was Sir R. Peel's ideal,-rare appearances for serious purposes, and without compromise generally to the independence of his personal habits. put it that this was possible in the House of Lords, but only there. . . . On Saturday I saw him again as he came from the South Sea bubble. Meanwhile, Mr. Gladstone's Railway of Act of 1844, besides a number of working regulations for the day, laid down two principles of the widest range: reserving to the state the full right of intervention in the concerns of the railway companies, and giving to the state the option to purchase a line at the end of a certain term at twenty-five years' purchase of the divisible profits.¹

It was during these years of labour under Peel that he first acquired principles of administrative and parliamentary practice that afterward stood him in good stead: on no account to try to deal with a question before it is ripe; never to go the length of submitting a difference between two departments to the prime minister before the case is exhausted and complete; never to press a proposal forward beyond the particular stage at which it has arrived. Pure commonplaces if we will, but they are not all of them easy to learn. We cannot forget that Peel and Mr. Gladstone were in the strict line of political succession. They were alike in social origin and academic antecedents. They started from the same point of view as to the great organs of national life, the monarchy, the territorial peerage and the commons, the church, the universities. They showed the same clear knowledge that it was not by its decorative parts, or what Burke styled 'solemn plausibilities,' that the community derived its strength; but that it rested for its real foundations on its manufactures, its commerce, and its credit. Even in the lesser things, in reading Sir Robert Peel's letters, those who in later years served under Mr. Gladstone can recognise the school to which he went for the methods, the habits of mind, the practices of business, and even the phrases which he employed when his own time came to assume the direction of public affairs, the surmounting of administrative difficulties, the piloting of complex measures, and the handling of troublesome persons.

¹ Wordsworth wrote (Oct. 15, 1844) to implore him to direct special attention to the desecrating project of a railway from Kendal to the head of Windermere, and enclosed a sonnet.

The sixth line, by the way, is a variant from the version in the books: 'And must he too his old delights disown.'—Knight's Wordsworth (1896 edition), viii. 166.

of the conscrvative body resumed. I told him, in the first place, that I felt some difficulty in answering him in my state of total ignorance, so far as direct communication is concerned, of Sir R. Pecl's knowledge and intentions; that on Tuesday I had seen him on colonial matters, and had talked on the probable intentions of the new government as to the sugar duties, but that I did not like to ask what he did not seem to wish to tell, and that I did not obtain the smallest inkling of light as to his intentions in respect to that very matter now immediately pending. He observed it was a pity Sir R. Peel was so uncommunicative; but that after having been so long connected with him, he would certainly be very unwilling to do anything disagreeable to him; still, if I and others thought fit, he was ready to do what he could towards putting the party together again. I then replied that I thought, so far as extinguishing the animosities which had been raised in connection with the corn law was concerned, I could not doubt its propriety, that I thought we were bound to give a fair trial to the government, and not to assume beforehand an air of opposition, and that if so much of confidence is due to them, much more is it due towards friends from whom we have differed on the single question of free trade, that our confidence should be reposed in That I thought, however, that in any ease, before acting together as a party, we ought to consider well the outline of our further course, particularly with reference to Irish questions and the ehureh there, as I was of opinion that it was very doubtful whether we had now a justification for opposing any change with respect to it, meaning as to the property. He said with his accustomed facility, 'Ah yes, it will require to be eonsidered what eourse we shall take.'1

I met Lord Aberdeen the same afternoon in Bond Street, and told him the substance of this conversation. He said, 'It is stated that Lord G. Bentinck is to resign, and that they are to have you.' That, I replied, was quite new to me. The (late) chancellor had simply said, when I'-pointed out that the difficulties lay in the House of Commons, that it was true, and that my being there would make the way more open. I confess I am very doubtful of that, and much disposed to believe that I am regretted, as government.' 'He explained that he did not know whether the feeling among Goulburn's constituents [the university _ of Cambridge] might not be too strong for him; that in Scotland, as he expected, there would be a great opposition; and he seemed to think that from the church also there might be great resistance, and he said the proceedings in the diocese of Exeter showed a very sensitive state of the public mind.' During the whole of 1844 the project simmered. At a very early moment Mr. Gladstone grew uneasy. He did not condemn the policy in itself, but whatever else might be said, it was in direct antagonism to the principle elaborately expounded by him only six years before, as the sacred rule and obligation between a Christian state and Christian churches. He had marked any departure from that rule as a sign of social declension, as a descent from a higher state of society to a lower, as a note in the ebb and flow of national life. Was it not inevitable, then, that his official participation in the extension of the public endowment of Maynooth would henceforth give to every one the right to say of him, 'That man cannot be trusted'? He was not indeed committed, by anything that he had written, to the extravagant position that the peace of society should be hazarded because it could no longer restore its ancient theories of religion; but was he not right in holding it indispensable that any vote or further declaration from him on these matters should be given under circumstances free from all just suspicions of his disinterestedness and honesty?1

¹ See Life of Lord Lyndhurst, by Lord Campbell, p. 163.

In view of these approaching difficulties upon Maynooth, on July 12 he made a truly singular tender to the head of the government. He knew Peel to be disposed to entertain the question of a renewal of the public relations with the papal court at Rome, first to be opened by indirect communications through the British envoy at Florence or Naples. 'What I have to say,' Mr. Gladstone now wrote to the prime minister, 'is that if you and Lord Aberdeen should think fit to appoint me to Florence or Naples, and lively and my position in some respects different. He replied, 'Your position is quite different. You are free to take any eourse you please with perfect honour.' I told him of Lord Lyndhurst's visit and the purport of his eonversation, of the meaning of the junction on the opposition bench in the Lords, and of what we had said of the difficulties in the Commons. He said, 'My resentment · is not against the new government, but against the seventy-three conservative members of parliament who displaced the late government by a factious vote; nearly all of them believed the bill to be necessary for Ireland; and they knew that our removal was not desired by the crown, not desired by the country. I find no fault with the new ministers, they are fairly in possession of power-but with those gentlemen I can never unite.' Later, however, in the evening he relented somewhat, and said he must admit that what they did was done under great provocation; that it was no wonder they regarded themselves as betrayed; and that unfortunately it had been the fate of Sir R. Peel to perform a similar operation twice. . . .

¹ The letters from Mr. Gladstone Mr. Parker, Peel, iii. pp. 160, 163, to Peel on this topic are given by 166.

Graham dwelt with fondness and with pain on Lord Stanley; said he had very great qualities—that his speech on the eorn law, consisting as it did simply of old fallacies though in new dress, was a magnificent speech, one of his greatest and happiest efforts—that all his conduct in the public eye had been perfectly free from exception; that he feared, however, he had been much in Lord Geo. Bentinck's counsels, and had concurred in much more than he had himself done, and had aided in marking out the course taken in the House of Commons. He had called on Lord Stanley several times but had never been able to see him, he trusted through accident, but seemed to doubt.

On the Cobden eulogy, though he did not defend it outright by any means, he said, 'Do you think if Cobden had not existed the repeal of the corn law would have been carried at this moment?' I said very probably not, that he had added greatly to the force of the movement and accelerated its issue, that I admitted the truth of every word that Peel had uttered, but complained of its omissions, of its spirit towards his own friends, of its false moral effect, as well as and much more than of its mere impolicy.'

¹ Six years later (Nov. 26, 1852), mons said of Cobden, with words of Mr. Gladstone in the House of Com-characteristic qualification:—'Agree

the discussion, the Roman catholic religious education. That comes on Monday. My mind does not waver; pray for me, that I may do right. I have an appointment with Peel tomorrow, and I rather think he means to say something to me on the question.

Nov. 23.—You will see that whatever turns up, I am sure to be in the wrong. An invitation to Windsor for us came this morning, and I am sorry to say one including Sunday—Nov. 30 to Dec. 2. I have had a long battle with Peel on the matters of my office; not another syllable. So far as it goes this tends to make me think he does not calculate on any change in me; yet on the whole I lean the other way. Manning comes up on Monday.

Nov. 25.—Events travel fast and not slow. My opinion is that I shall be out on Friday evening. We have discussed Maynooth to-day. An intermediate letter which Sir James Graham has to write to Ireland for information causes thus much of delay. have told them that if I go, I shall go on the ground of what is required by my personal character, and not because my mind is made up that the course which they propose can be avoided, far less because I consider myself bound to resist it. I had the process of this declaration to repeat. I think they were prepared for it, but they would not assume that it was to be, and rather proceeded as if I had never said a word-before upon the subject. It was painful, but not so painful as the last time, and by an effort I had altogether prevented my mind from brooding upon it beforehand. At this moment $(6\frac{1}{4})$ I am sure they are talking about it over the way. I am going to dine with Sir R. Peel. Under these circumstances the Windsor visit will be strange enough! In the meantime my father writes to me most urgently, desiring me to come to Liverpool. I hope for some further light from him on Wednesday morning. . . .

Nov. 26.—I have no more light to throw upon the matters which I mentioned yesterday. The dinner at Peel's went off as well as could be expected; I did not sit near him. Lord Aberdeen was with me to-day, and said very kindly it must be prevented. But I think it cannot, and friendly efforts to prolong the day only aggravate the pain. Manning was with me all this morning; he is well, and is to come back to-morrow.

VOL. I. S

your labours have been incredible, but, allow me to say, that is vould have something to say upon that too. . . . To which I merely replied that I hoped not, and that the country indistinctly muttered, but the purport such as I have described. will) 'go out of parliament'—the first part of the sentence was government is carried on.' Then he said, (If it is necessary I separate yourself from the parliamentary system by which our influence, merely that you will remain in parliament and yet which you have announced to-day, and which events are not to you to lay down with certainty a foregone conclusion such as that rely upon, and should therefore urge how impossible it is for any reasoning deforehand. I replied, 'That is just what I should He said, 'I think events will answer that question better than great movements of political forces which sway to and fro there?' Commons as an isolated person, and hold yourself aloof from the you occupy before the country, you can remain in the House of to retire, but whether after all you have done, and in the position not the question. The question is not whether you are entitled

No man can doubt that he is the strong man of this parliament—of this political generation. Then it is asked, Is he honest? But this is a question which I think cannot justly be raised nor treated as admissible in the smallest degree by those who have known and worked with him. . . . He spoke of the immense multiplication of details in public business and the enormous task imposed upon available time and strength by the work of attendance in the available time and strength by the work of attendance in the the growth of greatness among our public men; and he said the mass of public business increased so fast that he could not tell what it was to end in, and did not venture to speculate even for what it was to end in, and did not venture to speculate even for thought the consequence was already manifest in its being not thought the consequence was already manifest in its being not thought the consequence was already manifest in its being not

It sometimes occurred to him whether it would after all be a good arrangement to have the prime minister in the House of Lords, which would get rid of the very encroaching duty of attendance on and correspondence with the Queen. I asked if in that case it would not be quite necessary that the leader in the in that case it would not be quite necessary that the leader in the Commons should frequently take upon himself to make decisions brought the little people through the corridor yesterday after luncheon, where they behaved very well, and she made them come and shake hands with me. The Prince of Wales has a very good countenance; the baby I should call a very fine child indeed. The Queen said, After your own you must think them dwarfs; but I answered that I did not think the Princess Royal short as compared with Willy. We had more cards last evening; Lady—made more blunders and was laughed at as usual. . . .

Jan. 13.—I think there will certainly be at least one cabinet more in the end of the week. My position is what would commonly be called uncomfortable. I do not know how long the Maynooth matter may be held over. I may remain a couple of months, or only a week—may go at any time at twenty-four hours' notice. I think on the whole it is an even chance whether I go before or after the meeting of parliament, so that I am unfeignedly put to-obey the precept of our Lord, 'Take no thought for the morrow; the morrow will take thought for the things of itself.' I am sorry that a part of the inconvenience falls on your innocent head. I need not tell you the irksomeness of business is much increased, and one's purposes unmanned by this indefiniteness. Still, having very important matters in preparation, I must not give any signs of inattention or indifference.

Cabinet Room, Jan. 14.—I have no news to give you about myself, but continue to be quite in the dark. There is a certain Maynooth bill in preparation, and when that appears for decision my time will probably have come, but I am quite ignorant when it will be forthcoming. I am to be with Peel to-morrow morning, but I think on board of trade business only. Graham has just told us that the draft of the Maynooth bill will be ready on Saturday; but it cannot, I think, be considered before the middle of next week at the earliest.

Jan. 15.—The nerves are a little unruly on a day like this between (official) life and death; so much of feeling mixes with the more abstract question, which would be easily disposed of if it stood alone. (Diary.)

It was February 3 before Mr. Gladstone wrote his last note from his desk at the board of trade, thanking the prime minister for a thousand acts of kindness which he trusted

CHAPTER XI

THE TRACTARIAN CATASTROPHE

(9†81-1†81)

The Emancipation time. It was anti-Roman sa much as it was the Emancipation time. It was anti-Roman as much as it was anti-sectarian and anti-erastian. It was to avert the danger of people becoming Romanists from ignorance of church principles. This was all changed in one important section of the party. The fundamental conceptions were reversed. It was not the Roman church but the English church that was put on its trial, . . . From this point of view the object of the movement was no longer to clevate and improve an independent English church, but to approxicievate and improve an independent English church, but to approximate it as far as possible to what was assumed to be undeniable—the perfect catholicity of Rome.—Dean Church.

from 1845 to 1852. extreme perturbation. Roughly it may be said to extend by and by, brought Mr. Gladstone to an epoch in his life of domestic circumstance of which I shall have more to say lphas these lphaulic events were lphaiin certain inportunities of the secession of Newman and the fall of Sir Robert, coupled reader will not wonder that two events so far-reaching as cerns had reached a critical and menacing stage. a decisive issue; and the longer struggle in religious condispersed. A long struggle in secular concerns had come to an the land were thus at the same moment dislodged and its beginning. Two main centres of authority and leading Chadstone had more or less associated himself almost from rupture in that rising party in the church with which Mr. state coincided pretty nearly with a hardly less memorable THE fall of Peel and the break-up of his party in the

At the time of his resignation in the beginning of 1845, he wrote to Lord John Manners, then his colleague at Newark, a curious account of his views on party life.

According to what is perhaps a questionable usage, Lord John Russell invited the retiring minister to explain his secession from office to the House. In the suspicion, distraction, tension that marked that ominous hour in the history of English party, people insisted that the resignation of the head of the department of trade must be due to divergence of judgment upon protection. The prime minister, while expressing in-terms of real feeling his admiration for Mr. Gladstone's character and ability, and his high regard for his colleague's private qualities, thought well to restate that the resignation came from no question of commercial policy. 'For three years,' he went on, 'I have been closely connected with Mr. Gladstone in the introduction of measures relating to the financial policy of the country, and I feel it my duty openly to avow that it seems almost impossible that two public men, acting together so long, should have had so little divergence in their opinions upon such questions.' If anybody found fault with Mr. Gladstone for not resigning earlier, the prime minister was himself responsible: 'I was unwilling to lose until the latest moment the advantages I derived from one whom I consider capable of the highest and most eminent services.'1

In the course of May, 1845, Peel made some remarks on resignations, of which Mr. Gladstone thought the report worth preserving:—'I admit that there may be many occasions when it would be the duty of a public man to retire from office, rather than propose measures which are contrary to the principles he has heretofore supported. I think that the propriety of his taking that course will mainly depend upon the effect which his retirement will have upon the success of that public measure, which he believes to be necessary for the good of his country. I think it was perfectly honourable, perfectly just, in my right honourable friend the late president of the board of trade to relinquish office. The hon. gentleman thinks I ought to have pursued the same course in 1829. That was precisely the course I wished to pursue—it was precisely the course which I intended to pursue. Until within a month of the period when

I consented to bring forward the measure for the relief of the Roman catholics, I did contemplate retiring from office—not because I shrank from the responsibility of proposing that measure—not from the fear of being charged with inconsistency—not because I was not prepared to make the painful sacrifice of private friendships and political connections, but because I believed that my retirement from office would promote the success of the measure. I thought that I should more efficiently assist my noble friend in carrying that measure if I retired from office, and gave the measure my cordial support in a private capacity. I changed my opinion when it was demonstrated to me that there was a necessity for sacrificing my own feelings by retaining office—when it was shown to me that, however humble my abilities, yet, considering the station which I occupied, my retiring from office would render the carrying of that proposed substitutes for its true moral and paternal work which appear to me mere counterfeits.

On this letter we may note in passing, first, that the tariff legislation did in the foundations what the Young England party wished to do in a superficial and flimsy fashion; and second, it was the tariff legislation that drove back a rising tide of socialism, both directly by vastly improving the condition of labour, and indirectly by force of the doctrine of free exchange which was thus corroborated by circumstances. Of this we shall see more by and by.

the break-up of a distinguished and imposing generation of little he foresaw the second phase of the Oxford movement its duties by the national church. He has told us-also how supposed to exist only as a consequence of the neglect of those large and powerful nonconforming bodies who were even revive the allegiance not only of the masses, but of that the church of England would hold her ground, and he stood at this hour of crisis; how strongly he believed passing into the second. Mr. Gladstone has told us I how dencies, and its first stage was now slowly but unmistakably had by the opening of the next decade revealed startling ten-The movement that began in 1833 cabinet in 1843. have exercised much self-denial when he put me in his any real capacity for affairs. Sir Robert Peel must, I think, far persons infected in this particular manner could have word et and eterminate prejudice with serious doubts how advancement by either party in the state, and for laymen a yet indeed prosecution, but proscription and exclusion from so blind as to be unaware that for the clergy this meant not in common fame as tarred with their brush; and I was not direct connection with Oxford and its teachers, I was regarded religious over secular interests. Although I had little of working official man, but with a decided predominance of 1845, he says in a fragmentary note, 'I continued a hardreligious affairs at Oxford. 'From 1841 till the beginning of Mr. Gladstone had been keenly intent upon the progress of Throughout the years of Sir Robert Peel's government, to the fatal character and consequences of the Act of 1829; and wished that his advice had then been taken, which was that the Duke of Cumberland should be sent as lord lieutenant to Ireland with thirty-thousand men. 'As that good and very kind man spoke the words,' Mr. Gladstone says, 'my blood ran cold, and he too had helped me onwards in the path before me.' William Palmer wrote that the grant to Maynooth was the sin of 1829 over again, and would bring with it the same destruction of the conservative party. Lord Winchilsea, one of his patrons at Newark, protested against anything that savoured of the national endowment of Romanism. Mr. Disraeli was reported as saying that with his resignation on Maynooth Mr. Gladstone's career was over.

The rough verdict pronounced his act a piece of political prudery. One journalistic wag observed, 'A lady's footman jumped off the Great Western train, going forty miles an hour, merely to pick up his hat. Pretty much like this act, so disproportional to the occasion, is Mr. Gladstone's leap out of the ministry to follow his book.' When the time came he voted for the second reading of the Maynooth bill (April 11) with remarkable emphasis. 'I am prepared, in opposition to what I believe to be the prevailing opinion of the people of England and of Scotland, in opposition to the judgment of my own constituents, from whom I greatly regret to differ, and in opposition to my own deeply cherished predilections, to give a deliberate and even anxious support to the measure.'

The 'dreamer and the schoolman' meanwhile had left behind him a towering monument of hard and strenuous labour in the shape of that second and greater reform of the tariff, in which, besides the removal of the export duty on coal and less serious commodities, no fewer than four hundred and thirty articles were swept altogether away from the list of the customs officer. Glass was freed from an excise amounting to twice or thrice the value of the article, and the whole figure of remission was nearly three times as large as the corresponding figure in the bold operations of 1842. Whether the budget of 1842 or that of their suthors, and particularly that they intended to deal as gently with prepossessions thought to look towards Rome, as the necessity of securing a certain amount of reformation would allow. Certainly also the terms in which Newman characterises the present state of the church of England in his introduction are calculated to give both pain and alarm; and the whole aspect of the tract is like the assumption of a mew position.'

prejudice but fury in the public mind-a fury that without it was these writings on Reserve that roused not merely Anybody can now see in the coolness of distant time that 'partakes perhaps in the popular prejudice against them.' understand or to have studied the Tracts on Reserve.1 same letter Mr. Gladstone says that he cannot profess to dressed to his close friend Frederic Rogers. In the in favour of an amicable compromise, in a letter adother arguments are strongly pressed (December 3, 1841) comminnion of Rome. 'Miserable choice!' These and protestantised or decatholicised English church, and the for catholicity between the rival pretensions of an ultrachurch should be thus broken up, there would be no space within the pale, but in spirit estranged or outcast. If the -Tracts would be placed in the position of aliens, corporally weakened; and those who at all sympathised with the vidrasim ed bluow basigna to derude ed bas selgionirq lic principles in the gross; the association between catholic sentence would be a disavowal by the university of cathonotion associates with the Tructs for the Times. Such a all that congeries of opinions which the rude popular professorship, passed by the university of Oxford upon the prospect of a sentence in the shape of a vote for this so alien a debate. Mr. Gladstone was cut to the heart at surely has the service of the muses been pressed into between a no-popery candidate and a Puseyite. Seldom university chair of poetry at the end of the same year, truly singular struggle Mext followed the more called his cabinet together, invited them to support C him in settling the question, and as they would not all assent, resigned; how Lord John tried to form a government and failed; and how Sir Robert again became first minister of the crown, but not bringing all his colleagues back with him. 'I think,' said Mr. Gladstone in later days, 'he expected to carry the repeal of the corn law without breaking up his party, but meant at all hazard to carry it.'

¹ On Reserve in Communicating and in every sense un-English super-Religious Knowledge—Tracts 80 and scription, Ad Olerum. Isaac Wil-87. (1837-40.) With the ominous liams n as the author.

Peel's conduct in 1846, Lord Aberdeen said to a friend ten years later, was very noble. With the exception of Graham and myself, his whole cabinet was against him. Lyndhurst, Goulburn, and Stanley were almost violent in their resistance. Still more opposed to him, if it were possible, was the Duke of Wellington. To break up the cabinet was an act of great courage. To resume office when Lord John had failed in constructing one, was still more courageous. He said to the Queen: 'I am ready to kiss hands as your minister to-night. I believe I can collect a ministry which will last long enough to carry free trade, and I am ready to make the attempt.' When he said this there were only two men on whom he could rely. One of the first to join him was Wellington. 'The Queen's government,' he said, 'must be carried on. We have done all that we could for the landed interest. Now we must do all that we can for the Queen.'

On one of the days of this startling December, Mr. Gladstone writes to his father: 'If Peel determines to form a government, and if he sends for me (a compound uncertainty), I cannot judge what to do until I know much more than at present of the Irish case. It is there if anywhere that he must find his justification; there if anywhere that one returned to parliament as I am, can honestly find reason for departing at this time from the present corn law.' Two other letters of Mr. Gladstone's show us more fully why he followed Peel instead of joining the dissentients, of whom the most important was Lord Stanley. The first of these was written to his father four and a half years later:—

6 Carlton Gardens, June 30, 1849 .- As respects my 'having made

¹ Lord Aberdeen to Senior Sept. 1856. Mrs. Simpson's Many Memories, p 233.

In the summer of 1842 Mr. Gladstone received confidences him on to the beginning of the end.2 had done for him. To him it gave a final shake, and brought good or harm that bishopric had ever done, except what it men agreed with Newman, who 'never heard of any either in succession filled the see, but in the fulness of time most even became a trustee of the endowment fund. Two bishops scheme into an order comformable to his own views, and he characteristic, he set to work to bring the details of the With a strenuous patience that was thoroughly men, provided the terms of union were not contrary to sound brave misconstruction for the sake of union with any Christian or fancy church, Mr. Gladstone declared himself ready 'to what he himself called the inauguration of an experimental making a new church out them, and resolute against Hope called gathering up the scraps of Christendom and dustrious man. 12 While resolute against any plan for what for 'Gladstone is a good man and a clever man and an inhealth of the new prelate, and this gave Ashley pleasure at Bunsen's rejoicing in the bishopric, and proposing the for objection. Ashley describes him (October 16) at a dinner moved slowly, and laboured to remove practical grounds according to his general manner in all dubious cases, he circumstance the perils of the logical short cut. Hence, trenchant blade; but nobody ever knew better in complex Chadatone when he liked, no logician could wield a more that amazed him. Here is a passage from his diary:—

the admirer of both.' But not more of that development and of all health (some tending even to say the church of England, but seem to consider the main condition renewal and development of the catholic idea within the pale of and their friends. It is startling. They look not merely to the ariters of the ulterior section of the Oxford writers subject of our recent letters. I made it my object to learn from July 31, 1842.—Walk with R. Williams to converse on the

3, ad fin. Apologia, chapter i. chapters 15-17. Bee Memoirs of J. R. Hope-Scott, Frederick had no children? wonderful than Bunsen forgetting that great-grandson of Frederick the Great, Earl of Shaftesbury, the friend of Voltaire, should write thus to the is, that the great-grandson of Anthony which he exclaims how wonderful it is a letter from Bunsen (p. 373), in Life of Shaftesbury, i. p. 377. There

That is to say, what he proposed to his cabinet early in Condended December was not the total and immediate repeal to which he was led by events before the end of the month.

II

The acceptance of office vacated the seat at Newark, and Mr. Gladstone declined to offer himself again as a candidate. He had been member for Newark for thirteen years, and had been five times elected. So ended his connection with the first of the five constituencies that in his course he represented. 'I part from my constituents,' he tells his father, with deep regret. Though I took office under circumstances which might reasonably arouse the jealousy of my friends, an agricultural constituency, the great majority of my committee were prepared to support me, and took action and strong measures in my favour.' 'My deep obligation,' he says, 'to the Duke of Newcastle for the great benefit he conferred upon me, not only by his unbroken support, but, far above all, by his original introduction of me to the constituency, made it my duty at once to decline some overtures made to me for the support of my re-election, so it only remained to seek a seat elsewhere.' Some faint hopes were entertained by Mr. Gladstone's friends that the duke might allow him to sit for the rest of the parliament, but the duke was not the man to make concessions to a betrayer of the territorial interest. Mr. Gladstone, too, we must not forget, was still and for many years to come, a tory. When it was suggested that he might stand for North Notts, he wrote to Lord Lincoln:—'It is not for one of my political opinions without an extreme necessity to stand upon the basis of democratic or popular feeling against the local proprietary: for you who are placed in the soil the case is very different.'

Soon after the session of 1846 began, it became known that the protectionist petition against the Peelite or liberal sitting member for Wigan was likely to succeed in unseating him. 'Proposals were made to me to succeed him, which were held to be eligible. I even wrote my address; on a certain day, I was going down by the mail train. But it was an object for our opponents to keep a

Oct. 28, 1843.—S. Simon and S. Jude. St. James's 11 A.M. with —: snut it sind ed of the inner life of a great Christian teacher.' In his diary, sions of some taust gambling for his soul, than the records man's language, 'forgive me if I say it, more like the expres-Manning, 'I am at my wit's end.' He found some of Newot etagger to and fro like a drumken man, he wrote to they threw upon the writer's probity of mind if not of heart. which they pointed, but from the ill-omened shadow that shock was extreme, not only by reason of the catastrophe to (chapter iv. § 2) to tell their own tale. To Mr. Gladstone their ences between them. The letters stand in the Apologia great difficulty in making Dr. Pusey understand the differ-· terval. 1 But Newman has told us that he had from the first might be taken by surprise or might trust me in the inautumn of 1843, and begged him to tell others, that no one Pusey that I expected to leave the church of England in the regarded as candid. For Newman says, 'I formally told secession. In a man of the world this would not have been portentous, but did not believe that they necessarily meant arəw retted that the expressions in Newman's letter were doctrines of Tract Ninety. Dr. Pusey, on the other hand, repudiation alike by episcopal and university authority of the anglicanism had been totally undermined by the sweeping were both convinced, that the foundations of their leader's ceived from Newman, indicating only too plainly, as they Manning sent to Mr. Gladstone two letters that he had resought disciples. This was the autumn of 1843. In October by the restlessness alike of unprovoked opponents and ungo about his own business so far as he might be permitted of Athanasius, to attend to his little parish, and generally to o.c. 28, 1845.—5. Simon and S. Jude. Sc. James s II A.M. With a heavy heart. Another letter had come from Manning, enclosing a second from Mewman, which announced that since the summer of 1839 he had had the conviction that the church of Rome is the catholic church, and ours not a branch of the catholic church because not in communion with Rome; that he had resigned St. Many's because he felt he could not with a safe conscience longer blany's because he felt he could not with a safe conscience longer words and sound, that might prevent some of the worst Ci mistakes of some of the best men.

III

This memorable session of 1846 was not a session of argument, but of lobby computations. The case had been argued to the dregs, the conclusion was fixed, and all interest was centred in the play of forces, the working of high motives and low, the balance of parties, the secret ambitions and antagonism of persons. Mr. Gladstone therefore was not in the shaping of the parliamentary result seriously missed, as he had been missed in 1845. 'It soon became evident,' says a leading whig in his journal of the time, 'that Peel had very much over-rated his strength. Even the expectation of December that he could have carried with him enough of his own followers to enable Lord John, if that statesman had contrived to form a government, to pass the repeal of the corn law, was perceived to have been groundless, when the formidable number of the protectionist dissentients appeared. So many even of those who remained with Peel avowed that they disapproved of the measure, and only voted in its favour for the purpose of supporting Peel's government.' The tyranny of the accomplished fact obscures one's sense of the danger that Peel's high courage averted. It is not certain that Lord John as head of a government could have carried the whole body of whigs for total and immediate repeal, Lord Lansdowne and Palmerston openly stating their preference for a fixed duty, and not a few of the smaller men cursing the precipitancy of the Edinburgh letter. It is certain, as is intimated above, that Peel could not have carried over to him the whole of the 112 men who voted for repeal solely because it was his measure. In the course of this session Sir John Hobhouse met Mr. Disraeli at an evening party, and expressed a fear lest Peel having broken up one party would also be the means of breaking up the other. 'That, you may depend upon it, he will,' replied Disraeli, 'or any other party that he has anything to do with.' It was not long after this, when all anything of true value. be devoted, and indeed from such devotion alone can they derive that life, strength, and all means and faculties, ought freely to the fortunes of the church; to which I desire to feel with you take counsel with you upon those absorbing subjects and upon as I trust, to say what a resource and privilege it is to me to been too warm, free, and confiding to make it necessary for me, them; and indeed our communications have now for many years With regard to your own feelings believe me that I enter into of the community regard with prejudice and deep suspicion. has no πίστις ήθική: much more then one whom a great majority those two letters are quite enough to condemn a man in whom one proceeded honestly; no doubt that he can show it; but I say that of what he knew to be untrue. I have no doubt of his having his 'committing himself again' was simply a deliberate protestation mind, for instance to your own. But surely it will be said that having, however, tried my own views by reference to some other at a time when as now, summa res agitur, to tell him so, after upon the terms which would warrant it, I should feel it my duty, I see the parts of his two statements; and that were I spellbound and entranced, he could not fail to see the gross moral of their connection. And further I am persuaded that were he not

VOL. I.

The next blow was struck in the summer of 1844 by Ward's Ideal of a Christian Church, which had the remarkable effect of harassing and afflicting all the three high camps—the historical anglicans, the Puseyites and moderate tractarians, and finally the Newmanites and moderate formanisers.² The writer was one of the most powerful dialecticians of the day, defiant, aggressive, implacable in his logic, unflinching in any stand that he chose to take; the master-representative of tactics and a temper like the master-representative of tactics and a temper like those to which Laud and Strafford gave the pungent name of Thorough. It was not its 'theology, still less its history, of Thorough. It was not its 'theology, still less its history, of Thorough.

a For a full account of this book and its consequences the reader will always consult chapters xi., xii., and xiii., of Mr. Wilfrid Ward's admirably written work, William George Ward and the Oxford Morement.

I the was on the fifth of November, a week after this, correspondence, that Manning preached the Guy Fawkes sermon which caused Mewman to send J. A. Fronde to the door to tell Manning that he was 'not at tell Manning that he was 'not at home.'—Purcell, i. pp. 245-9.

and with the Duke of Wellington's in the opposite sense. The duke, in my opinion, was right and Peel wrong, but he had borne the brunt of battle already beyond the measure of human strength, and who can wonder that his heart and soul as well as his physical organization needed rest?

In announcing his retirement to the House (June 29), Peel passed a magnanimous and magnificent eulogium on Cobden.² Strange to say, the panegyric gave much offence, and among others to Mr. Gladstone. The next day he entered in his diary:—

Much comment is made upon Peel's declaration about Cobden last night. My objection to it is that it did not do full justice. For if his power of discussion has been great and his end good, his tone has been most harsh and his imputation of bad and vile motives to honourable men incessant. I do not think the thing was done in a manner altogether worthy of Peel's mind. But he, like some smaller men, is, I think, very sensible of the sweetness of the cheers of opponents.

He describes himself at the time as 'grieved and hurt' at these closing sentences; and even a year later, in answer to some inquiry from his father, who still remained protectionist, he wrote: 'July 1, '47.—I do not know anything about Peel's having repented of his speech about Cobden; but I hope that he has seen the great objection to which it is, as I think, fairly open.' Some of his own men who voted for Peel declared that after this speech they bitterly repented.

The suspected personal significance of the Cobden panegyric is described in a memorandum written by Mr. Gladstone a few days later (July 12):—

A day or two afterwards I met Lord Stanley crossing the park,

¹ Cobden also wrote to Peel strongly urging him to hold on, and Peel replied with an effective defence of his own view. Life of Cobden, i. chap. 18.

2 'There is a name that ought to be associated with the success of these measures; it is not the name of Lord John Russell, neither is it my name. Sir, the name which ought to be, and will be, associated with these measures is the name of a man who, aeting from pure and disinterested motives, has advocated their cause with untiring energy, and by appeals to reason expressed by an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned—the name which ought to be associated with the success of these measures is the name of Richard Cobden. Without seruple, Sir, I attribute the success of these measures to him.'

We have a glimpse of the passionate agitation into which which it was well to plant in a periodical like the Quarterly the long run satisfied that things were left standing in it in some places 'almost to tatters'; but the writer was in revision, mutilation, and re-revision, reducing the argument and contributor, followed by an immense amount of irksome in a non-natural.': The end was a concordat between editor a natural sense, before you condemn me for subscribing of the recognised parties in the church can subscribe in As Ward himself had virtually put it, 'Show me how any tion consistency might entail, if that game were once begun. should be had of what judicial proceedings in another direceven judicial proceedings in one direction, due consideration Reformation a term of communion; and third, that before England does not make assent to the proceedings of the is bad and should be stopped; second, that the church of of mobbing out by invective and private interpretations that what he sought was three things, first that the process do not know when they are beat, saw his editor; declared describing things fruly as 'one of those soldiers who Mr. Gladstone's main object in writing. Mr. Gladstone, and the expression of such a judgment he suspected to be to be taken by the authorities of church and university, Review committing itself to a judgment on the line proper the canons of the church, and he could not approve of the Ward's book, and not only these, but also the Articles and that he had very seriously studied the article and studied palace. He represented that the Queen was sorely grieved at this change; which indeed I had already heard from Catherine through Lady Lyttelton, but this showed that it continued. And again on Monday we heard through Lady Lyttelton that the Queen said it was a comfort to think that the work of that day would soon be over. It appears too that she spoke of the kindness she had received from her late ministers; and that the Prince's sentiments are quite as decided.

We have a glimpse of the passionate agitation into which this great controversy, partly theologic, partly moral, threw Mr. Gladstone:—

Aristotle's politics and on the Oxford proceedings. I grew hot, for which ignoscat Deus. Feb. 13.—Oxford l-5. We were in the theatre. Ward was like himself, honest to a fault, as little like an advocate in his line of argument as well could be, and strained his theology even a point further than before. The forms are venerable, the sight imposing; the act is fearful [the degradation venerable, the sight imposing; the act is fearful [the degradation of Ward], if it did not leave strong hope of its revisal by law.

On Monday we delivered up the seals at our several audiences. Her Majesty said simply but very kindly to me, 'I am' very sorry to receive them from you.' I thanked her for my father's baronetcy, and apologised for his not coming to court. She had her glove half off, which made me think I was to kiss hands; but she simply bowed and retired. Her eyes told tales, but she smiled and put on a cheerful countenance. It was in fact the 1st of September 1841 over again as to feelings; but this time with more mature judgment and longer experience. Lord Aberdeen and Sir J. Graham kissed hands, but this was by favour.

The same night I saw Sidney Herbert at Lady Pembroke's. He gave me in great part the same view of Sir R. Peel's speech, himself holding the same opinion with Lord Aberdeen. But he thought that Peel's natural temper, which he said is very violent though usually under thorough discipline, broke out and coloured that part of the speech, but that the end in view was to cut off all possibility of reunion. He referred to a late conversation with Peel, in which Peel had intimated his intention of remaining in parliament and acting for himself without party, to which Herbert replied that he knew of no minister who had done so except Lord Bute, a bad precedent. Peel rejoined 'Lord Grenville,' showing that his mind had been at work upon the subject. He had heard him not long ago discussing his position with Lord Aberdeen and Sir James Graham, when he said, putting his hand up to the side of his head, 'Ah! you do not know what I suffer here.'

Yesterday Lord Lyndhurst called on me. . . . He proceeded to ask me what I thought with respect to our political course. He said he conceived that the quarrel was a bygone quarrel, that the animosities attending it ought now to be forgotten, and the old relations of amity and confidence among the members with favour upon that particular sort of toleration which arose out of the need for comprehension. When the six doctors condemned Pusey (June 1843) for preaching heresy and punished him by suspension, Mr. Gladstone was one of those who signed a vigorous protest against a verdict and a sentence passed upon an offender without hearing him and without stating reasons. This was at least the good beginning of an education in liberal rudiments.

II.

Most ordinary churchmen remained where they were. at his judgment, i beyond measure, Mr. Gladstone would proceed, and startled besirgues arw I' . Atunt to their was their bond nommos clusion. Manning's answer was slow and deliberate; 'Their of such various circumstance, to come to the same conled men of-intellect so different, of characters so opposite, perplexed him: what was the common bond of union that sought from Manning an answer to the question that sorely heard Mr. Gladstone tell the story how about this time he followed by a host of other converts. More than once I have The leader who had wielded a magician's power in Oxford was anything like the full amount of its calamitous importance. Gladstone said that it has never yet been estimated at received into the Roman communion. Of this step Mr. In October 1845 the earthquake came. Newman was

An erastian statesman of our own time, when alarmists An erastian statesman of our own time, when alarmists An erastian statesman of our own time, when alarmists ran to be a most and their wives had just gone over to Rome, replied with calm, 'Show me a couple of grocers and their wives who have gone over, then you will frighten me.' The great body of church people stood firm, and so did Pusey, Keble, Gladstone, and so too, for half a dozen years to come, did his two closest friends, Manning and Hope. The dominant note in Mr. Gladstone's mind was clear and it was constant. As he put it to stone's mind was clear and it was constant. As he put it to for the church of Rome in respect of her virtues and her for the church of Rome in respect of her virtues and her glories, is of course right and obligatory; but one is equally glories, is of course right and obligatory; but one is equally things and persons absent often are, in comparison with the CI present. At dinner I sat between Graham and Joeelyn. The latter observed particularly on the absence from Sir R. Peel's speech of any acknowledgment towards his supporters and his colleagues. These last, however, are named. Joeelyn said the new government were much divided. . . . Jocelyn believes that Lord Palmerston will not be very long in union with this cabinet.

With Sir J. Graham I had much interesting conversation. I told him, I thought it but fair to mention to him the regret and blame which I found to have been elieited from all persons whom I saw and conversed with, by the passage relating to Cobden. said he believed it was the same on all hands; and that the new government in particular were most indignant at it. He feared that it was deliberately preconceived and for the purpose; and went on to repeat what Lord Aberdeen had told me, that Sir R. Peel had been within an ace of quitting parliament, and was determined to abjure party and stand aloof for ever, and never resume office. I replied as before, that in the House of Commons it was impossible. He went on to sketch the same kind of future for himself. He was weary of labour at thirteen or fourteen hours a day, and of the intolerable abuse to which he was obliged to submit; but his habits were formed in the House of Commons and for it, and he was desirous to continue there as an independent gentleman, taking part from time to time in public business as he might find oceasion, and giving his leisure to his family and to books. I said, 'Are you not building houses of eards? Do you coneeive that men who have played a great part, who have swayed the great moving forces of the state, who have led the House of Commons and given the tone to public policy, can at their will remain there, but renounce the consequences of their remaining, and refuse to fulfil what must fall to them in some eontingency of public affairs? The country will demand that they who are the ablest shall not stand by inactive.' He said Sir Robert Peel had all but given up his seat. I answered that would at any rate have made his resolution a praeticable one.

He said, 'You can have no conception of what the virulence is against Pecl and me.' I said, No; that from having been out of parliament during these debates my sense of these things was less with favour upon that particular sort of toleration which arose out of the need for comprehension. When the six doctors condemned Pusey (June 1843) for preaching heresy and punished him by suspension, Mr. Gladstone was one of those who signed a vigorous protest against a verdict and a sentence passed upon an offender without hearing him and without stating reasons. This was at least the good beginning of an education in liberal rudiments.

III

In October 1845 the earthquake came. Newman was received into the Roman communion. Of this step Mr. Gladstone said that it has never yet been estimated at anything like the full amount of its calamitous importance. The leader who had wielded a magician's power in Oxford was followed by a host of other converts. More than once I have sought from Manning an answer to the question that sorely perplexed him: what was the common bond of union that led men of-intellect so different, of characters so opposite, of such various circumstance, to come to the same conclusion. Manning's answer was slow and deliberate; 'Their common bond is their want of truth.' I was surprised beyond measure, Mr. Gladstone would proceed, and startled so his judgment.'

Most ordinary churchmen remained where they were an erastian statesman of our own time, when alarmists ran to him with the news that a couple of noblemen and their wives had just gone over to Rome, replied with calm, Show me a couple of grocers and their wives who have gone over, then you will frighten me.' The great body of church people stood firm, and so did Pusey, Keble, Gladstone, and so too, for half a dozen years to come, did his two closest friends, Manning and Hope. The dominant note in Mr. Gladstone, stone's mind was clear and it was constant. As he put it to hlanning (August I, 1845),—'That one should entertain love for the church of Rome in respect of her virtues and her glories, is of course right and obligatory; but one is equally glories, is of course right and obligatory; but one is equally

IV

Still more interesting is an interview with the fallen minister himself, written ten days after it took place:—

July 24.—On Monday the 13th I visited Sir R. Peel, and found him in his dressing-room laid up with a cut in one of his feet. immediate purpose was to let him know the accounts from New Zcaland which Lord Grey had communicated to me. . . . However I led on from subject to subject, for I thought it my duty not to quit town, at the end possibly of my political connection with Sir R. Peel, that is if he determined to individualise himself, without giving the opportunity at least for free communication. Though he opened nothing, yet he followed unreluctantly. I said the government appeared to show signs of internal discord or He said, Yes; related that Lord John did not mean to include Lord Grey, that he sent Sir G. Grey and C. Wood to propitiate him, that Lord Grey was not only not hostile but volunteered his services. At last I broke the ice and said, 'You have seen Lord Lyndhurst.' He said, 'Yes.' I mentioned the substance of my interview with Lord Lyndhurst, and also what I had heard from Goulburn of his. He said, 'I am hors de combat. I said to him, 'Is that possible? Whatever your present intentions may be, can it be done?' He said he had been twice prime minister, and nothing should induce him again to take part in the formation of a government; the labour and anxiety were too great; and he repeated more than once emphatically with regard to the work of his post, 'No one in the least degree knows what it is. I have told the Queen that I part from her with the deepest sentiments of gratitude and attachment; but that there is one thing she must not ask of me, and that is to place myself again in the same position.' Then he spoke of the immense accumulation. 'There is the whole correspondence with the Queen, several times a day, and all requiring to be in my own hand, and to be carefully done; the whole correspondence with peers and members you may in his general polities, or you may not; complain you may, if you think you have cause, of the mode and force with which in the freedom of debate he commonly states his opinions in this House. But it is impossible for us to deny that those benefits of which we are now acknowledging the existence are, in no small part at any rate, due to the labours in which he has borne so prominent a share.'

in appearance of our clergy, Newman and Dr. Mill. He surprises me by the extent of his information and the way in which he knows the details of what takes place in England. Most of our conversation related to it. He seemed to me one of the most liberal and catholic in mind of all the persons of his communion whom I have known. To-morrow I am to have tea with him again, and there is to be a third, Dr. Görres, who is a man of eminence among them. Do not think he has designs upon me. Indeed he disarms my suspicions in that respect by what appears to me a great sincerity. . . .

the people that by money payments they could procure the release he said he believed it was true that the preachers represented to subject of indulgences which moved Luther to resist them; and with such a sentiment of the doctrine that was taught on the frequently taught in the church of Rome. Last night he spoke oot si tadt lesb tærer a great deal that is too religion has to contend in Germany. Lastly, I may be wrong, but acter, and he does not at all slur over the mischief with which Calvinist. He is a great admirer of England and English charand said it was so striking that he could not have been a real Archbishop Leighton he expressed great admiration of his piety, very words, declaring that to be his opinion. Again, speaking of strong, and even presumptuous, but he took me up and used the thing to that effect. But I hesitated, thinking it perhaps too was about to add, he would then have been a great saint, or someturn him to account, or if he had been in the church of-Rome I ruling power in our church had had energy and a right mind to his own views and intuitions were not heretical, and that if the can find it. For instance, when in speaking of Wesley I said that between us, and to have a mind to appreciate good wherever he church of England, apart from the (so to speak) party question Rio, seems to take hearty interest in the progress of religion in the or what crowns other causes of liking towards him, is that he, like one o'clock, I have lost my heart to him. What I like perhaps most, spent a good deal of time in Dr. Dollinger's company, last night till seen a great deal that is interesting in the way of art, and having though I have not seen all the sights of Munich I have certainly Oct. 2.—On Tuesday after post I began to look about me; and

House of Commons. Then I must, of various departments, such sequence; the sitting seven or eight course, have my mind in the of parliament, in my own hand, as whours a day to listen in the TRIUMPH OF POLICY—FA 867 with them. I can hardly tell you, fon there is the difficulty that as the Oregon question for example, an instance, what trouble the principal subjects connected with the d all the reading connected you have in conducting such ques New Zealand question gave me. Thettions on account woman anti-popish in spirit, she will push the argument against them to all extremes.

I was at the same time that he read Bunsen's book on the read bunsen's pook of the read

I need spend no time in pointing out how inevitably the virtues of England are alike against it. instrument of the work of God among us; the faults and of being powerfully modified in spirit, it never can be the (June 23, 1850), that if the Roman system is incapable With my whole soul I am convinced, he says to Manning faith within the boundaries of anglican form and institution. journey would rather confirm than weaken his theological nor wavers. None the less, these impressions of his German an instant, or in any of his moods, open. He never doubts faltering accent in respect of Rome. The question is not for stone's letters to Manning or to Hope is there a single still the great catholic doctor. At no time in Mr. Gladand the ripe thinking and massive learning of one who was contrast with the spiritual graces of these catholic ladies, can.' Bunsen would seem all the more dismal from the I as ylbnizi as os yas ot min to triny sum I bas', enots the church. It is dismal, he wrote home to Mrs. Glad-It was at the same time that he read Bunsen's book on

VOL. I. to deny that doctrine. This legislation rendered unitarian had repealed the act of William III. that made it blasphemy affecting the doctrine of the Trinity. In 1813 parliament belief in certain church articles, including especially those dissenting ministers from the necessity of declaring their was obvious. In 1779 parliament had relieved protestant estates and their manor-houses. The equity of the thing protected gentlemen in the peaceful enjoyment of their to unitarian chapels the same principle of prescription that nothing more revolutionary or latitudinarian than to apply what was known as the Lady Hewley case, and its object was and purest motives.' It arose from a judicial decision in honest, an excellent bill, introduced from none but the best good tories like Sir Robert Inglis. Peel, to his great honour, in that year brought in what Macaulay truly called 'an parted company with the high ecclesiastical principles of old moorings of his first book. Even in 1844 he had these new currents drew Mr. Gladstone away from the dispositions towards it, would be materially changed. . . . close quarters, your expectations from an administration, and your if you thus had been accustomed to look into public questions at as one responsible for the movements of great parliamentary bodies, and upright mind, you had been called upon for years to consult entertain the strongest impression that if, with your honourable parliament, for I am now virtually such, ask no more. And I do the circumstances of the times I can as an independent member of tain an unblemished character, it is my fixed conviction that under they prevent others from doing a good deal of evil, if they mainfrom any government are very small. If they do a little good, if of political life. But now my expectations not only from this but which, from a distance and in the abstract, I had once entertained were to estimate its results by a comparison with the anticipations working of a conservative government. And so should I be if I Jan. 30, 1845.—You, I have no doubt, are disappointed as to the

K Lord John was then acting with the Young England group inspired by Disraeli, who has left a picture of them in Sybil, the most far-seeing of all his novels.

To Lord John Manners.

The principles and moral powers of government as such are sinking day by day, and it is not by laws and parliaments that they can be renovated. . . . I must venture even one step further, and say that such schemes of regeneration as those which were propounded (not, I am bound to add, by you) at Manchester, appear to me to be most mournful delusions; and their re-issue, for their resal parentage is elsewhere, from the bosom of the party to which we belong, an omen of the worst kind if they were likely to obtain currency under the new sanction they have received. It is most do I in word or in heart presume to blame you; but I should do I in word or in heart presume to blame you; but I should do I in word or in heart presume to blame you; but I should sorely blame myself if with my experience and convictions of the growing impotence of government for its highest functions, I were either to recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts beyond its powers, which would react unto recommend attempts of the a party to who followed Mr. Gladstone, made a decidedly striking observation. He declared how delighted he was to hear from such high authority that the bill was perfectly reconcilable with the strictest and the sternest principles of state conscience. 'I cannot doubt,' he continued,' that the right hon. gentleman, the champion of free trade, will ere long become the advocate of the most unrestricted liberty of thought.' Time was to justify Sheil's acute prediction. Unquestionably the line of argument that suggested it was a great advance from the arguments of 1838, of which Macaulay had said that they would warrant the roasting of dissenters at slow fires.

¹ Some proceedings, I think, of Mr. Disraeli and his Young England friends.

4 T

could write down in a few lines, he says to Manning, the one direction, the inward voice drew him in the other. I incessantly present to his mind. Manning pressed him in church can be most effectually performed in parliament was unavailable.' The question whether the service of the current, that even if they be sound, they may become wholly serving her are getting so fearfully wide of those generally for the service of the church, and my views of the mode of from public life, For, I profess to remain there (to myself) 'I could get a synodical decision in favour of my retirement wish,' he writes to Manning (March 8, 1846) good humouredly, I' and dilemma of his early years still tormented him. I glory; but what a leap to it, over what a gulf. For himself, the elect. In the farthest distance there is peace, truth, promise,' he cried, 'indeed stands sure to the church and was the laying waste of the heritage of the Lord. The afresh, its purity secured. What wrung him with affliction institutions by which faith is spread, its lamps trimmed astical master-builders, for strengthening and extending the bottom more like the passion of the great popes and ecclesinow sent so many flocking into the Roman fold. It was at stress of argument, of pious sensibility, of spiritual panie, personal salvation and sanctification, which under sharp inflamed him was not in the main place that solicitude for In this yast field of human interest what engaged and clergy; 'the spectacle of some of the most gifted sons reared by Oxford for the service of the church of England, hurling at her head the hottest bolts of the Vatican; and along with this strange deflexion on one side, a not less convulsive rationalist movement on the other,—all ending in contention and estrangement, and in suspicions worse than either, here less accessible and more intractable.

11

England were not meant to bind all men to every opinion namely that the authoritative documents of the church of it is an a b c truth, almost a truism of the reign of Elizabeth, mainly to argue, I believe not only that he is right, but that As far as regards the proposition for which he intended outside the church of England in point of spirit and sympathy. of view exclusively, he has in writing it placed himself quite inclined to defection, and therefore occupying their point mind turned for the moment so entirely towards those is that, doubtless with very honest intentions and with his The most serious feature in the tract to my mind of Froude's Remains, and Newman has again burned his to Lord Lyttelton, is like a repetition of the publication the Times which I read by desire of Sir R. Inglis,' he writes and the world would take it. 'This No. Ninety of Tructs for as to its drift, its intentions, the way in which the church as we have seen, regarded Tract Minety with uneasy doubts. man's endeavour it was in the Articles still. Air. Gladstone, worst to disfigure and to mutilate, and yet-in spite of all bring out the old eatholic truth that man had done his trom the glosses encrusting them, like barnacles, and to and his friends, was the famous attempt to clear the Articles by Tract Minety (1841). This, in the language of its author (1838)' with repeated regrets.' Then came the blaze kindled Mr. Gladstone read the first instalment of this book high-churchmen in an essentially anti-protestant direclighting the path of divergence from the lines of historical publication of Froude's Remains-was the first flagrant beacon I do not ask the reader in any detail to retrace them. The The landmarks of the Tractarian story are familiar, and only effectual defence of the church in the House of Commons, as the want of it is now our weakness there. It is not everything that calls itself a defence that is really such.

The following to Mr. Phillimore sums up the case an so continue.' (Dec. 7, 1846.) i tand bod to llive and ai ti angia tnasarq mort agbul of the good principle against the bad one. That has conflict may go on as now, and with a progressive whole anti-puritanic, and what we should call catholic. either split or become heretical. As it is, the basis is on episcopal and collegiate teaching, then the church must the same sphere. If puritanical doctrines were the base of were equally developed they could not subsist together in English church vitally opposed to one another, and if they in the English church. There are two systems, he says, in the that with at least as much countenance from authority abides corrodes' the life of the Roman church, and the puritanism bas swang that the superstition and idolatry that graws and their fusion.' Later, he thinks that he finds a truer analogy of the two church sections insignificant, and so to cause nation and church became so wide as to make the rivalries Revolution burst upon both. Then the breach between by the force of the church; they were in full vigour when the unity of wolf and lamb. Their differences were not absorbed anti-Jansenist dwelt within the church of Rome with the in conflict within the church of England, Jansenist and than any for which puritan and eatholic principles have been Recollect that for a century and a half, a much longer period her struggles, she has a great providential destiny before her. (Aug. 31, 1846), 'than the opposite idea. She will live through 'Nothing can be firmer in my mind,' Mr. Gladstone replied belief, that the church of England must split asunder. Manning expressed a strong fear, amounting almost to a everything that calls itself a defence that is really such.' 1 replied the church is now in a condition in which her children may and recipied feed her national position

Then believed it to stand (June 24, 1847) :—: (Тье эма (June 24, 1847)

grant in 1845, and then the far wilder storm about the papal it greatly aggravated, first the storm about the Maynooth those days to be ultra-protestant was to be anti-Irish; and the worse the feeling between England and Ireland, for in to members of the church of Rome itself. It affected for either justice or logic extended from hatred of Romanisers aggression six years later.

Nobody could be more of a logician than Mr. catholics. Mr. Gladstone could not be drawn to go these mussulman against the Greek orthodox and the Latin could hear of, and even form a sort of league with the nestorians, jacobites, monophysites, and all the heretics one to be a church, could become an associate and protector of Newman asked how the anglican church, without ceasing and Pusey soon came to their mind. With caustic scorn whole design in root and branch as a betrayal of the church, Hope, with a keener instinct for their position, distrusted the church in the city of the Holy Sepulchre; but Newman and liked the idea of a bishop to represent the ancient British pattern for the church of England: Pusey at first rather liturgies and subscribing different articles, -his favourite at Jerusalem would comprehend persons using different Dr. Arnold was delighted at the thought that the new church possessed in the Greek church and France in the Latin. such an instrument in those uncomfortable regions, as Russia hoped that England might find in the new protestant church into true episcopacy. Politics were not absent, and some over the Lutherans and others of his subjects by this side-door a restoration of Israel, and the king of Prussia hoped to gain the evangelicals were keen for it as the blessed beginning of among the more logical of the high churchmen. Ashley and enthusiasm in the religious world, but it deepened alarm disposed to accept his authority. The scheme stirried much of the church of England or anybody else who might be miscellaneous region, of any German protestants or members quarters at Jerusalem, was to take charge through a somewhat alternately by Great Britain and Prussia and with his head-(1841) in a fantastic project by which a bishop, appointed Further fuel for excitement was supplied the same year only effectual defence of the church in the House of Commons, as the want of it is now our weakness there. It is not everything that calls itself a defence that is really such.

The following to Mr. Phillimore sums up the case as he so continue.' (Dec. 7, 1846.) judge from present signs it is the will of God that it should on the whole the course of things during our lifetime, and to of the good principle against the bad one. That has been conflict may go on as now, and with a progressive advance whole anti-puritanic, and what we should call catholic. either split or become heretical. As it is, the basis is on the episcopal and collegiate teaching, then the church must the same sphere. If puritanical doctrines were the base of were equally developed they could not subsist together in English church vitally opposed to one another, and if they in the English church. There are two systems, he says, in the that with at least as much countenance from authority abides corrodes' the life of the Roman church, and the puritanism between the superstition and idolatry that gnave and their fusion.' Later, he thinks that he finds a truer analogy of the two church sections insignificant, and so to cause nation and church became so wide as to make the rivalries Revolution burst upon both. Then the breach between by the force of the church; they were in full vigour when the unity of wolf and lamb. Their differences were not absorbed anti-Jansenist dwelt within the church of Rome with the in conflict within the church of England, Jansenist and than any for which puritan and eatholic principles have been Recollect that for a century and a half, a much longer period her struggles, she has a great providential destiny before her. (Aug. 31, 1846), 'than the opposite idea. She will live through 'Nothing can be firmer in my mind, Mr. Gladstone replied belief, that the church of England must split asunder. Manning expressed a strong fear, amounting almost to a

then delieved it to stand (June 24, 1847):—

The church is now in a condition in which her children may and must desire that she should keep her national position of all life) to be reunion with the church of Rome as the see of

there to pursue his theological studies, to prepare translations more, a hamlet on the outskirts of the ever venerable city, Ozford; and had retired with a neophyte or two to Littlecussion of ecclesiastical politics; had given up his work in the issue of the Tracts; had withdrawn from all public disthe great enchanter, in obedience to his bishop had dropped Manning and Hope began to approach their closest. Newman, Now was the time at which Mr. Gladstone's relations with the meantime I was anxious to put it down-while fresh. of Christ. All this is matter for very serious consideration. ticular, though of course desiring the reunion of the whole body and who take a different view as to reunion with Rome in parideas on the foundation laid by the church of England as reformed, harmony with those who look mainly to the restoration of catholic the church of England. They expect to work on in practical they render absolute obedience to their ecclesiastical superiors in doctrine de fide is oppugned they must protest; but short of this though neither do they positively deny it. Wherever Roman system of the church of Rome, and they could not have affirmed, They regret what Newman has east strongly against the actual upon which, after mental conflict, they have settled steadily down. Og. ioraT to insmugae out to sized out no nizmer llive bas ob yedt demned anything that the church of Rome has defined defide, but the church of England if they thought that she dogmatically conis somewhere and nowhere but there. They could not remain in not to judge the saints; thirdly, they consider that infallibility Rome, first, because they do not wish to judge; secondly, especially strong feeling of revulsion from actual evils in the church of giving free scope to her own rubrical system. They have no that this can be done to any great degree in working out and the members of the church of England, but do not seem to feel to baim ent gaisisitoats a dguordt bedeser ed ot si bae edt tsdt defined order of proceedings in the way of means.' They consider said, the sole object of Oakeley's life. They do not look to any seek the fulfilment of this work of reunion. It is, for example, he land, and abide in her without love specifically fixed upon her, to They recognise, however, authority in the church of Eng-

Book HH

~98I-L†8I

CHAPTER I

NEMBER FOR OXFORD

(2781)

THERE is not a feature or a point in the national character which has made England great among the nations of the world, that is not strongly developed and plainly traceable in our universities. For eight hundred or a thousand years they have been intimately associated with everything that has concerned the highest interests of the country.—GLADSTONE.

The thing soon happened. happens, place me in marked and public contrast with him. with some reluctance and regret to what must, when it decidedly of the other way of thinking, that I look forward very keen in his protective opinions, and I am so very to wish it warmly on many grounds. But my father is so liament but coldly; feeling at the same time that I ought Lyttelton from Fasque, he tells him: 'I wish to be in parrepeal the corn law. At the end of 1846, writing to Lord Gladstone quitted Newark when he entered the cabinet to fluence of his new constituency. As we have seen, Mr. luminary of ours were perturbations due in fact to the inin the firmament, so some devious motions of this great in the attraction of an unseen and unsuspected neighbour astronomers until they discover the secret of its irregularities affected his political course. As a planet's orbit has puzzled . Gladstone into relations that for many years to come deeply. In 1847 the fortunes of a general election brought Mr.

perished! conscience! How are the mighty fallen and the weapons of war would keep him from hasty steps and resolves with a doubting letters; he was relieved of a heavy heart; yet he trusted that God aid to beased of sau tahr make what use he pleased of his that Manning's interference had only made him the more realise affair of the Jerusalem bishopric, and had increased ever since mitted himself again; that his alarms revived with that wretched reluctantly, he, as the best course under the circumstances, comyears; that in his letter to the Bishop of Oxford, written most catholicity of the English church he had quieted his mind for two teach in her; that by the article in the British Critic on the

Two days later he wrote to Manning again : and flagrant sins have been before it.2 been before my mind in any other sense than as other plain the church of Rome of which some are conscious, has never shrawot noitstquest off, ti tuq of noos aswed at Illstbus conversion to that church by the unfinching names of lapse stone does not, nor did he ever, shrink from designating Roman church had often been far too censorious, Mr. Cladopinion that in many of the Tracts the language about the no shadow of doubt about it. But while repeating his ciples within its bounds, since the time when he entertained rairig siloatses to yawe the eway of eatholic piring her members more catholic from year to year, and how much Oxford heads, perceive the English church to be growing in that Newman did not, in spite of all the pranks of the blue sky where others saw unbroken cloud, he was amazed in every other field, he always insisted on espying patches of With the characteristic spirit with which, in politics and

1 This letter of October 28 is in 2 Mr. Gladstone to Dr. Hook, Jan. Purcell, Manning, i. p. 242. which he has had to do, disgraced in proportion to the proximity general view a disgraced man-and all men, all principles, with mulgation of those two letters to the world, Newman stands in the them as final, are still and strongly to the effect that upon the prothough without more opportunity of testing them I cannot regard Oct. 30, 1843. . . . I have still to say that my impressions, onnovations which had been finally stamped with the censure offence: above all, he had kept clear of all those tractarian no sort of distinction, Mr. Round had at least given no party combined to bring out Mr. Round. If he had achieved fight. The old high-and-dry party and the evangelical it wise at a pretty early hour to withdraw from a triangular and I received Strypes at the hand of the vice-chancellor, years before, wrote to him: -- Ever since the time when you Gladstone in the contest for the Ireland scholarship seventeen the learned Grecian who had been beaten along with Mr. high personal merit and extraordinary natural genius. Scott, stone will appreciate at its full value the support of such right side, and the Oxford chairman is sure that Mr. Glad-Modern Painters (he was still well under thirty), was on the before published the memorable second volume of his his friends inclined to fear. Ruskin, again, who had the year might be trusted to work them into something better than put them together again; but so earnest and good that he busily taking all his opinions to pieces and not beginning to intellect, but also a still deeper admirer of Dante; just now well read in German literature and an admirer of German friend of Carlyle's, Frank Newman's, and others of that stamp ; in numbers and importance among the younger Oxford men, a Gladstone as a very favourable specimen of a class, growing among the younger. Northcote described Clough to Mr. in influence among older men, that of Arthur Clough was his committee, and what that learned veteran's adhesion was on the rival doctrine of social justice. Mr. Hallam joined conscience, while the candidate seemed more than ever bent because he himself held to the high principle of state Glenalmond, found it hard to give Mr. Gladstone his support, Charles Wordsworth, his old tutor and now warden of of the university two years before.

, οβιοβιαστιγίας

1 Frogs, 756; the second line is At least, we carried off one Strype λαβών άγωνος τας ίσας πληγάς έμοι, rpove p. 61. and Gladstone as being good seconds to the winner of the ireland. See the selfsame beating: Good brother-rogue, we've shared translates:-Strype was the book given to Scott Scott's own. An Aristophanic friend apiece.'

and so you became my

that made his book the signal for the explosion; it was doctrine was gradually possessing numbers of English doctrine was gradually possessing numbers of English and holding his fellowship on the tenure of church subscription, had in so subscribing to the Articles renounced no single Roman doctrine. This, and not the six hundred pages of argumentation, was the ringing challenge that provoked a plain issue, precipitated a decisive struggle, and brought the first stage of tractarianism to a close.

what was to be done to Ward. Lockhart wrote to Murray nor the real meaning of Hooker, Jewel, Bull, but simply not the merits or the demerits of Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, so fervid and so distracted. The practical issue after all was the dire perplexities of Lockhart's editorial mind in times meant for the Quarterly Review, and it is easy to imagine as ever blew from the Molian wallet. The article was reviewer undoubtedly let loose upon it as shrewd a blast controversy as frail a bark as ever carried sail, and his sentence, Ward 'had launched on the great deep of human Mill than to the whole range of Christian divines. far greater debt in mental culture to Mr. John Stuart and for the lamentable circumstance that it exhibited a the infatuation of mind manifested in some of its arguments; tor the wild and wanton opinions broached in its pages; for investigations of fact; for the savageness of its censures; reproof for its capricious injustice; for the triviality of its dialectic way. Alr. Gladstone held the book up to stringent reformers and all others whom he found planted in his Ward as Ward himself had dealt trenchantly with the he flew to his intrepid pen, and dealt as trenchantly with in his view so injurious, pass in silence! With indignation portant minister in strong harness, should let a publication, duties, and all the other absorbing occupations of an imof his tariffs, his committees and deputations, his cabinet It was impossible that Mr. Gladstone even in the thick

If was in the midst of these liturgy. An edition of two thousand laborious employments that Mr. Clades copies went off at once, and n as folstone published a prayer-book, comlowed by many editions more.

puled for family use, from the anglican

this election which it makes me blush to speak of. Mr. Ward called the reformation a vile and accursed thing; Mr. Gladstone voted against a certain measure for the condemnation of Mr. Ward; therefore he spoke of the artifice of this kind, said Maurice, 'has been practised in certain way of treating the property of unitarians. One Nicene creed into the same thing as an opinion about a and fervently protesting against making a belief in the the bigoted spirit that this election was warming into life, to a London clergyman vigorously remonstrating against enjoyed in the church of Rome.' Maurice published a letter land, 'because all might be had there that was to be ment, to spow that nobody need leave the church of Engthat he habitually employed 'a Jesuitical system of arguretracted, but at once revived in the still grosser untruth, had gone over to the church of Rome, The fable was fact that a sister of Mr. Gladstone's under his own influence wrote to the newspapers that it was an admitted and notorious stone's refusal to vote for the degradation of Ward. People those who differ from her.' Aluch was made of Mr. Gladchurch of England with the restraint of the civil rights of a disposition to identify the great and noble cause of the But I will never consent to adopt as the test of such doctrine, to the doctrine and constitution of our reformed church. me to the world as a person otherwise than heartily devoted reply (July 26), ' that its writers are not justified in exhibiting testant grounds. 'I humbly trust,' wrote Mr. Gladstone in A circular was issued impugning his position on pro-Gladstone thought the seat the highest of electoral prizes. what it meant to be member for a university, and why Mr. to the church. The reader will thus see the lie of the land, vital truths of Christianity was proclaimed to be a real service tion of the tendency of dissent to drop one by one all the the church and dissent, and Mr. Gladstone's masterly exposisimple justice and involved no principles at issue between great societies for the spread of church principles, the propagation of church doctrines, and the erection of church fabrics. As for the Dissenters' Chapels bill, it was an act of

THE CONTEST

To Dr. Pusey he writes (Feb. 7):-

Indignation at this proposal to treat Mr. Newman worse than a dog really makes me mistrust my judgment, as I suppose one should always do when any proposal seeming to present an aspect of incredible wickedness is advanced. Feb. 17.—I concur with my whole heart and soul in the desire for repose; and I fully believe that the gift of an interval of reflection is that which would be of all gifts the most precious to us all, which would restore the faculty of deliberation now almost lost in storms, and would afford the best hope both of the development of the soundest elements that are in motion amongst us, and of the mitigation or absorption of those which are more dangerous.

In the proceedings at Oxford against Ward (February 13, 1845), Mr. Gladstone voted in the minority both against the condemnation of the book, and against the proposal to strip its writer of his university degree. He held that the censure combined condemnation of opinions with a declaration of personal dishonesty, and the latter question he held to be one 'not fit for the adjudication of a human tribunal.'

nature tolerant, was soon drawn by circumstance to look. probably was not one of those who are as if born by bleak and hazardous shores. Mr. Gladstone, though he a long and painful journey, often unedifying, not seldom squalid, with crooked turns not a few, and before it was over, casting men into strange companionship upon pale of the communion immediately concerned. It was toleration, extending in its consequences far beyond the ordinary importance in the general history of English as good as nameless—all constitute a chapter of extraa host of judgments affecting minor personages almost und Reviews, Colenso, and ended, if they have yet ended, and penalty, on Newman, Pusey, Maurice, Gorham, Essays and legal censures and penalties, or attempts at censure followed down to our own day by academical, ecclesiastical begun with the attack on Hampden in 1836, and then were the established church, yet the series of proceedings that had progress. Though primarily and ostensibly the concern of All this has a marked place in Mr. Gladstoine's mental

Then the voting began. The Gladstonians went into the battle with 1100 promises. Morthcoto, passing vigilant days in the convocation house, sent daily reports to Mr. Gladstone at Fasque. Peel went up to vote for him. At the close of the second day things looked well, but there was no ground for over-confidence. Inglis was six hundred and twenty ahead of Gladstone, and Gladstone only a hundred and twenty ahead of Round. The next day Round fell a little more behind, and when the end came (August 3) the figures stood:—Inglis 1700, Gladstone stone 997, Round 824, giving Gladstone a majority of 173 stone 997, Round 824, giving Cladstone a majority of 173 over his competitor.

Numbers were not the only important point. When the poll came to be analysed by eager statisticians, the decision of the electors was found to have a weight not measured by an extra hundred and seventy votes. For his double-firsts against seven for Round, and of single first-classes he had one hundred and fifty-seven against Round's sixty-six. Of Ireland and thertford scholars Mr. Gladstone had nine to two and three to one respectively; and of chancellor's prizemen who voted he had forty-five against twelve. Of fellows of colleges he had forty-five and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-eight, and his and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-eight, and his and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-eight, and his speaking is sure to rise, he is pre-eminent. — Lang's Life of Lord Iddesleigh, i. pp. 63-67. man of business, and one who humanly which I cordially agree; and as a of principles representative measure; he stands almost alone as I should desire to attach myself. . . He is one whom I respect beyond statesmen of the present day to whom is the man of all others among the сатеет, was chosen. 'Mr. Gladstone,' he wrote to a friend, June 30, 1842, Northcote, who looked to a political three names, Farrer, afterwards Lord Farrer, Morthcote, and Pocock. He suggested mend a successor. plied to Coleridge of Eton to recomtary, Mr. Rawson, to a post in Canada in 1842, Mr. Gladstone appointment of his first private secreprivate secretary to Mr. Gladstone at the board of trade. On the ap-

1 Stafford Northcote had peeu probemus.' princ poqie suffragiis nostris comjura et libertates nostras tueri queat, summa eloquentiæ et argumenti vi, rebus decus et tutamen sit, et qui tum, Academici, cooptare velimus, qui cum omni laude idom nostris theologiæ, philosophiæ, artium studio vacaret. Quæ cum ita sint, si delegapublicia negotiia adeo se dedit quin cinium olus suscepit. Meque vero factam sua ope stabilivit, et patrocolonos nostros plurinis locis labe-Regina fuit, ecclesia Anglicana apud pervenisset, episcopatus quoque eve-heretur, Et quamdiu e scerctis orbis terrarun ecclesia Auglicana quentia contendebat, ut ubicunque et perpaucos summo labore et elola enim erat qui inter primos studium non verba, sed facta, testenecclesian Anglicanam

To Dr. Pusey he writes (Feb. 7):

Indignation at this proposal to treat Mr. Newman worse than a dog really makes me mistrust my judgment, as I suppose one should always do when any proposal seeming to present an aspect of incredible wickedness is advanced. Feb. 17.—I concur with my whole heart and soul in the desire for repose; and I fully believe that the gift of an interval of reflection is that which would be of all gifts the most precious to us all, which would restore the faculty of deliberation now almost lost in storms, and would afford the best hope both of the development of the soundest elements that are in motion amongst us, and of the mitigation or absorption of those which are more dangerous.

In the proceedings at Oxford against Ward (February 13, 1845), Mr. Gladstone voted in the minority both against the condemnation of the book, and against the proposal to strip its writer of his university degree. He held that the censure combined condemnation of opinions with a declaration of personal dishonesty, and the latter question he held to be one 'not fit for the adjudication of a human tribunal.'

nature tolerant, was soon drawn by circumstance to look. probably was not one of those who are as if born by bleak and hazardous shores. Mr. Gladstone, though he was over, easting men into strange companionship upon squalid, with crooked turns not a few, and before it a long and painful journey, often unedifying, not seldom pale of the communion immediately concerned. It was toleration, extending in its consequences far beyond the ordinary importance in the general history of English as good as nameless—all constitute a chapter of extrain a host of judgments affecting minor personages almost und Reviews, Colenso, and ended, if they have yet ended, and penalty, on Newman, Pusey, Maurice, Gorham, Essuys and legal censures and penalties, or attempts at censure followed down to our own day by academical, ecclesiastical begun with the attack on Hampden in 1836, and then were the established church, yet the series of proceedings that had progress. Though primarily and ostensibly the concern of All this has a marked place in Mr. Gladstone's mental

Then the voting began. The Gladstonians went into the battle with 1100 promises. Morthcote, passing vigilant days in the convocation house, sent daily reports to Mr. Gladstone at Fasque. Peel went up to vote for him (splitting for Inglis); Ashley went up to vote against him. At the close of the second day things looked well, but there was no ground for over-confidence. Inglis was six hundred ahead of Gladstone, and Gladstone only a hundred and twenty ahead of Round. The next day Round fell a little more behind, and when the end came (August 3) the figures stood:—Inglis 1700, Gladstone 997, Round 824, giving Gladstone a majority of 173 stone 997, Round 824, giving Gladstone a majority of 173 over his competitor.

Numbers were not the only important point. When the poll came to be analysed by eager statisticians, the decision of the electors was found to have a weight not measured by an extra hundred and seventy votes. For five double-firsts against seven for Round, and of single first-classes he had one hundred and fifty-seven against Round's sixty-six. Of Ireland and Hertford scholars Mr. Gladstone had nine to two and three to one respectively; and of chancellor's prizemen who voted he had forty-five against twelve. Of fellows of colleges he had two hundred and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-eight, and his and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-eight, and his and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-eight, and his

speaking is sure to rise, he is pre-eminent. — Lang's Life of Lord Iddesleigh, i. pp. 63-67. man of business, and one who humanly which I cordially agree; and as a representative of principles measure; he stands almost alone as I should desire to attach myself. . . . He is one whom I respect beyond statesmen of the present day to whom is the man of all others among the he wrote to a friend, June 30, 1842, career, was chosen. 'Mr. Gladstone,' Northcote, who looked to a political three names, Farrer, afterwards Lord Farrer, Morthcote, and Pocock. He suggested mend a successor. plied to Coleridge of Eton to recomtary, Mr. Rawson, to a post in Canada in 1842, Mr. Gladstone appointment of his first private secreprivate secretary to Mr. Gladstone at the board of trade. On the approbemus.' -mos eintean einganthe princ poqie jura et libertates nostras tueri queat, summa eloquentiæ et argumenti vi, rebus decus et tutamen sit, et qui qui cum omni laude idem nostra tum, Academici, cooptare velimus, theologiæ, philosophiæ, artium studio vacaret. Quæ cum ita sint, si delegapublicia negotiis adeo se dedit quin cinium elus susceluit. Meque vero factam sua ope stabilivit, et patrocolonos nostros plurimis locis labe-Regina fuit, ecclesia Anglicana apud Et quanidiu e secretis betvenisset, episcopatus quoque eveorbis terrarum ecclesia Anglicana quentia contendebat, ut ubicunque et perpaucos summo labore et eloeomirq rətni inp tarə minə el studium non verba, sed facta, testenecclesiam Anglicanam ,snlə

Northcote

1 Stafford

pry

peeu

bound under the circumstances of the English church in direct antagonism with Rome to keep clearly in view their very fearful opposites.

-: Siry and of yrota and fourth century and Athanasius contra mundum. Here is sa reading in Döllinger over forty years ago the history of the in after years, ever so much made me anglican versus Roman talent and information.' 'Nothing, Mr. Gladstone once wrote political men, 'good catholics and good men with no ordinary present himself to him, as well as to other learned and and he now begged Mr. Gladstone on no account to fail to Scott had already made the acquaintance of Dr. Döllinger; most interesting and cherished friendships of his life. Hopemind. At Munich he laid the foundation of one of the that could not be without effect upon him significationable and dismal, but the journey brought him into a society a couple of months in Germany. The duty was heavy (September 24-November 18), Mr. Gladstone, passed nearly father's for her advantage, that in the autumn of 1845 vas for the purpose of carrying out some plans of his and spoke strongly in that sense to Dr. Wiseman; and it most. She had feelings of warm attachment to her brother, difficulties that taxed patience and resource to the utter-Roman church, and her somewhat peculiar nature led to to the keen distress of her relatives, his sister had joined the stone in a rather singular atmosphere. In the course of 1842, Things of the great secession happened to find Mr. Chal-

Munich, Sept. 30, 1845.—Yesterday evening after dinner with two travelling companions, an Italian negoziante and a German, I must needs go and have a shilling's worth of the Augsburg Opera, where we heard Mozart (Don Juan) well played and very respect infinite conversation with Dr. Döllinger, who is one of the first among the Roman catholic theologians of Germany, a remarkable and a very pleasing man. His manners have great simplicity and I am astonished at the way in which a busy student such as he is can receive an intruder. His appearance is, singular to say, just can receive an intruder. His appearance is, singular to say, just compounded of those of two men who are among the most striking compounded of those of two men who are among the most striking told may be considered on the whole the fairest exponent of the feelings of the place. Stanley, Jowett, Temple, and others are great names in what is nicknamed the Germanising party. Lake, and perhaps I should say Temple, hold an intermediate position between the two parties. . . . Whatever may have been the evils attendant on the Puscyite movement, and I believe they were neither iew nor small, it has been productive of great results; and it is not a little satisfactory to see how its distinctive features are dying away and the spirit surviving, instead of the spirit departing and leaving a great sham behind it.

Meanwhile he thoroughly enjoyed his much coveted diswith freedom nor quit with honour. vexed and precarious situation, that he could neither hold with his laurels in what too soon proved to be, after all, a between obscurantism and illumination. The victor was left camps, to arm themselves in the new conflict for mastery not last. The two bands speedily drew off into their rival bore Mr. Gladstone to triumph at the poll. The fusion did force and the rising force united to swell the stream that of authority, doubtful of tradition. Yet both the receding ecclesinatical movement, critical, scoptical, liberal, scornful repulse in 1845. It was now to be followed by an antiauthority and tradition, had ended in complete academic their champion. A great ecclesiastical movement, reviving not of the church but of the nation, eagerly took him for for him; the new school who deemed the university an organ ancient and peculiar inheritance of the church were zealous supported him. The old school who looked on Oxford as the of opinion. Dr. Puscy supported him; Stanley and Jowett common rallying-point of two violently antagonistic sections than to find him, as in this curious moment at Oxford, the ardent life Mr. Gladstone was brought, none is more startling of the many strange positions to which in his long and

To Mrs. Aludstone.

tinction:—

Exeter Coll., Nov. 2, 1847.—This morning in company with Sir R. Inglis, and under the protection or chaperonage of the dean, I have made the formal circuit of visits to all the heads of houses of souls from purgatory. I told him that was exactly the doctrine I had heard preached in Messina, and he said a priest preaching so in Germany would be suspended by his bishop.

of them.2

time of Napoleon edited a journal that had a great effect in rousing of his own thoughts. One of them was Dr. Görres, I who in the force the attention of the others, but to be following the current once all four, were speaking at once, very loud, each not trying to But of the others I assure you always two, sometimes three, and Rogers, being as he is a much more refined man than the rest. inaudible as they did, always excepting Dr. Döllinger, who sat like I never saw men who spoke together in a way to make one another have been amused to see and hear them, and me in the midst speak any tongue but their own with any freedom, but you would into them still less, as none of them (except Dr. D.) seemed to esting discussions; I could only follow them in part, and enter professors, or four, and the editor of a paper, who held very inter-For two hours was I there in the midst of five German sweets. mmediately followed by meat supper with beer and wine and meet, to an entertainment which consisted first of weak tea, ot beingw I monw abneirt aid to larevea betivni ed tilgin taad

At Baden-Baden (October 16) he made the acquaintance of Mrs. Craven, the wife of the secretary of the Stuttgart mission, and authoress of the Récit d'une Sour. Some of the personages of that alluring book were of the company. I have drunk tea several times at her house, and have had two or three long conversations with them on matters of religion. They are excessively acute and also full of Christian sentiment. But they are unuch more difficult to make real way with than a professor of theology, because they are determined (what is vulgarly called) to go the they are determined (what is vulgarly called) to go the whole hog, just as in England usually when you find a whole hog, just as in England usually when you find a

Germany to arms. Unfortunately he spoke more thickly than any

call the newspaper a fifth great power. In time Gorres became a vehement altramontane. 2-See Friedrich's Life of Dollinger, ii. pp. 222-226, for a letter from Dol-linger to Mr. Gladstone after his visit, dated Nov. 15, 1845.

Lamous of European publicists and gazetteers between the two revolutionary epochs of 1789 and 1848. His journal was the Rhine Alercury, where the doctrine of a free and united Germany was preached (1814-16) with a force that made Napoleon 16) with a force that made Napoleon

CHAPTER II

THE HAWARDEN ESTATE

(1781)

IT is no Baseness for the Greatest to descend and looke into their owne Estate. Some forbeare it, not upon Megligence alone, But doubting to bring themselves into Melancholy in respect they shall finde it Broken. But wounds cannot be cured without Searching. Hee that cleareth by Degrees induceth a habit of Frugalitie, and gaineth as well upon his Minde, as upon his Estate.—Bacox.

I must here pause for material affairs of money and business, with which, as a rule, in the case of its heroes the public is considered to have little concern. They can no more be altogether omitted here than the bills, acceptances, renewals, printers and publishers can be left out of the story of Sir printers and publishers can be left out of the story of Sir brevity will give the reader little idea of the pre-occupations with which they beset a not inconsiderable proportion of Mr. Gladstone's days. A few sentences in a biography many a time mean long chapters in a life, and what looked like an incident turns out to be an epoch.

Sir Stephen Glynne possessed a small property in Staffordshire of something less than a hundred acres of land, named the Oak Farm, near Stourbridge, and under these acres were valuable seams of coal and ironstone. For this he refused an offer of five-and-thirty thousand pounds in 1835, and under the advice of an energetic and sanguine agent proceeded to its rapid development. On the double marriage in 1839, Sir Stephen associated his two brothers-in-law with himself to the modest extent of one-tenth share each in an enterprise that seemed of high prospective value. Their interests were accounted through their wives, and it is to be presumed that acquired through their wives, and it is to be presumed that nights in our time. Mississippi. The do not often enjoy such parliamentary Hindoos, Peruvians, Mexicans and tribunals beyond the own, from jurists of imperial Rome, sages of old Greece, law and justice with a luxuriance of illustration all his and a reasoner, manfully enforcing principles both of and sound, and Macaulay the speech of an eloquent scholar catholics, Peel and Gladstone made political speeches lofty that had (or perhaps I should say had not) guarded Irish a glittering orator, guarding unitarians by the arguments Follett made a masterly lawyer's speech, Sheil the speech of but because unitarianism was scandalous heresy and sin. not because they had an inch of locus standi in the business, clamour was raised by anglicans, wesleyans, presbyterians, divinity; 'bigotry sought aid from chicane,' and a tremendous a question of property was treated as if it were a question of school-houses, and their burial-grounds. But what was thus other voluntary bodies to their places of worship, their Sregations the same prescriptions as covered the titles of foundations legal, and the bill extended to unitarian con-

Mr. Gladstone supported the proposal on the broadest grounds of unrestricted private judgment:

I went into the subject laboriously, he says, and satisfied myself that this was not to be viewed as a mere quieting of titles based on lapse of time, but that the unitarians were the true lawful holders, because though they did not agree with the puritan opinions they adhered firmly to the puritan principle, which was that scripture was the rule without any binding interpretation, and that each man, or body, or generation must interpretation, and that each man, or body, or generation must interpret for himself. This measure in some ways heightened my enterthor himself. This measure in some ways heightened my enterthormanship, but depressed my church-and-statesmanship.

Far from feeling that there was any contrariety between his principles of religious belief and those on which legislation in their case ought to proceed, he said that the only use he could make of these principles was to apply them to the decisive performance of a great and important act, founded on the everlasting principles of truth and justice. Sheil, time to Mrs. Gladstone:complaint. Here is a moving passage from a letter of the himself nobly free from vexation, murmur, repining, and that sometimes passes muster for true resignation, he kept Yet without a trace of the frozen stoicism or cynical apathy think of total withdrawal from parliament and public life. him, along with the working of other considerations, to duties in the House of Commons.' The load even tempted Farm broke down, as frequently to disqualify me for my private demands upon my mind has been such, since the Oak weight, he writes to his father (June 16, 1849), 'of the life that test whether a man be made of gold or clay. The and inexorable obligation. These, indeed, are the things in called to make both now and later were matter of direct been his own, and as if the financial sacrifice that he was and deliberately took up the burden as if the errors had good fruit in future days at the exchequer. He manfully the customs, rules, maxims, and enrrents of trade and it bore prolonged, uncongunial; but it completed his knowledge of and machinery of industrial life. The labour was immense, he came to serve an arduous apprenticeship in the motions system, he had been well trained in high economics. Now tion with the Bank act and in the growth of the railway At the beard of trade, in the reform of the tariff, in connec-At home he had been bred in the atmosphere of commerce. of the material interests of the country that was new to him. brought him into close and responsible centact with a side a not unimportant biographic fact. These circumstances on Oak Farm alone. Let us note in passing what is, I think, There are a hundred and forty of his letters to Mr. Freshfeld

Fasque, Jan. 20, 1849.—Do not suppose for a moment that it I could by waving my hand strike out for ever from my cares and occupations those which relate to the Oak Farm and Stephen's affairs, I would do so; I have never felt that, have never asked it; and it my language seems to look that way, it is the mere impatience of weakness comforting itself by finding a vent. It has evidently some to me by the ordinance of God; and I am rather trightened to think how light my lot would be, were it removed,

lute truth, but it is not there.'1 is ever to be borne for truth, that is to say for full and absobear witness for the truth. There is a place where witness not of those (excellent as I think them) who say, Remain and all, it must be by a sort of re-conversion from without. I am idea by means of any agency from within itself: that, if at been effected, the state never can come back to the catholic For I hold and believe that when that transition has once of this matter, and which has, I think, no place in yours. of the state which is the determining element in my estimate change now in progress from the catholic to the infidel idea different. Then a pregnant passage: -- It is the essential and what remains to duty is of a character essentially state, such as it was according to the old idea, dies of itself, longer be given, the function of serving the church in the herself," and when it is recognised that active help can no For when the end is attained of letting "the church help who have already placed themselves in this latter sphere. not think it at all absurd to say the same thing to some then; it must depend upon his invard vocation), and should he were otherwise determined by his station, and not always chürch do it in the sanctuary, and not in parliament (unless to say to a young man entering life, If you wish to serve the measures, after the adoption of which I should be prepared

He reproaches himself with being 'actively engaged in carrying on a process of lowering the religious tone of the state, letting it down, demoralising it, and assisting in its transition into one which is mechanical.' The objects that warrant public life in one in whose case executive government must be an element, must be very special. True that in all probability, the church will hold her nationality in substance beyond our day. 'I think she will hold it as long as the monarchy subsists.' So long the church will need parliamentary defence, but in what form? The dissenters parliamentary defence, but in what form? The dissenters had no members for universities, and yet their real representation was far better organized in proportion to its weight than the church, though formally not organized at all than the church, though formally not organized at all. 'Strength with the people will for our day at least be the

In order to give effect to the nearly hopeless resolution thus thousands pounds free from all encumbrance but the jointure. bachelor, possessed of from a hundred to a hundred and twenty sold, it was estimated that he would have come out a wealthy which was certainly counted by hundreds. Had the estate been pay the heavy subvention of the family to the schools of the parish, allowance of £700 a year out of which, I believe, he continued to I think for several years his personal servant; and to take an hoped, but hoped in vain, to let); to give up carriages, horses, and effect was that Sir Stephen had to close the house (which it was sympathised; and it was resolved to persevere. But the first Barker, their lawyer, and Mr. Burnett, the land agent, entirely and every effort and sacrifice to avoid the necessity of sale. Mr. less. But the family were unanimously set upon making any degree surveyed the state of affairs, thought the case was hopeand could not be relied on. Your grandfather, who had in some Farm, the iron property, was under lease to an insolvent company, be supported? There was no income, even less than none. of nearly are size of the paid? How was Sizephen to the income and the liabilities I have named. How was Lady argument was in favour of it, for example the comparison between was considered whether Hawarden should be sold. Every obvious taken at the meeting in London, it was determined to clip the estate by selling £200,000 worth of land. Of this, nearly one-half was to be taken by your uncle Lytielton and myself, in the proportion of about two parts for me and one for him. Neither of us had the power to buy this, but my father enabled me, and of us had the power to buy this, but my father enabled me, and thord Spencer took over his portion. The rest of the sales were effected, a number of fortunate secondary incidents occurred, and the great business of recovering and realising from the Oak Farm was laboriously set about.

Considerable relief was obtained by these and other measures. By 1852, there was a partial but perceptible improvement in the position. The house was reopened in a very quiet way by arrange-position. The house was reopened in a very quiet way by arrangement, and the allowance for Sir Stephen's expenditure was rather more than doubled. But there was nothing like ease for him until the purchase of the reversion was effected by me in 1865. I paid £57,000 for the bulk of the property, subject to debts not

lute truth, but it is not there." is ever to be borne for truth, that is to say for full and absobear witness for the truth. There is a place where witness not of those (excellent as I think them) who say, Remain and all, it must be by a sort of re-conversion from without. I am idea by means of any agency from within itself: that, if at been effected, the state never can come back to the catholic For I hold and believe that when that transition has once of this matter, and which has, I think, no place in yours. of the state which is the determining element in my estimate change now in progress from the catholic to the infidel idea different. Then a pregnant passage:—'It is the essential and what remains of duty is of a character essentially state, such as it was according to the old idea, dies of itself, longer be given, the function of serving the church in the herself," and when it is recognised that active help can no For when the end is attained of letting "the church help who have already placed themselves in this latter sphere. not think it at all absurd to say the same thing to some then; it must depend upon his inward vocation), and should he were otherwise determined by his station, and not always church do it in the sanctuary, and not in parliament (unless to say to a young man entering life, If you wish to serve the measures, after the adoption of which I should be prepared

He reproaches himself with being 'actively engaged in carrying on a process of lowering the religious tone of the state, letting it down, demoralising it, and assisting in its transition into one which is mechanical.' The objects that warrant public life in one in whose case executive government must be an element, must be very special. True that in all probability the church will hold her nationality in substance beyond our day. 'I think she will hold it as long as the monarchy subsists.' So long the church will need parliamentary defence, but in what form? The dissenters parliamentary defence, but in what form? The dissenters tation was far better organized in proportion to its weight than the church, though formally not organized at all than the church, though formally not organized at all than the church, though formally not organized at all than the church, though formally not organized at all than the church, though formally not organized at all.

1 To Manning, April 5, 1846.

of everything convertible to advantage, including, in 1865. the assets of Hawarden. By this, and the wise realisation consent and support, threw the bulk of his own fortune into The upshot is this, that Mr. Gladstone, with his father's your affectionate father. forward to your decoming at a finture time the proprietor.—Ever every year. It was not until 1865 that I had any title to look bias, Mr. Gladstone required that its terms should be referred touched matters in which he might be supposed liable to interest the sum paid for the reversion. As the transaction settlement by either of the Glynne brothers, on repaying with appoint. This was subject to a power of determining the or more of the Gladstone children as Mr. Gladstone might the parties, by which the estate was conveyed in trust for one Glynne and his brother, and Mr. Gladstone and his wife, were In 1867 a settlement was made, to which Sir Stephen it from debt with which it was ruinously loaded.' what was alienated), to keep it in the family, and to relieve Stephen, to keep the Hawarden estate together (or replace my life, in conjunction with your mother and your uncle in 1882, 'i.e., since the breakdown in 1847, a great object of has been for thirty-five years,' he wrote to W. H. Gladstone Hawarden estate as now existing, he noted at £267,000. It solvent. His own expenditure from first to last upon the brother, he succeeded in making what was left of Hawarden the reversion after the lives of Sir Stephen Glyune and his diary:— Chynne's affairs. Here are a couple of entries from his Lord Devon, and to confer with him upon Sir Stephen. Phillimore visited Hawarden (August 19-26, 1865) to meet and Sir Robert Phillimore—for their judgment and approval. to two men of perfect competence and probity-Lord Devon and then to W. E. Gladstone's other tion of S. G.'s affairs by Lord Devon and myself. We examined Ang. 26.—The whole morning was occupied with the investiga-sons in tail male; and next to W. H. Gladstone and his sons in tail male, ... otatee beliate... so forth in the ordinary form of an life, with the remainder to his brother's and other sons of Lord Lyttelton, and sons; and in default of male issue of W. E. Gladstone, then to the eldest devising the estate to his brother for of a will made by Sir Stephen in 1855, This settlement followed the lines and her civil and proprietary rights, and that she should by degrees obtain the means of extending and of strengthening herself, not only by covering a greater space, but by a more vigorous organisation. Her attaining to this state of higher health depends in no small degree upon progressive adaptations of her state and her laws to her ever enlarging exigencies; these depend upon the hor laws to her ever enlarging exigencies; these depend upon the humour of the state, and the state cannot and will not be in good humour with her, if she insists upon its being in bad humour with all other communions.

It seems to me, therefore, that while in substance we should all strive to sustain her in her national position, we shall do well on her behalf to follow these rules: to part earlier, and more freely and cordially, than heretofore with such of her privileges, here and there, as may be more obnoxious than really valuable, and some such she has; and further, not to presume too much to give directions to the state as to its policy with respect to other religious bodies. . . This is not political expediency as opposed to religious principle. Nothing did so much damage to religion as the obstinate adherence to a negative, repressive and coercive as the obstinate adherence to a negative, repressive and coercive us nothing but outwardly animosities and invardly lethargy. The revival of a livelier sense of duty and of God is now beginning to tell in the altered policy of the church. . . As her sense of her apiritual work rises, she is becoming less eager to sense of her exclusive claim, leaving that to the state as anatter for itself to decide; and she also begins to force more readily, which it ought to receive from you. and should feel the full benefit of the steady eare and attention to complete, thut you should be entire master of the property, scention of this purpose, which it may still take very many years debt; and it is almost necessary towards the satisfactory proanoning opposite of progressively unancipating it from the once ruinous because you have, delivered over to yon with the estate, the duty capacity to provide wisely for its inture destination. Secondly, dence as to your use of the estate during your lifetime, and your because I am able thoroughly to repose in you an entire confipresent ease, they are to my mind entirely conclusive. best, though the arguments may not be all on one side. In the this latter method of holding landed property as on the whole the tee simple. Reflection and experience have brought me to favour convert your life interest under the Hawarden settlement into a I. I have given instructions to Messrs. Barker and Hignett to associated with definite duty. mowhere else is the possession of landed property so closely dight as in this country, and this in great part for the reason that Wowhere in the world is the position of the landed proprietor so of time, and especially a free and ungrudging discharge of them. absence of special eause) residence on the spot, and a good share full of interest and rich in pleasure, but they demand (in the moral and social responsibilities which belong to it. They are could become rector of the parish, without recognising the serious or of the portion of it now accruing, than your brother Stephen can no more become the proprietor of such a body of property, You will, I hope, familiarise your mind with this truth, that you position is enhanced by the large population which inhabits them. be termed the first social position there. The importance of this the most considerable estate in the county, and give what may income they yield. Taking the two estates together, they form these in such a condition as to enjoy a large proportion of the minous properties delonging to me, and that you will receive 2, I hope that with it you will inherit the several conter-

but cautiously, her external prerogatives.

3. In truth, with this and your seat in parliament, which I hope (whether Whithy supply it, or whether you migrate) will continue, you will, I trust, have a well-charged, though not an

of your duties in the position to which it has pleased Him to call you, and which perhaps has come upon you with somewhat the effect of a surprise; that may, however, have the healthy influence of a stimulus to action, and a help towards excellence. Believe on a stimulus to action, and a help towards excellence. Believe

In the second letter Mr. Gladstone informed W. H. Gladsone stone that he had at Chester that morning (Oct. 23, 1882), along with Mrs. Gladstone, executed the deeds that made his son the proprietor of Mr. Gladstone's lands in Flintshire, subject to the payment of annities specified in the instrument of transfer; and he proceeds:—

I earnestly entreat that you will never, under any eireum-stances, mortgage any of your land. I consider that our law has offered to proprietors of land, under a narrow and mistaken notion of promoting their interests, dangerous facilities and inducements to this practice; and that its mischievons consequences have been so terribly felt (the word is strong, but hardly too strong) in the case of Hawarden, that they ought to operate powerfully as a warning for the future.

You are not the son of very wealthy parents; but the income of the estates (the Hawarden estates and mine jointly), with your prudence and diligence, will enable you to go steadily forward in the work I have had in hand, and after a time will in the course of nature give considerable means for the purpose.

I have much confidence in your prindence and intelligence; I have not the smallest fear that the rather unusual step I have taken will in any way weaken the happy union and harmony of our family; and I am sure you will always bear in mind the duties which attach to you as the head of those among whom you receive a preference, and as the landlord of a numerous tenantry, prepared to give you their confidence and affection.

A third letter on the same topics followed three years after, and contains a narrative of the Hawarden transactions already given in an earlier page of this chapter.

To IV. H. Gladstone.

Oct. 3, 1885.—When you first made known to me that you thought of retiring from the general election of this year, I

I have looked forward to your being the representative of the university. Richard Greswell of Worcester was the faithful chairman of his Oxford committee now and to the end, eighteen years off. He had reached the dignity of a bachelor of divinity, but nearly all the rest were no more than junior masters.

Routh, the old president of Magdalen, declined to vote for him on the well-established ground that Christ Church had no business to hold both seats. Mr. Gladstone at once met this by the dexterous proposition that though Christ Church was not entitled to elect him against the wish of the other colleges were entitled to elect him it they liked, by giving him a majority not made up of Christ Church votes. His eldest brother had written to tell him in terms of affectionate regret, that he could take no part in the election; mere political differences would be secondary, but in the case of a university, religion came first, and there it was impossible to separate a candidate from his religious opinions. When the time came, however, partly under strong pressure from Sir John, Thomas Gladstone took a strong pressure from Sir John, Thomas Gladstone took a more lenient view and gave his brother a vote.

services; how long he had been an active supporter of the Archbishop of Canterbury himself, had thanked him for his for the Propagation of the Gospel, through the mouth of the state, in erecting four colonial bishoprics; how the Society the few months for which he held the seals of secretary of clergy in Scotland; how instrumental he was in 1846, during had laboured for a college training for the episcopalian sees in six years; how zealously with energy and money he episcopate, which had resulted in the erection of eleven new into the first general move for the increase of the colonial Heamid worth an 1481 mi won; saidistayinn and to the these himself known by his resistance to the admission of disrecalling their champion's career; how in 1834 he first made integrity. The backers of Mr. Gladstone retorted by Ilut riedt ni baslerI bas baslgaft to derude betiau edt and insisted on the urgency of upholding the principles of votes on Maynooth and on the Dissenters' Chapels bill, The Round men pointed triumphantly to their hero's

Shortly described, the Peelites were all free trade condegree to myself.2 degree to Mr. Sidney Herbert, and in the same or a greater that party. I think that this description applied in some made them tardy, perhaps unduly tardy, in draving towards nevertheless, personal sympathies and lingering wishes which opinions were more akin to those of the liberals, cherished, these, says Mr. Gladstone, others of the Peelites whose tectionists in everything except protection.1 Differing from were in more or less latent sympathy with the severed promorrow that combined victorious policy with personal defeat, day of battle, and who still stood by him in the curious Many of those who had stood by Peel's side in the political story. The distinction was in the nature of political and they constitute a vital chapter in Mr. Gladstone's tions, manæuvres. These perplexities lasted down to 1859, time went on, and led to a long series of doubts, perturbadistinction arose among Peel's adherents that widened, as body never voted with the protectionists. From the first a as Sir Robert Peel lived (down to June 1850) the entire tionists it just turned the balance in their favour. So long gave free trade a very large majority: added to the protecto less than half. This number, added to the liberal force, Æ crisis of 1846, were reduced at once by the election of 1847 stone's, from a number approaching 120 in the corn law

Shortly described, the Peelites were all free trade conservatives, drawn by under-currents, according to temperament, circumstances, and all the other things that turn the balance of men's opinions, to antipodean poles of the political compass. 'We have no party,' Mr. Gladstone tells his father in June 1849, 'no organization, no whipper-in; and under these circumstances we cannot exercise any considerable degree of permanent influence as a body.' The leading sentiment that guided the proceedings of the whole body of Peelites alike was a desire to give to protection its final puetus. While the younger members of the Peel cabinet duietus. While the younger members of the Peel cabinet held that this could only be done in one way, namely, by took their places in conservative administrations.

2 Memo, of 1876.

1 Among them were such men as Wilson Patten, General Peel, Mr. Corry, Lord Stanhope, Lord Hardinge, most of whom in days to come reformation as a vile and accursed thing. I should not have believed it possible that such a conclusion had been drawn from such premisees even by our relieious and services and formularies of his own church. confirmed his affection and reverential attachment to the been present at other modes of Christian worship had only declaration that the very rare occasions on which he had ground, however, was handsomely recovered by a public 1846, he had been guilty of this backsliding. The lost was constrained to admit that, once in 1845 and thrice in Mr. Round attended a dissenting place of worship, and he A still more sinister rumour was next bruited abroad: that as fraught with danger to the country's very best interests. a series of measures which are considered by his supporters to term of band a helping hand to the first of said the mocking Gladstonians, that the protestant Mr. 1829, and had voted for him against Inglis. So it appears, election committee at the time of catholic emancipation in fact to the light of day, that he had actually sat on Peel's impregnable. A diligent scrutiny at last dragged the dark The worthy Mr. Round, on the other hand, was almost

from such premisses even by our religious press.

The nomination was duly made in the Sheldonian theatre (July 29), the scene of so many agitations in these fiery days. Inglis was proposed by a canon of Christ Church, Round by the master of Balliol, and Gladstone by Dr. Richards, the rector of Exeter. The prime claim advanced for him by his proposer, was his zeal for the English church in word and deed, above all his energy in securing that wherever the English church went, thither bishoprics should wherever the English church went, thither bishoprics should go too. Besides all this, his master work, he had found time to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontime.

inde nostræ academiæ honoribus cumulatus ad res civilcs cum magna omuium expectatione se coutulit; expectatione tanen major omni evasit. In senatis enim domum inferiorem cooptatus, eam ad negotia tractanda habilitatem, et ingenii perspicacitatem exhibebat, ut reipublica administrationis particeps et adjutor minstrationis particeps et adjutor adduce a and may be worth giving for its academic flavour:—'Jam inde a scademic flavour:—'Jam inde a pueritia literarum studio imbutus, et in celeberrimo Etoneusi gyunasio informatus, ad nostram honestate, pietate, et pudore nemini æqualium secundus, indole et ingenio facile secundus, indole et ingenio facile omnibus antecellebat. Summis de-itself, and until prosperity had justified the experiment,

Peel was hardly wrong in reckoning on the possibility of a protectionist reaction. Even the new prosperity and confectionist reaction. Even the new prosperity and confectionist reaction. Even the capable of being explained by the extraordinary employment found in the creation of railways. As Mr. Gladstone said to a correspondent in the governments, and the conservative proceedings of the new liberal administration, unite in pointing to the propriety of an abstinence from high-pitched opinions. This mas a tection no high-pitched opinions on any other subject were tection no high-pitched opinions on any other subject were available. The tenets of party throughout this embarrassed period from 1846 to 1852 were shifting, equivocal and fluid. Nor even in the period that followed did they very rapidly consolidate.

Mr. Gladstone writes to his father (June 30, 1849):—

hands to govern. aiffer from him, it is plain that my conduct is not placed in his may happen again. However painful, then, it may be to me to portant to the government, I fear even this year the same thing against him.1 And upon other colonial questions, yet most imposed. Upon Canada—a vital question—I again spoke and voted their friends, who would not adopt a plan upon the basis I prolaw this year I was saved from it only by the shipowners and with others, spoke and voted against Peel. On the Navigation and their adherents. On the West Indian question last year I, to separate and disorganize the small troop of the late government I must confess with sorrow that the present course of events tends any other living statesman for the good of the people. But still agree with Graham that he has done more and suffered more than I bas; esol ot toeqxe ton ob I mid ot ebutitatg bas taemdastta withdraw my confidence from Peel. My feelings of admiration, I will only add a few words about your desire that I should injury of their property. Mr. Gladstone strongly opposed any compensation being given to Canadian rebels.—Hansard, June 14, 1849.

We find an illustration of the distractions of this long day

A hill to indemnify the inhabitants of Lower Canada, many of whom had taken part in the rebellion of 1837-8, for the destruction and reformation as a vile and accursed thing. I should not have believed it possible that such a conclusion had been drawn

from such premisses even by our religious press.

services and formularies of his own church. confirmed his affection and reverential attachment to the been present at other modes of Christian worship had only declaration that the very rare occasions on which he had ground, however, was handsomely recovered by a public 1846, he had been guilty of this backsliding. The lost was constrained to admit that, once in 1845 and thrice in Mr. Round attended a dissenting place of worship, and he A still more sinister rumour was next bruited abroad: that as fraught with danger to the country's very best interests. a series of measures which are considered by his supporters Round 'was willing to lend a helping hand to the first of said the mocking Gladstonians, that the protestant Mr. 1829, and had voted for him against Inglis. So it appears, alection committee at the time of catholic emancipation in fact to the light of day, that he had actually sat on Peel's impregnable. A diligent scrutiny at last dragged the dark The worthy Mr. Round, on the other hand, was almost

The nomination was duly made in the Sheldonian theatre (July 29), the scene of so many agitations in these fiery days. Inglis was proposed by a canon of Christ Church, Richards, the rector of Exeter. The prime claim advanced for him by his proposer, was his zeal for the English church in word and deed, above all his energy in securing that wherever the English church went, thither bishoprics should go too. Besides all this, his master work, he had found time to spare not only for public business of the commontime to spare not only for public business of the commontenes to spare not only for public business of the commontenes.

inde nostræ academiæ honoribus cumulatus ad res civiles cum magna onnium expectatione se contulit; expectatione tamen major omni evasit. In senatús enim domum inferiorem cooptatus, et ingenii perspicacitatem exhibebat, ut reipublicæ administrationis particeps et adjutor minstrationis particeps et adjutor adhuc adolescens fieret. Quantum and may be worth giving for its academic flavour:—' Jam inde a academic flavour:—' Jam inde a pueritia literarum studio imbutus, et in celeberrimo Etonensi gymnasio informatus, ad nostram accessit academiam, ubi morum honestate, pietate, et pudore nemini æqualium secundus, indole et ingenio facile omnibus antecellebat. Summis dea letter from Mr. Gladstone to his wife (Feb. 22, 1850) sheds

aome light:—

To Mrs. Aladstone.

To turn then to what is more amusing, the battle of last night. and so perhaps you will think I have written on it. work might fall on me. I have viewed the matter very drily, Herbert should assume that post, whatever share of the mere it should be, it would be much better that either Lincoln or there were a question whether there should be a leader and who Commons, I have come to be satisfied in my own mind that, if state of things, and how this or that would work in the House of the men of my over standing, and I have Jelt more of the actual more disorganized, and I have had little sense of union except with other men were no longer in the van. But since we have become parliament, the first place might naturally fall to me when the time, I had discharged some prominent duties in office and in but perhaps thought or assumed that as, up to the then present telt as if Peel were our actual chief in politics, I did not think so, ago, before I had much considered the matter, and while we still particularly from birth or wealth or both. Three or four years position is less embarrassed, and more favourable and powerful, my own contemporaries; that there are others of them whose is better that I should not be the head or leader even of him to be of the opinion which is deliberately mine, namely, that banol I bas, gairmom sidt gainnish Ativ restram esedt revo gai there are in my circumstances many obstacles. I have been talk-To the formation of a party, or even of the nucleus of a party, faction, and without subserviency, on all questions as they arise. parliament except the simple one of acting independently, without I cannot form to myself any other conception of my duty in haps, disguises from you some things that are nevertheless real. many things that flow from your own deep affection which, per-Indeed you do rise to very daring flights to-day, and suggest

After much consideration and conference with Herbert (who has had an attack of bilious fever and could not come down, though much better, and soon, I hope, to be out again, but who agreed with me), I determined that I ought to vote last night with majority in this class was highest where the elections to fellowships were open. The heads of the colleges told a different tale. Of these, sixteen voted for Round and only four for Gladstone. This discrepancy it was that gave its significance to the victory. Sitting in the convocation house watching the last casual voters drop in at the rate of two or three an hour through the summer afternoon, the ever faithful three an hour through the summer afternoon, the ever faithful Morthcote wrote to Mr. Gladstone at Fasque:—

Since I have been here, the contest has seemed even more interesting than it did in London. The effect of the contest itself has apparently been good. It has brought together the younger men without distinction of party, and has supplied the elements of a very noble party which will now look to you as a leader. I think men of all kinds are prepared to trust you, and though each feels that you will probably differ from his set in some particulars, each seems disposed to waive objections for the sake of the general good he expects. . . .

mho is now abroad, is looked upon as something more, and I am Mozley, and Church appear to be regarded as leaders; but Church the past, though there are still Puseyites of importance. Marriott, tended to unite them. 'Puseyism' seems rather to be a name of earnestness which only wants direction, and this contest has effect great things, but there is a large amount of ability and the university. They do not seem yet to be sufficiently united to have proved their title to be considered an important element of party by carrying you against the opposition of the Heads, and consciousness that they have shown the strength of the magisterial you will do something for the university yourself, partly in the On the other hand, the young men exult, partly in the hope that country feeling, but as a possible reformer and a man who thinks. here, though they use the cry against you and though that is the a young man.' It is not as a Maynoothian that you are dreaded day, 'He would rather be represented by an old woman than by who is among the dissatisfied supporters of Round, said the other have expressed themselves accordingly. The provost of Queen's, important one. The Heads felt it their last chance, and are said to the masters over the Hebdomadal board, and as such a very The victory is not looked upon as 'Puseyite'; it is a victory of that partly for great good, partly for some evil, never wholly things only and leaving persons out, indicates a turn of mind my political education. The sentence about thinking of This is one of the cases illustrating the extreme slowness of should have done better never to have given my notice. thing like a vested interest in my proposal. I certainly notification I had given to the opposition generally someat their surprise. It did not occur to me that by my public things only and not taken persons into view, was surprised the tories were much put about. I, who had thought of declined to accept it. I accordingly withdrew it. At this says, 'of a motion to that effect. But the government upon a footing of absolute reciprocity. 'I gave notice,' he which offered everything, even their wast coasting trade, desired, however, to accept a recent overture from America E spoke copiously for the repeal of the navigation laws. He anzious and at times absorbing. He warmly favoured and

Yet partially withdrawn as he was from active life in the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone was far too acute an observer to have any leanings to the delusive self-indulgence of temporary retirements. To his intimate friend, Sir Walter James, who seems to have nursed some such intention, he wrote at this very time (Feb. 13, 1847):—

The way to make parliament profitable is to deal with it as a calling, and if it be a calling it can rarely be advantageous to calling, and if it be a calling it can rarely be advantageous to suspend the pursuit of it for years together with an uncertainty, not got your other vocation open and your line clear before you. The purchase of an estate is a very serious matter, which you may not be able to accomplish to your satisfaction except after the lapse of years. It would be more satisfactory to drop parliament with another path open to you already, than in order to seek about for one. . . I think with you that the change in the position of the conservative party makes public life still more painful where it was painful before, and less enjoyable, where it was painful before, and less enjoyable, where it the painful where it was painful before, and less a duty to work was enjoyable; but I do not think it remains less a duty to work through the tornade and to influence for good according to our

and all the common-rooms. It has gone off very well. There was and all the common-rooms. It has gone off very well. There was and that was only a little cold. Marsham (Merton), who is a frank, warm man, keenly opposed, said very fairly, to Inglis, 'I congratulate you warmly'; and then to me, 'And I would be very glad to do the same to you, Mr. Gladstone, if I could think you would do the same to you, Mr. Gladstone, if I could think you would do the same to you, Mr. Gladstone, if I could think you would do the same to you, Mr. Gladstone, if I could think you would do the same to gir R. Inglis.' I like a man for this. They say the dean should have asked me to dine to day, but I think he may be, and perhaps wisely, afraid of recognising me in any very marked way, for fear of endangering the old Christ Church right to one seat which it is his peculiar duty to guard.

We dined yesterday in the hall at Christ Church, it being a to make a row in honour of me during dinner, which the two censors had to run all down the hall to stop. This had better not be talked about. Thursday the warden of All Souls' has asked me and I think I must accept; had it not been a head (and it is one of the little party of four who voted for me) I should not have doubted, but at once have declined.

grand day there. Rather unfortunately the undergraduates chose connection as one of duty rather than as one of advantage. from his earliest parliamentary days, regarded our colonial He had, maxims of Downing Street were erroneous. Almost from the first he was convinced that some leading named are now well covered with the moss of kindly time. no particular contribution, and the matters that I have To colonial policy at this stage I discern worldly wisdom.2 he says in a fugitive serap upon it, a singular absence of There was on my part in this matter, in far better stead. half a dozen blunt, sound sentences would have stood him sualight in their substance, were over-skillul in form, and Mr. Gladstone's explanations, simple and veracious as the attends, any important personago in a trivial scrapo ensued; disadvantago of the secretary of state: the usual clatter that were another; nimble partisanship confused the two, to the the lurch; the recall was one affair, the personal runtours bishop of the diocese and others. The bishop left him in These he had taken on trust from the регзопа! спагастег: recall a private letter stating ruments against the governor's pradently in the simplicity of his heart he added to the ing a colonial governor for incilicioucy in his post; im-He exposed himself to criticism and abuse by recallment was vetoed by Mr. Chadstone's successor at the colonial divided, Robert Lowe leading the opposition, and the expericommittee eight years before. Opinion in Australia was Australia, a practice effectually condemned by the terrible resuming on a limited scale the transportation of convicts to made the mistake of sending out despatches in favour of It was in effect little botter than if written in water. oH wean the Canadian assembly from its economic delusions. between Canada and the mother country, endeavouring to enoimbar frierommos out no despateb ovimeramente an besog from Stophen, the chief of the staff in the office. - guirdin mobies ton thesinid betseten in doing mi throi os bun ¿smamolitas land in noineauba noqu snoiteap ; sotunim

L See The Gladstone Colony by J. E. When he had only been four years in the House he took a margin to live upon. Hawardon was over £250,000, leaving its owner with no legal possession of the wreck of Oak Farm. The burden on existing interests; and in May Sir Stephen Glynne resumed of himself and his two brothers-in-law, subject to certain Birmingham, Mr. Gladstone purchased the concern on behalf wind up. The court directed a sale. In April 1849, at was found hopelessly insolvent, and it was determined to reported, a meeting was held at Freshfield's, the company course brought down Oak Farm.1 A great accountant of our historic panies shook the money-market, and in its equitable mortgage on the concern. Two years later, one brothers-in-law by agreement retired, each retaining an brothers-in-law extended in proportion. In 1845 the three eystem of unlimited partnership the liability of his two Glynne had become seriously compromised, while under the clouds rose on the horizon. The position of Sir Stephen would be the death-blow, to Hawarden. As early as 1844 the Hawarden estate, and a forced stoppage of Oak Farm of its realisable capital. The whole basis of its credit was if carefully worked; but it was evidently pushed in excess the impression is that it had the material of a sound property Farm was irrationally inflated or not, we cannot say, though security of the Hawarden fortune and credit. Whether Oak his principal, and large capital was raised solely on the market. The agent's confidence and enthusiasm mastered tools and hardware for which he foresaw a roaring foreign forges, rolling-mills, and all the machinery for producing the business, rapidly extended operations, setting up furnaces, ∠ the concern. The adventurous agent, now manager-in-chief of they had no opportunity of making a personal examination of

Estafford Northcote published an effective vindication in a 'Letter to a Friend, 1847. Hogan, M.P., with prefatory note by Mr. Gladstone, April, 20, 1897, and the chapter in Lord Sherbrooke's Life, 'Mr. Gladstone's Penal Colony.'

Into this far-spreading entanglement Mr. Chadstone for several years threw himself with the whole weight of his accounts, mastered the coil of interests and parties, studied legal intricacies, did daily battle with human unreason, and year after year carried on a voluminous correspondence.

² For an account of the creditors' meeting held at Birmingham on Dec. 2, 1847, see the Times of Dec. 3, 1847.

than defeat; and though as an English success on the part of this country bill, June 26, 1849, Colonial Adminideclare that I should more deplore See speech on Australian Colonies In their views of colonial policy Mr. Gladstone was in subinvoked disaster upon the British arms. who, in the Canadian revolt of the winter of 1837, actually stone share any such sentiments as those of Alolesworth; and are, a millstone round our necks. 4 Nor did Mr. Gladwretched colonies will all be independent too in a few years, opinion expressed by Mr. Disraeli in those days, These worth's speeches,3 and neither of them sympathised with the He acknowledged how much he had learned from Moleschurch of England take a strong and healthy root." munities, in the soil of which I am anxious to see the herself and of discord and difficulty to the colonial coma fatal gift,—' nothing but a source of weakness to the church he rejected the boon of civil preference as being undoubtedly mere exercise of power.1 Even for the church in the colonies Our error lay in the attempt to hold the colonies by the unnecessary. But the real mischief was not here, he said. that the cost of the existing system was both large and colonies and the mother country, though it was certain ment to sever the connection between any one of the x'No consideration of money ought to induce parlindespotic government, renders them less fit for free institu-

p. 1406, Dec. 22, 10 Hist. Eng., iii. p. 425. ing in an opposite sense.—Hans. 39, p. 1466, Dec. 22, 1837. Walpole, To Lord Malmesbury, Aug. 13, 522. Memoirs of an Ex-Minister, Mr. Gladstone spoke the same evenreap in consenting to such a step. be the honour this country would subject connected with the foundation of the two countries, and great would Wakefield and his devotion to every vantages of an amicable separation Great would be theadfriendship. desire it should terminate in peace and should now be brought to a conclusion, I for one most sincerely desire, but I That our dominion in America strugging in defence of its just rights. over a frec though feedler community arms in putting down and tyrannising mighty nation succeeding by force of disgraccful spectacle of a free and, of regret than a success which would offer to the world the disastrous and would be to me a less poignant matter disasters of my countrymen, still it citizen I could not but lament the he states how the signal ability of state to Sir George Grey, then governor of New Zealand (March 27), 1846, In a letter as secretary of April 28, 1852, Makefield their common arge. the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, March 27, 1849. 2 On the Colonial Bishops bill, Martin in the Fields Association for Scientific Colonisation before the St. Also speech on bill, May 21, 1852. Australian Colonics, Feb. 8, 1850, March 22, 1850, and May 13, 1850. On the Kaffir War, April 5, 1852. On the Mew Zealand Government Lill the Mew Zealand Government 1849, or Feb. 8, stration, April 16,

, Sponja a war take place, I must

by the Earl of Malmesbury, i. p. 344.

of colonies has influenced him.

is too free and absolute. placed in me by all concerned. Indeed, I can only regret that it my part. Nor can anything be more generous than the confidence any rate not been impeded by indolence, obstinacy, or blunders on I can conscientiously feel that the restoration of his affairs has at and once more firmly planted in the place of his fathers, provided shall have much more hereafter when Stephen is brought through, I has the means of keeping a load off the minds of others; and I I earr yns as that the thought that at any rate I a blessing by the addition or the subtraction of worldly wealth. tion together be rendered in the very smallest degree less or more can be so absolutely blameless as you and Mary, nor can our relathe idea of you. No persons who have been in contact with it suppose that the subject can ever associate itself painfully with altogether short of the eategory of high trials. Least of all of strength and skill and habits which I have not, but, it falls drain on strength and a peculiar one, because it asks for a kind a ylesem ei ti ; enoiteille bna enoitetieiv diw ti banolnos ton so light that something else would surely come in its place. I do

I may as well now tell the story to the end, though in anticipation of remote dates, for in truth it held a marked place in Mr. Gladstone's whole life, and made a standing background amid the vast throng of varying interests and transient commotions of his great career. Here is his own narrative as told in a letter written to his eldest son for a definite purpose in 1885:—

To W. H. Gladstone.

Hawarden, Oct. 3, 1885.—Down to the latter part of that year (1847), your uncle Stephen was regarded by all as a wealthy country gentleman with say £10,000 a year or more (subject, however, to his mother's jointure) to spend, and great prospects from iron in a Midland estate. In the bank crisis of that year the whole truth was revealed; and it came out that his agent at the Oak Farm (and formerly also at Hawarden) had involved him to the extent of £250,000; to say nothing of minor blows to your unele Lyttelton and myself.

At a conversation in the library of 13 Carlton House Terrace, it particularly well acquainted: upon a transaction, with all the details of which he was only thing to be added is the judgment of Sir Robert Peel or any part of it, on which the divorce was founded. evidence, or that the evidence given by him was the evidence, that he had anything whatever to do with the collection of as he had occasion to tell the House of Commons in 1857, with which his hearth was threatened. It was quite untrue, duty or affection could suggest for averting the calamity the person claiming the bill had omitted no means that of Lords, he was called as a witness to show that in this case proceedings on the bill for a divorce brought into the House report to his friend at home. In the course of the subsequent self the discoverer of what it was inevitable that he should after a journey across half Europe, he suddenly found himabsurd. To no one was it a greater shock than to him when, $^{\mathrm{A}}$ of a hundred the thought of success would have seemed that made him hopeful of success, where to ninety-nine men

.6481 ,84 .gul-

ROBERT PEEL, Yours, and generous conduct.—Ever, my dear Gladstone, most faithfully tion, but the expression of my sincere admiration for truly virtuous would not have considered a valid excuse if not a superior obligatude of affectionate friendship, under circumstances which few -idemora for that which you undertook with the promptibeen the active agents in a work of charity. I can offer you valuable as it respects the heart and conscience of those who have far as the world and the world's opinion is concerned—much more and essayed with the utmost delicacy. This proof is valuable so to the Law for such protection as it can afford, had been essayed could suggest as the means of averting the necessity for appealing tender consideration of a husband and the devotion of a friend the conclusive proof that everything that the forbearance and mother. Your errand has not been a fruitless one, for it affords of a friend, and conducing possibly to the salvation of a wife and generosity, you undertook in the hope of mitigating the affliction result of that mission which, with unparalleled kindness and MY DEAR GLADSTONE,—I am deeply concerned to hear the exceeding £150,000, and after the lives of the two brothers, the table value of which was, I think, twenty-two and a-half years. From this time your uncle had an income to spend of, I think, £2200, or not more than half what he probably would have linee 1847 had the estate been sold, which it would only have since 1847 had the estate been sold, which it would only have been through the grievous fault of others.

The full process of recovery was still incomplete, but the means of carrying it forward were now comparatively simple. Since the reversion came in, I have, as you know, forwarded that process; but it has been retarded by agricultural depression and by the disastrous condition through so many years of coal-mining; so that there still remains a considerable work to be done before the end can be attained, which I hope will never be lost sight of, namely, that of extinguishing the debt upon the property, though for family purposes the estate may still remain subject to charges in the way of annuity.

The full history of the Hawarden estate from 1847 would run to a volume. For some years after 1847, it and the Oak Farm supplied my principal employment, but I was amply repaid by the value of it a little later on as a home, and by the unbroken domestic happiness there enjoyed. What I think you will see, as clearly resulting from this narrative, is the high obligation not only to keep the estate in the family, and as I trust in its natural course of descent, but to raise it to the best condition by thrift and eare, and to promote by all reasonable means the aim of diminishing and shally extinguishing its debt.

This I found partly on a high estimate of the general duty to promote the permanence of families having estates in land, but very specially on the sacrifices made, through his remaining twenty-seven years of life, by your uncle Stephen, without a murmur, and with the concurrence of us all. . . .

Before elosing I will repair one omission. When I concurred in the decision to struggle for the retention of Hawarden, I had not the least idea that my children would have an interest in the succession. In 1847 your uncle Stephen was only forty; your uncle Henry, at thirty-seven, was married, and had a child almost uncle Henry, at thirty-seven, was married, and had a child almost of the content of the conten

To Lord Lyttelton, July 29, 1874: it; and after 1852 my attention was to consional.'

TH.

this quarrel into more promising shape, Palmerston charwith the United States. When Peel and Aberdeon got were bringing us at the same period within an ace of war of war with France. Disputes about an American frontier and the preacher. In 1840 he had brought us within an ace Bright and Cobden as displeasing mixtures of the bagman ing, Palmerston was weak and purblind. Ho regarded and moderate faith. Where Peel was strong and penetratmake it scrupulous and just, he had only limited perception the things that make a nation rich and the things that fear. On the economic or the moral side of national life, in who was sure that he must be right in whatever he chose to CH sense most opposed to Palmerston. So, of Palmerston it without being an enthusiast; abroad he was a zealot, in the foreign minister, it was said that at home he was a liberal tions and nationality. Of Aberdeen, who had been Peel's Italy, Greece, Portugal, the fearless champion of constitucountrymen. They saw him in Belgium and Holland, Spain hated at Vienna and Petersburg won the confidence of his least he intervened for freedom. The action that made him he meddled in many affairs that were no affairs of ours, at and reaction that were supreme at Vienna in 1815; and if foreign misrule. He had a healthy hatred of the absolutism A follower of Canning, he was the enemy of tyrants and form, some of the most generous instincts of his countrymen. fast glow, Palmerston represented, not always in their best without a spark of their heroic fire or their brilliant and steadhighest heroes of his school—of Chatham, Carteret, Pitt temper had its fine side. With none of the grandeur of the Yet all this policy of high spirits and carcless dictatorial not procure a single ally in Europe.'

remained at the foreign office, it was certain that you could man, 'This is a blow to me, for so long as Lord Palmerston foreign ruler on an insecure throne observed to an English-When he was dismissed by Lord John Russell in 1852, a Palmerston at the foreign office meant an American war. ber 1845, because he was convinced that at that moment refused help in manufacturing a whig government in Decemacteristically taunted them with capitulation. Lord Grey Lectly sgreed in the opinion expressed in a memorandum signed by us both. Gladstone, as might have been expected, has behaved very well. Sept. 19 [London].—Correspondence between Lyttelton and Gladstone, contained in Lord Devon's letter. Same subject as that which Lord D. and I came to consult upon at Hawarden. Sept. 24.—I wrote to Stephen Glynne to the effect that Henry entirely approved of the scheme agreed upon by Lord D. and myself, after a new consideration of all the circumstances, and after reading the Lyttelton-Gladstone correspondence. I and after reading the Lyttelton-Gladstone correspondence. I showed Henry Glynne the letter, of which he entirely approved.

In 1874 the death of Sir Stephen Glynne, following that of his brother two years before, made Mr. Gladstone owner in possession of the Hawarden estate, under the transaction of 1865. With as little delay as possible (April 1875) he took the necessary steps to make his eldest son the owner in fee, and seven years after that (October 1882) he further transferred to the same son his own lands in the county, acquired by purchase, as we have seen, after the crash in 1847. By agreement, the possession and control of the castle and its contents remained with Mrs. Gladstone for life, as if she were contents remained with it under settlement or will taking a life-interest in it under settlement or will

Although, therefore, for a few months the legal owner of the whole Hawarden estate, Mr. Gladstone divested himself of that quality as soon as he could, and at no time did he assume to be its master. The letters written by him on these matters to his son are both too interesting as the expression of his views on high articles of social policy, and too characteristic of his ideas of personal duty, for me to omit them here, though much out of their strict chronological place. The first is written after the death of Sir Stephen, and the falling in of the reversion:—

To W. H. Gladstone.

II Carlton House Terrace, April 5, 1875.—There are several matters which I have to mention to you, and for which the present moment is suitable; while they embrace the future in several of its aspects.

of England. The debate travelled far beyond Don Pacifico, of and it stands to this day as a grand classic exposition in parliament of the contending views as to the temper and the principles on which nations in our modern era should conduct their dealings with one another:

It was in the Greek debate of 1850, which involved the censure or acquittal of Lord Palmerston, that I first meddled in speech with foreign affairs, to which I had heretofore paid the slightest possible attention. Lord Palmerston's speech was a marvel for physical strength, for memory, and for lucid and precise exposition of his policy as a whole. A very curious incident on this occasion evinced the extreme reluctance of Sir R. Peel to appear in any evinced the extreme reluctance of Sir R. Peel to appear in any policy Peel relation with Disraeli. Voting with him was disagreed able enough, but this with his strong aversion to the Palmerstonian policy Peel could not avoid; besides which, it was known that Lord Palmerston would carry the division. Disraeli, not yet fully recognised as leader of the protectionists, was working hard for that position, and assumed the manners of it, with Beresford, a kind of whipper-in, for his right-hand man. After the Palmerston speech he asked me on the next night whether I would undertake knowledge and otherwise. He answered that in that case he must do it. As the debate was not to close that evening, this left another night free for Peel when he might speak and not be in Disraeli's neighbourhood. I told Peel what Disraeli had arranged. He was very well satisfied. But, shortly afterwards, I received from Disraeli a message through Beresford, that he had changed his mind, and would not speak also. I had to make known to when Peel would have to speak also. I had to make known to Peel this alteration. He received the tidings with extreme annoyneel this alteration. He received the tidings with extreme annoyneel this alteration. I suppose, that if the two spoke on the same side ance: thinking, I suppose, that if the two spoke on the same side to answer it. I said that I was incompetent to do it, from want of

and in the late hours just before the division it would convey the idea of some concert or co-operation between them, which it was evident that he was most anxious to avoid. But he could not help himself. Disraeli's speech was a very poor one, almost like a 'cross,' and Peel's was prudent but otherwise not one of his best.!

over-charged, life, and will, like professional and other thoroughly employed men, have to regard the bulk of your time as forestalled on behalf of duty, while a liberal residue may be available for your special pursuits and tastes, and for recreations. This is really the sound basis of life, which never can be honourable or satisfactory without adequate guarantees against frittering away, even in part, the precious gift of time.

While touching on the subject I would remind you of an old recommendation of mine, that you should choose some parliamentary branch or subject, to which to give special attention. The House of Commons has always heard your voice with pleasure, and ought not to be allowed to forget it. I say this the more freely, because I think it is, in your case, the virtue of a nore freely, which rather too much indisposes you to put yoursel forward.

Yet another word. As years gather upon me, I naturally look forward to what is to be after I am gone; and although I look forward to what is to be after I am gone; and although I should indeed be a great pleasure to me to see you well settled in life by marriage. Well settled, I feel confident, you will be, it settled at all. In your position at Hawarden, there would then be at once increased ease and increased attraction in the performance of your duties; nor can I overlook the fact that the life of the unmarried man, in this age particularly, is under peculiar and insidious temptations to selfishness, unless his celibacy arise from a very strong and definite course of self-devotion to the service of God and his fellow creatures.

The great and sad change of Hawarden [by the death of Sir Stephen] which has forced upon us the consideration of so many subjects, gave at the same time an opening for others, and it seemed to me to be best to put together the few remarks I had to make. I hope the announcement with which I began will show that I write in the spirit of confidence as well as of affection. It is on this footing that we have ever stood, and I trust ever shall stand. You have acted towards me at all times up to the standard of all I could desire. May you have the help of the Almighty of all I could desire. May you have the help of the Almighty to embrace as justly, and fulfil as cheerfully, the whole conception to embrace as justly, and fulfil as cheerfully, the whole conception upon the tone of Lord Palmerston's future proceedings, stration which has been made may not be without its effect particular question. It remains to hope that the demonbeyond all authoritative doubt, against the merits of the organized opposition ready to succeed, carried the day ing the removal of a ministry which there is no regularly in heart and in conviction; but fear of inconveniences attend-Guizot, then in permanent exile from power, 'was with us of the House of Commons, I am convinced,' he wrote to disappointment by hopes for a better future. The majority Mr. Gladstone, as was his wont, consoled himself for present The government triumphed by a handsome majority, and a long while colleagues in office. Never at any time were times frank foes, occasionally partners in opposition, and for some curious vicissitudes and inversions. They were some-Palmerston in 1850 went on in many changing phases, with The conflict thus opened between Mr. Gladstone and Lord they in thought or feeling congenial.

the memory of Pitt: of sorrow and with the quotation of Scott's moving lines to Gladstone to second him. He was content with a few words members, at once moved the adjournment, and it fell to Mr. the House met the next day, Huine, as one of its oldest age, and after forty-one years of parliamentary life. When he died three days later (July 2), in the sixty-third year of his was thrown from his horse and received injuries from which On the afternoon of the day following this debate, Peel

The warder silent on the hill! The trumpet's silver sound is still, The deacon-light is quenched in smoke, ' Now is the stately column broke, enormous energies were in truth so lavishly spent upon the his life as beneath those that had preceded them. His of his notes in 1851, 'I must consider the closing years of Great as he was to the last, wrote Mr. Gladstone in one to a man great indeed, but not greater than Sir Robert Peel. These beautiful words were addressed, said Mr. Gladstone, ¹ Mr. Gladstone's Don Pacifico speech is still not quite out of date.—June 27, Hansard, 1850.

CHAPTER III

PARTY EVOLUTION-MEW COLONIAL POLICY

(0981-9781)

I shall ever thankfully rejoice to have lived in a period when so blessed a change in our colonial policy was brought about; a change which is full of promise and profit to a country having such claims on mankind as England, but also a change of system, in which we have done no more than make a transition from misfortune and from evil, back to the rules of justice, of reason, of nature, and of common sense.—Gladescher (1856).

subsisted on conservative declarations. Such was ment had carried liberal measures; the liberal government support was what they intended. The conservative governturn round upon them. On the contrary, fair and candid the whigs in merely to punish the betrayer, and then to Peel out, they had decided that it would not be fair to put, before Bentinck and his friends made up their minds to turn The protectionists gave them to understand that go on as they best could upon the narrow base of their own Herbert. Nothing came of it, and the whigs were left to in a proposal of office to Dalhousie, Lincoln, and Sidney not attempt to influence them either way.1 The action ended if Lord John made offers to any of his friends; and he should advisable, but said he should have no ground of complaint thought such a junction under existing circumstances unsaw Peel, and proposed to include any of his party. When Lord John Russell was forming his government, he in 1846 led to a long train of public inconveniences. THE fall of Peel and the break up of the conservative party singular situation. The Peelites, according to a memorandum of Mr. Glad-

House of Commons is as nearly as possible equally divided. side, and all calling themselves conservatives on the other, the \sim The fact is, that if all calling themselves liberal be put on one aint de noidiaeq nwo ain moqu owd to brow gnidaetedni nA precious possession.' as and of intercourse with him, is a high privilege and a after years. Even the afterthought of knowledge of such a force and noble moral sense, he might have done for us in was immense. It is sad to think what, with his high mental to him, as leader of the liberals, the loss of such an opponent in some respects compete with, in some even excel, him; but there that was possessed by no one else. Lord John might and is now widely different. He had a kind of authority Commons has never since his death been quite the same, immeasurable. The moral atmosphere of the House of was indeed great; in some of them it may almost be called of our internal politics was concerned. In other respects it occurred was a great calamity so far as the chief question not think, that the death of Sir R. Peel at the time when it but a vital necessity. I do not, therefore, think, and I did This I think was not only a safe experiment (after 1848) composed a quarter of a century later (1876), he says: the protectionists the responsibilities of office. In a note great mistake in Peel to resist any step that might put upon I have already described how Mr. Gladstone thought it a season occur in a letter to his father (July 9, 1850):

present state of things, and a widely spread feeling that it is not party, and as there is great annoyance and dissatisfaction with the powerful obstacles to the general reorganisation of the conservative Peel's life and continuance in parliament were of themselves in that character only. People feel, I suppose, that Sir Robert probable or possible, and they must pass for what they are worth those rumours beyond mere speculation on things supposed until yesterday. The fact is, that there is nothing whatever in in parliament of the conservative party, did not come to my hands in the rumours circulated with regard to my becoming the leader me, so far as I might be able to speak, whether there was anything The letter in which you expressed a desire to be informed by forcing the protectionists into office where they must put their professions to the proof, Peel himself, and Graham with him, took a directly opposite view, and adopted as the leading principle of their action the vital necessity of keeping the protectionists out. This broad difference led to no diminution of personal intercourse or political attachment.

the left hand benches on those terms. promising redress, there would be protectionists in plenty to fill parliament to be won by chanting the woes of the land and of opposition, and as there were two hundred and fifty seats in esont tud esitilidienoqeer on ban etsinoiteetorq ent en gaol ea tant were flatly at issue with him on this opinion. We even considered which was a thing far enough from our limited conceptions. We us with the possibility of being 'sent for' if a crisis should occur, restoration of protection.' He would sometimes even threaten ministers, 'I foresee a tremendous struggle in this country for the great fault (as I thought it), in the colonial policy of the saying to me, when I was endeavouring to stir him up on some became a visionary dream, Yet I remember well Sir Robert Peel not be overlooked. But he died in 1848, and with his death it iron will and strong convictions, this was a contingency that could the country. As long as Lord George Bentinck lived, with his designation of their party, and would in so doing probably convulse power endeavour to establish a policy in accordance with the that the chiefs of the protectionists would on their accession to the liberal party. It sprang entirely from a belief on his part least in Sir R. Peel's mind) for, or contemplation of, coalition with Certainly this was not due, says Mr. Gladstone, to any desire (at

The question what it was that finally converted the country to free trade is not easy to answer. Not the arguments of Cobden, for in the summer of 1845 even his buoyant spirit perceived that some precipitating event, and not reasoning, would decide. His appeals had become, as Distaeli wrote, both to nation and parliament a wearisome iteration, and he knew it. Those arguments, it is true, had laid and he foundations of the case in all their solidity and the foundations of the ease in all their solidity and the foundations of the energency in Iteland presented breadth. But until the energency in Iteland presented

CHYLLER A

COBHYN CVEE-SECESSION OF FRIENDS

(ISSI-178I)

In is not by the State that man can be regenerated, and the terrible woes of this darkened world effectually dealt with.—Cladstone: (1894).

THE test case of toleration at the moment of the Oxford C

1847): 'After much consideration, prolonged indeed I may To his father he explained (December 17, exclusion from full civil rights of those who were not these two earlier operations thenceforth condemned the to be protestant, and the considerations that supported Parliament had ceased to be anglican and it had ceased and now they were fighting for a Christian parliament. ment, second they fought for a protestant parliament, The tory party had fought first for an anglican parliaphase, so Gladstone argued, of an irresistible movement. modern state is or is going to be. This was the third that school who learned, or was able to learn, what the violent indignation, for Mr. Gladstone was the only man of to some to draw me from it. Pusey wrote to him in rather only the church which holds me there, though she may seem it raises is about remaining in parliament, and it is truly and writes in his diary (Dec 16), 'but the only substantive doubt a constituency. It is a painful decision to come to, he courage was needed for such a step by the member for such removal of Jewish disabilities. No ordinary degree of moral supporters, by voting with the government in favour of the astonished his father, as well as a great host of his political parliament, and in the last month of 1847 Afr. Chadstone and the case of lower the admission of the Jews to set in a section of 1847 was the admission of the Test of an appropriate the contraction of the entirely unshaken. principles for which we in common contended remains conclusions, that his confidence in the justice of those although in this particular motion we arrive at different ance, and it is no small consolation to me to hear from him, derived from him the most zealous, the most effective assistpartly attributes the conclusion at which he has arrived. of those measures, to the desire of maintaining which he I was associated with him in the preparation and conduct Chadstone he had the greatest respect and admiration. last time, as it was to happen, Peel declared that for Mr. free trade and of his own motives and character. For the then proceeded to one more of his elaborate defences, both of took this plain point against his ingenious lieutenant, and millions would hardly be enough. Peel rose later, promptly consolidated fund, when they were clamouring that fourteen a shabby couple of millions from their own shoulders to the was to be as bitterly contested as ever; with the transfer of admission of a great claim, while all the rest of their claim lame a nivi satisfied to be satisfied with a small would weaken the case for restoring protection. As if the reason for supporting the motion, than that its adoption unexpected champion was Mr. Gladstone, he found no better unhorsed. The reader will hardly think so, for though the champion, by whom, according to him, Graham was fairly then, in Mr. Disraeli's own language, sent him an unexpected of local control and inviting prodigal expenditure. Fortune poor rate to the consolidated fund, violating the principles said the mover's policy was simply a transfer of the entire been depreciated or rent been permanently lowered. Graham denied that there was a case in which the fee of land had and the insecurity of relief of rural burdens. Bright bluntly very familiar Kind, on the distress of the agricultural classes Disraeli brought forward a motion (Feb. 19, 1850) of a of party metamorphosis, as well as an example of what was regarded as Mr. Gladstone's over ingenuity, in one among other passing divergences between him and his chief. Mr.

On this particular battle, as well as on more general matter,

1 Hansard, Feb. 21, 1850, p. 1233.

factory in many ways, but I do not believe that it mystified or mixeled surpody.

or puzzled anybody.

The following year he received the honour of a D.C.L. degree at Ozford. Mrs. Chadstone was there, he tells his father, and 'was well satisfied with my reception, though it is not to be denied that my vote upon the Jew bill is upon the whole unpalatable there, and they had been provoked by a paragraph in the Globe newspaper stating that I was to have the degree, and that this made it quite clear that the minority was not unfavourable to the Jew bill.

July 5,—I went off after breakfast to Oxford. Joined the V.-C. and doctors in the hall at Wadham, and went in procession to the Divinity schools provided with a white neckeloth by Sir R. Inglis, who seized me at the station in horror and alarm when he saw me with a black one. In due time we were summoned to the theatre where my degree had been granted with some non placets but with no scrutiny. The scene remarkable to the cyc and mind, so pictorial and so national. There was great tumult about me, the hisses being obstinate, and the jantoves also very generous. 'Gladstone and the Jew bill' came sometimes from the generous. 'Gladstone and the Jew bill' came sometimes from the gallery, sometimes more favouring sounds.

11

After the whig government was formed in 1846, Alr. Chadstone expressed himself as having little fear that they could do much harm, 'barring church patronage,' He was soon justified in his own eyes in this limitation of his confidence, for the next year Dr. Hampden was made a bishop.\(^1\)

This was a rude blow both to the university which had eleven years before pronounced him heretical, and to the bishops who now bitterly and fervidly remonstrated. Grave points of law were raised, but Mr. Gladstone, though warmly reprobating the prime minister's recommendation of a divine so sure to raise the hurricane, took no leading part in the strife that followed. 'Never in my opinion,' he said to his father (Feb. 2, 1848), 'was a firebrand more he said to his father (Feb. 2, 1848), 'was a firebrand more he said to his father (Feb. 2, 1848), 'was a firebrand more he said to his father (Feb. 2, 1848), 'was a firebrand more he said to his father (Feb. 2, 1848), 'was an indication the wantonly and gratuitously east.' It was an indication the wantonly and gratuitously east.' It was an indication the of the ear and the fancy. What a long story! other time, would I go to him for conviction, but for the delight I have been wholly against him; but never, last night or as any of a debate. You have heard me speak of that talent before when up with brilliancy, buoyancy, and comprehensiveness at the close and Distaeli showed the marvellous talent that he has, for summing Peel again replied upon me, but I did not hear that part of him; dinner hour from 7 to 74, and then I went home for a little quiet. the story, for there is nothing else worth saying. It was at the had to make the best I could after Graham. That is the end of np again, and the Speaker deserted Scott and called me, and I in succession, who are usually together, called for me. - So I was pating more or less interest when men speak on opposite sides and and there was a great uproar because the House always antieiwho had risen at the same time. Upon this I sat down again, Speaker was not dreaming of me, and called a certain Mr. Scott is strong], and made my plunge when he sat down. But the Chi per virth, chi per paura vale [one from valour, another from fear, courage that proceeds from fear, according to a line from Ariosto: speech that this was no pleasant prospect; but I acquired the I felt I had no choice but to follow him. He made so very able a had seen Graham first, and he got it. But when he was speaking rose and stood in competition for the Speaker's eye. The Speaker Then there was an amusing seene between him and Peel. Both Stafford who began the debate, as he was to take the other side. similar wish. At any rate, he had the opportunity of following found I was going to speak, and I suppose may have had some did not wish any conflict even of reasoning with him. But he early, as I knew Graham would speak on the other side, and saying why, at some period of the night. I was anxious to do'it Distraeli; and made up my mind accordingly, which involved

During the parliament that sat from 1847 to 1852, Alr. Cladstone's political life was in partial abeyance. The whole burden of conducting the affairs of the Hawarden estate fell appen him. For five years, he said, 'it constituted my daily and continuing care, while parliamentary action was only occasional. It supplied in fact my education for the office occasional. It supplied in fact my education for the office of finance minister.' The demands of church matters were of finance minister.' The demands of church matters were or might have meant the expulsion from the establishment of calvinists and evangelicals bag and baggage. 'I am old enough,' said the provost of Oriel, 'to remember three paptismal controversies, and this is the first in which one party has tried to eject the other from the church.' On the other hand the sacramental wing found it intolerable that fundamental doctrines of the church should be settled under the veil of royal supremacy, by a court possessed of no distinctly church character.

The judgment was declared on March 8 (1850), and

1 Purcell, Manning, i. pp. 528-33. were leaving his friends in the lurch. None of them ever further.1 This graphic relation looks as if Mr. Gladstone of his character, turned and said: We will not press him protest; and finally how Manning, knowing the pertinacity thought that as a privy councillor he ought to sign such a Manning to sign, asked him in a low voice whether he prok to the fire, began to demur; and when pressed by proceeded to sign; how Mr. Gladstone, standing with his house, agreed to a declaration against the judgment, and authority; how thirteen of them met at Mr. Gladstone's it tends to impair another vivid scene described on the same the cardinal is trivial and not worth mentioning, but perhaps case and its probable consequences. This slip of memory in discussion with Manning, Hope, and others on the Gorham busy day, including a morning spent after letter-writing, in having friends to dine with him on this night, he records a judgment, having dined at the palace the night before, and Manning included, in his bedroom. On the black day of the up until several days later, when he did see various people, an alibi. According to Mr. Gladstone's diary he was not laid that it was wise to keep diary enough at any rate to prove once observed in regard to the practice of keeping diaries, relieved itself by some authoritative act. A witty judge exclaimed that the church of England was gone unless it whereon Mr. Gladstone started up, threw out his arms and by his bedside and telling him what the court had done; Oladstone's house, finding him ill with influenza, sitting down Manning is made to tell a vivid story about going to Mr.

be cast. means the new forms into which political combination may diary he records on April 10, 'On duty from 2 to 34 P.M.' special constables during the troubled days of April. In his Both Mr. Gladstone and his brother John served as pass for them, offered their services to put down the chartist ot tannailrag becausing had had holded parliament to saint' of the coal-whippers, who, as a manifestation of their In 1848 Northcote speaks of Mr. Gladstone as the 'patron

1 Garnett's Edward Gibbon Wakefield, p. 248. See also p. 232. colonial clergy, full of knotty points as to which he wrote of state in 1846, questions arose upon the legal status of spoke frequently on colonial affairs. When he was secretary unoccupied lands to the crown.1 Between 1837 and 1841 he among other things the principle of the reservation of all minority for the draft report of the chairman, containing 1840 on the colonisation of New Zealand, and voted in the accounts. He was a member of the important committee of upon military expenditure in the colonies, and upon colonial committee on Waste Lands (1836). He served on committees the 'prominent and valuable' part taken by him in the portant side of the colonial question. Molesworth mentions full view of the costly and sanguinary nature of that imon native affairs at the Cape, and there he had come into whole strength. He had sat upon a committee in 1835-6 tion or work on his reflection, he never failed to bend his whatever it might be, that happened to kindle his imaginapartment for more than a few months, but to any business, came next. He had not held the seals of the colonial deinterests and free trade the second, the turn of the colonies church had been the first of Mr. Gladstone's commanding found it, critical principles and improved ideals. is to say, who applied to the routine of government, as they gressive or theorising section of the cabinet—the men, that of 1845, he was described as a strong accession to the pro-When Mr. Gladstone became colonial secretary at the end to show that the judicial committee was historically unconstited tutional, as an organ for the decision of ecclesiastical questions. This declaration was entitled, I think, 'A Letter to the Bishop of 'Dondon on the Ecclesiastical Supremacy.' If I recollect right, while it dealt little with theology, it was a more pregnant production than the declaration, and it went much nearer the mark. It has been repeatedly published, and is still on sale at Murray's. It has been repeatedly published, and is still on sale at Murray's. I am glad to see that Sidney Herbert (a gentleman if ever there was one) also declined to sign. It seems to me now, that there is something almost Indicrous in the propounding of such a congeries of statements by such persons as we were; not the more, but of statements by such persons as we were; not the more, but eartainly not the less, because of being privy conneillors.

It was a terrible time; aggravated for me by heavy cares and responsibilities of a nature quite extraneous: and far beyond all others by the illness and death of a nuch-loved child, with great anxieties about another. My recollections of the conversations before the declaration are little but a mass of confusion and bewilderment. I stand only upon what I did. No one of us, I bewilderment. I stand only upon what I did. No one of us, I bewilderment. I stand only upon what I did. No one of us, I bewilderment and extend position, not even our lawyers, until Baron Alderson printed an excellent statement on the points raised.¹

III

For long the new situation filled his mind. The case of the chord borurch of England at this moment, he wrote to Lord Lyttelton, 'is a very dismal one, and almost leaves men to choose between a broken heart and no heart at all. But at present it is all dark or only twilight which rests upon our future.' He busily set down thoughts upon the supremacy. He studied Davily set down thoughts upon the supremacy. He studied busily set down thoughts upon the Ectormation in regard to the supremacy; but also much more sensible of the drifting of the church since, away from the range of her constitutional securities; and more than ever convinced how thoroughly false is the present position. As to himself and his own work in life, in reply I suppose to something urged by Manning, he says (April 29, 1850), 'I have two characters in the fourth edition, i. p.

1. Furcell professed to rectify the original story.

2. Furcell professed to rectify the original story.

2. Furcell professed to rectify the original story.

3. Furcell professed to rectify the original story.

NEM COPONIVE BOFICK

stand against pretensions in Canada to set their assembly n equal footing with the imperial parliament at home. The other hand, while he should always be glad to see ament inclined to make large sacrifices for the purpose as intaining the colonies, he conceived that nothing I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose I be more ridiculous, or more mistaken, than to suppose in the deliberate and permanent in opposition to the deliberate and permanent istion of the neonle of the colonies themselves?

ch they are retained under the administration of le, in point of fact, every year and every month during on about fitting them for the privileges thus conferred; rval they are condemned to hear all the miserable During the whole of that seding free institutions. ni tanematire of parliament in the liberality of parliament in s' waiting, have a portion given back to them, with ties, and then perhaps, after fifteen or twenty or thirty ut to Australia or New Zealand to be deprived of these her country, instead of keeping their hereditary liberties, Our modern colonists, he said, after quitting the nditure was maintained, which became a premium on l itself; and, as the climax of the evil, a great military reared up for the purposes which the colony ought to long clothes, then into short clothes. A governing class ny, like an infant, by slow degrees to walk, first putting it paring' these new communities for freedom: teaching a r weary of protest against the fallacy of what was called master key with him was local freedom, and he was with a colony to be the moral and the social tie.3 n first to last he always declared the really valuable e to reproduce its laws and the spirit of its institutions. land from which they sprang, and their spontaneous ection lay in the natural affection of the colonies for s done to room eat that the urged that the root of such a e did not at all undervalue what he called the mere iction of the people of the colonies themselves.2

29, 1840.

peech on affairs of Lower Canada, 2 See his evidence before a Select Committee on Colonial Military ExOn Government of Canada bill, penditure, June 6, 1861.

nineteenth. Mr. Gladstone did not see, in truth he never saw, any more than Bossuet saw in his age, that the Time-Spirit was shifting the foundations of the controversy. However that may be, the interesting thing for us in the history of his life is the characteristic blaze of battle that this case now life is the characteristic blaze of battle that this case now kindled in his breast.

On the eve of his return from Germany in the autumn of 1845, one of his letters to Mrs. Gladstone reveals the pressing intensity of his conviction, deepened by his intercourse with the grave and pious circles at Munich and at Stuttgart, of the supreme interest of spiritual things:—

tention. I do not think that you would be very sorrowful? As I retire from the barren, exhausting strife of merely political conas His organ for the recovery of our country-how joyfully would trial before God and the world upon the performance of her work path of the church clear before her, as a body able to take her the face, and to work through them. Were they over, were the questions—God grant that we may have courage to look them in anoigiler tearg bas laisoe teerg esolt an mogu escret religious teoitzujni benota-flad but bastetetate and but half-atoned anit the west, that coming storm, the minister of God's retribualways be where it is. . . . Ireland, Ireland! that cloud in the line of my own future life, but I hope and pray it may not into language which is necessarily determinate. I cannot trace It is dangerous to put indefinite thoughts, instincts, longings, give themselves, if it may be, clearly and wholly to that work. it, to labour more and more in the spirit of these principles, to how solemn is the call upon all those who hear and who can obey the other to human eyes immeasurably remote—lastly how loud, church's unity, inestimably precious on the one hand, and on up with the church—how inestimably precious would be the history-how the power of religion and its permanence are bound a'blrow edt to boireq aidt ai egraf ta noigiler rot aiaira a tadw leef school. All that I can see and learn induces me more and more to tions of hers staying with her, who are Roman eatholics of a high Munich and since coming here with Mrs. Craven and some connecand I have had much conversation upon church matters first at In my wanderings my thoughts too have had time to travel;

upon which, within the last twelve or fifteen years, you have lounded a rational mode of administering the affairs of your colonies without gratuitous interference.

As I turn over these old minutes, memoranda, dispatches, speeches, one feels a curious irony in the charge engendered by party heat or malice, studiously and scandalously careless of facts, that Mr. Gladstone's policy than that which he so the colonies. As if any other policy than that which he so ardently enforced could possibly have saved them.

like him to regard the affair with an optimistic simplicity body and especially detestable to him; and again, it was disaster, cheerfully to undertake a duty detestable to anycall of friendship, and in the hope of preventing a terrible the interests of both. I have called the proceeding characteristic, for it was in fact exactly like him to be ready at the scientiously believed, alike friendly to both parties and in the person missing, set off alone for a purpose, as he conalso of his own wife who had long been much attached to Mr. Gladstone at the earnest solicitation of his friend, and for this critical mission. Manning was unable to go, but the two persons best qualified by character and friendship clusion reached was that Mr. Gladstone and Manning were place herself in a position of security. The further conshould seek access to the lady, and try to induce her to members of his circle, it was thought best that some one sultations between the husband and three or four important In consequence of these rumours, and after anxious conmight be no more than indiscreet, but might be worse. and rumours by and by reached England of movements that His friend's wife had been for some time travelling abroad, wholly passed over. Fortunately a few sentences will suffice. Gladstone, and so entirely to his honour, that it cannot be been often misrepresented; and it is so characteristic of Mr. of it, but it finds a place in books even to this day; it has feeling would now willingly choose either to speak or hear that befel one of his nearest friends. Nobody of humane In 1849 Mr. Gladstone was concerned in a painful incident way to make that community powerful and healthful, to give a several capacities, in the performance of its public duties, is the enlist the members of a community, with due regard to their but feeble and ineffective systems; and that methodically to principle of absolutism, must of necessity be, not indeed tyrannical, us all systems, whether religious or political, which rest on a forms of usefulness for man. I am deeply convinced that among might, educated and shaped into the most refined and regular and mineral of nature are, with clamour indeed but also with obedience, and the brute powers of society like the fire, air, water a ceaseless labour is going on; stubborn matter is reduced to workshops, and have seen that amidst the clatter and the din asi to desision but testtod of the midst of its man to won hundreds of unlearned to agree with him. months later, it was seen how the learned man found several be a proper member for the university of Oxford. A few that no man holding such opinions as these could ever he exclaimed that he had heard enough to be quite sure Magdalen, revolving nearly a hundred years of mortal life, in vig and cassock among his books and manuscripts at When they reached the ears of old Dr. Routh, as he sat These were the golden trumpet-notes of a new time.

firm seat to its rulers, and to engender a warm and intelligent

devotion in those beneath their sway.1

me, considering how long you have been a large part both a reflected sorrow. You can do nothing that does not reach must be sacred to me, even did they not touch me sharply with suffered. . . . Such griefs ought to be sacred to all men, they tion from you, I can too well comprehend what you have to him from Naples (January 26, 1851):-- Without descripstep of quitting his charge at Lavington, Mr. Gladstone wrote wards the edge of the cataract. When he took the ominous growing dismay he had seen Manning drawing steadily to-Gladatone one of the dire catastrophes of his life. With This chapter naturally closes with what was to Mr.

CHYPTER IV

DEVIH OF SIR ROBERT PEEL

(0981)

FAMOUS men—whose merit it is to have joined their name to events that were brought onwards by the course of things.—Paul-Louis Courier.

IT was now that Lord Palmerston strode to a front place--- man who always believed what he desired; a confident man ready to make arrows out of any wood. He was a sanguine described him as audacious and passionate marksman, of seeing the whole and not merely the half. Metternich own arguments, and wanting in the statesman's first quality cut, but apt to be narrow, teasing, obstinate, a prisoner to his and pleasure. Diplomatists found him firm, prompt, cleanpassion for public business to sympathy with social gaiety and long resentments. Like so many of his class, he united example that amused it. Yet he had no capacity for deep trait of which he was before long to give the world an success was quick retaliation on a victorious adversary—a and it was noticed that with him the next best thing to cheerful humour. But to lose the game was intolerable, recklessness. He was good-tempered and a man of bluff share of shrewd common sense, yet was capable of infinite vinced it that he was the man for its mood. He had his full was for a time in a mood for change, and Palmerston conspell of peace, earnestness, and political economy, the nation much a moral antagonism as it was political. After a long stiffer and more deeply rooted, for being in both cases as different degrees of energetic antagonism. This was all the sive epochs in his career, Mr. Gladstone found himself in one of the two conspicuous statesmen with whom, at success-

Hope as executor, and substituting Northcote. Friendship did not die, but only lived 'as it lives between those who inhabit separate worlds.' Communication was not severed; social intercourse was not avoided; and both on occasions in life, the passing by of which, as Hope-Scott said, would be a loss to friendship, and on smaller opportunities, they corresponded in terms of the old affection. Quis desiderio is Mr. Gladstone's docket on one of Hope's letters, and in another (1858) Hope communicates in words of tender feelting the loss of his wife, and the consolatory teachings of the faith that she, like himself, had embraced; and he recalls to faith that she, like himself, had embraced; and he recalls to the deepest was fed by a common interest in religion.¹

In Manning's case the wound cut deeper, and for many years the estrangement was complete.² To Wilberforce, the archdeacon, Mr. Gladstone wrote (April 11, 1851):—

I do indeed feel the loss of Manning, if and as far as I am capable of feeling anything. It comes to me cumulated, and doubled, with that of James Hope. Nothing like it can ever form I suppose with any other two men the habits of communication, counsel, and dependence, in which I have now for from fifteen to eighteen years lived with them both. . . . My intellect does deliberately reject the grounds on which Manning has proceeded. Indeed they are such as go far to destroy my confidence, which was once and far too long at the highest point, in the healthiness and soundness of his. To show that at any rate this healthiness and soundness of his. To show that at any rate this is not from the mere change he has made, I may add, that my conversations with Hope have not left any corresponding impression upon my mind with regard to him.

A wider breach was this same year made in his inmost

A wider breach was this same year made in his inmost circle. In April of the year before a little daughter, between four and five years old, had died, and was buried at Fasque.

among those who think that Scott still deserves to be remembered, not as an author only, but as a noble and vigorous man.' " From 1853 to 1861 they did not correspond nor did they even meet. t In 1868 Mr. Gladstone urged him to produce an abridged version of Lockhart's Life of Scott. Then Hope found that his father-in-law's own abridgment was unknown; and (1871) asks Mr. Gladstone's leave to dedicate a reprint of it to him as 'one cate a reprint of it to him as 'one sulover han emod to eviteveness was on tach bine ad blues though the algorithm of reverting the subject to the subject of the subject of the partial transform was sometimes and subject of the partial transform of the continues of the partial subject of the continues of t io mue guoris odi ban eyo hindəren odi izadi insbitucə fesi thate, od yam on band rowning in Josefelie deitiff a dela de mue engreed cised yet blues of node yingibui mori cori Mosanid blad blo do seah ni menod odi sa gedisdW', nob same and no colliner a to exprediants costrad a drive que banow node to treated the same along the lips, and he then rod corne calded nedelvib odt ni dynnist obem tedt oton a flouric reachaim becauchun out sonerwe seul eid ni sud -Mill mideri) andelo, Marsell Jost-vertoll wit in nem accepted example bine, builder Mr. Chabstone, the greaters Astronia ban noiserotone error obrailgun oldu -dannes dibe equibectory contact eld behardob noncombet confidence of foreign policy found the malvest for the confidence over odl good to romain; wit an ogner bus cored granibrosites to endsh a nt. Coal area von a ban geland andi bebesch ed or seel car spitoq aptoaol sid ban neverounted soils shifts es becognih un I han alive hun magnah to coicde a si si' Josef or manical) bian filled coldmon non oldiens, obam of han goille ni wen mountweep pids them out to redment pullur ada saa ogenoaroj arojzo lum lidrosam eid!

The Roman citizen was in this instance a Mediterranean dew who chanced to be a british subject. His house at Achens had for some reason or other been sacked by the mob; he presented a demand for compensation absurdly mob; he presented a demand for compensation absurdly to pay. England dispatched the fleek government reinsed to pay. England dispatched the fleek government this and some other petty accounts outstanding. Itussia and France proposed their good offices; the mediation of France was accopted; then a number of Greek vessels were perempterily seized, and France in umbrage recalled her ambassador from soixed, and France in umbrage recalled her ambassador from London. Well might Peel, in the last speech over delivered by him in the House of Commons, describe such a course, of action as consistent neither with the dignity nor the honour action as consistent neither with the dignity nor the honour

's yaorw bae ositenfai teaiche and tostory lliw backyal

CHYPTER VI

NYLFER

(ISSI-09SI)

tyrannies is the tyranny of cowards.—Tocqueville [1850]. He to terow out ban chirals are of the horid the worst of all dungeons. I am ready to believe that the king of Naples is itself to leaving six or seven thousand state prisoners to perish in ness and clemency, because it does not put men to death, and confines so, to hear the pretensions of the government here [Naples] to mild-Ir would be amusing, if the misfortunes of mankind ever could be

In the autumn of 1850, with the object of benefiting the

who came to this country a nearly starving refugee. But plished man of letters, and a victim of political persecution, described him, 'of warm, large and free nature, an accombeen opened to him by Panizzi—a man as Mr. Gladstone time pretty strongly in favour of established governments, either at Naples or anywhere else. The case had doubtless political propagandism, and his prepossessions were at that to the heart's core. He went to Naples with no purposes of Nationality penetrated later, and then indeed it penetrated beyond liberty, with all that ordered liberty conveys. weight of old conservative tradition, did not at first go slowly and almost blindly heaving off his shoulders the of Liberty, the sentiment of Nationality. Alx. Gladstone, the huge uprisings that shook Europe in 1848—the principle sentiments, aspirations, forces, call them what we will, awoke Two deep principles, was destined to carry him so far. tarily, into that great European stream of liberalism which native ardour of his humanity, unconsciously and involun-For Italy it was, that now first drew Mr. Gladstone by the journey to southern Italy, and an eventful journey it proved. eyesight of one of their daughters, the Gladstones made a

and welfare of the world. their acquisitions, if indeed we wish to promote the peace take care to build whatever it may be our part to add to gone before us, and a firm foundation on which we must inheritance bequeathed to us by the generations that have on the combined dictates of sound experience, a precious a great and noble monument of human wisdom, founded untrustworthy, he exclaimed; 'I find in it, on the contrary, of nations. You may call the rule of nations vague and some substitute, even a substitute so imperfect as the law lence, anarchy, and brute wrong. He knew the necessity for though with so many defects, a controlling force over vio-Christian for nothing: He knew the evils that followed in Europe the breakdown of the great spiritual power—once, Gladstone had not read history for nothing, he was not a from others towards their authority and strength.' free institutions, which we should desire and should exact ds pay all respect to a feeble state and to the infancy of Greece, he said, 'let us do as we would be done by; let the rights that belong to our fellow-subjects resident in language. 'When we are asking for the maintenance of their rights of the weak with the strong. Such was his nations, to their sacred independence, to the equality in victions of mankind, to the principles of brotherhood among ment of the civilised world, to the general and fixed conappeal, so often repeated by him, to the common sentifabric is founded. Now for the first time he made the Europe and of the principles and relations on which the well-armed master, into a full view of the state system of case, though of these too he proved himself a thoroughly chanceries, above the narrow expediencies of the particular who transported them apart from the chicane of diplomatic a living spring. It felt all the noble elevation of an orator of carefully collected rain-water, but the bounteous flow of that, in the image of an ancient critic, here was no cistern dethroned leader who sat by his side, Yet the House felt confronting him; still less had he such authority as the Mr. Gladstone had not in 1850 at all acquired such full parliamentary ascendency as belonged to the hardy veteran

See Munz's Italienische Reminiscenzen und Profile, p. 248. entire classes upon which the life and growth of the nation all the other proceedings of the government, desolating long periods of time of uncondemned and untried men, and corruptions of the tribunals, the vindictive treatment for stirred him less, as it was right they should, than the would enter. Even these inhuman and revolting scenes loathsome to allow it to be expected that professional men the doctors, because the lower regions were too foul and men almost with death in their faces, toiling upstairs to see of Nisida chained in this way; he watched sick prisoners, common felons; he conversed with Poerio himself in the bagno liberal opposition) chained two and two in double irons to (and political prisoners included a large percentage of the for the extreme of filth and horror; he saw political prisoners trived to visit some of the Meapolitan prisons, another name undergoing degrading and murderous penalties. He conthose who for unproved political offences were in thousands Gladstone accurately informed himself of the condition of dreadful penalty of four-and-twenty years in irons. Poerio, not long before a minister of the crown, of the tute court found good enough to justify the infliction on condign punishment for perjury-evidence that a prostiheard should not only have ended the case, but secured giving such evidence that the tenth part of what he as he could command to the principal crown witness, during the trial of Poerio, he listened with as much patience system of government. Sitting in court for long hours thing it really was,—'the negation of God erected into a of conventional diplomacy, but as the black and execrable saw Bourbon absolutism no longer in the decorous hues ment of fact was made upon Lacaita's credit. Alr. Gladstone he was able to say with literal truth that not a single stateopened the traveller's eyes to the condition of things, though to the world of fashion in the Corso.'1 Here Lacaita first and statues of the Villa Reale, looking now to the sea, now night, 'under the acacias and palms, between the fountains constantly; they talked politics and literature day and gentality, cuttivestin, and embassy; he met Mr. Gladstone geniality, cultivation, and enlightenment. He was the legal ( gigantic work of government, which he conducted after a fashion quite different,—I mean as to the work done in the workshop of his own brain,—from preceding and succeeding prime ministers, that their root was enfeebled, though in its feebleness it had more strength probably remaining than fell to the lot of any other public man.'

Peel may at least divide with Walpole the laurels of our greatest peace minister to that date—the man who presided over beneficent and necessary changes in national polity, that in hands less strong and less skilful might easily have opened the sluices of civil confusion. And when we think of Walpole's closing days, and of the melancholy end of most other ruling spirits in our political history—of the mortifications and discoppinate in which, from Chatham and Pitt down to Canning and O'Connell, they have quitted the glorious field death. Daring and prosperous legislative exploits had higher, his path. His authority in parliament never stood higher, his honour in the country never stood so high. His last words had been a commanding appeal for temperance in national action and language, a solemn plea for peace as in national action and language, a solemn plea for peace as the true aim to set before a powerful people. To his father Mr. Gladstone wrote:—

persons were what are called Peelites, and not protectionists. By far the greater portion, I am sorry to say, of both sets of partly by some twenty who actually voted with the government. was made up out of our ranks, partly by people staying away and is an unsatisfactory subject. The majority of the government great earnestness about it. As to the division I shall say little; it wards. I was at the palace last night and she spoke to me with which is one of deep interest to all classes, from the Queen down-This is all that I know and that is worth telling on a subject ill at a meeting which, in common with him, I had to attend. and next day, Saturday, in the forenoon I thought he looked very Palmerston's speech, that he spoke with little physical energy, I observed that he slept during much of Lord he usually is. during the debate last week. I mean as compared with what July 2, 1850.—I thought Sir R. Peel looked extremely feeble Neapolitan government, and increase their severity? His reply was, 'As to us, never mind; we can hardly be worse than we are. But think of our country, for which we are most willing to be sacrificed. Exposure will do it good. The present government of Naples rely on the English conservative party. Consequently metion in the House of Lords. Let there be a voice from that party showing that whatever government be in power in England, no support will be given to such proceedings as these. It will do much to break them down. It will also strengthen the hands of an eupport will be given to such proceedings as these. It will do are not alike, I know it from observation. These ministers all the extremest of extremes. There are others who would willingly the extremest of extremes. There are others who would willingly see more moderate means adopted.' On such grounds as these (I do not quote words) he strongly recommended me to ack.

11

deen's intervention, in preference to any other mode of London with the intention of obtaining, if possible, Aberhumane' (to Mrs. Gladstone, March 4). He had come to and 'found him as always, satisfactory; kind, just, moderate, Hope and Manning, he sought Lord Aberdeen (March 4), $\overline{\mathrm{by}}$ the unmistakable signs of the approaching secession of he could of the poignant anxieties that were stirred in him the proposal to join the new cabinet, after making the best chambers of his wrath and pity. After rapidly despatching hundred miles away, but still vividly burning in the haunted more of those 'scenes fitter for hell than earth, now many probably thought not only nearly as much, but infinitely own accession to one of the highest offices of state.' believe he thought nearly as much as the prospect of his horrors of the Neapolitan government, of which I verily character. He could speak of nothing so readily as the says Phillimore, 'by the earnestness and simplicity of his to enter the government. 'I was never more struck,' which we shall hear in the next chapter, pressing him, more met him at the station with Lord Stanley's letter, of Mr. Gladstone reached London on February 26. Philli-

1 Letters, p. 226.

expectation that the party will be in some manner reconstituted. I share in the feeling that it is desirable; but I see very great difficulties in the way, and do not at present see how they are to be effectually overcome. The House of Commons is almost equally divided, indeed, between those professing liberal and those professing conservative polities; but the late division [Don Pacifico] showed how ill the latter could hang together, even when all those who had any prominent station among them in any sense all those who had any prominent station among them in any sense were united, . . .

Cornewall Lewis wrote, 'Upon Gladstone the death of Peel will have the effect of removing a weight from a spring—he will come forward more and take more part in discussion. The general opinion is that Gladstone will renounce his free trade opinions, and become leader of the protectionists. I expect neither the one event nor the other,' More interesting still is something told by the Duke of Buccleuch. Very shortly,' said the duke in 1851, 'before Sir Robert Peel's death, he expressed to me his belief that Sidney Reel's death, he expressed to me his belief that Sidney and with sarcasm, If the hour comes, Disraeli must be made governor-general of India. He will be a second made governor-general of India. He will be a second Ellenborough.' 2

² Dean Boyle's Recollections, p. 32.

0

with the Austrian government, and taken a warm interest in Vienna, saying that for forty years he had been connected On May 2 Lord Aberdeen wrote to Schwarzenberg at Vesuvius or Etna. resolute exposure, than they would put out the fires of bilities of diplomacy would no more hold him back from from Mr. Gladstone's demeanour that the decorous plausiindictment from the lips of such a pleader; and he perceived on the European continent, by the publication of such an would inevitably be done to conservatism both at home and the indictment laid before him; he saw the prejudice that have been pleasing. He felt the truth and the enormity of down his own case of a few months earlier, and this cannot was now forced upon him. Still that evidence plainly shook than any promised advantage. Aberdeen was too upright and deeply humane a man to resist the dreadful evidence that depart without producing mischiefs a thousandfold greater the intercourse between states, from which you never can tion of the sacred principles that govern and harmonise the more careful ought they to be not to impair the applicathat the less they admired Meapolitan institutions and usages, guarded phrases, and had urged as against Lord Palmerston to the Neapolitan government without approval but in light. In his speech in the Pacifico debate, he had referred had represented her operations in Italy in a completely false 1850, he protested that we had deeply injured Austria and were effete. In attacking Palmerston's foreign policy again in Lamartine's trenchant saying that the treaties of Vienna вутратћу with rebellion shocked Абегдеец аз тисh ая dicating undriendliness to the King of Maples and a veiled out any chance of relief. This and other proceedings inredress, should take up any scheme, however wild, that held for long years under such grievances and seeing no hope of

with the Austrian government, and taken a warm interest in the fortunes of the empire; that Mr. Gladstone, one of the most distinguished members of the cabinet of Peel, had been so shocked by what he saw at Naples, that he was resolved to make some public appeal; then to avoid the pain and scandal of a conservative statesman taking such a course, would not his highness use his powerful influence to course, would not his highness use his powerful influence to any for the last two years and a half, I made up my mind to support Lord John Russell's bill for the admission of the Jews. I spoke to this effect last night. It is with reluctance that I give the vote, but I am convinced that after the civil privileges we have given them already (including the magistracy and the franchise), and after the admission we have already conceded to unitarians who refuse the whole of the most vital doctrines of the Gospel, we cannot compatibly with entire justice and fairness refuse to admit them.'

)K

Aly speech, Mr. Chadstone answered, was most unsatispossible like Muurice, and more like the Duke of Wellington! not seen by common men, in short, to be as lillle as out refining, and without dragging out some recondite view sure to deal with the Jew question on broad grounds, withwarned him, for the sake of his personal influence, to be character, His stouthearted friend Thomas Acland had pense is a key to many misunderstandings of Mr. Cladstone's worth your inquiring into.' The sentence above about susby official habits, which it may perhaps in some cases be have some claim to your confidence, probably increased tion, with a reserve towards those who may think they may nie. There is, however, a natural closeness in your disposistate you were in, without any intention whatever to annoy you withheld your opinions from me under the undecided tory reason I do not expect. I cannot doubt you thought to find some fair apology for your vote: good and satisfacnot satisfy his father. 'I shall certainly read your speech be much more frequent than even they are now. This did bluow esisnesisnosni bna erores it tuohiw bna enoitesup to shiri yann yasu noqu stil silduq ni sənərusəsə tautenos a question which seemed to many so plain; but suspense is of should find it necessary to hold my judgment in suspense on he says, in a notable sentence, 'it seems strange to you that I never intended to run it as close as it actually came. 'I know,' time as he possibly could for reflection upon it, though he question as one of difficulty, and he therefore took as much concealment. Alr. Gladstone replied that he regarded the His father, who was sometimes exacting, complained of accuser added invincible force to his accusations, and for the have been expected. The character and the politics of the die country took the matter up with the warmth that might nino cor, the 'difensore d'un popolo gemente.' The press in des in fire and tears to the 'generoso britanno, the 'magnaof revolutionary illusion. Italian women composed fervid nim letters of gratitude and hope, with all the moving accent NEVLOLITAN LETTERS PUBLISHED 268

European conservatives read the letters with disgust and better reason than that he bore the name of Gladstone. For blackballed at one of the fashionable clubs in Paris for no servative. On the other hand, an English gentleman was parison with the ferocious adjectives of the English con-They regarded their own epithets as insipid by comof the Neapolitan policy. The Letters delighted the Paris organ in France, made himself the foremost champion the fact that the editor of the Univers, the chief catholic education question. This line was none the less natural from so things glided easily round to Dr. Cullen and the Irish bound to abhor, or else these doctrines were their own. accepted from the government doctrines that they were in this atrocious instruction? The clergy had either basely comment on the church which is the main and direct agent schools. Why then, cried the Times, does he omit all books he ever read a certain catechism used in the Meapolitan Gladstone had denounced as one of the most detestable the Roman clergy regarded as normal and complete. infernal system described by Mr. Gladstone was that which Naples was the bosom friend of the pope, and that the church fed the flame. It was pointed out that the King of ment of English public feeling against the Roman catholic applanded in liberal prints. Even the contemporary excitefirst time in his life Mr. Gladstone found himself vehemontly setting his name at the head of a detestable libel. The his own fame, besides doing Lord Aberdeen the wrong of declared that he had injured the good cause and discredited Mr. Gladstone the dupe of men less honest than himself, and People like Madame de Lieven pronounced .apprehension.

¹ Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, Octoder 1851. Protestant Magazine, September 1851.

.03

ЭK

alliance with it?' will do, or allow to be done, for the church while yet in fully answered, What will the state of its own free and good of preparation for a crisis, I want to see the question more her habits. And besides all these very needful conditions for the church to point to in argument, and to grow into must supervene. There must be more years of faithful work emost to dorude the third and the church of Rome to it. A more composed and settled state of the public group of secessions which, following or preceding, belonged years must elapse from the secession of Newman and the body we are not ready yet for the last alternatives. More against a catholic doctrine. But what I feel is that as a would be still more distasteful than a decision of the state issue. Perhaps they will evade it. On abstract grounds this sunrise to sunset on the Gorham case. It is a stupendous (December 30), I should wish to converse with you from gether,' Mr. Gladstone writes to Manning at the end of 1849 duced the second great tide of secession. 'Were we to-This and the preferment of Hampden to his bishopric prodecision of a court of law, known as the Gorham judgment. marking incident after the secession of Newman was a religion for the doctrines of the church. The next really more of a determination to substitute a sort of general

The Gorham case was this: a bishop refused to institute a clergyman to a vicarage in the west of England, on the ground of unsound doctrine upon regeneration by baptism. The clergyman sought a remedy in the ecclesiastical court of Arches. The judge decided against him. The case then council, and here a majority with the two archbishops as assessors reversed the decision of the court below. The bishop, one of the most combative of the human race, flew to Westminster Hall, tried move upon move in queen's bench, exchequer, common pleas; declared that his archbishop had exchequer, common pleas; declared that his archbishop had communion with him. But the sons of Zerniah were too communion with him. But the sons of Zerniah were too hard. The religious world in both of its two standing camps had. The religious world in both of its two standing camps had.

cation. How then could Aberdeen expect that Mr. Gladstone of should abandon the set and avowed purpose with which is a standard to England?

It was exactly because the party with which Mr. Gladstone

When I consider, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Aberdeen, of humanity' it was not artificial claptrap in a protocol.2 he was thinking of. When he talked of the sacred purposes just and good; and the issue is in His hands.' That is what feeble they are, and I lament it; but God is strong and is faithful to them, and will use every means in iny power; those directly interested, in my name, that I am not unyour power, he writes to Lacaita in May, 'to assure any of scandal to the reactionaries of Europe. 'I wish it were in his purpose? He had something else to think of than the government, that should induce Mr. Gladstone to abandon about bringing the charges under the notice of the Neapolitan recriminations, winding up with a still more idle sentence they arrived, in Prince Schwarzenberg's idle dissertations and at variance with right.1 And what was there, when at last any course of conduct, even in a foreign country, flagrantly became specially responsible for not passing by in silence governments throughout Europe, that in his eyes that party was allied had made itself the supporter of established when I consider, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Aberdeen, that Prince Schwarzenberg really knew the state of things at Naples well enough independently of me, and then ask myself why did he wait seven weeks before acknowledging a letter relating to the intense sufferings of human beings

new supplementary publication:—
'If it be disagreeable to you in any manner to be the recipient of such sad communications, or if you think it better for any other reason, I would put the further matter into another form.' In answer to this, Lord Aberton refuse leave to associate his name with the second Letter, than he had done to withdraw the assumed leave for the association of his name with for the factor.

Gladstone to Lord Aberdeen, July 7,

as to the mode of proceeding "-(Mr.

Then he proceeds as to the draft letter to Castelcieala.

2 The one point on which Lord Aberdeen had a right to complain was that deen had a right to complain was that vice. As the point revives in Lord Stanmore's excellent life of his father, it may be worth while to reproduce two further passages from Mr. Gladstone's letter to Lord Aberdeen of July 7, 1851. Before publishing the second of the two Letters, he wrote to Lord Aberdeen of to Lord Aberdeen of to Lord Aberdeen of to Lord Aberdeen;—'I ought perhaps to Lord Aberdeen:—'I ought perhaps to have saked your formal permission for the act of publication; but I for the set of publication; but I

noh yim uoisesisanio nico no moif

.03

II. MOC

being hurried by other people.2 there never was a man in this world more resolute against Mr. Gladstone was often enough in a hurry himself, but own, and arguing tenaciously against all the rest for delay. sumptively the other way: that he was taking a line of his tion at all, and there is even evidence that points preis no evidence that Mr. Gladstone ever agreed to the resolusaid so, none of them made any signs of thinking so. There

—: syss an (3681 ,41 a letter to the writer of the book on Cardinal Manning (Jan. no sooner saw the, story than he pronounced it fiction. In We need not, however, argue probabilities. Mr. Gladstone me to-day, and the latter has sugnot with them.' On the same day etc., met here in the evening, I was Keble and Pusey have been with and Manning is not named as present. On the 18th: - 'Drs. Mill, Pusey, Gladstone from 14 Curzon Street:-¹ See, J. R. Hope's letter (undated) in Purcell, i. p. 530.

² On March 13, Hope writes to Mr. would appear to be the last meeting, try some immediate effort. prepared and published with promptitude an elaborate argument your second or next edition; with the simple statement that I as it stands. And here I have to ask you to insert two lines in know that I entirely disavow and disclaim Manning's statement did so without (I believe) any kind of sequel. I wish you to many interior objections. Seven out of the thirteen who signed nay, I believe cabinet minister. The declaration was liable to I was not only privy councillor but official servant of the crown, I had done stronger things than that when name degan with G. prised had he written that I told him I could not sign because my I was a privy councillor.' I should not have been more sur-35 years) that I would not sign the declaration of 1850 because I read with surprise Manning's statement (made first after here from 92 to 12 on the drait of the the Gorham judgment shall have taken effect, No later mecting is Denison, Dr. Pusey, Keble, Bennett, mate issues will have arrived until tion of a character pointing to uttivery heavy upon me, and secondly and mainly, because I do not consider that the time for any enunciapressure of other business has become meet to-night, first, because the Alr. Gladstone had written to the Rev. W. Maskell, 'As respects mysell, I do not intend to pursue the consideration of them with those who consideration of them with those who ever mentioned.

allow me the are of your rooms. The meeting seems to have taken place, for the entry on March 14 in Mr. Gladstone's diary is this:—
'Hope, Badeley, Talbot, Cavendish, 'Hope, Badeley, Talbot, Cavendish, 'Denison, Dr. Pusey Kehle Bennett. you cannot or do not will at any rate a before 10 to-morrow morning. propose a meeting at your house at tions; I have taken upon me to gested some alterations in the resolu-resolutions. Badeley again in the evening.

On the whole I resolved to honour. Instead of seeking amusements, diving into volcanoes and exploring excavated cities, he had visited prisons, descended into dungeons, examined cases of the victims of illegality and injustice, and had then sought to rouse the public opinion that he had circulated the pamphlet, in the hope that the European courts might use their influence. As Lord Aberdeen told Madame de Lieven, Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet by the extraordinary sensation it had created among men of all parties had given a great practical triumph to Palmerston and the foreign office.

The immediate effect of Mr. Gladstone's appeal was an The immediate effect of Mr. Gladstone's appeal was an August 7, 1851. Hansard, exv. ance of their country was close at hand. with sympathy and applause by the population. The deliver-Italians made their way to Bristol, where they were received news of you.' Communications were speedily opened. The (March 12, 1859), 'the first need of my heart was to seek tree soil, Poerio wrote to Mr. Gladstone from the Irish haven or bribed, put in at Queenstown. In setting foot on this ferred to an American ship; the captain, either intimidated were embarked for America. At Lisbon they were transcommuted prison to perpetual exile,3 and sixty-six of them should die in chains, or worse than death, should go mad, the cry of horror that would go up in Europe if Poerio of Cavour. But it was not until 1859 that the tyrant, fearing Letter; and in 1854 the martyrs heard vaguely of the action contrived to smuggle in a ferv pages of Mr. Gladstone's first pierced the gloom of the dungeons. As time went on, a lady Parizzing Parizzine ship of the mort of the strengt ship of the strength of th suddenly cut short the interview, saying, Addio, terribile The king Settembrini and the condition of the prisons. with Ferdinand, and for twenty minutes spoke of Poerio, Gladstone. At the close of 1851 he obtained an interview the king did not know of all the iniquities exposed by Mr. aggravation of prison rigour. Panizzi was convinced that

p. 1949.
p. 1949.
p. 1949.
p. 1951. Hansard, cxy.
p. 1949.
decision, see the address of Baldaca fisgan's Life of Panizzi, ii. pp.
Poerio (1867), p. 58.
3 On the share of Mr. Gladstone's to many eyes this might have appeared the greatest of the called the grandest spectacle of the seventeenth century, so doctor since Bossuet; and just as Bossuet's struggle was perhaps Europe might have seen the mightiest Christian If this vision of a dream had ever come to pass, the laying of firm foundations for future union in Christenblessed, inasmuch as it is both the business of truth, and truth in the church of England, which is an office doubly the holy task of clearing, opening, and establishing positive would be, were there not. It would be to set to work upon mercy and comfort. But I think I know what my course hand and much more than enough for its weakness, a great says to Manning a little later, 'there is work ready to my conditions that have passed away. 'In my own case,' he than historical anglicanism, which essentially depended on secret to rise through the struggle into something better calamities and appalling future prospects the conquering wanted was the divine art to draw from present terrible such unbounded prospects open before them. What they ever committed to men. Such vast interests were at stake, He does not think (June I, 1850), that a loftier work was days of her prosperity, in any period, can have been adorned. That opportunity is a prize far beyond any with which the the church than that now offered to English churchmen. afforded a nobler opportunity of doing battle for the faith in believe that all Christendom and all its history have rarely case,' he wrote to a clerical friend (April 9), 'I yet also medrob ent to seuszi eviternative issues of the Gorham to perform. Fully believing that the death of the church England amid trouble, suspense, and it might be even agony which it was now laid upon the children of the church of tion of spirit he expatiated on the arduous and noble task done by the state to the church. With boundless exaltahave become evident that justice cannot, i.e., will not, be That necessity will plainly have arisen for me when it shall my profession, unless and until the necessity has arisen. break my understood compact with the last, and forswear member of a sort of wreck of a political party. I must not to fulfil—that of a lay member of the church, and that of a honour. Instead of

canoes and explorin descended into duration case at descended into duration gained a clear view.

illegality and injr.adstone gained a clear view.

public opinion off have learned in Italy, he wrote to Manning this opinion off have learned in Italy, he wrote to Manning hope that the lower of the pope, that great, wonderful and ancient has Lord Aberdae. The problem has been worked out—the ground pamphlet by a train is laid—a foreign force, in its nature transitory, among men he hand of those who would complete the process by triumph to he hand of those who would complete the process by triumph to he match. This seems, rather than is, a digression. The imit event comes, it will bring about a great shifting of parts aggravantic super comes, it will bring about a great shifting of parts aggravatifunger- and much subter-position. God grant it may be the ling, event comes, it will bring about a great shifting of parts aggravatic super- and much subter-position. God grant it may be the ling.1. I desire it, because I see plainly that justice requires it. Gladst ut of malice to the popedom; for I cannot at this moment with; to answer with a confident affirmative, the question, a very Settem one—Ten, twenty, fifty years hence, will there be any subther body in western Christendom witnessing for fixed dogmatic Ptruth? With all my heart I wish it well (though perhaps not Ptruth? With all my heart I wish it well (though perhaps not Ptruth? what the consistory might think agreed with the meaning of of the term)—it would be to me a joyous day in which I should to see it really doing well.

Various ideas of this kind set him to work on the large and curious enterprise, long since forgotten, of translating fractions of translating of translating of translating of translation of a large portion of the began and finished the translation of a large portion of the book at Maples in 1850—dictating and writing almost daily. Three of the four volumes of this English translation were done with extraordinary speed by Mr. Gladstone's own hand, and the fourth was done under his direction. His band, and the fourth was done under his direction. His object was, without any reference to Italian unity, to give an illustration of the actual working of the temporal power in its latest history. It is easy to understand how the theme in its latest history. It is easy to understand how the theme fitted in with the widest topics of his life; the nature of

Sent No. I to the Prince; and wrote with sad feelings in those for Hope and Manning. "—Diary.

1 The first two volumes were published by Mr. Murray in 1852, and the last two in 1854. 'June 17, 1851,—'Got my first copies of Farini.

to ambition in its ordinary sense, we are spared the chief part of a substraions. If it has a valuable reward upon earth over and above a good name, it is when a man is enabled to bequeath to his children a high place in the social system of his country. That cannot be our case. The days are gone by when such a thing might have been possible. To leave to Willy a title with its burdens and restraints and disqualifications, but without the material substratum of wealth, and the duties and means of good, as well as the general power attending it, would not I think be acting for him in a wise and loving spirit—assuming, which may acting for him in a wise and loving spirit—assuming, which may be a vain assumption, that the alternative could ever be before us.

able as the power of the language in which it finds expresletter denotes an advance in his political temper, as remarkof the Christian religion itself. One fine passage in this greatest is the mutilation, under the seal of civil authority, energies of each communion. Of all civil calamities the religious freedom that brings out into old vigour the internal alike to maintain a full religious freedom. It is this plenary and full religious character, it is our interest and our duty parliaments. When the state has ceased to bear a definite servile doctrine that religion cannot live but by the aid of some of his warmest friends. Away, he cried, with the directness that kindled both alarm and indignation among enlarged upon the doctrine of religious freedom, with a a Scotch bishop at the end of 1851, Mr. Gladstone boldly direction. Certain it is that in a strongly-written letter to Mell-fitted to hasten the progress of his min in the liberal members of his own episcopal church were dissenters, was passed so much time and had such lively interests, the The fact that in Scotland, a country in which Mr. Gladstone

It is a great and noble secret, that of constitutional freedom, which has given to us the largest liberties, with the steadiest throne and the most vigorous executive in Christendom. I confess to my strong faith in the virtue of this principle. I have lived

Letter to the Right Rev. William Also Letter to Mr. Gladstone on this Skinner, Bishop of Aberdeen and letter by Charles Wordsworth, the Primus, on the functions of laymen in Varden of Glenalmond. Oxford, the Church, reprinted in Gleanings, vi. J. H. Parker, 1852.

CHAPTER VII

BEFICIONS LOGAVDO--- DEFILE DIFFICULTIES

(5981-1981)

I AN always disposed to view with regret the rupture of party ties—my disposition is rather to maintain them. I confess I look, it not with suspicion, at least with disapprobation on any one who is disposed to treat party connections as matters of small importance. My opinion is that party ties closely appertain to those principles of confidence which we entertain for the House of Commons.—Gladely (1852).

stand his attitude on papal aggression.1 Then according to on the good ground that the House of Commons would not Apparently not without some lingering doubts, he declined The Queen next wished Aberdeen to undertake the task. was committed to it, the other two strongly disapproved. The negotiation broke off on the No Popery bill; Lord John towards the fated coalition between whigs and Peelites. Aberdeen and Graham—the first move in a critical march was once more summoned to the palace, this time along with tions failed, he would make the attempt. Lord John Russell prepared to form a government, but that if other combina-Stanley said that he was not then protectionist leader. session, the whigs had resigned. The Queen sent for the Mortified by more than one repulse at the opening of the that he was urgently required to meet Lord Stanley. Italian journey (February 26, 1851) Ar. Gladstone found As we have seen, on the morning of his arrival from his not clearly eatch, namely that Lord Aberdeen himself would have acted on the Queen's wish, and that Graham had either suggested the got it put forward into its position.' Gladstone Memo., April 22, 1851.

t' He had told the Queen that he thought all the offices might be filled in a respectable manner from among the members of the Peel administration. On a subsequent day both Herbert and Cardwell made out from his conversation what I did

CHYPTER VII

SELIGIOUS TORNADO—PEELITE DIFFICULTIES

(2281-1281)

n always disposed to view with regret the rupture of party ties ny disposition is rather to maintain them. I confess I look, if a with suspicion, at least with disapprobation on any one who disposed to treat party connections as matters of small importee. My opinion is that party ties closely appertain to those inciples of confidence which we entertain for the House of inciples of confidence which we entertain for the House of among.—Glabour (1852), and his attitude on papal aggression.1 Then according to ton bluow anommood to seuse of Commons would not pparently not without some lingering doubts, he declined 1e Queen next wished Aberdeen to undertake the task. a committed to it, the other two strongly disapproved. ne negotiation broke off on the No Popery bill; Lord John vards the fated coalition between whigs and Peelites. erdeen and Graham—the first move in a critical march s once more summoned to the palace, this time along with is failed, he would make the attempt. Lord John Russell pared to form a government, but that if other combina-Stanley said that he was not then sectionist leader. ion, the whigs had resigned. The Queen sent for the tified by more than one repulse at the opening of the he was urgently required to meet Lord Stanley. an journey (February 26, 1851) Alr. Gladstone found ve have seen, on the morning of his arrival from his not clearly catch, namely that Lord Aberdeen himself would have acted on the Queen's wish, and that Graham had either suggested the difficulty altogether, or at any rate got it put forward int 'to position,' fill datone Memo,, t 'He had told the Queen that he account the falled anught all the offices might be filled the respectable manner from among ion. On a subsequent day both Jerbert and Cardwell made out Jerbert and Cardwell made out irom his conversation what I did

The illness was long and painful, and Mr. Gladstone bore his character and opinion to the same aggregate amount as esons femilies of free persons will be found differences flove, and it is the shattering of a great bond of union. one wrote to his brother John, is the loss of a great object y bis withdrawal.' The death of my father,' Mr. Gladund, and heart, and a great space is accordingly left void uman beings, that he still filled a great space to the eye, nantul, energetic, affectionate, and simple-hearted among nct, yet so much remained about him as one of the most ecayed and even his perception of personality rather indisommon purposes imperfect, the reasoning power much is memory was gone, his hold upon language even for om to another or to his brougham for a short drive, though ther of sight or hearing, and only able to walk from one Ir. Gladatone wrote to Phillimore, 'though with little left ighty-seventh birthday (Dec. 11). On the 7th he died. As aid the hope disappeared of seeing him even reach his Then December came, the veteran was taken seriously ill, its a very hard knock to those who come across him. a him: though weak in comparison with what he was, he great and sometimes almost frightful energy remaining f 1851 he finds him 'very like a spent cannon-ball, with Il the wear and pressure of his long life.' In the spring is brain—that indefatigable brain which has had to stand nature is full of grandeur. . . . Mischief is at work upon eventh year. The very wreck of his powerful and simple rown quite mild. The old man was nearing his eightyld age '; not having lost any of his interest in politics, but hat his father had taken 'a decided step, nay a stride, in When he returned to Fasque in the autumn he found t was the first time that death entered his married home. is little children, and the sorrow had a peculiar bitterness. oart in the nursing and watching. He was tenderly fond of ich differences from begetting estrangement.

·sn Zuou

pening them, I think we may the better strive to prevent

We cannot shut our eyes to this fact; by answer it was plain I must give; he told me his persevering would probably depend on me.

second time.'1

he ought to do so. I was not five minutes with him this I think I told him it seemed to me with little hope. He said he would still persevere, though least surprise. give Lord Stanley my answer, at which he did not show the he would do the like), I changed my clothes and went to Canning, told him what I meant to do, and gathered that Immediately after leaving the levee (where I also saw to bruit abroad the fame of the Meapolitan government. on to the levee, saw Lord Normanby and others, and began to the overwhelming majority. 'I then,' he continues,' went at the same conclusion on a new question, and in opposition remarkable that so many minds should arrive independently Graham against No Popery legislation, and noticed it as He learned also the clear opinions held by Aberdeen and learned what had been going on during his absence abroad. Mr. Gladstone next hastened to Lord Aberdeen, and allies talks to Graham of 'your sombre temperament.' Aly acter no two men could be more unlike. One of his closest colleagues together.' In some of the foundations of charspontaneous recourse to him for advice, than to all other tions, for the last twenty years and more, I had more Mr. Gladstone wrote to a friend, 'On administrative quescharacter. When Graham died ten years after this (1861), friends.' Here was the weak point in a strong and capable with the Peel squadron, or of letting in Stanley and his avoiding the responsibility either of taking the government think more than consciously, he is set upon the object of of their own. But it soon appeared that, unconsciously I they would now at length begin to take an independent course effectively place himself at the head of the Peelites, and that had given Mr. Gladstone the hope that Graham would they could not go on for long. The events of the late crisis aside, the whigs came back, most of them well aware that The protectionists having failed, and the Peelites standing

1 Memorandum, dated Fasque, April 22, 1851.

E Panizzi had certainly made no great revolutionist of him.

His opinions, as he told Lord Aberdeen, were the involuntary and unexpected result of his sojourn.

He had nothing to do with the subterranean forces at work in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, in the States of the Church, and in truth all over the Peninsula. The protracted struggle that had begun after the establishment of Austrian domination in the Peninsula in 1815, and was at last to end in the construction of an Italian kingdom—the most wonderful political transformation of the century—seemed after the fatal crisis of Novara (1849) further than ever from a close. Now was the morrow of the vast failures ever from a close. Now was the morrow of the vast failures and disenchantments of 1848. Jesuits and absolutists were and disenchantments of 1848.

once more masters, and reaction again alternated with conspiracy, risings, desperate carbonari plots. Mazzini, four years older than Mr. Gladstone, and Cavour, a year his junior, were directing in widely different ways, the one the revolutionary movement of Young Italy, the other the constitutional movement of the Italian Resurrection. The scene presented brutal repression on the one hand; on the other a chaos of republicans and monarchists, unitarians and federalists, frenzied idealists and monarchists, unitarians and federalists, frenzied idealists and sedate economists, wild ultras and men of the sober middle course. In the midst was the pope, the august shadow, not long before the centre, now once again the foe, of his countrymen's aspirations after freedom and a purer glimpse of the lights of the sun. The evolution of this extraordinary historic drama, to which evolution of this extraordinary historic drama, to which contributed alike the highest and the lowest elements in human nature and the growth of states, was to be one of the most sincere of Mr. Gladstone's interests for the rest of his life.

As we shall see, he was at first and he long remained untouched by the idea of Italian unity and Italy a nation. He met some thirty or more Italian gentlemen in society at Naples, of whom seven or eight only were in any sense liberals, and not one of them a republican. It was now that he made the acquaintance of Lacaita, afterwards so valued a friend of his, and so well known in many circles in England for his of his, and so well known in many circles in England for his promise Lord Stanley tried his hand. Proceedings were suspended for some days until Mr. Gladstone should be on the ground. He no sooner reached Carlton Gardens, than Lord Lincoln arrived, eager to dissuade him from accepting office. Before the discussion had gone far, the tory ing office. Before the discussion had gone far, the tory whip hurried in from Stanley, begging for an immediate

Visit.

Aberdeen, but that what he had told me about corn constituted, brod see bluow I staft bas ; gaixlesteban sid of llew bedeiw I object to inquiry; that, on general as well as on personal grounds, and against the ministerial bill, but that I did not on principle inquiry. I told him I was utterly against all penal legislation thing much better might result from a comprehensive and deliberate and intemperate as well as ineffective; and that he thought somerespect to papal aggression. He said that this measure was harty would do so. I asked him also what was his intention with I mid blot bas ; rewars as mid gaivig eroted neebredA brod ees at all. I thought, however, it might be well that I should still a most difficult question to decide, whereas now I had no question ing that if he had put protection in abeyance, I might have had pretty much in silence, but with an intense sense of relief; feelbut to put a duty of five or six shillings on corn. I heard him that he proposed to maintain the system of free trade generally, preliminary obstacle were found to intervene. Stanley then said none of them would constitute a difficulty with me, provided no should ask no questions and make no remark on these points, as have any occupant but one for the foreign office. I told him, I ship of the House of Commons, but his anxiety was evident to Nothing was said of the leaderoffice and the board of trade. open to me, along with others of which he named the colonial asw ti benileeb ed ii tud ganing ot berefte asw tnemtrageb with him—any office, subject to the reservation that the foreign and went. He told me his object was that I should take office and hear what Stanley had to say. I did not like to stickle, Aberdeen. But he came back with a fresh message to go at once, I promised, says Mr. Gladstone, to go directly after seeing Lord

I must not conceal from him, 'an enormous difficulty.' I used this expression for the purpose of preparing him to receive the martyr's part. himself he was not only willing—he rejoiced—to play the motto, to suffer is to do, 'it putine è anche operare. For as blaming him or considering it officious. He adopted the minister and brother of Lord Palmerson; not in the least Poerio apprehended that his own case had been made worse by the intervention of Mr. Temple, the British engenders a necessity for new.'1 vice multiplies itself with fearful speed, and the old crime before; and thus fear is quickened and enhanced, the original resentment creates true causes of fear where they were not fears lead to tyranny, that tyranny degets resentment, that illegality which gives a bad conscience, creates fears; those fountain-head of cruelty and baseness and every other vice the foundation of the Neapolitan system; illegality, the from the great fact of illegality, which seems to me to be endeavour to fix attention os much as to draw it of severity of these sentences, he wrote, 'I would not Hven on the sentences and barbarous prison practice. two before, that outraged him more than even rigorous King Ferdinand had solemnly sworn fidelity only a year or vas this violation of all law, and of the constitution to which depend, undermining the foundation of all civil rule.'

NOOK III.

.1681

I was particularly desirous, wrote Mr. Gladstone in a private memorandum, to have Poerio's opinion on the expediency of making some effort in England to draw general attention to these dorrors, and dissociate the conservative party from all suppositions at them; because I had had from a sensible man one strong opinion against such a course. I said to him that in my remonstrance through the cabinets, the second public notoriety and shame. That had Lord Aberdeen been in power the first might have been practicable, but that with Lord Palmerston it would not, because of his position relatively to the other cabinets would not, because of his position relatively to the other cabinets would not, because of his position relatively to the other cabinets would not, because of his position relatively to the other cabinets would not, because of his position relatively to the other cabinets of wanting in the will. Matters standing thus, I saw no way open but that of exposure; and might that possibly exasperate the forebodings are always gloomy, says Graham himself; 'I shudder on the brink of the torrent.' All accounts agree that he was a good counsellor in cabinet, a first-rate manager of business, a good if rather pompous speaker, admirably loyal and single-minded, but half-ruined by intense timidity. I have heard nobody use warmer language of commendation about him than Mr. Bright. But nature had not made him for a post of chief command.

1 For the two Letters to Lord Aberdsen, see Gleanings, iv.

It by and by appeared that the Duke of Newcastle, known to us hitherto as Lord Lincoln, coveted the post of leader, but Mr. Gladstone thought that on every ground Lord Aberdeen was the person entitled to hold it. I made, says Mr. Gladstone, 'my views distinctly known to the duke. He took no offence. I do not know what communications he may have held with others. But the upshot was that Lord Aberdeen became our leader. And this result was obtained without any shock or conflict.' 1 recklessly to create fresh discords between the Irish and to offend and to indict eight millions of his countrymen, to a prime minister of the Queen who thus allowed himself of superstition. Justified indeed was Bright's stern rebuke of the nation looked with contempt upon the mummeries own gates. He wound up by declaring that the great mass of unworthy sons of the church of England within her of a foreign sovereign to be less than at the conduct than his alarm, and even his alarm at the aggressions insidious, declared his indignation to be greater even of the pope upon our protestantism as insolent and document he accepted the description of the aggression the Bishop of Durham (Nov. 4, 1850). In this unhappy Russell cast fuel upon the flame in a perverse letter to of Westminster. The uproar was tremendous. Lord John titles and appointing Cardinal Wiseman to be Archbishop Vatican, dividing England into dioceses bearing territorial frightened out of their senses by a document from the In the autumn of 1850 the people of this country were proceeding, and they agreed that private representation and remonstrance should be tried in the first instance, as less likely than public action by Mr. Gladstone in parliament, to rouse international jealousy abroad, or to turn the odious tragedy into the narrow channels of party at home. Mr. Gladstone, at Lord Aberdeen's desire, was to submit a statement of the case for his consideration and judgment.

тт

This statement, the first memorable Letter to Lord Aber-

There was a slight discrepancy between the two on this point, Mr. and had boldly said that it was little wonder if men groaning at Vienna to the crying evils of the government of Naples, attempt unofficially. Lord Palmerston had called attention Gladstone was now bringing mornslead compulsion on him to of the day for doing the very thing officially, which Mr. Aberdeen had sharply criticised the British government debate in the Lords two years before (July 20, 1849), Lord relations were the nourishing and maintaining cause. of the uncounted mischiefs to the Peninsula of which those any new views of either the relations of Austria to Italy, or not calculated to loosen this fixed idea, or to dispose him to The fierce storms of 1848 were would dare to lay a finger. structure on which only reckless or criminal unwisdom to make him regard the state-system then founded as a tact with the vast and formidable problems of 1814-5 was the fall of Napoleon; the natural effect of this close conthat laid their mighty weight upon European statesmen at anoitzeup oitargig edt dtiw laab ot aoqu bellas aeed bad ed was a reason for this in his past career. In very early youth estimating human action and the world's affairs, and thereto shom larsengs aid saw tahw hiv seinomrah ton bib years later, admitted that Lord Aberdeen's views of Italy His antecedents made him cautious. Mr. Gladstone, ten gave it 'mature consideration' for the best part of a month. deen, was ready at the beginning of April. The old minister to the public opinion of England and Europe, that Lord Aberdeen supposed it to be an immediate and not an ulterior resort. Aberdeen to Casteleicala, September 15, 1851, and Mr. Gladstone to Aberdeen, and Mr.

Gladefone describing the position as posed it above, Aberdeen believing that it to Castelei was by his persuasion that Mr. Glad-to Castelei stone dropped his intention of instant and Mr. publicity. Probably the latter used October 3, such urgent language about an appeal to Greville that 'he thought the whole thing humbug and newspaper that every morning blew up the coals, admitted Infrewog a to rotibe edt neve bas ; ylqer lanoitar on aaw, strengthening his tottering government? To all this there peace, tried to turn the ferment to account for the sake of thought of a prime minister who, at such risk to the public of popular wrath against the Puseyites? What was to be tion, and the frenzy really and in essence an explosion the action of the pope, after all, a secondary considera-London by the old form of vicars apostolic? Was not make a new Archbishop of Westminster, than to administer another? Why was it more of a usurpation for the pope to any other voluntary episcopal church, Scottish, colonial, or ecclesiastics to exercise the spiritual authority exercised in such a tenet would that be, which forbade the pope to name cal supremacy of the pope; and what sort of toleration of religion, if you would not tolerate its tenet of the ecclesiasti-How, they asked, could you tolerate the Roman catholic at its right value, and all resolved to resist legislation. out concert taken this outburst of prejudice and passion Vatican and the Flaminian Gate, had all of them with-Bright, 'despising and loathing' the language of the more futile for its ends. The Peelites while, like Mr. the measure came to life again with changes making it still a pack of nonsense!'1

The debate on the second reading was marked by a little brutality and much sanctimony. Mr. Gladstone (March brutality and much sanctimony. Mr. Gladstone (March bim. Yet his superb resources as an orator, his transparent depth of conviction, the unmistakable proofs that his whole heart was in the matter, mastered his audience and made the best of them in their hearts ashamed. He talked of Boniface viii. and Honorius iv.; he pursued a long and close historical demonstration of the earnest desire of the lay catholics of this country for diocesan bishops as against vienra apostolic; he moved among bulls and rescripts, briefs and pastorals and canon law, with as much ease as if he had been arguing about taxes and tariffs. Through it he had been arguing about taxes and tariffs. Through it all the House watched and listened in enchantment, as to get done at Naples all that could reasonably be designed at Austrian minister replied several weeks after (June If he had been invited, he said, officially to interfer would have declined; as it was, he would bring Mr. (stone's statements to the notice of his Sicilian maj heanwhile, at great length, he reminded Lord Aberdeen a political offender may be the worst of all offenders, argued that the rigour exercised by England herself in lonian Islands, in Ceylon, in respect of Irishmen, an Ionian Islands, in Ceylon, in respect of Irishmen, an should be in taking up abroad the cause of bad men pe should be in taking up abroad the cause of bad men pe should be in taking up abroad the cause of bad men pe should be in taking up abroad the cause of bad men pe should be in taking up abroad the cause of bad men pe should be in taking up abroad the cause of bad men pe

BOOK III. 1851.

Aberdeen for the publication, but from their conversat night later. He did not obtain formal leave from L followed by a second explanation and enlargement a fe his thunderbolt, publishing his Letter to Lord Aberde a fortnight more, then at the beginning of July he launc and extending to the highest persons in the land. He wai wildfire from man to man, exciting the liveliest inter versation seemed to him—so he tells Lacaita—to spread The facts that escaped from him in private o dungeons. cut off from the light of heaven, and festering in the foul soup, degraded by forced companionship with crimir the rest, wearing their double chains, subsisting on t Dover, and every day he thought of Poerio, Settembrini, It was nearly four months since Mr. Gladstone lander begged him to give the Austrian minister a little more t Mr. Gladstone was growing impatient. Lord Aberc secretaries hunt up recriminatory cases against Engl gnizam arw grednerrawdol enir elidw bas griebiz During all these weeks, while Aberdeen was maturely took it for granted.

The sensation was profound, and not in England or The Letters were translated into various tongues and I alerge circulation. The Society of the Friends of Italy London, the disciples of Mazzini (and a high-hearted bathey were), besought him to become a member. Exiles wro great work of civil legislation. And what is it they chiefly admire her before, as the mistress and guide of nations, in regard to the this moment not less, no, but even more than ever they looked to Europe and the whole of the civilised world look to England at you have to perform in the face of the world. Recollect that break and its youth? Surely not. Oh, recollect the functions difficulty your greatest men have been achieving during its daybns nisq doum os driw doidw drow tserg edt gniobnu ni Trutnee Are you going to spend the decay and the dusk of the nineteenth repeat Penelope's process, but without the purpose of Penelope? have arrived at the division of the century. Are you going to of agonising struggle. And now what are you going to do? You ultimately triumphed, after you had spent upon it half a century assent of one public man after another. It was a principle which tried in struggle and conflict. It was a principle which gained the principle which you did not adopt in haste. It was a principle well modern state, and its compatibility with ancient institutions, was a steadily. The principle of religious freedom, its adaptation to our politics and legislation; but, although it moves slowly, it moves people, whom we have the honour to represent, moves slowly in safety or with honour, do to-day and un-do to-morrow. This great dealt with as one of the ordinary matters in which you may, with conviction is, that this great subject of religious freedom is not to be the helmet, and his the hand that was to grasp the spear? My agent in its revival—that his was to be the head that was to wear in the year 1851, but that the noble lord himself was to be a main religious liberty was to be revived with a greater degree of acerbity, sentiments, have believed not only that the strife with respect to Would any man, who heard the noble lord deliver these impressive freedom, our strife is never to cease, and our arms are never to rust. of Maynooth, that it seems as if upon the questions of religious powerful opposition then offered to the bill for the endowment occupation. The noble lord went on to say, in reference to the strife, and as quickening his sense of the blessings of his peaceful looks upon them with calm and joy, as the memorials of forgotten only similar times the sort in following times and sorted arms, and the hand of nature effaces the traces of the wrath of man, and the And he said, upon those scenes where battles have been fought,

The mere announcement caused was required almost before the factor and that a second edition

Fortunato at Naples, and of Castelcicala in London, disrelied upon.1 The attitude of the minister at Vienna, of would suffice to show whether the private method could be described in very specific terms his idea that a short time make a public appeal. In transmitting the first letter, he strance did not work 'without elusion or delay,' he would Mr. Gladstone from the first insisted that if private remonto complain of the publication. It is not easy to see why. friends abroad, Lord Aberdeen thought he had some reason Perhaps discomposed by the reproaches of reactionary remedy was moonshine. Naples, showed that like Guizot's French policy the Austrian Lord Aberdeen, as well as the official communications from make reforms; and now the answer of Schwarzenberg to of the French government, to induce the rulers of Italy to cable. He avowed his own failure when he was at the head revolutionary spirit, blind, chimerical, insatiate, impractiperceived in progress a struggle for life and death with the generalising intellect, and everywhere his jaundiced vision century. Guizot was a great man, but 48 had perverted his with the European party of order in the middle of the one did not hesitate. This was Mr. Gladstone's first contact is Italy. Between the King of Maples and Mazzini, he for Naples on one side, Mazzini on the other; such, said Guizot, alert than ever for destruction and chaos. The King of and the fury of the beaten revolutionists with hopes more the terrors of governments attacked in their very existence publication. Nothing is left in Italy, said Guizot, between ing, with much courtesy and kindness, his regret at the Illustrious Guizot wrote Mr. Gladstone a long letter express-comply with his wishes even when writing before the publithe abominable facts. Schwarzenberg never consented to denied the foundation of the case, or the actual state of far as possible from thinking it a detestable libel. He never entire credit to Mr. Gladstone's horrible story, and was as hope there was of anything being done; elusion and delay was all that he could expect. He was forced to give covered even to Aberdeen himself how little reasonable whithersoever it may lead. follow that bright star of justice, beaming from the heavens, cause we are defending; and we are, I trust, well determined to enstained by the sense of justice which we feel belongs to the have escaped me, I wish them unsaid. But above all we are man, and if in the warmth of argument such expressions should not wished to say a syllable that would wound the feelings of any side the strength of public opinion (oh, oh!). I am sure I have principle of justice—the conviction that we shall soon have on our against you, but the conviction that we have on our side the no ordinary bond of union. What is it that binds us together knots and groups of two or three, we have no power of cohesion, numbers. We are more insignificant still, because we are but to taioq ni tasafingizai ytironim s ers eW . . . nerdterd catholic fellow-subjects to the constitution by treating them as the severity of the law, and attract the affections of their Roman the chains and deepen the brand. Their disposition was to relax principles of loyalty. . . . They were not always seeking to tighten Clarendon and Newcastle, so were the gentlemen who sustained the House. If Hampden and Pym were friends of freedom, so were appeal in other names to gentlemen who sit on this side of the because it was directed against the Roman catholics alone. I would and terocious intolerance which in them became the more powerful whom they were the most distinguished chiefs, it was the bitter almost say odious—feature in the character of the party among was one blot on their escutcheon, if there was one painful—I would be adopted with our Roman catholic fellow citizens, because, if there than one which relates to the mode of legislation or the policy to

All this was of no avail, just as the same arguments and temper on two other occasions of the same eternal theme in his life, 1 were to be of no avail. Disraeli spoke strongly against the line taken by the Peelites. The second reading was carried by 438 against 95, one-third even of this minority being Irish catholics, and the rest mainly Peelites, 'a limited but accomplished school,' as Disraeli styled them. Hume asked Mr. Gladstone for his speech for publication to circulate asked Mr. Gladstone for his speech for publication to circulate asked Mr. Gladstone for his speech for publication to circulate among the dissenters who, he said, know nothing about among the dissenters who, he said, know nothing about among the dissenters who, he said, know nothing about over the people of England. thing that gave to Lord Palmerston the best of his power to baix ear sinT .serds early accommon bas yibisdir assertions and reckless denials, mixed up with coarse an official pamphlet 'consisting of a flimsy tissue of bare been drawn; and flatly refused to have anything to do with manifold and grave abuses to which their attention had hoped that they might have set to work to correct the mədt noqu zarird ylbəruzas bluow əsitzulmi basıqzəbiv. han beunitaco-gaci tant acidutorer taeloiv ent to taem ment and hostile intention; warned the Meapolitan governvindicated Mr. Gladstone against the charges of overstate-Palmerston promptly, and in his most characteristic style, of the pamphlet that had been got up on the other side. London in his turn requested him also to send fifteen copies to give a copy to each government. The Neapolitan envoy in representatives in all the courts of Europe, with instructions copies of Mr. Gladstone's Letters to be sent to the British they did not know the truth.'1 Lord Palmerston directed wrong last year in their attacks on my foreign policy, but and Molesworth, wrote Palmerston, 'say that they were state of things there for him to be sceptical. Gladstone Palmerston's brother kept him too well informed about the were much interested and not at all incredulous. Palmerston, and other members of the government. They home, he had had some conversation with John Russell, The matter did not rest there. Soon after his arrival at Mr. Gladstone met them with a point by point rejoinder. entered the field with a formal reply point by point, and as regards these people. The Neapolitan government spirit of the letter was creditable to him, or very promising Ernest Jones and O'Brien, I cannot say that I think the his people were concocting all that trash about Frost and which were going on day by day and hour by hour, while

In the House of Commons he spoke with no less warmth. Though he had not felt it his duty, he said, to make representations at Maples on a matter relating to internal affairs, he thought Mr. Gladstone had done himself great element of disruption and confusion, for the fallen minister had plenty of friends. Lord Lansdowne was very uneasy about reform, and talked ominously about preferring to be a supporter rather than a member of the government; and whig dissensions, though less acute in type, threatened a perplexity as sharp in the way of a stable administration, as the discords among conservatives.

personage at the admiralty. a half-Derby, Disraeli, St. Leonards, and a worthy fractional One jest was that the cabinet consisted of three men and for the first time sworn of the privy council in a single day. nearly all new to public office, and seventeen of them were protectionists had a definite existence. The ministers were state, seemed up to this point to have prospered, and the Bentinck first tried it, of forming a new third party in the The experiment that seemed so impossible when Earl of Derby, had no choice but to give his followers their ministers resigned, and Lord Stanley, who had now become only eleven, but other perils lay pretty thick in front. The a militia bill, that slit the thread. The hostile majority was amendment moved by Palmerston (Feb. 20) on a clause in new support. Their tottering life was short, and it was an Lord John Russell and his men met parliament without any more Peelite than I believe was Peel himself.' In the end Gladstone, 'is a Jesuit, and them, 'is a Jesuit, and culties about the Puseyite notions of Newcastle and Mr. true to the church traditions of the caste, made great diffiwere made and refused. Two or three of the whig ministers, or only a device to mend the parliamentary case, if the offer an offer to them was to be a persistent attempt in good faith might join, but would not consent to be absorbed; whether whether the Peelites, considering themselves as a party, followed; whether Graham alone would do them any good; an offer should be made to Graham. A long discussion Lord John (Jan. 14, 1852) next asked his cabinet whether Sending to his wife at Hawarden a provisional list (Feb. 23), Mr. Gladstone doubts the way in which the offices were distributed:—'It is not good, as compared I mean with what it should have been. Disraeli could not have been worse his people were concocting all that trash about Frost and spinest Jones and O'Brien, I cannot say that I think the spirit of the letter was creditable to him, or very promising as regards these people.' The Mespolitan government entered the field with a formal reply point by point, and Mr. Gladstone met them with a point by point rejoinder. The matter did not rest there. Soon after his arrival at home, he had had some conversation with John Russell, Palmerston, and other members of the government. They were much interested and not at all incredulous. Lord reate much interested and not at all informed about the state of things there for him too well informed about the state of things there for him to be sceptical. 'Gladstone and Molesworth,' wrote Palmerston, 'say that they were or Peelism single-handed. The last he described as their least natural position; for, he urged, they might be 'liberal in the sense of Peel, working out a liberal policy through the medium of the conservative party.' To that procreatinating view Mr. Gladstone stood tenaciously, and his course now is one of the multitudinous illustrations of his constant abhorrence of premature committal, and the taking of a second step before the first.

After Aberdeen he approached Graham, who proceeded to use language that seemed to point to his virtual return to his old friends of the liberal party, for the reader will not forget the striking circumstance that the new head of a conservative government, and the most trusted of the cabinet colleagues of Peel, had both of them begun official life in the reform ministry of Lord Grey. Graham said he acter, and that Lord J. Russell had committed many errors, but that looking at the two as they stood, he thought that the opinions of Lord Derby as a whole were more dangerous to the country than those of Lord John. Mr. Gladstone said to the country than those of Lord John. Mr. Gladstone said to the country than those of Lord John. Mr. Gladstone said to the country than those of Lord John. Mr. Gladstone said to the country than those of Lord John. Mr. Gladstone said to the country than those of Lord John. Mr. Graham's reception of this remark implied a two; but Graham's reception of this remark implied a contrary opinion.

government, 'During this conversation, held on a sofa Mewcastle persisted in his disbelief in the of the Peelites. other people was stimulated by what they imagined or heard of the feelings of his party, and that his violence and that of stone replied that Beresford's language was not a good test worthy had said 'The Peelites, let them go to hell.' Mr. Gladorders to tory newspapers to run them down; that the same The duke told him that Beresford, the whip, had sent out position, others would. They had a further conversation. if the Peelites did not place themselves in a prominent those who led the charge against it would reap the reward; this government must be opposed and overthrown; then not even that he would not join Disraeli; but he thought Derby and his party; he would make no vows as to junction, another direction, speaking with great asperity against Lord Lincoln, now Duke of Newcastle, he found obdurate in Roman voluntary church. as detained the state of a bill for meddling with the rights of a memorable case in his own country, the temporal power wrathful, just as impassioned and as eloquent, when, in a and to mankind.' As we shall soon see, he was just as blot upon the face of creation, an offence to Christendom priests, and tenfold more because it is one, stands out a foul boughs—such a monarchy, even were it not a monarchy of sun, the air, the rain soliciting in vain its sapless and rotten unable to strike root downward or bear fruit upward, the foreign armies, smitten with the curse of social barrenness, popes as temporal sovereigns. 'A monarchy sustained by fiercest, he denounces the fallen and impotent regality of the conscience.' With an energy not unworthy of Burke at his and retiring forms of private life and of the individual ing war against human freedom, even in its most modest checked and balanced; and an unceasing, covert, smoulderdisregard of those elements by which it ought to be tighter and tighter, of the hierarchical spirit, in total Ultramontanism; the winding up higher and higher, domineering, implacable policy represented in the term burgh in 1852, was his first blast against 'the covetous, powerful of all the churches. His translation of Farini, followed by his article on the same subject in the Edintruth by evil-doing in the heart and centre of the most mischiefs done to the cause of what he took for saving twenty years later in the day of the Vatican decrees,—the all,—as he says to Manning now, and said to all the world famous phrase) of a free church in a free state; and above theocratic government; the possibility (to borrow Cavour's

¹ Gleanings, iv. pp. 160, 176.

was the Peelite staff. the Duke of Argyll. Such, as counted off by Mr. Gladstone, tributed Aberdeen, Newcastle, Canning,2 St. Germans and Clerk, Cardwell, Sir J. Young, H. Corry. The Lords conwho had held important offices there were only available, commoners; Goulburn, Herbert, Gladstone. And of others cruited. Of ex-cabinet ministers there were but three having retired. Nor was the band very large even as refraham isolated; Hardinge in the Lords and by way of Enatchbull were dead; Stanley in the Lords and separated; these only the last remained in his old position. Peel and Peel, Stanley, Graham, Hardinge, Knatchbull, Goulburn. Of cabinet began its career thus manned in the Commonsof the eight still in the Commons. On the other hand, Peel's alive in 1851, seven of them in the then existing cabinet; six of John Russell and seven others. These eight all were Graham in April made his own position definitely liberal, or 'whig and something more,' in so pronounced a way as to cut him off from the Gladstonian subdivision or main body of the Peelites. Mr. Gladstone read the speech in which this departure was taken,' with discomfort and surprise.' He instantly went to read to Lord Aberdeen some of the more pungent passages; one or two consultations were held with Mewcastle and Goulburn; and all agreed that them were coming to 5 Carlton Gardens in the course of the afternoon (April 20); and my first wish was that now Lord Aberdeen himself would go and tell them how we stood upon Graham's speech. To this they were all opposed; and they seemed to feel that as we had had no meeting yet, it would seemed to feel that as we had had no meeting yet, it would seemed to feel that as we had had no meeting yet, it would seem ungracious and unkind to an old friend to hold one by way of ovation over his departure. It was therefore agreed that I should acquaint Young it was their wish that he should tell any one who might come, that we, who were there contemporary at Eton and Christ Church, and known to history as governor-general of India in the hlutiny. Stratford Canning, afterwards Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, wards Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, was cousin of George Canning.

¹ Namely Palmerston, Spring-Rice, E. Baring, Charles Wood, Hobhouse, Labouchere, Lord Howick.
² This, of course, was Charles John Earl Canning, third son of Canning the prime minister, Mr. Gladstone's

1821

III.

BOOK

Roman voluntary church. bethought itself of a bill for meddling with the rights? memorable case in his own country, the temporal post wrathful, just as impassioned and as eloquent, when in and to mankind.1 As we shall soon see, he when it blot upon the face of creation, an offence to Christenland to man inches priests, and tenfold more because it is one, stands out boughs—such a monarchy, even were it not a monarch, sun, the air, the rain soliciting in vain its sapless and ri unable to strike root downward or bear fruit upward, foreign armies, smitten with the curse of social barrent popes as temporal sovereigns. 'A monarchy sustained hercest, he denounces the fallen and impotent regality of conscience. With an energy not unworthy of Burkess and retiring forms of private life and of the infinite ing war against human freedom, even in its most me checked and balanced; and an unceasing, covert, smodisregard of those elements by which it ought !! tighter and tighter, of the hierarchical spirit, in . Ultramontanism; the winding up higher and domineering, implacable policy represented in the burgh in 1852, was his first blast against 'the wr followed by his article on the same subject in the powerful of all the churches. His translation of I truth by evil-doing in the heart and centre of the mischiefs done to the cause of what he took in twenty years later in the day of the Vatican detectall,—as he says to Manning now, and said to all the famous phrase) of a free church in a free state. Mi. theocratic government; the possibility (to bottor?-

1 Gleanings, iv. pp. 160, 176.

could have been called revolutionary if he had written them; and in regard to church matters he saw no reason why there should not be joint action, for he was cordially disposed to maintain the church of England, and so, he believed, was I. Lord John, however, we may be sure was the last man not opinion, decides relations of party. Personal sympathies and antipathies, hosts of indirect affinities having apparently little to do with the main trunk of the school or the faction, hosts of motives only half disclosed, or not disclosed at all even to him in whom they are at work—all these intrude in the composition and management of parties whether in the composition and management of parties whether religious or political.

syllables what conservative progress expresses in six. liberal-conservative expresses in seven, and whiggism in two whig has the convenience of expressing in one syllable what liberal-conservative, Lord John caustically observed that in our politics for the benefit of waverers, of the name of sect. And as to the suggestion, constantly made at all times often change their creed, but not so often the name of their maram about religion was just as true in politics—that men members. On the other hand Graham declared that Paley's Russells, Greys, Howards, Cavendishes, Villierses, were join the whigs, who yet would join a government of which It was pointed out that many people would on no account only less unpopular in the country than the name of tory. 1832. The name of whig had some associations that were had greatly gained by calling themselves conservatives after Grave discussions turned on new nicknames. The tories

Connected with all this arose a geographical question—in what quarter of the House were the Peelites to sit? Hitherto the two wings of the broken tory party, protectionist and Peelite, had sat together on the opposition benches. The change of administration in 1852 sent the protectionists over to the Speaker's right, and brought the whigs to the natural place of opposition on his left. The Peelite leaders therefore had no other choice than to take their seats below the gangway, no other choice than to take their seats below the gangway, but on which side? Such a question is always graver than to the heedless outsider it may seem, and the Peelite discusto the heedless outsider it may seem, and the Peelite discusto the heedless outsider it may seem, and the Peelite discusto the heedless outsider it may seem, and the Peelite discusto the heedless outsider it may seem, and the Peelite discusto the heedless outsider it may seem, and the Peelite discusto.

promise Lord Stanley tried his hand. Proceedings were suspended for some days until Mr. Gladstone should be on the ground. He no sooner reached Carlton Gardens, than Lord Lincoln arrived, eager to discussion had gone far, the tory ing office. Before the discussion had gone far, the tory whip hurried in from Stanley, begging for an immediate visit.

this expression for the purpose of preparing him to receive the I must not conceal from him, 'an enormous difficulty.' I used Aberdeen, but that what he had told me about corn constituted, brod see bluow I tand bas ; garistraban sid of flew bedaiw I object to inquiry; that, on general as well as on personal grounds, and against the ministerial hill, but that I did not on principle inquiry. I told him I was utterly against all penal legislation thing much better might result from a comprehensive and deliberate and intemperate as well as ineffective; and that he thought somerespect to papal aggression. He said that this measure was hasty would do so. I asked him also what was his intention with I mid blot bas ; rewear ar mid gaivig eroled neebredA brod ees at all. I thought, however, it might be well that I should still a most difficult question to decide, whereas now I had no question bad eval if he had put protection in abeyance, I might have had pretty much in silence, but with an intense sense of relief; feelbut to put a duty of five or six shillings on corn. I heard him that he proposed to maintain the system of free trade generally, preliminary obstacle were found to intervene. Stanley then said none of them would constitute a difficulty with me, provided no should ask no questions and make no remark on these points, as have any occupant but one for the foreign office. I told him, I ship of the House of Commons, but his anxiety was evident to office and the board of trade. -rebesl edt to biss saw gnidton open to me, along with others of which he named the colonial department was offered to Canning, but it he declined it was with him—any office, subject to the reservation that the foreign He told me his object was that I should take office and hear what Stanley had to say. I did not like to stickle, Aberdeen. But he came back with a fresh message to go at once, I promised, says Mr. Gladstone, to go directly after seeing Lord

It depended entirely on the Peclites whether the new the session (subject to conditions or otherwise), or whether they should be open to an instant attack as the enemies of tree trade. The effect of such attack must have been defeat, followed by dissolution forthwith, and by the ejection of the in December. The tactics of giving the ministers a fair trial prevailed and were faithfully adhered to, Graham and trial prevailed and were faithfully adhered to, Graham and and other conditions, for ten months ministers, greatly outnumbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberation of the months.

Lord Derby had opened his administration with a pledge, as the Peelites understood, to confine himself during the session to business already open and advanced, or of an urgent character. When Mr. Disraeli gave notice of a bill to dispose of four seats which were vacant, this was regarded by them as a manner of opening new and important issues, and not within the definition that had been the condition of their provisional support.¹ 'Lord John Russell came and said to me,' says Mr. Gladstone, "What will you do?" I admitted we were bound to act; and, joining the liberals, we threw over the proposal by a large majority. This was the only occasion of conflict that arose; and it was provoked, as we thought, by the government itself.'

This was a bill to assign the four of Lancablire. Mr. Gladstone carried disfranchised seats for Sudbury and St. Albans to the West Riding of Yorkshire and the southern division a slways disposed to view with regret the rupture of party ties of disposition is rather to maintain them. I confess I look, if a with suspicion, at least with disapprobation on any one who disposed to treat party connections as matters of small importer. My opinion is that party ties closely appertain to those inciples of confidence which we entertain for the House of inciples of confidence which we entertain for the House of ammons.—Glaboure (1852).

CHAPTER VII

SELIGIOUS TORNADO-PEELITE DIFFICULTIES

(2281-1281)

CHV

and his attitude on papal aggression. Then according to the good ground that the House of Commons would not pparently not without some lingering doubts, he declined 1e Queen next wished Aberdeen to undertake the task. as committed to it, the other two strongly disapproved. e negotiation broke off on the Mo Popery bill; Lord John vards the fated coalition between whigs and Peelites. erdeen and Graham—the first move in a critical march s once more summoned to the palace, this time along with as failed, he would make the attempt. Lord John Russell pared to form a government, but that if other combina-Stanley said that he was not then sectionist leader. ion, the whigs had resigned. The Queen sent for the tified by more than one repulse at the opening of the he was urgently required to meet Lord Stanley. an journey (February 26, 1851) Air. Gladstone found ve have seen, on the morning of his arrival from his and the had told the Queen that he are seed administration. On a subsequent day both difficulty altogether, or at any tate ion. On a subsequent day both difficulty altogether, or at any rate got it put forward int. It position, ion is subsequent day both difficulty altogether, or at any rate got it put forward int. It position, ion is subsequent day both difficulty altogether, or at any rate got it put forward int. It position, ion is subsequent and Cardwell made out got it put forward int. It position, ion is subsequent I did dladatone Memo.,

It depended entirely on the Peelites whether the new the session (subject to conditions or otherwise), or whether the session (subject to conditions or otherwise), or whether they should be open to an instant attack as the enemies of free trade. The effect of such attack must have been defeat, followed by dissolution forthwith, and by the ejection of the in Derby government in June (as happened in 1859) instead of trial prevailed and were faithfully adhered to, Graham and trial prevailed and were faithfully adhered to, Graham and Oardwell taking their own course. As the result of this and other conditions, for ten months ministers, greatly outnumbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered were maintained in power by the deliberate whether manufactured were the more manufactured whether manufactured were manufactured whether manufactured were manufactured whether manufactured were manufactured whether manufactured were manufactured whether manufacture

Lord Derby had opened his administration with a pledge, as the Peelites understood, to confine himself during the session to business already open and advanced, or of an urgent character. When Mr. Disraeli gave notice of a bill to dispose of four seats which were vacant, this was regarded by them as a manner of opening new and important issues, and not within the definition that had been the condition of their provisional support.¹ 'Lord John Russell came and actine provisional support.² 'Lord John Russell came and admitted we were bound to act; and, joining the liberals, we threw over the proposal by a large majority. This was the threw over the proposal by a large majority. This was the only occasion of condict that arose; and it was provoked, as only occasion of condict that arose; and it was provoked, as we thought, by the government itself.

This was a bill to assign the four of Lancashire. Mr. Gladstone carried disfranchised seats for Sudbury and St. Albans to the West Riding of Yorkshire and the southern division answer it was plain I must give; he told me his persevering would probably depend on me.

TH

Mr. Gladstone next hastened to Lord Aberdeen, and learned what had been going on during his absence abroad. He learned also the clear opinions held by Aberdeen and Ctraham against No Popery legislation, and noticed it as temarkable that so many minds should arrive independently at the same conclusion on a new question, and in opposition on to the overwhelming majority. 'I then,' he continues, 'went on to the levee, saw Lord Normanby and others, and began to bruit abroad the fame of the Neapolitan government. Immediately after leaving the levee (where I also saw Canning, told him what I meant to do, and gathered that he would do the like), I changed my clothes and went to give Lord Stanley my answer, at which he did not show the least curprise. He said he would still persevere, though least aurprise. He said he would still persevere, though with little hope. I think I told him it seemed to me with little hope. I think I told him it seemed to me they would now at length begin to take an independent course of their own. But it soon appeared that, unconsciously I think more than consciously, he is set upon the object of avoiding the responsibility either of taking the government with the Peel squadron, or of letting in Stanley and his friends. Here was the weak point in a strong and capable character. When Graham died ten years after this (1861), hlr. Gladstone wrote to a friend, 'On administrative questions, for the last twenty years and more, I had more spontaneous recourse to him for advice, than to all other colleagues together.' In some of the foundations of character no two men could be more unlike. One of his closest allies talks to Graham of your sombre temperament.' My

The protectionists having failed, and the Peelites standing aside, the whigs came back, most of them well aware that they could not go on for long. The events of the late crisis had given Mr. Gladstone the hope that Graham would effectively place himself at the head of the Peelites, and that effectively place himself at the head of the Peelites, and that he ought to do so. I was not five minutes with him this

second time,1

1 Memorandum, dated Fasque, April 22, 1851.

It depended entirely on the Peelites whether the new the session (subject to conditions or otherwise), or whether the session (subject to conditions or otherwise), or whether they should be open to an instant attack as the enemies of free trade. The effect of such attack must have been defeat, followed by dissolution forthwith, and by the ejection of the Derby government in June (as happened in 1859) instead of trial prevailed and were faithfully adhered to, Graham and trial prevailed and were faithfully adhered to, Graham and and other conditions, for ten months ministers, greatly out and other conditions, for ten months ministers, greatly outnumbered were maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered are maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered are maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered are maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered are maintained in power by the deliberate and numbered are maintained in power by the deliberate and

Lord Derby had opened his administration with a pledge, as the Peelites understood, to confine himself during the session to business already open and advanced, or of an urgent character. When Mr. Disraeli gave notice of a bill to dispose of four seats which were vacant, this was regarded by them as a manner of opening new and important issues, and not within the definition that had been the condition of their provisional support.¹ 'Lord John Russell came and said to me,' says Mr. Gladstone, "What will you do?" I said to me,' says Mr. Gladstone, "What will you do?" I threw over the proposal by a large majority. This was the only occasion of conflict that arose; and it was provoked, as only occasion of conflict that arose; and it was provoked, as we thought, by the government itself."

of Lancashire. Mr. Gladstone carried the order of the day by a majority of 86 against the government. This was a bill to assign the four distranchised seats for Sudbury and St. Albans to the West Riding of Yorkshire and the southern division temper of the times may be gauged by the fact that leave opinion in the cabinet, but a bill was settled, and the Holy Catholic Church.". There was some division of really to mean something when they say, "I believe in one those who not being papiets are such traitors and fools as dipped his pen in gall to smite first the pope, but most rocks and breakers ahead than he reckoned upon when he his great friend, Sir Walter James, John Russell has more was forced to legislate. 'I suspect,' wrote Mr. Gladstone to Having thus precipitately committed himself, the minister last five-and-twenty years had done so much to assuage. English nations, and to perpetuate animosities that the

to introduce it was given by the overwhelming majority of

I would far rather quit parliament for ever than not have from one inch of the ground I took in opposing the bill, and I heartily approved; but while I say this, I cannot recede prevention I desired; spiritual and ecclesiastical resistance game then, and the subject fell to the ground. Amicable later), of trying to draw attention to it. But it was nobody's tunity in the House (as did Sir R. Inglis, I think a little deplore sincerely) by amicable means, I took the opporwhen there was yet time to stop the measure (which I government were encouraging the pope to proceed, and the truth that shortly after I was elected, when the land into Romish dioceses. So far is this from being counselled indifference in regard to the division of Engbe asserted without contradiction that I ever felt or to Greswell, his Oxford chairman, in 1852: 'Do not let it period.2 His attitude is succinctly described in a letter but the government and the press were alike silent at that 'Lord John Russell, if he had chosen, could have stopped it; care to say so in parliament two and a half years before, when approved of the pope's proceeding extremely, and had taken In his own language, Mr. Gladstone lamented and dis-.395 votes to 63.

 $_{
m I}$ Grey $_{
m P}$ apers. crisis, the bill was stopped, and after the crisis was over Other matters, as we have seen, brought on a ministerial voted against so pernicious a measure.

² To Phillimore, Nov. 26, 1850.

all Peel's assailants. cabinet intimacy with the bitterest and least sincere of. looked without reprobation and aversion on the idea of friend, either Mr. Gladstone or anybody else, could have those who had been attached to him as master and as of dishonour if, within two years of Peel's death, any of Yet it would surely have been straining charity to the point men for charitable construction of their motives and intent. life are best aware how great is the need in the case of public present and later moments. Those who know most of public had anything to do with the balance of his opinions at the that the lead in the Commons or other personal question them.' Mr. Gladstone himself now and always denied not be very easy for him to enter into partnership with ment; ... that even if this should be removed, it would stone's reluctance to have anything to do with the governthat 'Disraeli's leadership was the great cause of Glad-Lord Aberdeen and Graham agreed in thinking (August)

III

Mr. Gladstone repaired to London some weeks before the new session, and though he was not in a position to open direct relations with the government, he expressed to Lord Derby, his strong opinion that the House of Commons would, and should, require from ministers a frank and explicit adoption of free trade through the address, and secondly, the immediate production of their financial measures. Lord Derby told Hardinge at Windsor that he thought that neither told Hardinge at Windsor that he thought that neither expectation was far wrong. When the Peelites met at Lord Aberdeen's to discuss tactics, they were secretly disastisfied with the paragraphs about free trade.

Mr. Disraeli had laid down at the election the sonorous with the paragraphs about free trade.

maxim, that no statesman can disregard with impunity the genius of the epoch in which he lives. And he now after the election averred, that the genius of the age was in favour of tree exchange. Still it was pleasanter to swallow the dose with as little public observation as possible. 'What would have been said,' cried Lord Derby in fervid remonstrance,' if

Virgil, which the house will not regret to hear:-The noble lord referred to some beautiful and touching langers statesman at any time in this House. Aladstone, 'a more impressive passage delivered by any on the Maynooth bill of 1845. 'I never heard,' said Mr. He went back to a passage of Lord John Russell's would not forgive me if I failed to transcribe its resplendent three or four most conspicuous masterpieces, and the reader zinall its elements and aspects one of the great orator's temporal legislation of a penal character.' The whole speech attempts to meet the spiritual dangers of our church by most solemn, earnest, and deliberate protest against all do it by penal enactments. Here, once for all, I enter my spiritual system by the progress of another; you can never ludicrous in extent. You must meet the progress of that to meet that progress by a measure false in principle as it is the progress of the Roman catholic religion, and you pretend frontier-between temporal and spiritual. You speak of as he insisted on respect for the frontier-no scientific incidents.' But this did not affect the power of his stroke, offices do not in a certain degree conjoin with temporal there is no religious body in the world where religious looked by advocates of the free church in a free state, that He clearly perceived the very relovant fact, so often overthe most important truths in the policy of a modern state. Along with complete grasp of details, went grasp of some of master he cleared the way before him towards his purpose. longing to his topics, as with the air and the power of a heroic his command of the whole stock of fact and of principle beof taking fire and kindling fire at a moral idea. They felt converted, but they felt a man with the orator's quality They did not apprehend every point, nor were they a magnificent tragedian playing a noble part in a foreign ich the house vill not regret to hear:

Scilicet et tempus veniet, cum finibus illis
Agricola, incurvo terram molitus aratro,
Exesa inveniet scabra rubigine pila;
Aut gravibus rastris galeas pulsabit inanes,

Grandiague effossis mirabitur ossa sepuleris. 1

1 Georgics, i. 493-7. 'Aye, and strike with heavy rake on empty with bent ploughshare upturning the heavy and gaze in wonder on giant with bent ploughshare upturning the heavy rasks on empty with bent ploughshare upturning the heavy rasks on giant solds, shall find all corroded by rusty

)K

been defeated fairly. Rather let them rejoice in the great public good that had been achieved; let them take courage from the attainment of that good, for the performance of their public duty in future. All this was inspired by the atrong hope of conservative reunion. 'Mervous excitement kept me very wakeful after speaking,' says Mr. Gladstone, 'the first time for many years.' (Diary.)

Villiers's motion was rejected by 336 to 256, the Peelites and Graham voting with ministers in the majority. The Peelite amendment in moderated terms, for which Palmerston stood sponsor, was then carried against the radicals by 468 to 53. For the moment the government was saved.

To this I replied, that it seemed to me that our situation (meaning affairs could be conducted. in the event of his displacement, the administration of public that, by what combination or arrangement of a satisfactory nature, the government or he might not; but the question lay beyond felt both uncertain and indifferent; he might be able to carry on might combine together to carry on with effect. For himself he those men who were united in their general views of government was to get rid of all personal questions, and to consider how all what in my view was to happen next? The great object, he said, in terms of the common kind, upon which he went on to ask me pleased with the issue of it. I simply made my acknowledgments from his manner, and Lady Derby's too, that they were highly tended to place the discussion on its right footing. It was evident ing me for the tone of my speech last night, which he thought me a little aside and said he must take the opportunity of thank-I went to Lady Derby's evening party, where Lord Derby took This evening, Mr. Gladstone writes on the next day, Nov. 27, that of Herbert, Goulburn, and others, with myself) in relation to that doublert, and the march and April last. . . We have to expect your budget, and the production of that is the next step. He replied that he much desired to see whether there was a possibility of any rapprochement, and seemed to glance at personal considerations as likely perhaps to stand in the way [Disraeli, presumably]. I said in reply, that no doubt there were many difficulties of a personal nature to be in England? It is not the rapidity with which you form constitu-

CIT

rather have heard Hampden and Pym quoted on any other subject men energetically engaged in resisting oppression. But I would one portion at least of their political career, because they were names of Hampden and Pym. I have great reverence for these in The noble lord appealed to gentlemen who sit behind me, in the make in that direction will recoil upon you in disaster and disgrace. of children, done by the hands of men, and every effort you may you may, but to endeavour to turn them backwards is the sport It is our business to guide and to control their application; do this found and resistless tendencies of the age towards religious liberty. we shall have to retrace with pain. We cannot change the proit to-day we make this step backwards, it is one which hereafter us feel the responsibility that belongs to us, and let us rely on it; upon its source. The character of England is in our hands. Let her steps than the river that bathes this giant city can flow back has done it once for all; and that she will then no more retrace that when she has done this slowly, and done it deliberately, she world-birow end to enciten the gnome gnibnest red bne sentini her policy for ages to come, and to affect the whole nature of her to influence the national character, to draw the dividing lines of once adopted some great principle of legislation, which is destined as well as Rome, has her semper eddem; and that when she has pope of Rome, and his cardinals, and his church, that England too, impaired. Show, I beseech you—have the courage to show the England. Do not forfeit it. Do not allow it to be tarnished or fathers and yourselves have earned this brilliant character for of the greatest and noblest among the neighbouring nations. Your preserved from irrational vicissitudes that have marked the career potism the day after. They know that you have been happily not a monarchy to-day, a republic to-morrow, and a military desand substance, about your proceedings. They know that you are you keep it. They know that there is reality and honesty, strength tendency. But they know that when you make a step forward assured by gradual effort, by progressive trials, and beneficial you are proverbial for resisting what is new until you are well that nothing is so distasteful to you as abstract theories, and that tions and broach abstract theories. On the contrary; they know dislocated expedients. He took off half of the malt-tax and fall of the hop duty, and in stages reduced the tea duty from two shillings and two pence to one shilling. More important, he broke up the old frame of the income-tax by a variation of its rates, and as for the house-tax, he doubled its rate and extended its area. In one of his fragmentary notes, Mr. Gladstone says:—

to eject the government. of the question thus raised made me feel that the day was come known his intentions to the board of inland revenue. The gravity the question. And I afterwards found that he had not even made sequitur. What angered me was that Disraeli had never examined disruption of the tax, with confusion in finance, as an immediate made me believe that it was impracticable, and probably meant the authority of Pitt and Peel, and then my own study of the subject, which, on the other hand, was disapproved by sound financiers. The opinion of the whigs and liberals was in favour of this scheme; of the liberal majority, for we all knew quite well that the current property. It was on Distaeli's part a most daring bid for the support distinct addition to the burdens borne by the holders of visible the land; but, inasmuch as to exempt one is to tax another, it was a the other schedules at sevenpence. This was no compensation to incometax on schedule ${
m D.}$ to fivepence in the pound, leaving vicious element in Disraeli's budget was his proposal to reduce the essentially bad to repeal half the malt duty. But the flagrantly It was a measure little their minority was ready to accept. first they would do, they had little to offer the land, but that Having run away from protection, as it was plain from the

It was upon the increase of the house-tax that the great battle was finally staked. Alr. Gladstone's letters to his wife at Hawarden bring the rapid and excited scenes vividly before us.

6 Carllon Gardens, Dec. 3, 1852.—I write from H. of C. at 4½ just expecting the budget. All seem to look for startling and dangerous proposals. You will read them in the papers of tomorrow, be they what they may. If there is anything ontrageous, we may protest at once; but I do not expect any extended debate to-night. . . The rush for places in the H. of C. is immense.

SIF

own administration.1 struck out of the statute book in 1871 in Mr. Gladstone's less; the law was from the first a dead letter, and it was thenace by these clumsy armourers proved blunt and worthsummer. The weapon that had been forged in this blazing: The fight was stiff, and was kept up until the end of the greatest living nonconformist, voting in the same lobby. Gladstone, the greatest living churchman, and Bright, the religious liberty. It was something, however, to find Alr.

III

One of the most illustrious of the This dismissal of Palmerston introduced a new leave the seals of the foreign department any longer in his them by telling him that he could not advise the Queen to despotism), and Lord John closed a correspondence between arings mobesti to shis out to tou esto ineedom against btaking an unauthorised line of his own upon Xapoleon's coup resolution. Before the year ended Palmerston persisted in their general dissatisfaction, they declined to adopt any tional, and though they did not conceal from Palmerston minister to the cabinet was felt by them to be unconstitucabinet upon it. Such an appeal by the sovereign from the requested the prime minister to ascertain the opinion of the at this proceeding took lively offence, and the Queen ing him for his exertions on Kossuth's behalf. The court he received a public deputation and an address complimentthat he should not receive Kossuth, and he complied; but apset the coach. The cabinet, early in November, settled no friend to reform, fell into restive courses that finally Granville, was named to prepare a reform bill. Palmerston, now reinforced by the admission for the first time of Lord In the sutumn (1851) a committee of the whig cabinet,

Ue que rous me dites que le bill econe' se sout obboses un nom de la to Senior:etè de cœur et d'esprit avec ceux qui comme Lord Aberdeen et M. Glad-European liberals of the century wrote terre!—Tecquerille, Corr. iii. p. 274. de vous avoue que far devais être. conscience. Où se réingièra la liberté religieuse, si on la chasse de l'Angle-Cest le contraire qui les mæms; sup earig siol esb sairi ionganog sich moins en théorie à l'indépendance de plable, grace aux mours du pars. et dangereuses que le bill a portées au menera à rien, me parair vraisemréiorme, à ces atteintes à la fois vaines contre les titres ecclésiastiques ne liberte et du principe même de la with Mahon and Wilson Patten, that this will be accomplished.

The debate may close to-morrow night. I am sorry to say I have a long speech fermenting in me, and I feel as a loaf might in the oven. The government, it is thought, are likely to be beaten.

Dec. 16.—I have been engaged in the House till close on post time. Distraeli trying to wriggle out of the question, and get it put upon words without meaning, to enable more to vote as they please, i.e. his men or those favourably inclined to him. But he is beaten in this point, and we have now the right question before us. It is not now quite certain whether we shall divide to-night; I hope we may, for it is weary work sitting with a speech fermenting inside may, for it is weary work sitting with a speech fermenting inside one.

could, I could see in the faces and demeanour of others quite other there was great heat and a disposition to interrupt me when they of believing that in some degree I effected; for while among some hoodwinking and bewildering them, and this I have the happiness object was to show the conservative party how their leader was sonalities I felt there was no choice but to go on. whether it would not be too late, but when I heard his perto begin by attacking him for these. There was a question graced by shameless personalities and otherwise; I had therefore powerful I ever heard from him. At the same time it was disuntil one. His speech as a whole was grand; I think the most me and made me quite forget that I had to follow him. He spoke superlative acting and brilliant oratory from time to time absorbed from that moment, of course, I was on tenterhooks, except when his back to the House at nine. Disraeli rose at 10.20 [Dec. 16], and think) to sleep in the fur cloak for another quarter of an hour; got dined, read for a quarter of an hour, and actually contrived (only chase, and prepared us all for excitement. I came home at seven, and the government to escape, a definite issue, were like a fox parliamentary life. The intense efforts which we made to obtain, Dec. 18.—I have never gone through so exciting a passage of was for doubling the house-tax, no-body was bound by that vote to do so. It was an attempt at a shuffle in order to catch votes from his own people, and to a certain extent it succeeded.'—Halijax Papers, 1852.

1 ' We had a preliminary debate to have the whole resolution put, instead of the preamble only, which was ultimately agreed to, and placed the question more initly before the public, Disraeli making the extraordinary declaration that though the proposal placed than at the exchequer. Henloy could not have been yourse than at the board of trade. If Baring, who would have been their best chancellor of the exchequer, seems to have declined. Herries would have been much better than Disraeli for that particular place. I suppose Lord Malmesbury is temporary foreign secretary, to hold the place for bury is temporary foreign secretary, to hold the place for S. Canning. What does not appear on the face of the case is, who is to lead the House of Commons, and about that everybody sceme to be in the dark.'

4.7

VOL. I. whether conservative reconstruction, or liberal conjunction, defeat of protectionist proposals, seem most honourablepared to take whatever of three courses might, after the clear and free from whig and Derbyite alike, so as to be presavisated that their duty plainly was to hold themselves with him securely.' Mr. Gladstone, on the contrary, from me), that on church questions we all might co-operate hands; but he considered, I thought (and if so he differed did not, however, like the reform question in Lord John's always been, and was now, friendly to a liberal policy. He said that though called a despot all his life, he himself had extricated from the company with which he is associated; spoke kindly of Lord Derby and wished that he could be of our conversation, he seemed to lean the other way; tive party, but yesterday, particularly at the commencement to reunite the fragments and reconstruct the conservahas usually been, during the last few years, that of anxiety position as the main anchor of their section. His tone -to his reight, his prudence, and his kindliness of dis-February Mr. Gladstone sought Lord Aberdeen, looking into the ease of a dubjous third party. At the end of party. It was the Peelites who had now been thrown wards liberalism, his sympathies drew him to his first lingering sympathies the other.' His opinions looked towards said, 'was that my opinious went one way, my Gladstone's career. 'The key to my position,' as he afterthe year 1852, marks a highly interesting stage in Mr. The first Derby administration, thus formed and covering and of themselves.' when he concluded the House might well feel proud of him attained by the most brilliant sallies of his adversary, and to him the goodwill of his audience in a degree never assumed and successfully maintained, and which conciliated resulting from the tone of moral superiority which he fully exerted. He had, besides, the immense advantage countenances of his hearers, those powers were very successstone possesses to great perfection, and to judge by the which seems entirely denied to his antagonist, Mr. Gladalmost pathetic expostulation. . . . That power of persuasion mencing in a tone of stern rebuke, it ended in words of and flowing than that of Mr. Disraeli; and though comlanguage was less ambitious, less studied, but more natural tained throughout without flagging and without effort. The indignation, now sinking to remonstrance-which was susor gaisir won—gaileel farom to each dgid a ai bedetiq to characterised throughout by the most earnest sincerity. speech of Mr. Gladstone was in marked contrast. effect of this great intellectual and physical effort. painful to the audience, and tending greatly to diminish the and a tone of studied and sardonic bitterness, peculiarly ally whole sentences were delivered with an artificial voice stimulants to laughter were very freely applied. Occasionmeant no doubt to relieve them by contrast, the coarser invective was pushed to the limit of virulence, and in others,

A violent thunderstorm raged during the debate, but the excited senators neither noticed the flashes of lightning nor heard a tremendous shock of thunder. A little before four o'clock in the morning (Dec. 17), the division was taken, and ministers were beaten by nineteen (305 to 286). 'There was an immense crowd,' says Macaulay,' a deafening cheer when Hayter took the right hand of the row of tellers, and a still louder cheer when the numbers were read.' ¹

A small incident occurred a few nights later to show that it was indeed high time to abate the passions of these six years and more. A politician of secondary rank had been accused of bribery at Derby, and a band of tory friends thought the a principle of the passion of pripers at Derby, and a band of tory friends thought the arrangement of the passion of the pass

Peelites. 'Newcastle stands nearly alone, if not quite, that there were at least four distinct shades among the The upshot of all these discussions was the discovery and in some degree Lord Londonderry and Lord Liverpool.' of them—for instance Mr. Pitt, Mr. Canning, Mr. Huskisson, spoke of the tories as the obstructive body I said not all to the conservative side of the liberal party. And when he preferable, comparing all advantages and disadvantages, the medium of the conservative party, and I thought a position like Peel's on the liberal side of that party worked out with greater security to the country through and on the whole I thought a liberal policy would be by a third or middle party unless it be for a time only, parties. To which I replied, the country cannot be governed party of our own, containing all the good elements of both He clung to the idea that we were hereafter to form a composed even of men of honour or of gentlemen."... at the Carlton, we were rather warm; and I said to him, "It appears to me that you do not believe this party to be

The personal composition of this section deserves a senof protection shall be settled.' (March 28, 1852.) that our clear line of duty is independence, until the question difficult and important for anticipating any conclusion, and the same desire, but feel that the matter is too crude, too I am with Lord Aberdeen and S. Herbert, who have nearly their only point of difference. Lastly myself, and I think in a bert ord Derby, and avoving that free trade is burn downwards, more or less undisguisedly anticipating Thirdly, there are the great bulk of the Peelites from Goularrested, not thoroughly smalgamated, owing to Graham. Sir C. Douglas went before him. But this section has been Oswald would I think have gone with him, as F. Peel and take his place in the liberal ranks; Cardwell, Fitzroy and one. Apart from these witcheries, Graham was ready to actual conservative nor the actual liberal party but a new lead a great, virtuous, powerful intelligent party, neither the in the rather high-flown idea that we are to create and

The personal composition of this section deserves a sentence. In 1835, during Peel's short government, the whig phalanz opposed to it in the House of Commons consisted

Mr. Disraeli, on the contrary, with infinite polish and drew easy forgiveness from the flying words of debate, and drew he had mocked as 'a weird sibyl'; the other member whom he greatly respected, but whom he greatly regarded; and the third member whom he bade learn that regarded; and the third member whom he bade learn that petulance is not sarcasm, and insolence is not invective. Lord John Russell congratulated him on the ability and the gallantry with which he had conducted the struggle, and so the curtain fell. The result, as the great newspaper put it with journalistic freedom, was 'not merely the victory of a with journalistic freedom, as 'reverse, but a conquest. The battle, but of a war; not a reverse, but a conquest. The vanquished have no principles which they dare to assert, no leaders whom they can venture to trust.'

present, looked upon our political connection with Graham as dissolved by the Carlisle speech.'

or yours? may ever tend to impair these sentiments in my own mind and to convey the fervent hope that no act or word of mine to accept and re-echo cordially your expressious of good will, advantages I have derived from communication with you, unvarying kindness of many years, to acknowledge all the other.' 'I have to thank you,' Mr. Gladstone replies, 'for the remember that we have no cense of complaint against each to maintain kindly relatious. It is a pleasure to me to having known each other well, we shall continue, I trust, you; and though political friendships are often short-lived, and regard, such as I can never cease to entertain towards that you will retain towards me some feelings of esteem submit to your decision with regret; but at parting I hope that party connexion must no longer subsist between us. arrive when we must separate. You intimate the decision master and friend, I have always feared that the time might to them was not congenial; and since the death of our great early political life, though broken, gave to me a bias, which different from theirs: that the habits and connexious of my says, I have always felt that my age and position were speaking of his colleagues in Peel's government, Graham in politics. In writing to Mr. Chadstone (Mar. 29, 1852), and a degree of good feeling that is a pattern for such occasions The temporary parting from Graham was conducted with

When the others had withdrawn, Aberdeen told Mr. Chadstone that Lord John had been to call upon him the day before for the first time, and he believed that the visit had special reference to Mr. Chadstone reports, 'was that my of his conversation,' Mr. Chadstone reports, 'was that my opinions were quite as liberal as his; that in regard to the colonies I went beyond him; that my Naples pamphlets colonies I went beyond him; that my Naples pamphlets self to support the ballot, but he admitted it was a liard question, and said he was not so blind that practical experience might not convince him that he was wrong. (Mar. 26, 1852.)

draham spoke of himself as a tried reformer and as a member of the liberal party, and as glad to find himself the ally of so faithful a liberal and reformer as his fellow-candidate, and reformer as his fellow-candidate, He would not exactly pledge him-

the one hand, and ' the Irish Brass Band' on the other. to Cobden and Bright and Hume and their friends on them at finding themselves neighbours on the benches House.' Considerable uneasiness was felt among some of presented to him as he passed them in walking up the complimented me on the excellent appearance they had about forty strong; and Sir James Graham, I recollect, once on the opposition side, but below the gangway, full, or bring them together, in the recognised modes. They sat Sidney Herbert and I, says Mr. Gladstone, 'took pains to giving the new government what is called a fair trial. 'Air. and Cardwell. The Peelite body as a whole determined on flozzust into the Lord of the ganging anticopy of sevent party, but only on a singlo question. In the end, Graham sat party, while in fact they were not divided from them as a n ar insini division the conservative government as a to betoken; and to sit on the front opposition bench would follow upon full conviction of the thing it was understood seat, he said, is an external sign and pledge that ought to soon as the crisis of protection should be over. Taking a conservativo in its personal composition and traditions, as they ought to desire was the promotion of a government going below the gangway on the opposition side. What expressed from the first a decided opinion in favour of the meantime he did not seem to know. Alr. Chalstone and enlightened third party, but where they should sit in dissent from both, looking to the formation of his virtuous the gangway on the ministerial side. Newcastle intimated to sit opposite to them as adversaries, but should sit below ministers on one question, and therefore that they ought not this year, argued that they only held aloof from the new Herbert, who acted pretty strictly with Mr. Gladstone all from the others, because he had ence been a whig himself. the whigs: he repeated that his own ease was different at once resolved on sharing the front opposition bench with sions upon it were both copious and vehement.1 Graham

¹ The same question greatly exercised Mr. Gladstone's mind in 1886 for the same reason, that he again

Whereas we, the mischievous Ecclesiastical Titles Act. doubt they were sufferers from their ill-conceived and of an used up, and so far a discredited, party. Without that they had at this juncture in some degree the character due share of power. It should, however, be borne in mind sixths or seven-eighths of our supporters, had less than their thought that the whigs, whose party was to supply five-In the Aberdeen cabinet, says Mr. Gladstone, 'it may be whom in their drawing-rooms they mocked as an old tory. pride was deeply revolted at subjection to a prime minister stand this, and that the storm will overwhelm me.' Whig afraid, cried Lord John, 'that the liberal party will never one to the two hundred and seventy just persons. 'I am heartrending: three were to go to the thirty Peelites, and as tauj asw tenidas edt to tuo seefflo taatroqmi ruot to ease were six whigs, as many Peelites, and one radical. radicals five, to Lord Palmerston one.' In the end there propose to give seven seats in cabinet, to the whigs and brigade, thirty are Peelites. To this party of thirty you to Aberdeen, '270 are whig and radical, thirty are Irish 330 members of the House of Commons, wrote Lord John From that point of view, the whig case was strong. treated as booty to be divided among successful combatants. on all sides, and how much the public employments are hepsis is some to see how little fitness for office is regarded 'It is melancholy,' muses Sir James Graham this Christmas sole ourselves by recalling the rapacity of our oligarchies. politicians hunting office in modern democracy, let us conin reform; but when we chide the selfishness of machine a genuine regard for good government, and a decent faith of this time were men of intellectual refinement; they had in the fish-ponds of the palace of Fontainebleau. The whigs that date from Henry IV. and Sully, struggling for bread the scramble, the reader may think of the venerable carp now remarked sardonically, 'The cake is too small.' To realise All the Talents was made,—'We are three in a bed.' Disraeli less remembered what Fox had said when the ministry of Peelites, only the leavings to the whigs. Lord John doubtbitter cry arose that all the good things were going to the

CHYPTER VIII

END OF PROTECTION

(2981)

IT is not too much to ask that now at least, after so much waste of public time, after ministries overturned and parties disorganized, the question of free trade should be placed high and dry on the above whither the tide of political party strife could no longer reach it.—Gladstone.

THE parliament was now dissolved (July 1) to decide a great and Bright assured them that no fall in wages would follow in earlier times never been really convinced when Cobden working-class had become strenuous free traders. They had not disclose. The great change since 1846 was that the new principles of taxation, but what they were to be, he did to loom in the future. He rang the changes on mysterious set-offs and compensations and relief of burdens, 'seeming best to mystify the agricultural elector by phrases about in Ireland, and against it in Scotland. Mr. Disraeli did his small town, free-trader in a large one. He was for Maynooth as was well said, was protectionist in a county, neutral in a in 1868. Instead of this, all was equivocation. The Derbyite, franchise in 1867, and Mr. Gladstone upon the Irish church trade, and as Mr. Distraeli was to change his mind upon changed his mind about the catholic question and about free told the country that he had changed his mind, as Peel had for corn and for colonial sugar. Or he might have openly ' have faced it boldly by announcing a moderate protection whether this policy was sound or unsound. Lord Derby might dozen years, and the issue before the electors in 1852 was had been the three great free trade measures of the last halftion of the sugar duties, the repeal of the navigation laws, question. The repeal of the corn law, the ultimate equalisa-

Say what they would, the parliamentary majority was and became chancellor of the exchequer. vas soon in induence the second post in the government,2 before Christmas day came, Mr. Gladstone accepted what would sow the tares of anglicanism in these virgin fields. So the excesses of his colonial liberalism, and felt sure that he returned to the colonial office, but the whigs suspected intervened. Mr. Gladstone himself would cheerfully have His constitutional dislike of high responsibility perhaps show the value set upon his capacity in this department. references to him in later times on points of pure finance the administration of Peel, and Mr. Gladstone's frequent blank.' Graham, as we know, was the best economist in says Mr. Gladstone, 'on Graham, but he refused point cellor.'1 Notwithstanding the royal wish, 'we pressed it,' to secure the continuance of Lord St. Leonards as chanthe chancellorship of the exchequer to Mr. Gladstone, and Aberdeen:—'The Queen hopes it may be possible to give was settled. From Osborne a letter had come to Lord

. It thus appears, if we strike out the fifty conservatives faintly Disraeli into any combination for turning out the government. the Derby opposition, from 200 to 250, ready to follow Mr. be counted on either for attendance or confidence; finally, vote, and not ill-disposed to the government, but not to eighty conservatives, not likely to join in any factious into forty Irish brigaders, bent on mischief; from fifty to to be depended on. The remainder of the House he divided minority, and a portion even of that minority not always he estimated them. The ministry, therefore, were in a the government were the forty Peelites—for at that figure only other party avowing themselves general supporters of bination against the government, especially in finance. The the radical wing of them certain to make occasions of com-Commons gave 270 British liberals, not very compact, and nnstable as water. His own analysis of the House of ² It was not until the rise of Mr. Gladstone that a chancellor of the exchequer, not being prime minister, stood at this high level.

The practical impossibility of retaining this learned man, the Derbyite chancellor, upon the coalition woolsack, is an illustration of the tenacity of the modern party system.

CHYLLER AIII

END OF PROTECTION

(2981)

It is not too much to ask that now at least, after so much waste of public time, after ministries overturned and parties disorganized, the question of free trade should be placed high and dry on the shore whither the tide of political party strife could no longer reach it.—Glaborek.

THE parliament was now dissolved (July I) to decide a great and Bright assured them that no fall in wages would follow in earlier times never been really convinced when Cobden working-class had become strenuous free traders. They had not disclose. The great change since 1846 was that the new principles of taxation, but what they were to be, he did to loom in the future. He rang the changes on mysterious set-offs and compensations and relief of burdens, 'seeming best to mystify the agricultural elector by phrases about in Ireland, and against it in Scotland. Mr. Disraeli did his small town, free-trader in a large one. He was for Maynooth as was well said, was protectionist in a county, neutral in a in 1868. Instead of this, all was equivocation. The Derbyite, franchise in 1867, and Mr. Gladstone upon the Irish church. trade, and as Mr. Distaeli was to change his mind upon changed his mind about the catholic question and about free told the country that he had changed his mind, as Peel had for corn and for colonial sugar. Or he might have openly have faced it boldly by announcing a moderate protection whether this policy was sound or unsound. Lord Derby might dozen years, and the issue before the electors in 1852 was had been the three great free trade measures of the last halftion of the sugar duties, the repeal of the mavigation laws, question. The repeal of the corn law, the ultimate equalisa-

ment or that he will break it up.'? conjecture is that Chadstone will, before long, leave the governyou expect and to compare these expectations with results. My pretend to be a prophet, but it is always well to put down what evangelicals on Gladstone and S. Herbert with dislike. I don't who voted against the Aggression bill with distrust; the are weak in their church views. The protestants look on those the former; the Peelites (Gladstone especially) the other. They on the other. The whigs of the cabinet will be anxious to satisfy they will have the liberals on the one side and the conservatives the numbers, but the class of supporters. The Peelites are forty; work uncomfortably. It is weak in the support. I do not mean antecedents of the cabinet; they must all make some sacrifices and Lord John cannot be comfortable. It is weak in the discordance i-stas: Palmerston is degraded, Cladstone will struggle for power,

--: notitinos Long afterwards Mr. Gladstone binaself said this of the toomanhuo do ocimorq rotzory, hijiw zonidao is wac rovo villatal I Noted all the of lead orow new only bur noiseoup staff. To gains over comi Hol Toyon conidno oils tenoistinogen mosterd oils lo estimations sucurror ban xelquice out in the complex and tortucus capain and unhappy. But with the general course of affairs atom noites yd needrodd, brod to noitieog out soods the cult collection occupation of the Principalities as a casus bellifor instance, a complete error to suppose that he asked the cabinet have been troublesome, but for a long time were not so. It is, who was home secretary, had in him some tendencies which might were some few idiosynerasies without donbt. Lord Palmerston, eather nearer in colour to the Peelites than to the whigs. There W. Molesworth, its radical member, seemed to be practically deliborations is never exhibited the marks of its dual origin. Sir ati ni and s'noshrodh broil to tonidas sidt to yas asmu I

[्]रेष्ट र अवह महत्त्र अपर रक्ष है प्रस्तुनहरू ग्राम्य है सारायुष्य अवद किन तीमाँ दीयाल्या । एद र हिंहे र लाहें इस र अवह महत्त्र अपर रक्ष है प्रस्तुनहरू ग्राम्य है सारायुष्य अवद किन तीमाँ दीयाल्या । एद र हिंहे र rolloomals won ode negu llei slodeshande a cambial e seda Acceptance of other samed the Oxford seat, and the day

CHAPTER VIII

(5981)

END OF PROTECTION

It is not too much to ask that now at least, after so much waste of public time, after ministries overturned and parties disorganized, the question of free trade should be placed high and dry on the shore whither the tide of political party strife could no longer reach it.—Glaborour.

THE parliament was now dissolved (July 1) to decide a great question. The repeal of the corn law, the ultimate equalisation of the sugar duties, the repeal of the navigation laws, had been the three great free trade measures of the last half-dozen years, and the issue before the electors in 1852 was whether this policy was sound or unsound. Lord Derby might have faced it boldly by announcing a moderate protection for corn and for colonial sugar. Or he might have openly told the country that he had changed his mind, as Peel had changed his mind about the catholic question and about free changed his mind about the catholic question and about free trade, and as Mr. Disraeli was to change his mind upon in 1868. Instead of this, all was equivocation. The Derbyite, as was well said, was protectionist in a county, neutral in a same well said, was protectionist in a county, neutral in a small town, free-trader in a large one. He was for Maynooth in Ireland, and against it in Scotland. Mr. Disraeli did his heat to mystify the agricultural elector by phrases about best to mystify the agricultural elector by phrases about best to mystify the agricultural elect()r by phrases about set-offs and compensations and relief of burdens, 'seeming to loom in the future.' He rang the changes on mysterious new principles of taxation, but what they were to be, he did not, disclose. The great change since 1846 was that the working-class had become strenuous free? traders. They had working-class had become strenuous free? traders. They had in earlier times never been really convinced when Cobden in earlier times never been really convinced when Cobden

wollot bluow segaw ni llat on tadt medt beruzza tdzird bna

zeen.

out a thoroughgoing man of the people. These anticipations out a thoroughgoing man of the people. Gladstone himself, in the smallest degree, shared. The newspapers, meanwhile, were all but unanimous in declaring that 'if experience, talent, industry, and virtue, are the attributes required for the government of this empire,' then the coalition government of this empire,' than the coalition government would be one of the best that England had ever

III

Mr. Gladstone's dislike and distrust of the intrusion not only of the rude secular arm, but of anything temporal into the sphere of spiritual things, had been marked enough in the old days of battle at Oxford between the tractarians and the heads, though it was less manifest in the Gorham case. In 1853 he found occasion for an honourable exhibition of the same strong feeling. Maurice had got into trouble with the authorities at King's College by essays in which he was taken to hold that the eternity of the future torment of the wicked is a superstition not warranted by the Thirty-nine to oust Maurice from his professorial chair. Mr. Gladstone to oust Maurice from his professorial chair. Mr. Gladstone took great pains to avert the stroke, and here is the story as took great pains to brother-in-law, Lord Lyttelton:—

To Lord Lyttelton.

Oct. 29, 1853.—I remained in town last Thursday in order to attend the council of K.C., and as far as I could, to see fair play. Ittend the council of K.C., and as far as I could, to see fair play. I was afraid of a very precipitous proceeding, and I regret to say my fears have been verified. The motion carried was the Bishop of London's, but I am bound to say he was quite willing to have vaived it for another course, and the proceeding is due to a body of laymen chiefly lords. The motion carried is to the effect that the statements on certain points contained in Maurice's last essay are of a dangerous character, and that his connection with the theology of the school ought not to continue. I moved as an amendment that the bishop be requested to appoint competent amendment that the bishop be requested to appoint competent theologians who should personally examine how far the statements from time to time, Distraeli, 'with whom,' he said, 'I have had communications esced in and adopted ours. He said he would convey it to mend any particular plan of action, and he willingly acquithe amendment to him at his house. He did not recomthe express request of S. Herbert and mine, and we carried amendment which defeated the attack, but he did this at which placed us against them. Lord Palmerston moved the the Four Seats bill; that is to say, they raised an issue that which had been done by the government in the case of Mr. Gladstone, 'we came to a case in which the liberals did of free trade in terms they could not adopt. Now, says virtually assailing the ministers, by asserting the doctrine Notice was at once given by Mr. Villiers of a motion to connive at Derbyite operations any more than were the and necessary?' The original free traders were not disposed been called upon to declare that the reform bill was wise, just, government and when the new parliament assembled, he had of Sir R. Peel have said in 1835 if, when he assumed the policy that had formerly prevailed? What would the friends but should expressly recant their opinion in favour of the should consent to act on the new policy they had adopted, down and insisted not only that the Houses of parliament had been admitted as settlements, their friends had come shortly after catholic emancipation and the reform bill ci

In the debate (Nov. 26) upon the two rival amendments—that of Mr. Villiers, which the ministers could not accept, and that of Palmerston, which they could—Sidney Herbert paid off some old scores in a speech full of fire and jubilation; Mr. Gladstone, on the other hand, was elaborately pacific. He earnestly deprecated the language of severity and exasperation, or anything that would tend to embitter party warfare. His illustrious leader Peel, he said, did indeed look for his revenge; but for what revenge did he look? Assuredly not for stinging speeches, assuredly not for motions made in favour of his policy, if they carried pain and degradation to the minds of honourable men. Were they not celebrating the obsequies of an obnoxious policy? Let them cherish no desire to trample on those who had fought manfully and greatly my own fault. Some years after the affair at ed tent that the I feel that this must be of an enigma. When I remember what is said and THE COALITION was one of those who signed an address of recognition and the attack upon him was renewed. Mr. Gladstone King's College, Maurice was appointed to Vere Street, said, rather decidedly, that he assented to the truth of this doctrine. oH i wollot bas, and initial for their guiding, and follow it. . . . He tions of parties, circumstances were often stronger than the human or failure in bringing them into harmony. I said that, as to relaand past relations, incompatibilities, peculiar defects of character, nence, but great difficulties arising from various causes, present at the present House of Commons: many men of power and emifaced in conceiving of any ministerial combination when we looked speech in the debate.' He gave a significant assent, and seemed dent that expression was occasioned by one particular preceding same time, I think I ought to observe to you that I am configrew warm and went beyond his intention at that point; at the conversation with him on it, but I think it very probable that he sion or sentence?' He rejoined, 'Yes.' I said, 'I have had no did he not?' I answered, 'You mean as to one particular expres-He added, 'I think Sidney said more last night than he intended, to express no surprise.

.noitslutstycon bas

about Mr. Disraeli :-- For my part L auppose this refers to a passage he said or what he believed in those then were seen to be a scheme of illusory compensations and obsolete opinions.' His proposals dazzled for a day, and he had greater subjects to consider than the triumph of for some of Mr. Gladstone's repulsion, he told the House that was fit for real use. With a serene audacity that accounts financial proposals, but it now turned out that none of them private member in opposition he had brought forward many out delay Disraeli presented his budget (Dec. 3). all ready at last to stalk down their crafty quarry. Withhad been at the exchequer and men who hoped to be, were hard realities of the taxes. Whigs and Peelites, men who oracular expounder of mysteries was at last gripped by the shadowy promises and delusive dreams was over; and the The respite for ministers was short. The long day of not tolerate. accuse him of having forgotten what verts, which the taste of our more democratic House would certainly least degree in protection. I do not ever been a protectionist. I never for one moment thought he believed in the reason why the Jews make no conchequer, so far as his own convictions are concerned, of the charge of having asme speech contains a whimaical it to appear that he believed.' years. I only accuse him of having forgotten now what he then wished I acquit the chancellor of the ex-

the official house. There was question, also, of the robe chart passes down under some law of exchange from one chancellor to another on an apparently unsettled footing. The tone on this high concern was not wholly amicable. Mr. Gladstone notes especially in his diary that he wrote auppose, the day most favourable to self-control; while suppose, the day most favourable to self-control; while hir. Disraeli at last suggests that Mr. Gladstone should really consult Sir Charles Wood, 'who is at least a man of the world.' Such are the angers of celestial minds.

At an early cabinet (Feb. 5) he began the battle that lasted in various shapes all the rest of his life. It was on a question of reducing the force in the Pacific. 'Lord Aberdeen, Granville, Molesworth, and I were for it. We failed.' What was the case for this particular retrenchment I do not know, nor does it matter. Fiercer engagements, and many of them, were to follow. Meanwhile he bent all the energies of his mind to the other front of financial questions—to raising money rather than expending it, and with unwearied industry applied himself to solve the problem of redistributing the burdens and improving the machinery of tributing the burdens and improving the machinery of tributing the burdens and improving the machinery of tributing the burdens and improving the machinery of shopkeepers, and the whole array of general taxpayers with had filled merchants, bankers, shipowners, manufacturers, the Reform bill had not only bewildered parliament, but The finance of the whigs in the years after individuals, the relations of classes, and the strength of but in a thousand ways go to the root of the prosperity of slumber, that budgets are not merely affairs of arithmetic, as to which they are always so soon ready to relapse into mercial system, had awakened men to the enormous truth, free trade and protection, ending in a revolution of our comagitated every class in the community. The battle between gatherings in all the large towns in the kingdom, had thronged exchanges, in the farmer's ordinary and at huge in senate and cabinet, but in country market-places and protracted discussion on the corn law, conducted not only lively and commanding place in popular interest. The For many years circumstances had given to finance a

Monday, Dec. 6.—On Saturday, in the early part of the day, I had a return, perhaps eaused by the damp relaxing weather, of the neuralgic pain in my face, and in the afternoon a long sitting at my pain disappeared, but which kept me past the ordinary post hour. These were the causes of your having no letter. The said budget will give rise to serious difficulties. It is plain enough distance, he did not mean this plan but something more extensive. Even his reduced scheme, however, includes fundamental sive. Even his reduced scheme, however, includes fundamental with. The first day of serious debate on it will be Friday next, with. The first day of serious debate on it will be Friday next, and a vote will be taken either then or on blonday.

Dec. 8.—Be sure to read Lord Derby's speech on Monday. His reference to the cause of his quarrel with Lord George Bentinels was most striking, and is interpreted as a rap at Disraeli.¹ I have bilities. The government, I believe, talk confidently about the decision on the house-tax, but I should doubt whether they are right, Meantime I am convinced that Disraeli's is the least consecrative budget I have ever known.

Dec. 14.—I need hardly say the vision of going down to-morrow has been dissolved. It has been arranged that I am not to speak until the close of the debate; and it is considered almost certain to go on till Monday. Ministers have become much less confident, but I understand that some, I know not how many, of Lord John's men are not to be relied on. Whether they win or not (I expect the latter, but my opinion is naught) they cannot carry this house-tax nor their budget. But the mischief of the proposals they have launched will not die with them.

Dec. 15.—I write in great haste. Though it is Wednesday, I have been down at the House almost all day to unravel a device of Disraell's about the manner in which the question is to be put, by which he means to catch votes; and I think after full consultation which he means to catch votes; and I think after full consultation nothing could be more unfitting nor more impolitic than to load with terms of vituperation those from whom we are compelled conscientiously to differ' (Dec. 6).

ing I ever had with my noble and lamented friend Lord George Ben-tinck, which I am happy to say was thoroughly removed before his untimely death—was upon a full and couraged Mr. Gladstone to build on a broad foundation. and creditable. It was strong ideas of this kind that enthe best ground for a financial arrangement both successful debt, and a review of the probate and legacy duties, afforded fixed term of extinction, with reduction of the interest of a combination of income-tax, gradually diminishing to a greater certainty and ease than simple renewal; and that (March 15) that a larger measure would be carried with tion about the income-tax. He was strongly of opinion seemed impossible and unworthy to avoid a frank declarapublic opinion in a matter of this crucial importance. It the executive government to lead the way and to guide dismissed. It was evidently, as Graham said, the duty of appointment of Hume's committee, the idea was wisely gift of indomitable courage. If anybody suggested the rewith the habit of unflagging toil, and above all, with the emstage and of irida and the sirid and averagiv to dirique imagination of the highest class, with a combination of the the exchequer), but a financier endowed with a practical no special choice of his own that Mr. Gladstone went to financier almost by accident (for, as we have seen, it was by the bewildered scene. At last a statesman appeared, a

The nature of his proceedings he set out in one of the most interesting of his political memorands:—

The liberals were, to all appearance, pledged to the reconstruction of the tax by their opinions, and the tories by their party following. The small fraction of Peelites could probably be relied upon the other way, and some few individuals with financial marke and experience. The mission of the new government financial mission, and the stress of it thus lay upon a person very ill-prepared. My opinions were with Peel; but under such circumstances it was my duty to make a close and searching investigation into the whole nature of the tax, and make up my mith the existing state of opinion. I went to work, and laboured with the existing state of opinion. I went to work, and laboured very hard. When I had entered gravely upon my financial very hard. When I had entered gravely upon my financial studies, I one day had occasion—I know not what—to go into the studies, I one day had occasion—I know not what—to go into the

might be well used. really with my deep sense of his gifts I would only pray they me to say it; God knows I have no wish to give him pain; and told he is much stung by what I said. I am vory sorry it fell to by no means says too much in praise of Disraeli's speech. I am seen what occurred, or been informed by those who did see. He debate. It has evidently been written by a man who must have will see a very curious article descriptive of the last scene of the human nature, at least mine. But in the Times of to-day you not contain my speech but a mangled abbreviation. Such is I thought you would buy, and was mortified when I saw it did for me to be mortified. Next morning I opened the Times, which When I came home from the House, I thought it would be good the consciousness of it, but I am very well and really not unquiet. And still, of course, the time is an anxious one, and I wake with had made, which worked upon me so that I could not rest any more. I moissimo esorg a beredmemer but, and remembered a gross omission I well last night. On Thursday night [i.e. Friday morning] after strung very high, and has not yet quite got back to calm, but I slept the hour, which always operates, were the causes. Aly brain was and the importance of the issue, combined with the lateness of think been so much excited for years. The power of his speech, gether it might have been better effected. The House has not I < feelings expressed. But it was a most difficult operation, and alto-

The writer in the Times to whom the victorious orator here refers describes how, 'like two of Sir Walter Scott's champions, these redoubtable antagonists gathered up all their force for the final struggle, and encountered each other in mid-career; how, rather equal than like, each side viewed from the war of words the fortunes of two parties so nicely balanced and marshalled in apparently equal array. Mr. Disraeli's speech,' he says,' was in every respect worthy of his oratorical reputation. The retorts were pointed and bitter, the hits telling, the sarcasm keen, the argument in ing. The merits were counterbalanced by no less glaring ing. The merits were counterbalanced by no less glaring ing. The merits were counterbalanced by no less glaring ing. The merits were counterbalanced by no less glaring ing. The merits were counterbalanced by no less glaring stamp, were no contemptible contributions to the comfort hundred pounds, and the substitution of a uniform receipt of life insurance from half-a-crown to sixpence on the taxes, the , reduction of the duty on the beneficent practice reform of rate and scale in the system of the assessed aspects of the scheme need not detain us; but a great Miscellaneous provisions ronim bas unequivocal good. identity of taxation in the three kingdoms—by no means an level of England and Scotland, a step was taken towards duties on spirits manufactured in Ireland nearer to the In the same department, by raising the entirely away. over eleven hundred thousand pounds annually, was swept injurious duty on soap, which brought into the exchequer In the department of excise, the high tending over three years from over two shillings to one The tea duty was to be reduced in stages ex-. Lowered. were extinguished, and nearly one hundred and fifty were and well-being of the community. Advertisements in news-in order, of the exchequer was wholly and strongly averse, and so he manent and ordinary finance of the country the chancellor From the retention of the income-tax as a portion of the perthe former having hitherto been the line of total exemption. comes between a hundred and fifty and a hundred pounds to be extended, also, at a reduced rate of fivepence, to in-British treasury of between four and five millions. It was tion for the remission of a debt owed by Ireland to the Meanwhile it was to be extended to Ireland, in compensahe hoped that parliament would be able to dispense with it. sixpence, and for the last three at fivepence. By that time years at sevenpence in the pound, for two years more at he determined to renew for a period of seven years,—for two was the position to be assigned in it to the income-tax. The keystone of the budget in Mr. Gladstone's conception papers became free of duty.1

remained for more than twenty years to come. In order, occurred. The original proposal was to reduce the duty from eighteen-pence to sixpence. A motion to repeat it altogether was rejected by peal it altogether was rejected by pient. Then a motion was made to fessed, and I believe do still profess, conservative opinions. official experience and a large amount of talent—who once progreat eminence and respectability, possessing considerable thirty or thirty-five gentlemen 'of great personal worth, of second, Irish ultramontanes; and lastly, a party of some and exclusive whigs down to the extremest radical theorists'; first, various gradations of liberalism from 'high aristocratic divided the combination that had overthrown him into, and judgment than Disraeli's farewell.' Derby angrily bination; while nothing could be better in temper, feeling, obliged to rise after him and contradict the charge of com-House of Lords on his resignation; such that Newcastle was making a most petulant and intemperate speech in the Mr. Gladstone wrote to his wife, 'Lord Derby has been signed. He did not take his defeat well. 'Strange to say,' it was adequate and sufficient, and Lord Derby at once retremendous, but as the history of half a century has shown, In point of numbers the stroke given to protection was not attacked with physical arguments by some man of blows.2 by a man of words like Disraeli, he would have been ducing rents, but annihilating them, instead of being attacked re- raivil war. . . . If Peel had proposed a law not only remanners or low morality in Americans; it is the first blow Brooks. 'That outrage,' he said, 'is no proof of brutal perpetrated on Summer in the Senate at Washington by striking reflection of Cornewall Lewis upon the assault indeed was trivial, but it illustrates a well-known and the Carlton in which I have taken no harm.' The affair haps, he wrote to his wife, 'see an account of a row at another room, and left him to himself. You will perpearls before swine. Eventually they ordered candles in courtesy to gentry in this humour was the easting of made some courteous reply, but as the reporter truly says, headlong out of the window into the Reform. Mr. Gladstone ing language, and tinally vowed that he ought to be pitched paper. Presently in came the revellers, began to use insult-Mr. Gladstono in another room was harmlessly reading the moment opportune to give him a banquet at the Carlton.

 \mathbf{K}

of any duties which it might fall to me to perform on behalf.

of such a government as was then in your contemplation.'

Thirteen, fourteen, fifteen hours a day he toiled at his desk. Treasury officials and trade experts, soap deputations and post-horse deputations, representatives of tobacco and representatives of the West India interest, flocked to Downing Street day by day all through March. If he went into the city to dine with the Lord Mayor, the lamentable hole thus made in his evening was repaired by working till four in the morning upon customs reform, Australian mints, budget plans of all kinds. It is characteristic that even this mountain load of concentrated and exacting labour did not prevent him from giving a Latin lesson every day to his second boy.

II

At last, after Mr. Gladstone had spent an hour at the thought this an ample warrant. to bring your original and whole plan before the cabinet." he boldly and wisely said, "I take it upon myself to ask you sacrifice to the probable inclinations of my colleagues. readiness, if he should think it called for, to make this Aberdeen the question I had put to myself, and stated my some politicians to be weaker but safer. I put to Lord reduced and mutilated scheme which might be deemed by appn the plan, and next day I carried to Lord Aberdeen a shoals? In consequence I performed a drastic operation my colleagues to follow me amidst all these rocks and scheme, that I began to ask myself, Have I a right to ask edt to azengid edt ta bebanotaa baa berebliwed oa aaw then holding office as president of the board of trade. He able and intelligent friend Cardwell, not in the cabinet but says Mr. Gladstone, 'I recited the leading particulars to my 'Some days before the day appointed for my statement,' palace in explaining his scheme to the Prince Consort, the budget was opened to the cabinet (April 9) in a speech of three hours—an achievement, I should suppose, unparalleled in that line, for a cabinet consists of men each with pretty absorbing pre-occupations of his own. The

AH YOOGL

CHAPTER I

6981-6981

THE COALITION

(1823)

The materials necessary for a sound judgment of facts are not found in the success or failure of undertakings; exact knowledge of the situation that has provoked them forms no inconsiderable element of history.—Metrensien.

Exer. In the peace that had been her fortunate lot for nearly forty years. To the situation that preceded this signal event, a judicious reader may well give his attention. Some of the particulars may seem trivial. In countries governed by particulars may seem trivial. In countries governed by trivial often count for much, and in the life of a man destined to be a conspicuous party leader, to pass them by would be to leave out real influences.

The first experiment in providing the country with a tory government had failed. That alliance between whig and government had failed. That alliance between whig and effect, had become imperative, and at least a second experiment was to be tried. The initial question was who should be head of the new government. In August, Lord Aberdeen be head of the new government. In August, Lord Aberdeen sent at least this would not be practicable. Whether it would be possible for Newcastle or me to undertake the concern, is more than I can say.' Other good reasons apart, had written to Mr. Gladstone in anticipation of the Derbyite defeat:—'If high character and ability only were required, you would be the person; but I am aware that for the pre-

Mr. Gladstone replied that it was after applying the test of damaged beforehand by some of the small changes that had been suggested.

In the course of these preliminaries Lord John Russell mured that he must take time. he would assent and assist. Wood looked grave, and murand Herbert. Graham was full of ill auguries, but said budget, the dissentients being Lansdowne, Graham, Wood. ments cut against one another, were for adopting the entire discussion, the cabinet finding that the suggested amendon the whole. At last, after further patient and searching weakest point of the plan, though warrantable and tenable Mr. Gladstone admitted that he thought the spirit duty the sion by suggesting the abandonment of the Irish spirit duty. government; as it was, he assented. Argyll created a diverincomes, and would act in that sense if he were out of the vidual opinion in favour of a distinction for precarious would have to dissolve. Palmerston expressed his indithat if they were beaten on differentiating the tax, they as the two extensions of the income-tax. Lord John said were not to be bound to dissolve or resign upon such a point beaten, but he would accept the budget provided they like a breach of faith. Palmerston thought they would be and an income-tax for Ireland together would be something text. Lansdowne suggested that an increased spirit duty 12), when they got into the open sea. Wood stuck to his Granville. They agreed to meet again the next day (April Wood; more or less leaning towards them, Palmerston and tax and keeping half the soap duty, Lansdowne, Graham, less favourable; for dropping the two extensions of income-Molesworth, Gladstone, with Argyll and Aberdeen more or stood for the whole budget Lord John, Newcastle, Clarendon, At the end of a long and interesting discussion, there

In the course of these preliminaries nord John Russen had gone to Graham, very uneasy about the income-tax. Graham, though habitually desponding, bade him be of strong; but the budget would be excellent to dissolve upon, and Lord John admitted that they would gain forty seats.

tion. He changed his mind every twelve hours, and made -idma faitifoq to sgnits and taings avitabes arus a ed mobles than he had expected. Historic and literary consolation can he found deposition from first place to second more bitter den and other ecclesiastical proceedings, that Mr. Gladstone would be his sharpest opponent. Then as the days passed, Lord John himself thought, from memories of Bishop Hampthe chief posts were filled by men not of his own party. him what sort of place he would hold in a cabinet in which often in his case the most mischievous of advisers, reminded then, refuse a position that Fox had accepted? But friends, Lord Grenville as head of the government. Why should he, at the head of the largest party, leading the Commons under orthodox historical parallel—the case of Mr. Fox, though Lord John at first had sought consolation in an Within a few hours angry squalls all but capsized the come to Graham or me. two I think certainly; and the exchequer will certainly of the exchequer or secretary for the colonies; one of the one to play. It is uncertain whether I shall be chancellor servatives, I cannot but say the game will be a very difficult without him, or rather with him between us and the conis looking to become the leader of a Derby opposition; and expect extraordinary difficulty. But I suppose Palmerston shall get to detailed arrangements, about which I do not refuses, which is a serious blow. To-morrow I think we wife at Hawarden, 'and has behaved very well. Palmerston sun shone. Lord John consents, wrote Mr. Gladstone to his form a government. He had a harassed week. At first the would join, Aberdeen accepted the Queen's commission to assent. Previously understanding from Lord John that he take the uncoveted post. Lord Aberdeen gave a slow at Lansdowne House, and each begged the other to underever. The leader of the Peelites visited the patrician whig and was supposed to have formally retired from office for have taken the helm, but Lord Lansdowne was seventy-two, sacred caste and their adherents were up in arms, and a appeased, difficulties were made on behalf of others. The infinite difficulties. When these were with much travail started whether we should go the length of the entire income-tax at sevenpence, with the augmented spirit duty. This view found favour generally; and I felt that some excess in the mere sacrifice of money was no great matter compared with the advantage of so great an approximation to equal taxation.' Then, 'speaking with great deference,' Gladstone repeated his belief once more that the entire budget was safer than a contracted one, both for the House and the stood out well, thank God. Many kind congratulations hours in detailing the financial measures, and my strength C. [Mrs. Gladstone]. Went at 4½ to the House. Spoke 43 and figures for the evening. Then drove and walked with at night. This day was devoted to working up papers moment. April 18. Wrote minutes. Read Shakespeare several hours to my figures.' Monday brought the critical obliged,' he says, with an accent of contrition, 'to give twice to church, and read the Paradiso; 'but I was Sunday, the chancellor of the exchequer went as usual as it stood, with its essential features unaltered. On was finally settled that the budget should be proposed The decisive cabinet was on Saturday, April 16. It budget as a whole than we seemed to be on Wednesday. resolved and certainly more likely to stand or fall by the cabinet now appeared well satisfied, and we parted, each well. 'Wood seemed still to hang back, but the rest of the name and fame of the government at any rate would stand country, and his conviction that if they proposed it, the

The proceeding that figures here so simply was, in fact, one of the great parliamentary performances of the century. Lord Aberdeen wrote to Prince Albert that 'the display of power was wonderful; it was agreed in all quarters that there had been nothing like the speech for many years, and that under the impression of his commanding eloquence the afterwards. Herberts and Wortleys came home with us and had soup and negus.

I Leans made to Ireland for various purposes.

Lord Derby might come back with a reconstructed team, either before they began the journey or very soon after, direction. If the Aberdeen-Russell coalition broke down, department of foreign affairs. In fact he looked in another had stood at the antipodes to one another in the momentous honourable ground that for many years he and Aberdeen Lord Palmerston refused to join the coalition, on the had upon us the gloss of freshness. Peelites had been for six and a half years out of office, and CHYMCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER 17T his mind and joined. In the end Lord Palmerston changed stiffly and jealously. Molesworth. In their newspaper the radicals wrote rather representative of the radicals in the cabinet was Sir William day has not come yet,' Bright said to Graham, and the understood that they were not candidates for office. Our a space the supreme ruler. Cobden and Bright let it be himself, and to the nation of which he one day became for that moment might have made, both to the career of Disraeli session by Lord Palmerston of this extraordinary genius at but be tempted to muse upon the difference that the superbrought the horse upon its knees. Speculative minds cannot as 'looming in the future,' and then like a bad jockey had alevram besimorq bad odw nam edt to Asia ed ot betroqer stituencies and many conservative boroughs were truly principles and then to lose their places. The county con-Mr. Disraeli, who had caused them first to throw over their tales of the anger and disgust of the Derbyites against tories he was on excellent terms. Pall Mall was alive with alliance of that eminent pair with Lord John. With the wen eat the hearpointed at the new missing hear at the new the amendment brought to him by Gladstone and Herbert something of this kind in view when he consented to move that should include the Peelites. He was believed to have with Palmerston leading in the Commons a centre party trying to press Graham into that service.' The next day it budget, so he ought to make a new one." However we are At headquarters I understand they say, "Mr. G. destroyed the filled. Mr. Gladstone in his daily letter to Hawarden writes:-It was three days before the post of the exchequer was one of my keenest anxieties not to do dishonour to his memory, or injustice to the patriotic policy with which his name is for ever associated.'

handled, and they now welcomed the appearance of a parliament and a strong nation like to see public difficulties This is the intrepid way in which a strong courage. masculine invocation of their intellectual and political of a great minister addressing a governing assembly—a expanstive; the moral appeal was in the only tone worthy The arguments throughout were close, persuasive, extinction of the slave trade in Africa, was exalted and connection between the repeal of the soap-tax and the Mr. Pitt and the great war, down to the unsuspected and the opening of each in the long series of topics, from speech was saturated with fact; the horizons were large; than he had displayed in irresponsible criticism. inposing resources in the task of responsible construction predecessor, and presented a command of even more aid ot beilqqa yltandqamirt bad ed tadt teet edt tem could be in exposure and assault. He now triumphantly raeli's budget to pieces, he had proved how terrifying he in the previous December, when he had torn Mr. Disthe budget of Sir Charles Wood. On the memorable night occasions exhibited the highest competency as a critic of tive purpose, and a powerful will. In 1851, he had on two showed that he had precise perception, positive and construca single hour after the fireworks have ceased to blaze. rhetorician's glitter commands the House of Commons for he was the possessor of qualities without which no amount of forcible. He now showed that besides and apart from all this, that were in a high degree interesting, ingenious, attractive, Mr. Gladstone had made many speeches governments, 2 great political necessities and fit to lead parties and direct itself, has given the country assurance of a man equal to and what is of far greater consequence than the measure speech 'has raised Gladstone to a great political elevation, Greville makes a true point when he says that the budget

1 Cavour, as Costi's letters show, stone's budget speech. 2 Greville, Third Series, i. p. 59.

67t

by reconciling differences and removing misunderstandings nations of Europe, was to act the part of a moderator, and position which we desired to see England occupy among the cate of moderation and peaces; and to Guizot, that 'the occupy her true position in Europe as the constant advo-To the King of the Belgians, Aberdeen wrote: 'England will meantime the public had regarded it with singular favour. which the success must be considered doubtful, but in the friend as 'a great experiment, hitherto unattempted, and of others. The head of the new government described it to a honest and direct, and who will not brook insincerity in and they have a perfect gentleman at their head, who is ways among them; but on the whole they are gentlemen, good driving. There are some odd tempers and queer Graham describes them as a powerful team that would need each other, one of them said. 'when we first meet in cabinet.' countless internal hazards. 'We shall all look strangely at Peelites, six whigs, and a radical, was evidently open to tional airs were still. But a cabinet finally composed of six to the harmless department of home affairs. The interna-The general course seemed smooth. Palmerston had gone Commons in the full constitutional sense.' cannot be said to possess the confidence of the House of most of thom ready to go all lengths. Such a government tions; with an opposition of 290 (Derbyites and brigaders), A liable on occasions, which frequently arise, to heavy deduc- favourable, that we have a government with 310 supporters, c

I have seen no more concise analysis of the early position of the coalition government than that by one of the ablest and most experienced members of the whig party, not himself a candidate for office:—

to preserve harmony and peace.

'It is strong,' Sir Francis Baring wrote to his son, 'in personal talent; none that I can remember stronger, though the head of the government is untried. It is strong in one point of view: as to public feeling. The country, I believe, wanted a moderate liberal government, and a fusion of liberal conservatives and moderate liberals. It is weak in the feelings of the component income-tax. with 'a dissolving view of the decline and fall' of the hated assessed taxes, and so forth,—the whole performance ending for five hundred; an easy saving of ten pounds a year in the bood a couple of pounds for the man who insured his life year in an ordinary household; a fall in the washing bill; a their gains:—a remission on tea, good for twenty shillings a the House of Commons. Meanwhile the public counted up and dexterity could have carried proposals so evil through that nothing short of the chancellor's extraordinary skill stone had ventured where Pitt had failed. He admitted Pitt rose from his ashes with double lustre, for Mr. Glad-Derby invoked him as a phænix chancellor, in whom Mr. harvest that death would pour into his treasury. Lord vas'a vulture soaring over society, waiting for the rich detestable, and odious measures ever proposed. Its author

3 E

The financial proceedings of this year included a proposal for the redemption of South Sea stock and an attempted operation on the national debt, by the creation of new stocks bearing a lower rate of interest, two options of conversion being given to the holders of old stock. The idea of the creation of a two-and-half-per-cent stock, said idea of the creation of a two-and-half-per-cent stock, said Mr. Gladstone in later years, though in those days novel, was very favourably received.²

I produced my plan. Disraeli offered it a malignant opposition. He made a demand for time; the one demand that ought not to have been made. In proposals of this kind, it is allowed to be altogether improper. In 1844 Mr. Goulburn was permitted, I think, to carry through with great expedition his plan for a large reduction of interest. When Mr. Goschen produced for a large reduction of interest, when Mr. Goschen produced for a large reduction of interest, important measure, we, the his still larger and much more important measure, we, the

I look back with the greater pleasure. The memory of the Succession Duty bill is to me something like what Inkermann may be to a private of the Guards: you were the sergeant from whom I got my drill and whose hand and a soire earlied me through.

and voice carried me through.' ² The city articles of the time justify this statement. I Mr. Gladstone received valuable sid from Bethell, the solicitor-general. On leaving office in 1855 he wrote to Bethell:—' After having had to try your patience more than once in circumstances of real difficulty, I have tound your kindness inexhaustible, and your sid invaluable, so that I really can ill tell on which of the two either case no fit person to dispense the church patronage of Socinian, sometimes as editor of the atheist Hobbes, but in worse still, of Molesworth, sometimes denounced as a narian, the erastian, the appropriationist, the despoiler; and and partner in council of Lord John Russell, the latitudiand flagrant fact that he would henceforth be the intimate could not shake it—all these were vain in face of the staring assurances of his own fidelity; that his assumption of office past history dispensed with the necessity of producing other Lord Aberdeen's hands as in Lord Derby's; that his own protestations that church patronage would be as safe in university of Oxford, or as a public man.' Mr. Gladstone's I can place no confidence in you as representative of the to you, as one of your constituents, that from this time to many others whom I respect and love. I have to state and must be little less so, I cannot doubt, to yourself and 'where every word I write is so bitterly distressing to me, of Taunton. 'I wish to use few words,' Denison wrote, of the exchequer from his friend, the militant archdeacon O OPPOSITION AT OXFORD IST either case no fit person to dispense the church patronage of the duchy of Lancaster. Lonly a degree less shocking was the thought of the power of filling bishoprics and deaneries by a prime minister himself a presbyterian. No guarantee that the member for Oxford might have taken against just claims, was worth a feather when weighed against the mere act of a coalition so deadly as this. Have sain awkward fact for Mr. Gladstone's canvassers It was an awkward fact for Mr. Gladstone's canvassers of a concert or combination between the Peelites and other of a concert or combination between the Peelites and other supporters. 'No doubt,' he said,' they will remember that I svowed before and during the last election a wish to find the policy and measures of the government such as would justify me in giving them my support. That wish I sincerely entertained. But the main question was whether the concert or combination alleged to have taken place for the purpose of ejecting Lord Derby's government from office was fact or fiction. I have not the slightest hesitation in was fact or fiction. I have not the slightest hesitation in political parties. Mr. Gladstone himself saw no reason why this should cause much soreness among his Oxford

but obliged me to sail always very near the wind, and this induced a habit of more daring navigation than I could now altogether approve. Nor will I excuse myself, by saying that others were deceived like me, for none of them were in a condition to have precisely my responsibility.

Another note contributes a further point of explanation:
'I have always imagined that this fault was due to my experience in the affairs of the Hawarden and Oak Farm estates, where it was an incessant course of sailing near the wind, and there was really no other hope.

struggle. Unluckily, in demonstrating the perils of meddefensible foundation while it lasted, bore us through the that enveloped the income-tax, and setting it upon a was this finance, that by clinching the open questions more than sixteen per cent than it had been in 1853. It work begun by Peel, made the country in 1859 richer by strain of the war. It was this finance that, continuing the the finance of 1853, is its effect in enabling us to meet the Crimean war. What is more to the point in estimating could not be removed was the heavy charge created by the everybody knows, the effective reason why the income-tax only moderately conclusive. I need not discuss it, for as Aladstone when the time came propounded an explanation, half a million.1 Of the disappointment in his own case, Mr. of nearly two and a quarter millions, instead of a surplus of memorable budget of 1842, which landed him in a deficiency miscalculation as to the income-tax, had marked Peel's disappointment, we must recollect, owing mainly to a singular produced only six hundred thousand. A similar but greater appointment, and instead of producing two million pounds, lations of 1853? The succession duty proved a woeful diswould be asked the question: what had become of the calcumet his semi-ironic expression of an expectation that he the exchequer, again produced a budget. Semi-ironic cheers Seven years later Mr. Gladstone, once more chancellor of

Peel was right about the yield of the within the year. income-taz, and only overlooked the Long afterwards, when the alleged heretic was dead, if he were indicted for murder.1 tinguished powers of the person charged in this particular case, as in a trial of this kind, irrespective of the high character and disdogma; and above all I hold that there should be as unuch rigour the obtrusion of any private or local opinion into the region of jealous of its infraction in any particular, I am not less jealous of induce me to surrender the smallest fraction of it; but while dogmatic profession of the church—on the contrary, nothing would and much was I grieved at it. I am not inclined to abate the supported the amendment, but the undority went the other way, of the dismissal. Sir J. Patteson, Sir B. Brodie, and Mr. Green some formula concording by the avert the scanna of the second and selected said, that his friends might be able in the meantime to arrange also cherished the hope, founded on certain parts of what he has opinions were in real contrariety to some article of the faith. if at all, only after using greater pains to ascortain that his he was disnissed, and should show that they had disnissed him, let the accused person know in the most distinct terms for what the conneil, acting perforce in a judicial capacity, that they should pendently of all this I thought that even decoucy demanded of the latitude allowed by the church in this matter. And indemore otherwise competent to judge whether it is within or beyond sufficiently certain what his view as a whole may be, even if I a condition to proceed with a definite indement. I do not feel eonsideration alone seemed to me to show that they were not in quite certain the conneil had not been able, to, reconcile. parts of what Manrice has written things that I cannot, and I am to communicate with the council. For myself I find in different make a report upon them, and that the bishop should be requested creeds and the formularies of the church of England, and should of Mr. Maurice were conformable to ov at variance with the three

Long ricerwards, when the riegod neteric was dead, Mr. Gladstone wrote of him to Mr. Macmillan (April 11, 1884): 'Maurice is indeed a spiritual splendour, to borrow the phrase of Dante about St. Dominic. His intellectual constitution had long been, and still is, to me a good deal

¹ See Life of Maurice, ii. p. 195; Life also Mr. Gladstone's letter to Bishop of Wilberforce, ii. pp. 208-218. See Hampden, 1856, above p. 168.

CHYPTER III

THE CRIMEAN WAR

(†981-8981)

HE [Burke] maintained that the attempt to bring the Turkish empire into the consideration of the balance of power in Europe was extremely new, and contrary to all former political systems. He pointed out in strong terms the danger and impolity of our espousing the Ottoman cause.—Burke (1791).

all the clangour of a world in arms. trumpets and drums, the heavy rumbling of the cannon, and might have heard, not in far distance but close at hand, the the hopeful words were falling from the speaker's lips, he time lessen the frequency of strife and war. Yet even while men all so fervently desire, and which must in the fulness of social and moral union of the nations of the earth which of increased intercourse and augmented wealth, that closer free trade which, in the near future, would bring, in the train humble but laborious part in realising those principles of had sown; that he had enjoyed the privilege of taking a that in commercial legislation ne had reaped where others the Queen. At Inverness the same evening, he told them statesmen who occupied the chief places in the counsels of life, and as being almost the youngest of those veteran self as having completed the twenty-first year of his political with the freedom of that ancient burgh. He spoke of himtravel south. At Dingwall they presented him (Sept. 27) days. It was the end of September before he was able to Vann vol and there he was laid up with illness for many AFTER the session Mr. Gladstone had gone on a visit to

11

One of the central and perennial interests of Mr. Gladstone's life was that shifting, intractable, and interwoven

CHAPTER II

THE TRIUMPH OF 1853

(*$9*87)

class against another.—Glabstone (1853). direct taxation, we have not been guided by any desire to set one labouring community by further extending their relief from inwith property-while we have sought to do justice to the great we have sought to do justice to intelligence and skill as compared ovarda closing up many vexed financial questions. . . . While expedients. . . . We have proposed plans which will go some way We have not attempted to counteract them by narrow or flimsy WE have not sought to evade the difficulties of our position. . . .

spiritual tragedies of that day of heroic idealists. mystic, fallen angel of his church, most moving of all the with 'dips into Lamennais—the bold and passionate French tion, consolidated annuities, and public accounts, alternating find or manufacture, with treasury papers, books on taxaevenings, and filled up whatever spare moments he could a speech in the hall at Balliol; passed busy days and brisk paid many calls, dined at Oriel, had a luncheon and made extremely piercing and shrewd, only it never came. He that he always looked as if on the point of saying something Christ Church with Dr. Jacobson, of whom it was observed self and to the country, with what he described as a short $\overline{\mathbb{A}}$ but active and pleasant visit to Oxford. He stayed at MR. GLADSTONE began this year, so important both to him- C his predecessor, on the valuation of the furniture in before him. He had a correspondence with Mr. Disraeli, twenty of the forty-one years of the public life that lay not a street, where he was destined to pass some two and of the exchequer in that best known of all streets which is On February 3 he moved into the house of the chancellor end of 1782 when Catherine by a sort of royal syllogism, as cabinet of the hour did not think it necessary to lend cabinet of the hour did not think it necessary to lend cabinet of the hour did not think it necessary to lend of the hour did not think it necessary to lend combination to resist. Then came Pitt. The statesman whose qualities of greatness so profoundly impressed his contemporaries has usually been praised as a minister denoted to peace, and only driven by the French Revolution into the long war. Happily the alarms of the Baltic trade, and the vigorous reasoning of Fox, produced such an effect upon the vigorous reasoning of Fox, produced such an effect upon opinion, that Pitt was driven, on peril of the overthrow of his government, to find the best expedient he could to bring the business to an end without extremities. In 1853 the country was less fortunate than it had been in 1791.

be made to his high protective claims. This issue was no to hold them in pledge until the required concession should and the Czar marched troops into the Danubian provinces, with encouragement from the British ambassador, rejected, of the Sultan's Christian subjects. This claim the Sultan, the Czar for recognition by treaty of his rights as protector was adjusted, but was immediately followed by a claim from heterogeneous races. The dispute about the holy places between powerful churches, between great states, between star was a trivial symbol of the vast rivalry of centuries quarrel between two packs of monks about a key and a silver crisis that was at first of no extraordinary pattern. The of their respective patrons, Russia and France, produced a holy places at Jerusalem, followed by the diplomatic rivalries between Greek and Latin religions as to the custody of the flying to the heart, and a catastrophe was sure. A dispute a vital part. In 1852 the Eastern question showed signs of toot, now in the hand; but all is safe if only it does not fly to Eastern question to the gout; now its attack is in the A Russian diplomatist made a homely comparison of the country was less fortunate than it had been in 1791.

good cause for a general conflagration. Unfortunately many combustibles happened to lie about the world at that time, and craft, misunderstanding, dupery, auto-perplexity and dismay. Poel recovered a financial equili- of brium and restored public confidence, but Peel was gone. The whigs who followed him after 1846 had once more abouted under an unlucky star in this vital sphere of national affairs. They performed the unexampled feat of uniquing forward four budgets in a single year, the first of tringing forward four budgets in a single year, the first of them introduced by Lord John Russell himself as prime minister. By 1851 floundering had reached a climax. Finance had thus discredited one historical party; it had broken up the other. It was finance that everthrew weak barrassment, adjournment after adjournment of a decision of civilised society itself. Party distraction, ministerial emtion, but, as Mr. Gladstone said, almost to the first principles descending not only to the elementary principles of taxathe liberal party. Discussions arose all through this period, temporary incomes, prevailed in the great mass, especially of impose the tax at one and the same rate upon permanent and frame a report. The belief that it was essentially unjust to of its readjustment and amendment. They could not even consider all the questions connected with the possibility the income-tax, and an important committee sat in 1851 to of the House of Commons was leaded with motions about reformers were powerless to fill the void. The order-book ances, were all to vanish, but even the most zealous advortisements, the male-tax, the stamp on marine insurplace. The window duty, the paper duty, the tax on the principles of the direct taxes that were to take their swept away, and yet no two men appeared to agree upon object of assault. Every indirect tax was to be reduced or fiscal confusion. Every source of public income was the do elorio end etaliquico et bomeos sect de end en applica powers of a different order. The defeat of Mr. Distaeli's a vast diversified society like the United Kingdom demands this he had; to grasp the complex material interests of and the patience of a great partisan chief is one gift, and Peel, tried his own hand in 1852. To have the genius Mr. Distracli, the most unsparing of all the assailants of governments and hindered the possibility of a strong one.

upon fundamental maxims of national taxation—such was Turk.

Ottoman empire may be transformed into independent states, which for us will only become either burdensome clients or hostile neighbours. If this forecast was right, then to resist Russia was at once to prevent her from embarrassing and weakening herself, and to lock up the Christians in their cruel prison-house for a quarter of a century longer. If sagacious calculation in such a vein as this were, the mainspring of the world, history would be stripped of many a crimson page. But far-sighted calculation can no longer be ascribed to the actors in this tragedy tion can no longer be ascribed to the actors in this tragedy of errors—to Nicholas or Napoleon, to Aberdeen or Palmer-ston, or to any other of them excepting Cavour and the ston, or to any other of them excepting Cavour and the

In England both people and ministers have been wont to change their minds upon the Eastern question. In the war change their minds upon the Eastern question. In the war of the struggle for Greek independence, Russia as Greek champion against the Turk had the English populace on her side; Palmerston was warmly with her, regarding even her side; Palmerston was warmly with indifference; and Aberdeen was reproached as a Turkish sympathiser. Now we ardent Turks, and Aberdeen falling into disgrace (unjustly shall see the parts inverted,—England and Palmerston ardent Turks, and Aberdeen falling into disgrace (unjustly enough) as Russian. Before we have done with Mr. Gladenough) as Russian. Before we have done with Mr. Gladenough) as Russian. Before we have done with Mr. Gladenough) as Russian. Before we have done with Mr. Gladenough) as Russian. Before we have done with Mr. Gladenough) as Russian.

III

When Kinglake's first two volumes of his history of the Crimean war appeared (1863), Mr. Gladstone wrote to a friend (May 14): 'Kinglake is fit to be a brilliant popular author, but quite unfit to be a historian. His book is too bad to live, and too good to die. As to the matter most directly within my cognisance, he is not only not too true, but so entirely void of resemblance to the truth, that one but so entirely void of resemblance to the truth, that one asks what was really the original of his picture.' A little touches very nearly, and not agreeably or justly, the character of Lord Aberdeen and his government. I am afraid Newcastle blubbed on what

" To Mrs. Gladstone, Jan. 3, 1863:—
'In the evenings I have leisure.
Much of it I have been spending in reading Kinglake's book, which city and to call upon Mr. Samuel Gurney, to whom experience c interest about my preparations for my budget; and he said, 'One interest about my preparations for my budget; and he said, 'One interest about my preparations for my budget; and he said, 'One sting I will venture to urge, whatever your plan is,—let it be simple.' I was a man much disposed to defer to authority, and I attached weight to this advice. But as I went further and further into my subject, I became more and more convinced that, as an honest steward, I had no option but to propose the renewal of the tax in its uniform shape. I constructed much elaborate argument in support of my proposition, which I knew it would be difficult to answer. But I also knew that no amount of unassisted argument would suffice to overcome the obstacles in my way, and that this could only be done by large compensations in my accompanying propositions. So I was led legitimately on, and on, until I had framed the most complicated scheme ever submitted to parliament.

almost to completion. Nearly one hundred and forty duties begun by Peel eleven years before, was carried forward lines. The simplification of the tariff of duties of customs, the fabric was planned on strong foundations and admirable of our expenditure would baffle my reckonings.' Meanwhile, pointed out explicitly that a great disturbance and increase views, 'I ought, no doubt,' he said afterwards, 'to have so Mr. Gladstone abandoned hand-to-mouth, and took long his establishment on the basis of one year or two years only, that period. Just as no provident man in private life settles expenditure would remain tolerably steady for the whole of roughly for a long period of seven years, and assuming that of the unusual course of estimating the national income his thirteen budgets. Its initial boldness lay in the adoption far-reaching and comprehensive character of the earliest of laborious months of 1853, and to mark the extraordinarily wrought out in Mr. Gladstone's mind during the first three biography to give an outline of the plan that was gradually tax, it is a dead one. It is as much as is consonant to Certainly if anything can be more odious than a living human nature in the simple reproduction of defunct budgets. Truly has it been said that there is something repulsive to Four days later (October 12) the minister repeated, that while elements of wide difference existed, still the appearance of that day was more favourable and tended to inutual agreement. At this cabinet Mr. Gladstone was not present, having gone on an expedition to Manchester, the first of the many triumphal visits of his life to the great industrial centres of the nation. 'Nothing,' he wrote to Lord Aberdeen, 'could have gone off' better. Yesterday (October 11), I had to make a visit to the Exchange, which was crammed and most cordial. This morning we had first the "inauguration" of the Peel statue, in the presence of an enormous audience-misnamed so, inasmuch as but a portion of them could hear; and then a meeting in the Town Hall, where there were addresses and speeches made, to which I had to reply. I found the feeling of the assemblage so friendly that I said more on the war question than I had intended, but I sincerely hope I did not transgress the limits you would think it wise for me to observe. The existence of a peace and a war party was evident, from alternate manifestations, but I think the former feeling was decidedly the stronger, and at any rate I should say without the smallest doubt that the feeling of the whole meeting as a mass was unequivocally favourable to the course that the government have pursued.'

'Your Manchester speech,' Lord Aberdeen wrote to him in reply, 'has produced a great and, I hope, a very beneficial effect upon the public mind, and it has much promoted the cause of peace.' This result was extremely doubtful. The language of the Manchester speech is cloudy, but what it comes to is this. It recognises the duty of maintaining the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire. Independence, however, in this case, says Mr. Gladstone, designates a sovereignty full of anomaly, of misery, of difficulty, and it has been subject every few years since we were born to European discussion and interference; we cannot forget the political solecism of Mahometans exercising despotic rule over twelve millions of our fellow Christians; into the questions growing out of this political solecism we are not now entering; what we see to-day is something different;

however, to meet a common and a just objection, that under this impost intelligence, enterprise, and skill paid too much and property paid too little, he resolved upon a bold step. E. He proposed that the legacy duty, hitherto confined to extended to real property, and to both descriptions of property passing by settlement, whether real or personal. In a word, the legacy duty was to extend to all successions whatever. This was the proposal that in many senses cut deepest. It was the first rudimentary breach in the rambarts of the territorial system, unless, indeed, we count as first the abolition of the corn law.¹ Mr. Chadstone eagerly disclaimed any intention of accelerating by the pressure of the changes in the tenure of landed property, and the letters which the reader has already seen (pp. 345-9) and the letters which the reader has already seen (pp. 345-9) personal property passing on death, either by will or by inheritance and not by settlement, should henceforth be

fiscal enactment changes in the tenure of landed property, and the letters which the reader has already seen (pp. 345-9) show the high social value that he invariably set upon the maintenance of the old landed order. The succession duty, as we shall find, for the time disappointed his expectations, for he counted on two millions, and in fact it yielded little more than half of one. But it secured for its author the lasting resentment of a powerful class.

not that toil is never slavish when illuminated by a strenuous purpose. When by and by the result had made him the hero of a glorious hour, he wrote to Lord Aberdeen (April 19): 'I had the deepest anxiety with regard to you, as our chief, lest by faults of my own I should aggravate the cares and difficulties into which I had at least helped to bring you; and the novelty of our political relations with many of our colleagues, together with the fact that I had been of our colleagues, together with the fact that I had been myself slow, and even reluctant, to the formation of a new connection, filled me with an almost feverish desire to do no injustice to that connection now that it was formed; and to injustice to that connection now that it was formed; and to

Such was the scheme that Mr. Gladstone now worked out in many weeks of toil that would have been slavish, were it there would be no want of cordiality and zeal in the discharge simple may place first the Act of 1833 making real estate liable for simple contract debts.

redeem the pledge you generously gave on my behalf, that

IV

On November 4, Clarendon wrote to Lord Aberdeen that they were now in an anomalous and painful position, and he had arrived at the conviction that it might have been avoided by firm language and a more decided course five months ago. 'Russia would then, as she is now, have been ready to come to terms, and we should have exercised a control over the Turks that is now not to be obtained.' Nobody, I suppose, doubts to-day that if firmer language had been used in June to Sultan and Czar alike, the catastrophe of war would probably have been avoided, as Lord Clarendon here remorsefully reflects. However that may have been, this pregnant and ominous avowal disclosed the truth that the British cabinet were no longer their own masters; that they had in a great degree, even at this early time, lost all that freedom of action which they constantly proclaimed it the rule of their policy to maintain, and which for a few months longer some of them at least strove very hard but all in vain to recover.

The Turks were driving at war whilst we were labouring for peace, and both by diplomatic action and by sending the fleet to protect Turkish territory against Russian attack, we had become auxiliaries and turned the weaker of the two contending powers into the stronger. A few months afterwards Mr. Gladstone found a classic parallel for the 'When Aeneas escaped from the flames Turkish alliance. of Troy he had an ally. That ally was his father Anchises, and the part which Aeneas performed in the alliance was to carry his ally upon his back.' But the discovery came too late, nor was the Turk the only ally. Against the remonstrances of our ambassador the Sultan declared war upon Russia, and proceeded to acts of war, well knowing that England and France in what they believed to be interests of their own would see him through it. If the Sultan and his ulemas and his pashas were one intractable factor, the French Emperor was another. 'We have just as much to apprehend, Graham wrote (Oct. 27), from the active intervention of our ally as from the open hostility of our exposition was 'as ingenious,' Lord Aberdeen told Prince Albert, 'as clear, and for the most part as convincing, as anything I have ever heard.' 'Gladstone,' said Lord Aberdeen later (1856)' does not weigh well against one another different arguments, each of which has a real foundation. But he is unrivalled in his power of proving that a specious argument has no real foundation. On the Succession bill the whole cabinet was against him. He delivered to us much the same speech as he made in the House of Commons. At its close we were all convinced.' Differences that might easily become serious speedily

You must take care your proposals are not unpopular ones.' strongly adhered to his whole plan. Lord Aberdeen said, this reservation he should follow their judgment, but he to; he should regard it as a high political offence. With basis of the income-tax: that he could not be a party decide on, except one thing, namely, the breaking up of the that he was willing to propose whatever the cabinet might Irish landlord) agreed with him. Mr. Gladstone told them only take away half the soap-tax. Lord Lansdowne (a great twofold extension of the income-tax, and thought they should did not see an alternative. Araham then fell in, disliked the servatives. Lord John Russell perceived difficulties, but he individually had great objection, would estrange many conradicals, while the succession duty, to which Palmerston was on the watch, the Irish would join him, so would the many points of attack, and it could never be carried: Disraeli perfectly just, and admirably put together, only it opened too would not touch her.2 Palmerston thought it a great plan, whereas much of the relief, such as soap and assessed taxes, would lay more than half a million of new taxation, lowering of the exemption line. On Ireland the plan of the extension of income-tax to Ireland, and of the Charles Wood, in cabinet (April 11), strongly disapproved the undertaking as not only difficult but perilous. Sir them, and for some days the prime minister regarded to earth to owt to abnim edt ni aliateb noqu eaora government had an agent who while seeming to follow C. instructions in the narrow letter baffled them in their spirit. In the autumn of 1853 Lord Aberdeen wrote to Graham, 'I fear I must renounce the sanguine view I have hitherto taken of the Eastern question; for nothing can be more alarming than the present prospect. I thought that we should have been able to conquer Stratford, but I begin to fear that the reverse will be the case, and that he will succeed in defeating us. Although at our wit's end, Clarendon and I are still labouring in the cause of peace; but really to contend at once with the pride of the Emperor, the fanaticism of the Turks, and the dishonesty of Stratford is almost a hopeless attempt.'1 This description, when he saw it nearly forty years later, seems to have struck Mr. Gladstone as harsh. Though he agreed that the passage could hardly be omitted, he confessed his surprise that Lord Aberdeen should have applied the word dishonesty to Lord Stratford. He suggested the addition of a note that should recognise the general character of Lord Stratford, and should point out that prejudice and passion, by their blinding powers, often produce in the mind effects like those proper to dishonesty.2 Perhaps we may find this a hard saying. Doubtless when he comes to praise and blame, the political historian must make due allowance for his actors;. and charity is the grandest of illuminants. Still hard + ., + stands first, and amiable analysis of the psychc' diplomatic agent who lets loose a flood of mischi, kind is by no means what interests us most abc

Why not call things by their right names?³
In his private letters (November) Stratford bc'' hibited his desire for war, and declared that 'the war, successful; must be a very comprehensive war on the par England and France.' Well might the Queen say to the prim minister that it had become a serious question whether they were justified in allowing Lord Stratford any longer to remain in a situation that enabled him to frustrate all the efforts of his government for peace. Yet here, as many

¹ Stanmore, Earl of Aberdeen, pp. ² To Sir A. Gordon, Aug. 31, 1892. ³ See Stanmore, p. 253.

They agreed, however, in Graham's language, that is would of never do to play their trump card until the state of the game actually required it. Lord John confessed that he was no judge of figures,—somewhat of a weakness in a critic of a budget,—and Graham comforted him by the reply of a budget,—and Graham comforted him by the reply that he was at any rate the best judge living of House of Commons tactics.

The position of the government in the House of Commons was notoriously weak. The majority that had brought them into existence was excessively narrow. It had been a session should happen to draw the tories, the Irish, and the radicals into one lobby, ministers would find themselves in a minority. Small defeats occurred. The budget was only four days off. Mr. Gladstone enters in his diary! Spoke against Gibson; beaten by 200—169. Our third time, this week. Very stiff work this. Ellice said discolution would be the end of it; we agreed in the House to a cabinet to-morrow. Herbert and Cardwell; to whom I spoke, inclined to dissolve.' Mext day (April 15), the cabinet met in a flutter, for the same tactics might well be repeated, met in a flutter, for the same tactics might well be repeated, whenever Mr. Disraeli should think the chances good.

measure was too sharp upon Ireland. The idea was the and Palmerston joined the chorus of those who said the must have a budget on Monday, but Clarendon, Herbert. In the end we went back to the position that we of the cabinet generally declared themselves against it. appear to lean to dissolution, and the older members most unusual and hazardous operation. But he did not tion to enable them to surmount the difficulties of a the necessity of a greater party sympathy and connection of parliament: keen opposition; lukewarm support; contraction. Graham took the same view of the disposilaitreq a nadt elaan eest as tegbud elodw edt noqu dool it might assume; but even with such perils he should whether the budget could live in that House, whatever form that they must take in a reef or two. Mr. Gladstone doubted exhibited in the tone of the debate, and hinted the opinion Lord John adverted to the hostility of the radicals as government had an agent who while seeming to follow coinstructions in the narrow letter bafiled them in their spirit. In the antumn of 1853 Lord Aberdeen wrote to Graham, 'I fear I must renounce the sanguine view I have hitherto taken of the Eastern question: for nothing can be more alarming than the present prospect. I thought that we should have been able to conquer Stratford, but I begin to fear that the reverse will be the case, and that he will succeed in defeating us. Although at our wit's end, Clarendon and I are still labouring in the cause of peace; but really to contend at once with the pride of the Emperor, the fanaticism of the Turks, and the dishonesty of Stratford is almost a hopeless attempt.' This description, when he saw it nearly forty years later, seems to have struck Mr. Gladstone as harsh. Though he agreed that the passage could hardly be omitted, he confessed his surprise that Lord Aberdeen should have applied the word dishonesty to Lord Stratford. He suggested the addition of a note that should recognise the general character of Lord Stratford, and should point out that prejudice and passion, by their blinding powers, often produce in the mind effects like those proper to dishonesty.2 Perhaps we may find this a hard saying. Doubtless when he comes to praise and blame, the political historian must make due allowance for his actors; and charity is the grandest of illuminants. Still hard truth stands first, and amiable analysis of the psychology of a diplomatic agent who lets loose a flood of mischief on mankind is by no means what interests us most about him.

Why not call things by their right names?"

In his private letters (November) Stratford boldly exhibited his desire for war, and declared that 'the war, to be successful; must be a very comprehensive war on the part of England and France.' Well might the Queen say to the prime minister that it had become a serious question whether they were justified in allowing Lord Stratford any longer to remain in a situation that enabled him to frustrate all the efforts of his government for peace. Yet here, as many have.' such approbation being the best reward a public man can sent to the Queen, feeling sure that it will give you pleasure, sending for your perusal the report which Lord John Russell will not allow you to be dangerously elated, I cannot help been well received. Trusting that your Christian humility in the House. I hear from all sides that the budget has perusal of it and should certainly have cheered had I a seat of yesterday. I have just completed a close and careful order to congratulate you on the success of your speech to Mr. Gladstone: 'I cannot resist writing you a line in relief to the Queen.' Prince Albert used the same language have every reason to be sanguine now, which is a great great success of Mr. Gladstone's speech last night. . . . We a line to Lord Aberdeen to say how delighted she is at the heard from Windsor the next day: 'The Queen must write could not have been more persuasive.' Lord Aberdeen days of his glory, might have been more imposing, but he ever made in the House of Commons. 'Mr. Pitt, in the John told the Queen the speech was one of the ablest reception of the budget had been most favourable.' Lord of my great teacher and master in public affairs, so it was by the thought of treading, however unequally, in the steps and therefore I will not scruple to say that as I was inspired recollections, he replied, with which you must have written, Gladstone than a letter from Lady Peel, 'I know the thing else. No testimony was more agreeable to Mr. administration which it could not, have derived from anythat Gladstone had given a strength and lustre to the will be your work.' To Madame de Lieven Aberdeen said if the existence of my government shall be prolonged, it on your account than on my own, although most assuredly, you. You will believe how much more sincerely I rejoice reasonable that I should have a word of congratulation for in the House of Commons last night, it seems only gratulating me on the wonderful impression produced Gladstone himself (April 19): 'While everybody is conits effect was decisive. The prime minister wrote to Mr. On the cardinal question of the fortunes of the ministry had no secure alliance with Prussia; on the contrary, her German rival opposed her on this question, and was incessantly canvassing the smaller states against her in respect to it. The French Emperor was said to be revolving a plan for bribing Austria out of Northern Italy by the gift of Moldavia and Wallachia. All was intricate and tortuous. The view in Downing Street soon expanded to this, that it would be a shame to England and to France unless the Czar were made not only to abandon his demands, and to evacuate the Principalities, but also to renounce some of the stipulations in former treaties on which his present arrogant pretensions had been formed. In the future, the guarantees for the Christian races should be sought in a treaty not between Sultan and Czar, but between the Sultan and the five Powers.

¹ Stanmore, Earl of Aberdeen, pp. ² To Sir A. Gordon, Aug. 31, 1892. 270-1. ³ See Stanmore, p. 253.

CHAP.

Ær. 44.

Men in the cabinet and men out of it, some with ardour, others with acquiescence, approved of war for different reasons, interchangeable in controversial value and cumulative in effect. Some believed, and more pretended to believe, that Turkey abounded in the elements and energies of self-reform, and insisted that she should have the chance. Others were moved by vague general sympathy with a weak power assailed by a strong one, and that one, moreover, the same tyrannous strength that held an iron heel on the neck of prostrate Poland; that only a few years before had despatched her legions to help Austria against the rising for freedom and national right in Hungary; that urged intolerable demands upon the Sultan for the surrender of the Hungarian refugees. Others again counted the power of Russia already exorbitant, and saw in its extension peril to Europe, and mischief to the interests of England. Russia on the Danube, they said, means Russia on the Indus. Russia at Constantinople would mean a complete revolution in the balance of power in the Mediterranean, and to an alarmed vision, a Russia that had only crossed the Pruth was as menacing as if her Cossacks were already encamped in permanence upon the shores of the Bosphorus.

Along with the anxieties of the Eastern question, ministers were divided upon the subject of parliamentary reform.

opinion which had seemed too powerful for any minister turned, at least for several years, a current of popular changed the convictions of a large part of the nation, and non tariersal applause from his audience at the time, but later chancellor of the exchequer, this speech not only have had time to bring forth their fruits. As was said by a salutary remissions of other burdens now proposed would tion of the tax at the end of a definite period, when the It was these disadvantages that made him plan the extinctrader, upon the precarious earnings of the professional man. holder of idle and secured public funds, upon the industrious ond mogu oter ours out zaivel in laying the same rate upon the that it entailed, the frauds to which it led, the sense in the form. He admitted all the objections to it: the inquisition master example of accurate reasoning thrown into delightful of the principles of an income-tax remains to this day a often almost conversational, but his elaborate examination structure of the tax as it stood. His manner was plain, comprehensive analysis and the boldest vindication of the come to an end in seven years, he yet produced the most It was so here. While proposing that the income-tax should quite as good in its influence and effect as the best of logic. imposts. In polities the spectacle of sheer courage is often and manfully defended the most unpopular of all the public like other people; and who at the same time boldly used not shrink from sconcing the powerful landed phalanx drying up one source of revenue after another; who did stand against heedless men with hearts apparently set on the last half dozen years; who was not afraid to make a Himsy expedients, of which so much had been seen in new minister, who rejected what he called narrow and

The succession duty brought Mr. Gladstone into the first conflict of his life with the House of Lords. That land should be made to pay like other forms of property was a proposition denounced as essentially impracticable, oppressive, unjust, cowardly, and absurd. It was called ex post facto legislation. It was one of the most obnoxious, had no secure alliance with Prussia; on the contrary, CHAP. her German rival opposed her on this question, and was incessantly canvassing the smaller states against her in respect to it. The French Emperor was said to be revolving a plan for bribing Austria out of Northern Italy by the gift of Moldavia and Wallachia. All was intricate and tortuous. The view in Downing Street soon expanded to this, that it would be a shame to England and to France unless the Czar were made not only to abandon his demands, and to evacuate the Principalities, but also to renounce some of the stipulations in former treaties on which his present arrogant pretensions had been formed. In the future, the guarantees for the Christian races should be sought in a treaty not between Sultan and Czar, but between the Sultan and the five Powers.

Men in the cabinet and men out of it, some with ardour, others with acquiescence, approved of war for different reasons, interchangeable in controversial value and cumulative in effect. Some believed, and more pretended to believe, that Turkey abounded in the elements and energies of self-reform, and insisted that she should have the chance. Others were moved by vague general sympathy with a weak power assailed by a strong one, and that one, moreover, the same tyrannous strength that held an iron heel on the neck of prostrate Poland; that only a few years before had despatched her legions to help Austria against the rising for freedom and national right in Hungary; that urged intolerable demands upon the Sultan for the surrender of the Hungarian refugees. Others again counted the power of Russia already exorbitant, and saw in its extension peril to Europe, and mischief to the interests of England. Russia on the Danube, they said, means Russia on the Indus. Russia at Constantinople would mean a complete revolution in the balance of power in the Mediterranean, and to an alarmed vision, a Russia that had only crossed the Pruth was as menacing as if her Cossacks were already encamped in permanence upon the shores of the Bosphorus.

Along with the anxieties of the Eastern question, ministers were divided upon the subject of parliamentary reform.

Ær. 44.

opposition, did our best to expedite the decision. There are no complications requiring time on such an occasion. It is a assistant of aye or no. But when time is allowed the chapter of accidents allows an opponent to hope that a situation known to be unusually happy will deteriorate. Of this contingency Disraeli no question of the substance of the plan, but a moderate change no question of the substance of the plan, but a moderate change in the political barometer, which reduced to two or three millions a subscription which at the right moment would probably have been twenty or thirty.

In a letter to W. R. Farquhar (March 8, 1861) he makes further remarks, which are introspective and autobiographic:—

and trying kind, under circumstances which admitted of no choice all my experience in money affairs had been of a most difficult likewise is this (to go a step further in my confessions) that almost had not perceptibly fallen, yet it was going to fall. The truth ebit edt dguodtla tadt baat; tag tew reten the tide although the tide in the faculty of rapid and comprehensive observation. I failed only time when I have had reason to lament my own deficiency unft for those grave operations. It is far from being the first or alteration of a kind at all serious was enough to make the period were upon the very eve of an altered state of things, and any sufficient quickness in discerning the signs of the times, for we since. Still I think that I committed an error from want of state of things: and the fluctuations then were even greater than some years before 83' were wholly incompatible with a sound I am decidedly of opinion that the rates of premium current for money and security of the market. As respects exchequer bills, as the time that precedes high-water with respect to abundance of effect, if they had been made at a time which I may best describe proposals themselves which might not have taken full and quick interest on the public debt, I think that there was nothing in the related to interest upon exchequer bills and to the reduction of Looking back now upon those of my proceedings in 1853 which

On the decision of Dec. 22, Sir Charles Wood says:-

CHAP. 111. Et. 44.

We had then a long discussion on the question of occupying the Black Sea, as proposed by France, and it seemed to me to be such a tissue of eonfusions that I advocated the simple course of doing Gladstone could not be persuaded to agree to this, in spite of a strong argument of Newcastle's. Gladstone's objection being to our being hampered by any engagement. His scheme was that our occupying the Black Sea was to be made dependent, in the first place, on the Turks having acceded to the Vienna proposals, or at any rate to their agreeing to be bound by any basis of peace on which the English and French governments agreed. Newcastle and I said we thought this would bind us much more to the Turks than if we occupied the Black Sea as part of our own measures, adopted for our own purposes, and without any engagement to the Turks, under which we should be if they accepted our con-Gladstone said he could be no party to unconditional occupation; so it ended in our telling France that we would occupy the Black Sea, that is, prevent the passage of any ships or munitions of war by the Russians, but that we trusted she would join us in enforcing the above condition on the Turks. If they agreed, then we were to occupy the Black Sea; if they did not, we were to reconsider the question, and then determine what to do. Clarendon saw Walewski, who was quite satisfied.

By the middle of February war was certain. Mr. Gladstone wrote an account of a conversation that he had at this time with Lord Aberdeen:—

Feb. 22.—Lord Aberdeen sent for me to-day and informed me that Lord Palmerston had been with him to say that he had made up his mind to vote for putting off (without entering into the question of its merits) the consideration of the Reform bill for the present year. [Conversation on Reform.]

He then asked me whether I did not think that he might himself withdraw from office when we came to the declaration of war. All along he had been acting against his feelings, but still defensively. He did not think that he could regard the offensive in the same light, and was disposed to retire. I said

¹ See Appendix.

, TA

CHY II. dling with the structure of the tax, in showing its power and simplicity, the chancellor was at the same time providing the easiest means, if not also the most direct incentive, to that policy of expenditure—it rose from fifty to seventy millions between 1853 and 1859,—which was one of the most fatal obstacles to the foremost aims of his political life. It was twenty years from now, as my readers will see, before the effort, now foreshadowed, to exclude the income-tax from the ordinary sources of national revenue, reached its dramatic close.

1897. BOOK

in his last interview with the departing ambassador of the Caar, he told him how bitterly he regretted, first, the original despatch of the fleet from Malta to Besika Bay (July, 1853); and second that he had not sent Lord Granville to St. Petersburg immediately on the failure of Menschikoff at Constantinople (May, 1853), in order to carry on personal negotiations with the Emperor.¹

brother Robertson upon it: sid of etoriv enotabald. TM. E. won emat aid to alairomenr brought him so much obloquy then, and stands as one of the month Bright wrote the solid, wise, and noble letter that heart and centre of the war at Sebastopol.2 proceedings—the duty of concentrating our strokes upon the temptations to far more embarrassing and less effective manner in which you urged—when we were amidst many will forgive, the thanks I offered at an earlier period, for the wrote to Lord Palmerston (Oct. 4, 1854), 'which I hope you 'I cannot help repeating to you,' Mr. Gladstone and on the 20th of the month was fought the battle of the Turkish troops disembarked on the shores of the Crimea, war continued. On September 14, English, French, and were evacuated a couple of months later, but the state of of March war was declared. In the event the Principalities France, the Czar kept a haughty silence, and at the end palities was despatched to St. Petersburg by England and An ultimatum demanding the evacuation of the Princi-

Mov. 7, 1854.—I thought Bright's letter both an able and a manly one, and though I cannot go his lengths, I respect and sympathise with the spirit in which it originated. I think he should draw a distinction between petty meddlings of our own, or interferences for selfish purposes, and an operation like this which really is in support of the public law of flurope. I agree with him in some of the retrospective part of his letter.

Then came the dark days of the Crimean winter. In his very deliberate vindication of the policy of the Crimean war composed in 1887, Mr. Gladstone warmly denies slumber.—De La Gorce, Hist. du second Empire, i. pp. 231-3. ² It is given in Speeches, i. p. 529. Oct. 29, 1854.

¹ Martens.
² The equivocal honour of originality seems to belong to the French, but they had allowed the plan to

CH

England, unlike France, had no systematic tradition upon contagion to governments beyond Ottoman limits. but henceforth all of them apt to spread with dangerous crisis after crisis apringing up within the Turkish empire, time, and with many diversities of place, plea, and colour, to church. This claim it was that led at varying intervals of civilisation on behalf of the Christian races and the Orthodox nade good a vague claim to exercise the guardianship of and while still the most barbaric of all the states, she had had made her way to the southern shores of the Black Sea; force into the west by the dismemberment of Poland; she Powers. By the end of the century she had pushed her eighteenth century Russia first seized her place among the rival ambitions of their own. At a certain epoch in the tormenting questions in the east to the advantage of Christian powers of northern and western Europe, to turn Ottoman and Christian gradually became a struggle among her institutions and her laws.' This secular strife between to claim the enjoyment of her own religion and to develop and of Greeks. It was that resistance which left Europe tide, and such was the resistance of Bulgarians, of Servians, the cultivated earth can spread, and escape the incoming of almost useless sea-weed. But it is a fence behind which becomes perhaps nothing save a mass of shingle, of rock, by the waves; it is laid desolate; it produces nothing; it that restrained the ocean. That beach, it is true, is beaten position of these races. They were like a shelving beach passages of his eloquence Mr. Gladstone once described the masters over Christian races. In one of the few picturesque but facing Asia,—and their sovereignty as Mahometan incomparable centre of imperial power standing in Europe Turks in Europe, their possession of Constantinople,—that almost too well knows, is the presence of the Ottoman question. The root of the Eastern question, as everybody TH faiths, that is veiled under the easy name of the Eastern tangle of conflicting interests, rival peoples, and antagonistic.

ed edienoT to obtain an establishment in the Black Sea. and the Porte in 1771, we supported Russia and helped ber this complicated atruggle. When war began between Russia

CHAPTER IV

OXEOED BELOEW—OPEN CIVIL SERVICE

(†981)

To rear up minds with sapirations and faculties above the herd, capable of leading on their countrymen to greater achievements in virtue, intelligence, and social well-being; to do this, and likewise so to educate the leisured classes of the community generally, that they may participate as far as possible in the qualities of these anperior spirits, and be prepared to appreciate them, and follow in their ateps—these are purposes requiring institutions of education placed above dependence on the immediate pleasure of that very multitude whom they are designed to elevate. These are the ends for which endowed universities profess to aim at; and great is their disall endowed universities profess to aim at; and great is their disagnee, if, having undertaken this task, and claiming credit for fulfilling it, they leave it unfulfilled.—J. S. Mille.

1820. IA. BOÓK

sphere of affairs; and Mr. Gladstone found himself forced criticism rapidly made themselves an active party in the tudinarian; a rising school in the sphere of thought and as it had done two centuries before, to breed the latithe antagonism between anglo-catholic and puritan helped, ing mind within the university, had roused new forces; curious. The nature of the theological struggle, by quickenchurch had at her expense fought for mastery. The result was turned into the battle-field on which contending parties in the Cambridge to set their houses in order. Oxford had been their closing days of power was the summons to Oxford and hour struck, and the final effort of the expiring whigs in occupations had given the antique Oxford a respite, but the universities. The Tractarian revival with all its intense pretor a score of years, now at length reached the two ancient THE last waves of the tide of reform that had been flowing

The large question, as it presented itself to Mr. Chadstone's the other, we have hore happily only the smallest concern. England, France, and Turkey on the one part and Russia on the diplomacy that preceded the outbreak of war between The story is still fresh. With the detailed history of " blaze. cratic pride, democratic hurry, combined to spread the c DILFONYLIC BILYPHIES by the rivalries of France, England, Austria, than it has ence will be more sharply combated, resisted, restrained, palities have been, and an order of things where our influas Greece has been, as troublesome as the Danubian Princiruins of Turkey all kinds of new states, as ungrateful to us The war in its results would cause to spring out of the Russian ambassador at St. James's, said to his sovoreign: be to the deliverer a loss and not a gain. Drunnow, then the break-up of Turkey by force of Russian arms might Nicholas was not without advisers who warned him that has the contemporary politician—to give a confident answer, the historian—who has many other things to think of than policy of the Crimean war, it is not quite easy even now for To this question, so decisive as it is in judging the governing themselves without any unaster, either Russian or particularly good friends to one another—the power of to secure to the Christian races—who, by the by, were not new master? 1. Or was the repulse of these designs necessary transfer of the miserable Christian races to the yoke of a Aussian designs at that day mean anything botter than the statesmen of the western Powers. Would the success of historic student, had hardly then emerged to the view of the mind in later years, and as it presents itself now to tho

Turkish barbarian civilised by the Russian,—Com. i. p. 402. they are, would have been cultivated in three hundred years; yet they people but the Turks, situated as he did not expect to live to see the grow more gross in the very native soil of civility and refinement. But did not wish well to Turkey, for any of 1772 Burke had said that he that the French too may get their share; and that the

the English may take more islands at their own convenience; treasure in order that King Otho may gain Thessaly; that direct advantage. We shall shed our blood and spend our ever been under the Ottoman. War cannot turn to our

1820

.VI BOOK

was taken on the question of the adjournment, when the of "Cardinal Wolsey" thrice repeated.'2 The final division of "Divide," so that nothing could be heard save the name Heywood's closing speech was happily drowned in the roar responded to it by profound and sympathetic silence. . . . His allusion to Peel was very touching, and the House anything which could be said against the commission. very powerful; he said, in the most effective manner, ministerial speeches were very feeble. . . . Gladstone's was Stanley (a strong supporter of the measure), tells us: The shared with him by Sir Robert Peel. 1 Of this debate, Arthur asm sotiumi mi moissimmos a dous oussi ot their on gaivad to Mr. Gladstone, and further that the view of the crown resisted the commission was also the party most opposed progress. It is just to add that the party in Oxford who from which this wonderful pilgrim had started on his shining festo, on a high theme and on a broad scale, of that toryism fortunately the speech is to be recorded as the last mani-In truth no worse case was ever more strongly argued, and government had a majority of 22. (July 18, 1850).

recalcitrant, but this made no difference either, nor did the made no difference. Many of the academic authorities were be cancelled. The petition was duly prepared, and duly addressed to the crown, praying that the instrument might not answer, but they suggested that a petition might be bib sraywal edd noitgalido lagel mort traga ytub to noit members of the university were bound to obey. The quession was not constitutional, not legal, and not such as the counsel of the day, and counsel advised that the commis-They submitted an elaborate case to the most eminent the world on the iniquity of setting aside the pious founder. subsisting on ancient Roman catholic endowments edified parliament over national domains; and protestant collegians property; contemptuous of the doctrine of the rights of without a struggle. They were clamorous on the sanctity of In Oxford the party of 'organized torpor' did not yield

2 Life, i. p. 420.

1 Letter to Bishop Davidson, June 11, 1891.

IV. 1853.

BOOK

Are we to go into it? The cabinet meets on Friday, and you must not be surprised at anything that may happen weather may be smooth; it also may be very rough.' First the smooth weather came. 'October 7. We have had our cabinet, three hours and a half; all there but Graham and Molesworth, who would both have been strongly for peace. We shall have another to-morrow, to look over our results in writing. Some startling things were said and proposed, but I think that as far as government is concerned, all will probably keep straight at this juncture, and as to war/I hope we shall not be involved in it, even if it goes on between Russia and Turkey, which is not quite certain.' Alberdeen himself thought the aspect of this cabinet of the 7th on the whole very good, Gladstone arguing strongly against a proposal of Palmerston's that England should enter into an engagement with Turkey to furnish her with naval assist-Most of the cabinet were for peace. Lord John was warlike, but subdued in tone. Palmerston urged his views 'perseveringly but not disagreeably.' The final instruction was a compromise, bringing the fleet to Constantinople, but limiting its employment to operations of a strictly defensive character. This was one of those peculiar compromises that in their sequel contain surrender. The step soon showed how critical it was. Well indeed might Lord Aberdeen tell the Queen that it would obviously every day become more and more difficult to draw the line between defensive and offensive, between an auxiliary and a principal. So much simpler is a distinction in words than in things. Still, he was able to assure her that, though grounds of difference existed, the discussions of the cabinet of the 8th were carried on amicably and in good humour. With straightforward common sense the Queen pressed the prime minister for his own deliberate counsel on the spirit and ultimate tendency of the policy that he would recommend her to approve. fact, Lord Aberdeen had no deliberate counsel to proffer. Speedily the weather roughened.

1 'Molesworth in the cabinet,' said popular he became outrageously war-Lord Aberdeen later, 'was a failure. like.'—Mrs. Simpson's Many Mem-Until the war he was a mere cipher. ories, p. 264; see also Cobden's When the war had broken out and was Speeches, ii. p. 28.

1820

BOOK

In truth no worse case was ever more strongly argued, and very powerful; he said, in the most effective manner, ministerial speeches were very feeble... Gladstone's was Stanley (a strong supporter of the measure), tells us: The shared with him by Sir Robert Peel. 1 Of this debate, Arthur having no right to issue such a commission in vities was to Mr. Gladstone, and further that the view of the crown resisted the commission was also the party most opposed progress. It is just to add that the party in Oxford who gninds sid no bettat had mirgliq luttebnow sidt doidw mort festo, on a high theme and on a broad scale, of that toryism fortunately the speech is to be recorded as the last manioman edi esard sand bluos gaidton tadt os "ebivid" to Heywood's closing speech was happily drowned in the roar ... sonsliz sitedtrqmyz bar banotorq yd ti ot bebacqzer. His allusion to Peel was very touching, and the House anything which could be said against the commission.

OXEORD REFORM

government had a majority of 22. (July 18, 1850). was taken on the question of the adjournment, when the of "Cardinal Wolsey" thrice repeated. 2 The final division

hiely ton bib 'roqrot besinggro' to ytreq eat brotzO al

1 Letter to Bishop Davidson, June 11, 1891. recalcitrant, but this made no difference either, nor did the made no difference. Many of the academic authorities were be cancelled. The petition was duly prepared, and duly addressed to the crown, praying that the instrument might not answer, but they suggested that a petition might be tion of duty apart from legal obligation the lawyers did members of the university were bound to obey. The quession was not constitutional, not legal, and not such as the counsel of the day, and counsel advised that the commis-They submitted an elaborate case to the most eminent the world on the iniquity of setting aside the pious founder subsisting on ancient Roman catholic endowments edified parliament over national domains; and protestant collegians property; contemptuous of the doctrine of the rights of without a struggle. They were clamorous on the sanctity of it is the necessity for regulating the distribution of power in Europe; the absorption of power by one of the great potentates of Europe, which would follow the fall of the Ottoman rule, would be dangerous to the peace of the world, and it is the duty of England, at whatever cost, to set itself against such a result.

00K IV. 853.

This was Mr. Gladstone's first public entry upon one of the most passionate of all the objects of his concern for forty years to come. He hears the desolate cry, then but faint, for the succour of the oppressed Christians. He looks to European interference to terminate the hateful solecism. He resists the interference single-handed of the northern invader. It was intolerable that Russia should be allowed to work her will upon Turkey as an outlawed state.1 In other words, the partition of Turkey was not to follow the partition of Poland. What we shortly call the Crimean war was to Mr. Gladstone the vindication of the public law of Europe against a wanton disturber. This was a characteristic example of his insistent search for a broad sentiment and a comprehensive moral principle. The principle in its present application had not really much life in it; the formula was narrow, as other invasions of public law within the next dozen years were to show. But the clear-cut issues of history only disclose themselves in the long result of Time. It was the diplomatic labyrinth of the passing hour through which the statesmen of the coalition had to thread their way. The disastrous end was what Mr. Disraeli christened the coalition war.

'The first year of the coalition government,' Lord Aberdeen wrote to Mr. Gladstone, 'was eminently prosperous, and this was chiefly owing to your own personal exertions, and to the boldness, ability, and success of your financial measures. Our second year, if not specially brilliant, might still have proved greatly advantageous to the country, had we possessed the courage to resist popular clamour and to avoid war; but this calamity aggravated all other causes of disunion and led to our dissolution.'2

¹ Eng. Hist. Rev. No. vi. p. 290.

² March 17, 1856.

the Aberdeen government to frame a bill. The charge fell had been given them to consider, it became the duty of the recommendations of the report. After a year's time parliament that the universities had been invited to examine Queen's speech, in November (1852), a paragraph informing burgesses,' he told them, 'I stand upon the line that divides the greatest acquaintance with it.' 1 As one of your and at length, quite entering into their case, and showing themselves. He answers everybody by return of post, fully him, on various parts of the bill more or less affecting fourths of the colleges have been in communication with Oxford, 'by the ubiquity of his correspondence. everybody here, writes a conspicuous high churchman from circumstances of war, 'Cladstone has been surprising character my office [the exchequer] is assuming under the is my consolation under the pain with which I view the is in the Oxford bill, Mr. Gladstone writes (March 29); 'it unluckily for the country, this was true. 'My whole heart Reform bill, and yours with university reform.' Perhaps, 27), 'my mind is exclusively occupied with the war and the querable, 'I fear,' Lord John Russell wrote to him (March everybody, flexible, persistent, clear, practical, fervid, unconbegan, so he advanced, listening to everybody, arguing with what their ordinary cares are to ordinary persons? As he Do great things become to great men from the force of habit, attention so minute to university affairs at such a crisis. wrote Dr. Jeune to him (Dec. 21, 1853), 'how you can give operations were to be confided. It is marvellous to me, suggestion even of the names of the commissioners to whom the kernel of the plan that was ultimately carried, with a what he called a rude draft, but the rude draft contained the middle of December he forwarded to Lord John Russell of his life was he more industrious or energetic. Before autumn of 1853'he set to work. In none of the enterprises upon Mr. Gladstone as member for Oxford, and in the late documents relating to the prepara-tion and passing of the Oxford University bill, Among them are

1853. BOOK

t Mozley, Letters, p. 220. Mr. Gladstone preserved 560 letters and during the same period. between Dec. 1853 and Dec. 1854, and 170 letters received by him 350 copies of his own letters written

it is the necessity for regulating the distribution of power in Europe; the absorption of power by one of the great potentates of Europe, which would follow the fall of the Ottoman rule, would be dangerous to the peace of the world, and it is the duty of England, at whatever cost, to set itself against such a result.

This was Mr. Gladstone's first public entry upon one of the most passionate of all the objects of his concern for forty years to come. He hears the desolate cry, then but faint, for the succour of the oppressed Christians. He looks to European interference to terminate the hateful solecism. He resists the interference single-handed of the northern invader. It was intolerable that Russia should be allowed to work her will upon Turkey as an outlawed state.1 In other words, the partition of Turkey was not to follow the partition of Poland. What we shortly call the Crimean war was to Mr. Gladstone the vindication of the public law of Europe against a wanton disturber. This was a characteristic example of his insistent search for a broad sentiment and a comprehensive moral principle. The principle in its present application had not really much life in it; the formula was narrow, as other invasions of public law within the next dozen years were to show. But the clear-cut issues of history only disclose themselves in the long result of Time. It was the diplomatic labyrinth of the passing hour through which the statesmen of the coalition had to thread their way. The disastrous end was what Mr. Disraeli christened the coalition war.

'The first year of the coalition government,' Lord Aberdeen wrote to Mr. Gladstone, 'was eminently prosperous, and this was chiefly owing to your own personal exertions, and to the boldness, ability, and success of your financial measures. Our second year, if not specially brilliant, might still have proved greatly advantageous to the country, had we possessed the courage to resist popular clamour and to avoid war; but this calamity aggravated all other causes of disunion and led to our dissolution.'2

¹ Eng. Hist. Rev. No. vi. p. 290.

² March 17, 1856.

BOOK

T981

obtained were the deposition of the fossils and drones, and this momentous measure has been overlaid by the strata the church in twain. The regeneration introduced by that the opinions had sprung that seemed to be rending it had failed to bring unity, for it was from Oxford

Mr. Gladstone seems to have pressed his draftsmen hard, from university training down to a Cook's tour. bliow and ai agaidt boog lla to noisuftib aldizzog teabiw but they illustrate his constant and lifelong interest in the of moderate means. These hopes proved to be exaggerated, and university education brought within reach of classes tion, whether the scale of living could not be reduced, of the university, and as settling the much disputed quesas a change calculated to extend the numbers and strength was eager for the proposed right to establish private halls, restrictions. Beyond these aspects of reform, Mr. Gladstone professorial teaching; the removal of local preferences and with active duties; the reorganization or re-creation of only on excellence tested by competition, and associated sleeping endowments; the bestownl of college emoluments the governing body; the wakening of a huge mass of a renovated constitution on the representative principle for of subsequent reforms. Enough to say that the objects stone, 'It is to yourself and Lord John that the university reformers, and added emphatically in writing to Mr. Gladother hand, was convinced that it must satisfy all reasonable inexpedient, but unjust and tyrannical. Jowett, on the The dean of Christ Church thought it not merely for the university, for the church, for religion, for righteoussorrow and sad anticipations'; it opened deplorable prospects eriticism. On the vice-chancellor it left an impression of private copies of the diaft were sent down from London for seized with consternation, stupefaction, enthusiasm. A few of so many agitations for a score of years past, was once more really loves you and feels this matter deeply. Oxford, scene and adds, 'write a few kind words to Phillimore, for he deeply attached to him to care for a few marks of impatience, membra of this unfortunate bill, tells him that he is too as he sometimes did. Bethell returning to him 'the disjecta, enemy.' Behind the decorous curtain of European concert Napoleon III. was busily weaving scheme after scheme of his own to fix his unsteady diadem upon his brow, to plant his dynasty among the great thrones of western Europe, and to pay off some old scores of personal indignity put upon him by the Czar.

The Czar fell into all the mistakes that a man could. Emperor by divine right, he had done his best to sting the self-esteem of the revolutionary emperor in Paris. By his language to the British ambassador about dividing the inheritance of the sick man, he had quickened the suspicions of the English cabinet. It is true the sick man will die, said Lord John Russell, but it may not be for twenty, fifty, or a hundred years to come; when William III. and Louis XIV. signed their treaty for the partition of the Spanish monarchy, they first made sure that the death of the king was close at hand. Then the choice as agent at Constantinople of the arrogant and unskilful Menschikoff proved a dire misfortune. Finally, the Czar was fatally misled by his own ambassador in London. Brunnow reported that all the English liberals and economists were convinced that the notion of Turkish reform was absurd; that Aberdeen had told him in accents of contempt and anger, 'I hate the Turks'; and that English views generally as to Russian aggression and Turkish interests had been sensibly modified. All this was not untrue, but it was not true enough to bear the inference that was drawn from it at St. Petersburg. The deception was disastrous, and Brunnow was never forgiven for it.1

Another obstacle to a pacific solution, perhaps most formidable of them all, was Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the British ambassador at Constantinople. Animated by a vehement antipathy to Russia, possessing almost sovereign ascendency at the Porte, believing that the Turk might never meet a happier chance of having the battle out with his adversary once for all, and justly confident that a policy of war would find hearty backers in the London cabinet—in him the

¹ See Martens' Recueil des Traités, office, 1898, vol. xii., containing many etc., published by the Russian foreign graphic particulars of these events.

BOOK sober nature that hath as much of the ballast as of the

T82T

-: 'libe _

Sometimes it may be necessary in dealing with a very ancient and the actual spirit of the age. This may be in certain circumstances a necessary, but it can never be a satisfactory process. It is driving a bargain, and somewhat of a wretched bargain. But that case, my view, right or wrong, is this: that Oxford is far behind her duties or capabilities, not because her working men behind her duties or capabilities, not because her working men behind her duties or capabilities, not because her working men do not work at all, so large a proportion of her children do not work at all, so large a proportion is so ill-adapted to developing her real but latent powers. What I therefore to developing her real but latent powers. What I therefore evil, but he submitted to it in order to avert greater evil. He never denied that parliamentary intervention was an side, Mr. Gladstone replied with inexhaustible patience. Pusey, and to all who poured reproach upon him from this ally, the good man adds, 'I must always love you.' confidence for Mr. Gladstone had roused him. that inactivity in things political, from which only love and election times the worker of such evil, and must return to which he belonged, and he could no longer support at death-blow from Mr. Gladstone and the government to away from the university. Oxford had now received its to the church; she would have to take refuge in colleges and overthrown by a parricidal hand; Oxford would be lost Pusey seems to have talked of the university as ruined mind of the country. increase of her moral force, and of her hold upon the heart and anticipate is not the weakening of her distinctive principles, not the diminution of her labour, already great, that she discharges for the church and for the land, but a great expansion, a great invigoration, a great increase of her numbers, a still greater

'If the church of England has not strength enough to keep upright, this will soon appear in the troubles of emancipated Oxford: if she has, it will come out to the joy of us all in the immensely augmented energy and power of the

another time in these devious manœuvres, that fearful dilemma interposed—inseparable in its many forms from all collective action whether in cabinet or party; so fit to test to the very uttermost all the moral fortitude, all the wisdom of a minister, his sense of proportion, his strength of will, his prudent pliancy of judgment, his power of balance, his sure perception of the ruling fact. The dilemma here is patent. To recall Lord Stratford would be to lose Lord Palmerston and Lord John; to lose them would be to break up the government; to break up the government would be to sunder the slender thread on which the chances of peace were hanging.1 The thought, in short, of the highminded Aberdeen striving against hope to play a steadfast and pacific part in a scene so sinister, among actors of such equivocal or crooked purpose, recalls nothing so much as the memorable picture long ago of Maria Theresa beset and baffled by her Kaunitzes and Thuguts, Catherines, Josephs, great Fredericks, Grand Turks, and wringing her hands over the consummation of an iniquitous policy to which the perversity of man and circumstance had driven

As the proceedings in the cabinet dragged on through the winter, new projects were mooted. The ground was , shifted to what Lord Stratford had called a comprehensive war upon Russia. Some of the cabinet began to aim at a transformation of the policy. It was suggested that the moment should be seized to obtain not merely the observance by Russia of her treaty obligations to Turkey, but a revision and modification of the treaties in Turkish interests. This is the well-known way in which, ever since the world called civilised began, the area of conflict is widened. If one plea is eluded or is satisfied, another is found; and so the peacemakers are at each step checkmated by the warmakers. The Powers of central Europe were immovable, with motives, interests, designs, each of their own. Austria had reasons of irresistible force for keeping peace with Russia. A single victory of Russia in Austrian Poland would enable her to march direct upon Vienna. Austria

¹ This is clearly worked out by Lord Stanmore, p. 254, etc.

17. ноон

7281

дер-от почо завхватахо од зоп bluow it equited - woiv anomorro in aid duid of noacor on at world! Trend to value of variety of the design derial I blue on thround that in acro ton 1820 to revenue off reservibility it through and through, considering we have a partianent and of dynone erest actionness sidt in basi-"soiledine grantes, espicit son per a fer all alou your paper -- Roman ला हर्नेष्ठ वर्ष , इन्निक्टर अंग्रेश वर्षा, अहर प्रहार १० अवर्षामध्य स्पा nogn quincel snoima to fram a s difers dadance whol off the time has not yet, I think, arrived for determining! thusemmoune of route to yab onne tann teilt live in el il intervention of parliament would be a great east. Whether oldieroi yd cenescan anda er reeffe cerie er anda noinige to osla and I choose storm a self bluow vibravian add to snommerorg edi bara yalibersi enciyiber odë to qu yaliberid odi succhiw cromogib to nobelimbs out and oxelled I olida Joolal . . . iliani voi noitemp att rebinee et banella of blueda ii tadi commander the most of the property of the contraction of the contracti eathart. Things of sa brad as mid by easy golunis rudark Almoirinn rodio ni ond a mort moredili Choiremn ron si only on other or build side to seen granulanding and that they radio unil quora on arlar or brasilory floruid uno chald ale reconcerate unitationly to consent out of adaptar elled adi doida yd llid cocraque a ui beogorg a troggue bluow od spondents, and which is a landmark in the long history of formula which he tenaciously reiterated to all his correagitation.' The basis of that settlement, he went on in a tion and so preclude, if we can, any protect for renewed should now make some endeavour to settle the whole quescolleagues, best for the interests of the university that we provost of Oriel, 'it seems to mo, I may add it seems to my to legislate upon the subject, Mr. Chadstone writes to the to yield. 'Parliament having now unhappily determined which it was composed left the government no option but The size of the majority and the diversified material of sono-vyonin yd anonunovog odi asniege (22 onul.) beiraso saw bill, a clause removing the theological test at anteieulation interference, did not turry, and on the report stage of the What Mr. Gladstone called 'the evil of parliamentary

ook IV.

another time in these devious manœuvres, that fearful dilemma interposed—inseparable in its many forms from all collective action whether in cabinet or party; so fit to test to the very uttermost all the moral fortitude, all the wisdom of a minister, his sense of proportion, his strength of will, his prudent pliancy of judgment, his power of balance, his sure perception of the ruling fact. The dilemma here is patent. To recall Lord Stratford would be to lose Lord Palmerston and Lord John; to lose them would be to break up the government; to break up the government would be to sunder the slender thread on which the chances of peace were hanging.1 The thought, in short, of the highminded Aberdeen striving against hope to play a steadfast and pacific part in a scene so sinister, among actors of such equivocal or crooked purpose, recalls nothing so much as the memorable picture long ago of Maria Theresa beset and baffled by her Kaunitzes and Thuguts, Catherines, Josephs, great Fredericks, Grand Turks, and wringing her hands over the consummation of an iniquitous policy to which the perversity of man and circumstance had driven

As the proceedings in the cabinet dragged on through the winter, new projects were mooted. The ground was shifted to what Lord Stratford had called a comprehensive war upon Russia. Some of the cabinet began to aim at a transformation of the policy. It was suggested that the moment should be seized to obtain not merely the observance by Russia of her treaty obligations to Turkey, but a revision and modification of the treaties in Turkish interests. This is the well-known way in which, ever since the world called civilised began, the area of conflict is widened. If one plea is eluded or is satisfied, another is found; and so the peacemakers are at each step checkmated by the warmakers. The Powers of central Europe were immovable, with motives, interests, designs, each of their own. Austria had reasons of irresistible force for keeping peace with Russia. A single victory of Russia in Austrian Poland would enable her to march direct upon Vienna. Austria

¹ This is clearly worked out by Lord Stanmore, p. 254, etc.

ROOK 208

₽981

TA.

enlightened by the one and inflamed by the other, brought passage about Voltaire and Rousseau, and the land that was da excellently worded but amusingly irrelevant tree and independent, with all its anomalies and imperfeccontrol of the government, he would reply, 'Give me Oxford fections, or an Oxford without imperfections but under the rəqmi ati Ila diw əəri brotxO əvan rəhtar bluow əd rəddədw never-to-be-forgotten appropriation clause. If he were asked the universities, and wore in effect the hideous aspect of the Chadstone, 'would be greatly increased if men hereafter The admiration of posterity, Dr. Jenne wrote to Mr. severe and strenuous opponent. siil yd bebrager asw ilesraeli Moidw diw ruovalaib qeeb edt to whose legislative bills it can do no harm, helps to explain triffing of this sort, though it may divert a later generation the curious performance to a solemn close. High fantastic

ing of Oxford than the three centuries since the Reformation. 1866, have seen more improvement in the temper and teach-The last twenty years, wrote a shrewd and expert sage in Smith he acknowledged a hardly lower degree of obligation. singularly ready and able help. To Jowett and Goldwin advantage which at every stage he had derived from his his warm sense of the great encouragement and solid with it. To Dr. Jeune when the battle was over he expresses source of strength to any one standing in reputed connection to scatter the bugbears, and the bill would be nothing but a failed him, he was convinced that no long time would suffice was bound to hold on. With dauntless confidence that never gencies of such a seat at such a time. As things stood he not have been presumptuous enough to face the continglare and a wider range than they had done before, I should were on the decline, were really about to assume a flercer 26, 1854), 'that church controversies which I then hoped foreseen in 1847, replied Mr. Gladstone (Broadstairs, Aug. This side of the matter Jeune made plain to him. notorious that Mr. Gladstone was bravely risking his seat. labour your success has required.' More than this, it was could know what wisdom, what firmness, what temper, what

This has undoubtedly been vastly promoted by the Reform

OK V. 853.

Some, including the prime minister, went with Lord John Russell in desiring to push a Reform bill. Others, especially Palmerston, were strongly adverse. Mr. Gladstone mainly followed the head of the government, but he was still a conservative, and still member for a tory constituency, and he followed his leader rather mechanically and without enthusiasm. Lord Palmerston was suspected by some of his colleagues of raising the war-cry in hopes of drowning the demand for reform. In the middle of December (1853) he resigned upon reform,1 but nine days later he withdrew his resignation and returned. In the interval news of the Russian attack on the Turkish fleet at Sinope (November 30) had arrived—an attack justified by precedent and the rule of war. But public feeling in England had risen to fever; the French Emperor in exacting and peremptory language had declared that if England did not take joint action with him in the Black Sea, he would either act alone or else bring his fleet home. The British cabinet yielded, and came to the cardinal decision (Dec. 22) to enter the Black Sea. 'I was rather stunned,' Gladstone wrote to Sidney Herbert next day, 'by yesterday's cabinet. I have scarcely got my breath again. I told Lord Aberdeen that I had had wishes that Palmerston were back again on account of the Eastern question.'

Here is a glimpse of this time:-

Nov. 23, '53.—Cabinet. Reform discussed largely, amicably, and satisfactorily on the whole. Dec. 16.—Hawarden. Off at 9 A.M. Astounded by a note from A. Gordon. [Palmerston had resigned the day before.] After dinner went to the admiralty, $10\frac{1}{4}$ - $1\frac{1}{2}$, where Lord Aberdeen, Newcastle, Graham and I went over the late events and went over the course for to-morrow's cabinet. Dec. 21.—Called on Lord Palmerston, and sat an hour. 22.—Cabinet, 2- $7\frac{1}{2}$, on Eastern Question. Palmerston and reform. A day of no small matter for reflection. Jan. 4, 1854.—To Windsor. I was the only guest, and thus was promoted to sit by the Queen at dinner. She was most gracious, and above all so thoroughly natural.

¹ Ashley's Life of Palmerston, ii. p. 270.

BOOK Lord Aberdeen presided. I myself was the only one of

.1854.

civil service in the summer of 1855.1 and incontrovertible speech than his defence for an open raised, and Mr. Gladstone never made a more terse, pithy, war went on, the usual cry for administrative reform waz, curable and the difficulties removable.' As the Crimean flame; but more and more do the incidental evils seem you and Northcote to write the report which has lit up the its favour as a principle, than they were when I invited of competition. I do not mean that they can be more in My own opinions are more and more in favour of the plan did not change him. In November he wrote to Trevelyan: his vigour and resolution, the reform was arrested. Time of all its patronage. There for the moment, in spite of all cabinet that conceived and matured a plan for the surrender not fairly be said to belong to that class. Yet it was this fifteen noblemen and gentlemen who composed it, who could

For this branch of reform, too, the inspiration had proceeded from Oxford. Two of the foremost champions of the change had been Temple—afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury—and Jowett. The latter was described by Mr. Gladstone to Graham as being 'as handy a workman as proposed to these two reformers that they should take the salaried office of examiners under the civil service scheme. Much of his confident expectation of good, he told them, was built upon their co-operation. In all his proceedings on this subject, Mr. Gladstone showed in strong light in how unique a degree he combined a profound democratic instinct unique a degree he combined a profound democratic instinct with the spirit of good government; the instinct of popular equality along with the scientific spirit of the enlightened equality along with the scientific spirit of the enlightened bureaucrat.

The made three speeches on the subject at this period; June 15th and reform, which was rejected by 359 to July 10th, 1855, and April 24th, 1856.

16F

CHAR III.

or munitions of war by the Russians, but that we trusted she occupy the Black Sea, that is, prevent the passage of any ships occupation; so it ended in our telling France that we would Gladstone said he could be no party to unconditional the Tuřks, under which we should be if they accepted our conadopted for our own purposes, and without any engagement to than if we occupied the Black Sea as part of our own measures, and I said we thought this would bind us much more to the Turks on which the English and French governments agreed. Newcastle or at any rate to their agreeing to be bound by any basis of peace first place, on the Turks having acceded to the Vienna proposals, our occupying the Black Sea was to be made dependent, in the to our being hampered by any engagement. His scheme was that a strong argument of Newcastle's. Gladstone's objection being Gladstone could not be persuaded to agree to this, in spite of a tissue of confusions that I advocated the simple course of doing Black Sea, as proposed by France, and it seemed to me to be such We had then a long discussion on the question of occupying the On the decision of Dec. 22, Sir Charles Wood says:-

By the middle of February war was certain. Mr. Gladstone wrote an account of a conversation that he had at this time with Lord Aberdeen:—

would join us in enforcing the above condition on the Turks. If they agreed, then we were to occupy the Black Sea; if they did not, we were to reconsider the question, and then determine what to do. Clarendon saw Walewski, who was quite satisfied.

Feb. 22.—Lord Aberdeen sent for me to-day and informed me that Lord Palmerston had been with him to say that he had made up his mind to vote for putting off (without entering into the question of its merits) the consideration of the Reform bill for the present year. [Conversation on Reform.]

He then asked me whether I did not think that he might himself withdraw from office when we came to the declaration of war. All along he had been acting against his feelings, but still defensively. He did not think that he could regard the offensive in the same light, and was disposed to retire. I said

1854. 1854.

failure, for it made the exchequer, in order to pay off eight cent., and at par, raise a larger sum at three, and a half per cent., and at three per cent. in a stock standing at 87.¹ All this brought loudish complaints from the money market. The men at the clubs talked of the discredit into which chadstone had fallen as a financier, and even persons not unfriendly to him spoke of him as rash, obstinate, and injudicious. He was declared to have destroyed his prestige injudicious. He was declared to have destroyed his prestige and and everthrown his authority.²

the study of Augustine and Dante and old divines were case clean home with a vigour that made it seem as if sparing his critics a point or an argument, he drove his stir the self-respect of the House of Commons. This was the way in which he at all times strove to by men owning the high responsibility of their station. debt imperatively due to themselves and to the country, and judgment upon the case before them was a binding he awoke in his hearers, that to exercise their attention getie interest in the performance, but by the sense which the House, not only by the orator's own buoyant and enerand difficult matter was impressed in full significance upon of charging deficiency bills. This astonishing mass of dry unfunded debt, his abortive schemo of conversion, his mode all the heads of attack,—his manner of dealing with the he dashed into a close and elaborate defence in detail, under if you disapprove, the sooner I know it the better. Then have confidence in our unangement of your hagnees or not; the very reason why you should show boldly whether you trary, he said, a case so momenteus as the case of war is vote would be awkward in a time of war. On the coning him by a direct vote of want of confidence, that such a brushed aside the apology of his assailants for not challengmight have satisfied the Paalmist himself. Peremptorily he long, he threw his detractors into a depth of confusion that the time came (May 8), in a speech three and a half hours This roused all the slumbering warrior in him, and when

1 Northcote, Financial Policy, p. 2 Greville, Part III. i. pp. 150, 242; Buxton, Mr. Aladelone: A 151, 157. Study, pp. 154-5.

1824,

IA BOOK

secondly, on the tact founded in good feeling and the love composed an eminently readable work on a dry subject; and a sincere compliment, first on the skill with which you have of Finance. 'I cannot refrain,' he says, from paying you He is writing in 1862 on Morthcote's book on Tuenty Years the letter to Morthcote to which I have already referred. plete or correct this language by a further quotation from are adjourned into a far future. I may as well here comnot really know what they are doing. The consequences and continual deception upon the people. The people do necessary for wars by loan practises, wholesale, systematic, not relatively, was emphatic. The system of raising funds for this chapter. His condemnation of loans, absolutely if to come to bear reproducing, and I have taken it as a motto mentary discussion, but it is only too likely for a long time grounds for his opinion has become a classic place in parliahis economic view. The passage in which he set forth the the demands of war by tax and not by loan that coloured but it was the political and moral reasons for meeting open to more dispute than he then appeared to suppose, Pitt's policy of loan, loan. The economic answer is of Pitt, he opened in all its breadth the question raised by While professing his veneration and respect for the memory ever, seem to have turned on the unqualified construction. from its own resources.' The discussions of the time, howof the country to make in the first instance a great effort of May 8, revised for Hansard, it was the duty and policy supplies were to be raised by taxes. . . . I said in my speech you find that I laid down any general maxim that all war not know, he wrote some years later to Morthcote, where were furiously provoked at having been taken in. 'I do phasis; they overlooked the lurking qualification; and then principle, set out in all its breadth and with much emfor sophistry and worse. Men fastened on the general it was one of the reasons why he acquired a bad name book, and among the rest on this:-

of truth with which you have handled your materials throughout. He then remarks on various points in the

F981

BOOK

of the question,

larger share of our total taxation than in peace. From this it seems to follow at once that, up to the point at which endurance is practicable, payment by war-taxes rather than by taxes in peace is for the interest of the people at large. I am not one of those who think that our system of taxation, taken as a whole, is an over-liberal one towards them. These observations are mere contributions to a discussion, and by no means pretend to dispose contributions to a discussion, and by no means pretend to dispose study diplomacy in letters of this kind, Mr. Gladstone replied, and there is no sort of doubt that I am very governor, who was his private friend, winced. 'I do not at all provoked more than one stern and brief epistle. faith of the directors in bringing fresh lawyers into the case of the lawyers with their high Bank views and the equivocal and direct when occasion moved him, and the proceedings letters were often prolix, but nobody could be more terse lawyers will talk. But 'tis their vocation.' Alr. Gladstone's Bank a trustee for the public! Proh pudor! What stuff Mr. Gladstone to stand to his guns, 'its counsel call the himself have been bound. And then, said Bethell, urging Bank itself, and by which if it had been adverse he would incensed at this refusal to abide by an opinion invited by the before the prime minister. Mr. Gladstone was righteously wrong; and recommended the Bank to bring their grievance and Palmer) advised that the attorney and solicitor were the Bank took an opinion of their own; their counsel (Kelly The lawyers backed the chancellor of the exchequer. Then able; and asked him to take the opinion of the law officers. balances actually in hand, to cover the entire amount paybe illegal; claimed the whole amount required, along with by long experience to be called for. The Bank held this to as would cover the maximum of dividends payable, as known deficiency bills, limiting the quarterly amount to such a sum spring he had introduced a change in the mode of issuing anger that greatly astonished Threadneedle Street. In the England, and displayed a toughness, stiffness, and sustained In the autumn he had a sharp tussle with the Bank of

тr

THY.

CH

 $\mathbf{I}I$

of propitiating the radicals.'1 been avoided, but which may, perhaps, have the advantage the whole which ought, under better circumstances, to have to finish it at all. There is a harsh, unfriendly tone about dragged, much will be excused. In fact the great work was den of band through which the raw material had to be When you consider, Stanley said to Jowett, the landmarks in the history of our modern English life and was completed and the report made public-one of the high riupni edt (2381 lirqA) erre yort lo bne edt tA Lasz bne secretaries, conducted their operations with tact, good sense, leading spirits, with Stanley and Mr. Goldwin Smith for missioners, of whom Tait and Jeune seem to have been the subject the colleges to his unhallowed control. The comor in earnet gring to tetal attempt of King James II. to Bishop of Exeter's hot declaration that the proceeding had

The originators of the commission were no longer in office, giving him a pull backwards.'3 him. He is giving them a push forwards instead of their current) he is liberalising them, instead of their torifying him, and (insomuch as it is difficult to struggle against the university. Most of his high church supporters stick, to now exercising a singular influence upon the politics of the stone's connection with Oxford,' said Sir George Lewis, 'is' warning them that delay would be dearly purchased.2 Gladopportunity for reforming the university from within, and neblog sidt de ear earm of brotzO as ebneirt eid gargru esseo of important and, above all, early changes. He did not report, but it only deepened his conviction of the necessity tound more moderate and less sweeping in tone than the of change too manifold and complicated. The evidence he submitted in his recollection to parliament, but the proposals Mr. Gladstone thought it one of the ablest productions but things had gone too far for their successors to burke what had been done. The Derby government put into the

* Interesting particulars of this memorable commission are to be found in the Life of Archbishop Tait, i. pp. 156-170.

Life of Stanley, i. p. 432.

2 Letters to Graham, July 30, 1852, and Dr. Haddan, Aug. 14 and Sept. 29, 1852.

Letters, March 26, 1853, p. 261.

CHAPTER VI

CRISIS OF 1855 AND BREAK-UP OF THE PEELITES

(1855)

PARTY has no doubt its evils; but all the evils of party put together would be scarcely a grain in the balance, when compared with the dissolution of honourable friendships, the pursuit of selfish ends, the want of concert in conneil, the absence of a settled policy in foreign affairs, the corruption of certain statesmen, the caprices of an intriguing court, which the extinction of party connection has brought and would bring again upon this country.-EARL Russell.1

THE administrative miscarriages of the war in the Crimea during the winter of 1854-5 destroyed the coalition government.² When parliament assembled on January 23, 1855, Mr. Roebuck on the first night of the session gave notice of a motion for a committee of inquiry. Lord John Russell attended to the formal business, and when the House was up went home accompanied by Sir Charles Wood. Nothing of consequence passed between the two colleagues, and no word was said to Wood in the direction of withdrawal. evening as the prime minister was sitting in his drawingroom, a red box was brought in to him by his son, containing Lord John Russell's resignation. He was as much amazed as Lord Newcastle, smoking his evening pipe of tobacco in his coach, was amazed by the news that the battle of Marston Moor had begun. Nothing has come to light since to set aside the severe judgment pronounced upon this proceeding by the universal opinion of contemporaries, including Lord John's own closest political allies. That a minister should run away from a hostile motion upon affairs for which responsi-

CHAP. VI. Ær. 46.

¹ On Bute's plan of superseding party by prerogative, in the intro duction to vol. iii. of the Bedford Correspondence.

² See Appendix.

been avoided, but which may, perhaps, have the advantage the whole which ought, under better circumstances, to have to finish it at all. There is a harsh, unfriendly tone about dragged, much will be excused. In fact the great work was od on head laintenam war out the raw material had to be growth. 'When you consider,' Stanley said to Jowett, 'the lun oil deilynd arobom mo do vroteid odt ni edrambarl age completed and the report made public-one of the high and zeal. At the end of two years (April 1852) the inquiry secretaries, conducted their operations with tact, good sense, leading spirits, with Stanley and Mr. Goldwin Smith for missioners, of whom Tait and Jeune seem to have been the subject the colleges to his unhallowed control! The comno parallel since the fatal attempt of King James 11, 10. Bishop of Exeter's hot declaration that the proceeding had curre. H 7H'

what had been done. The Derby government put into the our things had gone too far for their successors to burke The originators of the commission were no longer in office, giving him a pull backwards. him. He is giving them a push forwards instead of their current) he is liberalising them, instead of their toritying him, and (insomuch as it is difficult to struggle against the university. Most of his high church supporters stiele to now exercising a singular influence upon the politics of the stone's connection with Oxford, said Sir George Lewis, 'is warning them that delay would be dearly purchased." '(ilulopportunity for reforming the university from within, and nobley kill to ean extent to make use of this golden of important and, above all, early changes. He did not report, but it only deepened his conviction of the necessity found more moderate and less sweeping in tone thun thu of change too manifold and complicated. The cridence ha shapitted in his recollection to parliament, but the proposals Mr. Gladstone thought it one of the ablest productions of propitizing the radicals."

memorable commission are to be found in the Life of Archbishop Tail, i. pp. 156-170. tureresting particulars of this ^{29, 1852.} Letters to Graham, July 30, 1852, 29, 1852. Letters, March 26, 1853, p. 261. 1 Life of Stanley, i. p. 432.

Russell might deem honourable. On pressure from the CHAP. Queen, the whigs in the government, Lord John notwithstanding, agreed to stand fire. Mr. Gladstone proceeds:-

ÆT. 46.

Lord John's explanation, which was very untrue in its general effect, though I believe kindly conceived in feeling as well as tempered with some grains of policy and a contemplation of another possible premiership, carried the House with him, as Herbert observed while he was speaking. Palmerston's reply to him was wretched. It produced in the House (that is, in so much of the House as would otherwise have been favourable), a flatness and deadness of spirit towards the government which was indescribable; and Charles Wood with a marked expression of face said while it was going on, 'And this is to be our leader!' I was myself so painfully full of the scene, that when Palmerston himself sat down I was on the very point of saying to him unconsciously, 'Can anything more be said?' But no one would rise in the adverse sense, and therefore there was no opening for a minister, Palmerston [now become leader in the Commons] had written to ask me to follow Lord John on account of his being a party. But it was justly thought in the cabinet that there were good reasons against my taking this part upon me, and so the arrangement was changed.

Roebuck brought forward his motion. Mr. Gladstone resisted it on behalf of the government with immense argumentative force, and he put the point against Lord John which explains the word 'untrue' in the passage just quoted, namely, that though he desired in November the substitution of Palmerston for Newcastle as war minister, he had given it up in December, and yet this vital fact was omitted.1 It was not for the government, he said, either to attempt to make terms with the House by reconstruction of a cabinet, or to shrink from any judgment of the House upon their If they had so shrunk, he exclaimed, this is the sort of epitaph that he would expect to have written over their remains:-- 'Here lie the dishonoured ashes of a ministry that found England in peace and left it in war, that was content

^{1 &#}x27;This suppressio veri is shocking, and one of the very worst things he ever did.'—Greville, III. i. p. 232.

Ozford from the outer world, and as a sentinel I cry out to Gibl what I see from that position.' What he saw was that if this bill were thrown out, no other half so favourable \overline{E} would ever again be brought in.

dealt with by delegation to executive act. say, they were too complex for parliament, and could only be resort to what he called sub-legislation inevitable; that is to diverse institutions that had grown up in Oxford made Mr. Gladstone from the first, that the enormous number of process brought into clearer light the truth discerned by what was undoubtedly a task of exceptional difficulty. Tho ni bia rodrud rot ni bellae erow. gairdl' baa eromillid help of Bethell, the solicitor-general, at whose suggestion dence. In drawing the clauses Mr. Chadstone received the actual production, in many interviews and much corresponover the whole field of the bill, was maintained until its scheme. The discussion between him and Jowett, ranging of opinion in the cabinet went decisively for Mr. Gladstone's The two plans were printed and circulated, and the balance idea of an executive commission with statutory powers. interests. Alr. Gladstone, on the other hand, invented the ontside, unnequainted with special wants and special far better than a little body of great personages from principles, Oxford itself could be trusted to settle details influence, contended that after parliament had settled into his own hands, or the hands of those whom he could his life had a weakness for getting and keeping authority the highly important point of machinery. Jowett, who all difference between Jowett's plan and Mr. Chadstone's was on struck by the elearness and completeness of his views.' The I must own, writes the latter to Chadstone, I was much comprehensive plan, and soon after, saw Lord John (Jan. 6). Gladstone's own. Jowett at the earliest stage sent him a The schoine accopted by the cabinet was in essentials Mr.

It is untrue to say that Oxford as a place of education had no influence on the mind of the country; it had immense influence, but that influence was exactly what it ought not to have been. Instead of stimulating it checked, instead of expanding it stereotyped. Even for the church especially as to the cases of three persons: Lord John (Russell, Duke of Newcastle, and Lord Raglan.' Ministers CHAP. VI. were beaten (January 29) by 325 to 148, and they resigned.

Æт. 46.

Jan. 30, 1855.—Cabinet 1-2. We exchanged friendly adieus. Dined with the Herberts. This was a day of personal lightheartedness, but the problem for the nation is no small one.

The Queen sent for Lord Derby, and he made an attempt to form a government. Without aid from the conservative wing of the fallen ministry there was no hope, and his first step (Jan. 31) was to eall on Lord Palmerston, with an earnest request for his support, and with a hope that he would persuade Mr. Gladstone and Sidney Herbert to rejoin their old political connection; with the intimation moreover that Mr. Disraeli, with a self-abnegation that did him the highest eredit, was willing to waive in Lord Palmerston's favour his own elaim to the leadership of the House of Commons. Palmerston was to be president of the eouncil, and Ellenborough minister of war. In this conversation Lord Palmerston made no objection on any political grounds, or on account of any contemplated measures; he found no fault with the position intended for himself, or for others with whom he would be associated. Lord Derby supposed that all would depend on the concurrence of Mr. Gladstone and Herbert. He left Cambridge House at half-past two in the afternoon, and at half-past nine in the evening he received a note from Lord Palmerston declining. Three hours later he heard from Mr. Gladstone, who declined also. The proceedings of this eventful day, between two in the afternoon and midnight, whatever may have been the play of motive and calculation in the innermost minds of all or any of the actors, were practically to go a long way, though by no means the whole way, as we shall see, towards making Mr. Gladstone's severance from the conservative party definitive.

Jan. 31.—Lord Palmerston came to see me between three and four, with a proposal from Lord Derby that he and I, with S. Herbert should take office under him; Palmerston to be president of the council and lead the House of Commons. me when he called before, he had gone to S. Herbert, who seemed will be indebted for the greatest boon that it has ever received. After the introduction of the bill by Lord John Gussell, the obscurantists made a final effort to call down one of their old pelting hailstorms. A petition against the bill was of their old pelting hailstorms. A petition against the bill was of their old pelting hailstorms.

 $\mathbf{T}\mathbf{H}$

I

CH

of no more than two.

At length the blessed day of the second reading came. The ever zealous Arthur Stanley was present. 'A superb speech from Gladstone,' he records, 'in which, for the first time, all the arguments from our report were worked up in the most effective manner. He vainly endeavoured to reconcile his present with his former position. But, with this exception, I listened to his speech with the greatest delight, . . . To behold one's old enemies slaughtered before one's face with the most irresistible weapons was quite intoxicating. One great charm of his speaking is its exceeding good-humour. There is great vehemence but no bitterness,' An excellent criticism of many, perhaps most, of his speeches.

nature that doth put life into business, with a solid and to the rare combination, in Bacon's words, of a glorious of this date to Burgon of Oriel. Nobody answers better of his life was devoted, is worth giving here from a letter practical legislation to which so much of the energies tion of Mr. Gladstone's temper in the arduous work of Everybody had views of his own. A characteristic illustraall it is a thing that is to be carried through parliament. they forgot that, whatever else you may say of a bill, after and abstract critics now, and many another time, forgot: This was a point of view that Mr. Gladstone's more exacting ally, debate would run to such lengths as to make it hopeless. Butt or Cairns were employed to oppose the bill systematicthem.' And he pointed out that if any clever lawyer such as a world of subjects that we have to deal with in approaching diyersified, and complex mass, that it is not one subject but that history, law, and usage with them form such a manifold, Lord John at the outset, with respect to our old universities 'It must ever be borne in mind, Mr. Gladstone wrote to service in his administration. He then left. It was perhaps 6.30. Herbert and I sat down to write, but thought it well to send off nothing till after dinner, and we went to Grillion's where we had a small but merry party. Herbert even beyond himself amusing. At night we went to Lord Aberdeen's and Graham's, and so my letter came through some slight emendations to the form in which it went. I had doubts in my mind whether Derby had even intended to propose to Herbert and me except in conjunction with Palmerston, though I had no doubt that without Palmerston it would not do; and I framed my letter so as not to assume that I had an independent proposal, but to make my refusal a part of his.

CHAP. VI.

ÆT. 46.

Feb. 2.—I yesterday also ealled on Lord Palmerston and read him my letter to Lord Derby. He said: 'Nothing can be better.'

Lord Derby knew that, though he had the country gentlemen behind him, his own political friends, with the notable and only half-welcome exception of Mr. Disraeli, were too far below mediocrity in either capacity or experience to face so angry and dangerous a crisis. Accordingly he gave up the task. Many years after, Mr. Gladstone recorded his opinion that here Lord Derby missed his one real chance of playing a high historic part. 'To a Derby government,' he said, 'now that the party had been drubbed out of protection, I did not in principle object; for old ties were with me more operatively strong than new opinions, and I think that Lord Derby's error in not forming an administration was palpable and even gross. Such, it has appeared, was the opinion of Disraeli.2 Lord Derby had many fine qualities; but strong parliamentary courage was not among them. When Lord Palmerston (probably with a sagacious discernment of the immediate future) declined, he made no separate offer to the Peelites. Had Lord Derby gone on, he would have been supported by the country, then absorbed in the consideration of the war. None of the three occa-

At Lord Aberdeen's the question seems to have been discussed on the assumption that the offer to Mr. Gladstone and Herbert was meant to be independent of Palmerston's acceptance or refusal, and the impression there was that Mr. Gladstone had been not wholly disinclined to consider the offer.

to consider the offer.

² Malmesbury's Memoirs of an Ex-Minister, i. pp. 8, 37.

, TH

AHO VI university for good: If Germanism and Arnoldism are now university for good: If Germanism and Arnoldism are now to carry the day at Oxford (I mean supposing the bill is carry it fairly; let them win and wear her (God forbid, however); but if she has a nover than it has been heretofore, in doing battle. . . . Nor am I saddened by the pamphlet of a certain Mr. — which I have been reading to-day. It has more violence than venom, and also much more violence than often feel how hard it is on divines to be accused of treachery and baseness, because they do not, like us, get it every day and so become case-hardened against it.'

all things, to believe all things, and to endure all things. are spoken of in the Epistle to the Corinthians .-- 'To hope to manifest too much of those inestimable qualities which or not. Dissenters, he said with scorn, are expected always pusillanimous and tinkering an affair as this was passed House of Commons that he did not care whether so university. Bright, the most illustrious of them, told the bill of any provision for their admission to the remodelled senters had been extremely sore at the absence from the the life of the nation. From the first, the protestant disment, for so many generations, has so unhappily divided between the two camps into which the English establishsuch a subject could fail to awaken the ever-ready quarrel a new storm broke. It was impossible that a measure on John saw that they must take in canvas. At this point by its friends. By the end of May Mr. Gladstone and Lord discussed in committee.' Nor was oil cast upon the waters I have never known, says its pilot, 'a measure so foolishly In parliament the craft laboured heavily in cross-seas.

More discredit than he deserved fell upon Mr. Gladstone for this obnoxious defect. In announcing the commission of inquiry four years before, Lord John as prime minister had expressly said that the improvement of the universities should be treated as a subject by itself, and that the adshould be treated as a subject by itself, and that the adshould be treated as a subject by itself, and that the adserged of dissenters ought to be reserved for future and separate consideration. Writing to Mr. Gladstone (Jan. 1854) he said, 'I do not want to stir the question in this bill,' but the substitution of Palmerston for Lord Aberdeen would produce on foreign Powers at this critical moment, but dwelt chiefly on the impossibility of his having a majority. In this Lord Lansdowne seemed to agree.

VI. Ær. 46.

CHAP.

Lastly, I said that if Lord Lansdowne himself could venture to risk his health and strength by taking the government, this would be the best arrangement. My opinion was that at this erisis Derby, if he could have formed an administration, would have had advantages with regard to the absorbing questions of the war and of a peace to follow it, such as no other combination could possess. Failing this, I wished for a homogeneous whig government. The best form of it would be under him. He said he might dare it provisionally, if he could see his way to a permanent arrangement at the end of a short term; but he could see nothing of the sort at present.

An autobiographic note of 1897 gires a further detail of moment:— He asked whether I would continue to hold my office as chancellor of the exchequer in the event of his persevering. He said that if I gave an affirmative reply he would persevere with the commission, and I think intimated that except on this condition he would not. I said that the working of the coalition since its formation in December 1852 had been to me entirely satisfactory, but that I was not prepared to co-operate in its continuation under any other head than Lord Aberdeen. I think that though perfectly satisfied to be in a Peclite government which had whigs or radicals in it, I was not ready to be in a whig government which had Peclites in it. It took a long time, with my slow-moving and tenacious character, for the Ethiopian to change his skin.

In the paper that I have already mentioned, as recording what, when all was near an end, he took to be some of the errors of his life, Mr. Gladstone names as one of those errors this refusal in 1855 to join Lord Lansdowne. 'I can hardly suppose,' he says, more than forty years after that time, 'that the eventual failure of the Queen's overture to Lord Lansdowne was due to my refusal; but that refusal undoubtedly constituted one of his difficulties and helped to bring about the result. I have always looked back upon it with pain as a serious and even gross error of judgment. It was, I think obnoxious fetter was struck off. years later in the life of an administration of his own the and ample.' So they were, and so remained, until seventeen applying a church test to fellowships in colleges are clear Aladstone wrote, 'in the full belief that the means of shall in good time perceive. 'We have proceeded,' Mr. the bachelor's degree. Tests in other forms remained, as we removed, not only on admission to the university, but from of time.' In the end the church of England test was plaint, are often found virtually to dispose of it for a length country, and which by taking the edge off a matter of comarrangements that seem to suit the practical habits of this The new clause he described as 'one of those incomplete of degrees, honours, or emoluments, should be left open. the governing and teaching functions, whether in the way now, in the church of England, but that everything outside the colleges, halls, and private halls, should be retained, as teaching and governing function in the university and in his dealing with the question, should be that the whole bill was the laying of an unhallowed hand upon the ark of grasped administrative offices. Again, the principle of the a chance, see how they rushed into political conventions and moment the revolution of 1848 gave the German professors House of Commons, and not to professors' chairs.' still ambition in England will look to public life and to the Oxford professor two thousand a year instead of two hundred, and you may depend upon it, that though you may give an parliament. We, on the contrary, are a nation of action, professors only because they could not become members of to Oxford was nonsense. The great men of Germany became talk about the erudite professors of Germany as so superior why should they hurry to reform the universities? stitution (referring, to the withdrawal of Lord John's lili If government, he asked, could defer a reform of the conappearance on the page of Hansard relieves a dull discussion. gravity all the regulation manæuvres of opposition, and his division on the second reading, but he executed with entire istic masterpiece from Mr. Disraeli. He had not taken a The debates did not close without at least one characterbut rather different forms of the same principles connected with CHAP. different habits and temperaments. He said that Lord Palmerston had agreed to lead the House of Commons for him, he going as first minister to the Lords; but he did not mention any other alteration. Upon the whole his tone was low and doubtful. asked whether my answer was to be considered as given, or whether I would take time. But I said as there was no probability that my ideas would be modified by reflection, it would not be fair to him to ask any delay.

OHAI VI F.TÆ

ÆT. 46.

With the single exception of Lord Palmerston, none of his colleagues would have anything to do with Lord John, some even declining to go to see him. Wood came to Mr. Gladstone, evidently in the sense of the Palmerston premiership. He declared that Aberdeen was impossible, to which, says Mr. Gladstone, 'I greatly demurred.'

17.

Thus the two regular party leaders had failed; Lord Aberdeen, the coalition leader, was almost universally known to be out of the question; the public was loudly clamouring for Lord Palmerston. A Palmerston ministry was now seen to be inevitable. Were the Peelites, then, having refused Lord Derby, having refused Lord John, having told Lord Lansdowne that he had better form a system of homogeneous whigs, now finally to refuse Lord Palmerston, on no better ground than that they could not have Lord Aberdeen, whom nobody save themselves would consent on any terms to have? To propound such a question was to answer it. Lord Aberdeen himself, with admirable freedom from egotism, pressed the point that in addition to the argument of public necessity, they owed much to their late whig colleagues, 'who behaved so nobly and so generously towards us after Lord John's resignation.'

'I have heard club talk and society talk,' wrote an adherent to Mr. Gladstone late one night (February 4), 'and I am sure that in the main any government containing good names in the cabinet, provided Lord John is not in it, will obtain general Lord Clarendon is universally, or nearly so, looked

.Cr. 45.

'AI

CHAP.

bill of 1854, or at least by one enactment in it, the abolition of close fellowships, which has done more for us than all the other enactments of the measure put together.' The indirect effects, says the same writer in words of pregnant praise, in stimulating the spirit of improvement among us, have been no less important than the specific reforms enacted by it.2

III

The following speeches made by projected edition of his collected speeches -On the introduction of Mark Patrison, p. 24. $\mathbf{B}^{\mathbf{\lambda}}$ their own ill-educated sons appointed under the new system. to bestir themselves, and because they cannot hope to get introduction of well-educated, active men, will force them anys the writer, 'do not like the new plan, because the papers on this subject. The existing corps of civil servants, leading reformer, preserved by Mr. Gladstone among his meant is forcibly described in a private memorandum of a men like Manning and Spedding out. What patronage the existing system if it brought eminent men in, had driven outsiders. Mr. Gladstone was not slow to point out that discouraged and kept back by the sight of prizes falling to ranks a poor breed, or else that the meritorious men were tion that either the civil service trained up within its own -were introduced from without, with the obvious implieapointments in the service—the Merivales, Taylors, Farrers eminent men who held what were called the staff apqualifying examination and periods of probation. important of them, nominees were partially tested by result of patronage, though in some, and those not the more civil employment under the crown was in all the offices the proposed by a government.' On the system then reigning, one of the greatest improvements in public affairs ever plan of throwing open the civil service to competition as an official at the India House, did not hesitate 'to hail the of reform affected the civil service. J. S. Mill, then himself Another of the most far-reaching changes of this era

Mr. Gladatone on the Oxford bill were deemed by him of sufficient importance to be included in the speeches:—On the introduction of the bill, March 19 (1854); on the second reading, April 7; during the committee stage, April 27, June 1, 22, 23, and July 27.

CHAP VI.

of stability; and joining Lord Palmerston's cabinet would be a new coalition. He said he rather applied that phrase to a junction with Derby. I quite agreed we could not join Derby except under conditions which might not be realised; but if we did it, it would be a reunion, not a coalition. In coalition the separate existence is retained. I referred to the great instances of change of party these took place when parties were divided by great questions of principle; there were none such now, and no one could say that the two sides of the House were divided by anything more than this, that one was rather more stationary, the other more movable. He said, 'True, the differences are on the back benches.'

in our time; Palmerston himself, and Stanley with Graham. But

I said I had now for two years been holding my mind in suspense upon the question I used to debate with Newcastle, who used to argue that we should grow into the natural leaders of the liberal party. I said, it is now plain this will not be; we get on very well with the independent liberals, but the whigs stand as an opaque body between us and them, and moreover, there they will stand and ought to stand.

Lord Palmerston came a little after two, and remained perhaps an hour. Lord Lansdowne had promised to join him if he formed an administration on a basis sufficiently broad. He wished me to retain my office; and dwelt on the satisfactory nature of my relations with the liberal party. He argued that Lord Aberdeen was excluded by the vote on Monday night; and that there was now no other government in view. My argument was adverse, though without going to a positive conclusion. I referred to my conversation of Wednesday, Jan. 31, in favour of a homogeneous government at this juncture.

At half-past eleven I went to Lord Aberdeen's and stayed about an hour. His being in the Palmerston cabinet which had been proposed, was, he said out of the question; but his velleities seemed to lean rather to our joining, which surprised me. He was afraid of the position we should occupy in the public eye if we declined. . . .

Feb. 5.—The most irksome and painful of the days; beginning with many hours of anxious consultation to the best of our power, and ending amidst a storm of disapproval almost

CHYLLEE A

WAR FINANCE-TAX OR LOAN

(†98I)

THE expenses of a war are the moral check which it has pleased the Almighty to impose upon the ambition and lust of conquest, that are inherent in so many nations. There is pomp and circumstance, there is glory and excitement about war, which, notwithstanding the miseries it entails, invests it with charms in the eyes of the community, and tends to blind men to those evils to a fearful and dangerous degree. The necessity of meeting from year to year the expenditure which it entails is a salutary and wholesome check, making them feel what they are about, and making them measure the cost of the benefit upon which they may calculate.—Gleasemethe cost of the benefit upon which they may calculate.

CHAP.
V.
ÆT. 45.

The operation on the South Sea stock was worse than a already described, to have no attraction for the fundholder. The proposal for conversion proved, under circumstances tent department concerned to have fallen into such an error time, Mr. Gladstone observes, in which he knew the excelin no more than a fraction of the estimated sum—the only merease in their proceeds. But the succession duty brought duties of customs, excise, and stamps had all been followed by out they were not without weak points. Reductions in the plans of 1853 had, in the main, proved a remarkable success, much criticism alike from city experts and plain men. interval the chancellor of the exchequer was exposed to next in a completed scheme two months later. During the doses, first in a provisional budget for half a year (March 6), sugar, and malt. The draught was administered in two pence to fourteen pence), and raising the duties on spirits, genious than bluntly doubling the income tax (from seven THE finance of 1854 offered nothing more original or in-

.6681

.VI

BOOK

in the hands of Lord Aberdeen To Herbert, of course, it was a simple release from a difficulty. Palmerston had told Cardwell, 'Gladstone feels a difficulty first infused into him by Graham; Argyll and Herbert have made up their minds to do what Gladstone does.' Newcastle joined us, and was in Herbert's sense. I repeated again that Lord Aberdeen's declaration of consense. I repeated again that Lord Aberdeen's declaration of confidence quaphed me to soo you want to isining

I went to Lord Aberdeen in his official room after his return from Palmerston. It was only when I left that room to-day that I began to realise the pang of parting There he stood, struck down from his eminence by a vote that did not dare to avow its own purpose, and for his wisdom and virtue; there he stood endeavouring to cure the ill consequences to the public of the wrong inflicted upon himself, and as to the point immediately within reach successful in the endeavour. I ventured, however, within reach successful in the endeavour. I ventured, however, to tell him that I hoped our conduct and reliance on him would tend to his eminence and honour, and said, 'You are not to be of the cabinet, but you are to be its tutelary deity.'

I had a message from Palmerston that he would answer me, but at night I went up to him.

٨

The rush of events was now somewhat slackened. Lord John called on Graham, and complained of the Peelites for having selfishly sought too many offices, alluding to what also thought they had made a great mistake in joining Palmerston. He seemed sore about Mr. Gladstone, and told Graham that Christopher, a stout tory, had said that if Aladstone joined Derby, a hundred of the party would withdraw their allegiance. At the party meeting on Feb. 21, withdraw their allegiance. At the party meeting on Feb. 21, Lord Derby was received with loud cries of 'No Puseyites; No papists,' and was much reprehended for asking Gladstone and Graham to join.

L ought to have mentioned before, Mr. Gladstone writes here, that, during our conferences at the admiralty, Lord Aberdeen expressed great compunction for having allowed the country to be dragged without adequate cause into the out attracting much notice; subsequently it excites interest; in which anythical history arises. An event happens withtract, they had done nothing of the sort. This is the way conversion. Alr. Gladstone proved that, as matter of recorded others pretended that they had foreseen the failure of the in the fourth nearly five millions and a half. Disraeli and almost the same, in the third more than five and a quarter, first year they were four millions and a half, in the second bills of the chancellor whom this figure shocks? reached three millions and a half. How much were the tho exchequer 'My deficiency bills,' eried Mr. Chadstone, beer had once himself for four years been chancellor of reproached him for the amount of his deficiency bills. the spice of the sarcasm that the House loves. A peer had they had taken the wrong points. Nor did he leave out Even where their ease had something in it, he showed that exchequer bill, and all the areana of the public accounts." bank, the right interest on an exchequer bond and an mastery of the proper amount of gold to be kept at the after all the best training for an intimate and triumphant

TH:

For this budget no genius, only courage, was needed; but Mr. Chadstone advanced in connection with it a doctrine that raised great questions, moral, political, and economic, and again illustrated that characteristic of his mind which always made some broad general principle a necessity of action. All through 1854, and in a sense very often since, parliament was agitated by Mr. Chadstone's bold proposition that the cost of war should be met by taxation at the time, that the cost of war should be neet by taxation at the time, and not by loans to be paid back by another generation. He did not advance his abstract doctrine without qualification. This, in truth, Mr. Chadstone hardly ever did, and tion. This, in truth, Mr. Chadstone hardly ever did, and then peoplo look back upon the time now passed, and see things not as they are or were, but through the haze of distance—they see them as they wish them to have been, and what they wish them to have been, that they were,

I Not many years before (1838), studies; their influence on vigour as Talleyrand had surprised the French well as on finessee of mind; on the institute by a paper in which he skilful ecclesiastical diplomatists passed a enlogy on strong theological that those studies had formed.

1822.

BOOK

position for an inquiry by a select committee into the state of the army in the Crimea.'

were agreed) on the 6th, before our decision was declared, having ascertained from Palmerston (upon this recital we which had its confidence. I also, he says, 'recited my parliament would not inflict this committee on a government on the government. They had a right to believe that the House. 'I said that the committee was itself a censure not, as things stood, possess the confidence of a majority of partial resignation. Second, that it was clear that they did was an evil greater than any that could arise from a total or the recognition of this transfer by the executive government, the enemy and operating by the side of our French allies, and House of Commons, with respect to an army in the face of of the functions of the executive to a select committee of the dwelt mainly on these two points—That the proposed transfer justified on grounds which do not require a second?' than allow it? In what way can the first resignation be members of which (except one) have already resigned rather crown? (2) whether that government ought to allow it, the or other body, especially to one not under the control of the allow its (now) principal duty to be delegated to a committee the question arises, (1) whether any government ought to was then; therefore it is not one whit less a censure; and compatible with the functions of the executive now than it executive; therefore we resign! But it is not a whit more the functions of the executive, therefore it is a censure on the The appointment of areh a committee is incompatible with decision by the House of Commons. Our language was: we were in. Why did we go out? Because of that very staring them in the face, he replied: -- Before we were out, struction with the decision of the House for a committee scope. To the argument that they accepted office on reconwith an ingenuity for which the situation gave boundless Graham fought with extreme tenacity, and the first of them Time did not remove difficulties. Mr. Gladstone and confidence of the House of Commons, or to be responsible Graham did not feel disposed to govern without the

Allow me also to say that I think in your comparison of the effect of taxes and loans you have looked (p. 262) too much to the effect on labour at the moment. Capital and labour are in permanent competition for the division of the fruits of production. When in years of war say twenty millions annually are provided by loan say for three, five, or ten years, then two consequences follow.

1. An immense factitions stimulus is given to labour at the time—and thus much more labour is brought into the market.

2. When that stimulus is mithdenim on an ententity of

2. When that stimmins is withdrawn an augmented quantity of labour is left to compete in the market with a greatly diminished quantity of capital.

Here is the story of the misery of great masses of the Buglish people after 1815, or at the least a material part of that story.

I hold by the doctrine that war loans are in many ways a great evil: but I admit their necessity, and in fact the budget of 1855 was handed over by me to Sir George Lewis, and underwent in his hands little alteration unless such as, with the growing demands of the war, I should myself have had to make in it, i.e. some, not very considerable, enlargement.

Writing a second letter to Northcote a few days later (August II, 1862), he goes a little deeper into the subject:—'The general question of loans a taxes for war numbers is one of

will be laid upon property: and that, in war, property will bear a war comes, it is quite certain that a large share of the war taxes the labour market, reduce the rate of wages. But again, when mass of persons are dismissed from public employment, and, flooding drawn from commerce. When war ends, on the contrary, a great the outset, and for some time, to be larger than the sums withtaxes. The sums added to the public expenditure are likely at labour of the country is well able to bear some augmentation of the wages of labour on the whole have a tendency to rise, and the penditure should be defrayed from taxes. When war breaks out opposed to capital, that as large a share as possible of war ex-I have not the least doubt that it is for the interest of labour, as financial system, and by no means denying the necessity of loans, print. But assuming as data the established principles of our the utmost interest, but one that I have never seen worked out in The general question of loans v. taxes for war purposes is one of said my office had been offered him. This was after being refused by Cardwell and Baring. He asked my advice as to accepting it. This I told him I could not give. He asked if I would assist him with information in case of his accepting. I answered that he

1855. BOOK

This I told him I could not give. He saked if I would assist him with information in case of his accepting. I answered that he might command me precisely as if instead of resigning I had only removed to another department. I then went over some of the matters needful to be made known. On Tuesday he came again, acquainted me with his acceptance, and told me he had been acquainted by my promise.

the way stopped up against expectants, which led to subdivision, ministerial side overcharged with an excess of official men, and tion, and that both sides of the House were demoralised-the two political parties; that at present we were in a false posimi noitesinegro blo eti ot bearmer examisation in that she would have little peace or comfort in these matters, present state of things, and I frankly gave my opinion to II.M. of making arrangements for earrying on the government in the that our decision had been wrong. She spoke of the difficulty out the conversation did she in any manner indicate an opinion H.M. expressed her confidence of this, and at no time throughwhat was dest for the interests of the crown and the country. that we had all been governed by no other desire than to do ness of being her servants. I trusted H.M. would believe was the first duty of all those who had the honour and happibecause I thought that to have no reserve whatever with H.M. cabinet which pointed to this result, and that I spoke as I did, I answered that we had then already had a discussion in the from the language I then used that this was about to happen. on Saturday night [Feb. 17, when he had dined at the palace] painful effort of my public life. The Queen said she was afraid which had required me to surrender them had been the most received them with great pain. I answered that the decision The Queen, in taking them over, was pleased to say that she resign the seals, and had an audience of about twenty minutes. This day at a quarter to three I attended at the palace to

"Tonk to the expression come back to the cabinet and took mod succeeded the colonial office, which Sir George ralty, Lord John, "Jenna, agreed to where he succeeded Palmerston."

1 While Lewis went to the exchequer, Sir Charles Wood succeeded Graham at the admiralty, Lord John, then on his way to Vienna, agreed to

OOK V.

TIT

The year closed with an incident that created a considerable stir, and might by misadventure have become What has been truly called a warm and promemorable. longed dispute 1 arose out of Mr. Gladstone's removal of a certain official from his post in the department of woods and forests. As Lord Aberdeen told the Queen that he could not easily make the case intelligible, it is not likely that I should succeed any better, and we may as well leave the thick dust undisturbed. Enough to say that Lord John Russell thought the dismissal harsh; that Mr. Gladstone stood his ground against either the reversal of what he had done, or any proceedings in parliament that might look like contrition, but was willing to submit the points to the decision of colleagues; that Lord John would submit no point to colleagues 'affecting his personal honour'-to such degrees of heat can the quicksilver mount even in a cabinet If such quarrels of the great are painful, thermometer. there is some compensation in the firmness, patience, and benignity with which a man like Lord Aberdeen strove to appease them. Some of his colleagues actually thought that Lord John would make this paltry affair a plea for resigning, while others suspected that he might find a better excuse in the revival of convocation. As it happened, a graver occasion offered itself.

¹ Walpole's Russell, ii. p. 243 n.

1855. IV. 1855.

was perhaps the greatest mistake of his public life. the following summer that his assent to joining Palmerston ment, is certain. Graham even wrote to Mr. Gladstone in persuasion in joining, against their own feelings and judg-That they both regretted that they had yielded to over-Chadstone could not bear a futile and perilous inquiry. the obvious want of the confidence of parliament, and that evidence is the other way; that Graham could not resist alleged reason why they left was not the real one. All the new minister; that he worked on Gladstone; and that the letters; that from the first he was bent on overthrowing the helped to defend him in the matter of opening Alazzini's could not forgive Palmerston for not having (as he thought) politic or wise. Idle gossip long prevailed, that Graham the case was hardly urgent enough to make withdrawal mittee.2 But right as was his judgment on the merits, yet time entirely justified his description of the Sebastopol comthat he should have been slow to acquiesce. The result in used by Mr. Gladstone about the inquiry, we cannot wonder great affairs men's sight proves short. After the language would be astonished if it knew how often in the pressure of afterwards that this omission was a mistake. no doubt both stated and understood. Graham admitted government was formed, though the intention to refuse was enough beforehand on the refusal of the committee when the stone, and Palmerston were none of them emphatic or explicit own fate. The short truth seems to be that Graham, Gladadministration inight be applied with peculiar force to his papers declared that Gladstone's epitaph over the Aberdeen the country than Cobden and Bright themselves. The news-For a time Mr. Gladstone was only a degree less unpopular in sorry when Palmerston asked them to join his government. ites had always been odious, and they had been extremely at Brooks's Club was aproarious, for to the whigs the Peelworse and more unpatriotic than Lord John's. The delight Lord Clarendon pronounced their conduct to be actually

t Greeille, III. i. p. 216.

2 Mr. Gladatone projected and the Neapolitan letters, to Lord Aberparily executed some public letters deen.

00K [V. bility was collective, and this without a word of consultation with a single colleague, is a transaction happily without a precedent in the history of modern English cabinets.¹ It opened an intricate and unexpected chapter of affairs.

The ministerial crisis of 1855 was unusually prolonged; it was interesting as a drama of character and motive; it marked a decisive stage in the evolution of party, and it was one of the turning points in the career of the subject of this biography. Fortunately for us, Mr. Gladstone has told in his own way the whole story of what he calls this 'sharp and difficult passage in public affairs,' and he might have added that it was a sharp passage in his own life. His narrative, with the omission of some details now dead and indifferent, and of a certain number of repetitions, is the basis of this chapter.

. I

On the day following Lord John's letter the cabinet met, and the prime minister told them that at first he thought it meant the break-up of the government, but on further consideration he thought they should hold on, if it could be done with honour and utility. Newcastle suggested his own resignation, and the substitution of Lord Palmerston in his place. Palmerston agreed that the country, rightly or wrongly, wished to see him at the war office, but he was ready to do whatever his colleagues thought best. The whigs thought resignation necessary. Mr. Gladstone thought otherwise, and scouted the suggestion that as Newcastle was willing to resign, Lord John might come Lord John himself actually sent a sort of message to know whether he should attend the cabinet. Lord Aberdeen carried all their resignations to the Queen. These she declined to accept, and she 'urged with the greatest eagerness that the decision should be reconsidered.' It is hard at this distance of time to understand how any cabinet under national circumstances of such gravity could have thought of the ignominy of taking to flight from a motion of censure, whatever a single colleague like Lord John

¹ See Chap. x. of Lord Stanmore's Earl of Aberdeen.

CHAPTER VII

POLITICAL ISOLATION

(9981-9981)

ήκιστα γάρ πόλεμος έπλ ρητοίς χωρεί.—Τιτυς, i. 1929. War is the last thing in all the world to go according to programme.

STATESMEN are invincibly slow to learn the lesson put by Thucydides long centuries ago into the mouth of the Athenian envoys at Sparta, and often repeated in the same immortal pages, that war defies all calculations, and if it be protracted comes to be little more than mere matter of chance, over which the combatants have no control. A thousand times since has history proved this to be true. Policy is mastered by events; unforeseen sequels develop novel pretexts, or grow into startling and lateful necessities; the minister finds that he is fastened to an inexorable sities; the minister finds that he is fastened to an inexorable chain.

Mr. Gladstone now had this fatal law of mundane things brought home to him. As time went on, he by rapid intuition gained a truer insight into the leading facts. He realised that Mahometan institutions in the Ottoman empire were decrepit; that the youthful and vigorous elements in European Turkey were crushed under antiquated and worning reflection how the occupation of the Principalities had been discussed, day after day and month after month, entirely as a question of the payment of forty thousand pounds a year to Turkey, or as a violation of her rights as suserain, but never in reference to the well-being, happiness, freedom, but never in reference to the well-heing, happiness, freedom, or peace of the inhabitants. He still held that the war in its origin was just, for it had been absolutely necessary, he its origin was just, for it had been absolutely necessary, he

BOOK ST.

1855. At

to enjoy the emoluments of office and to wield the sceptre of power, so long as no man had the courage to question their existence: they saw the storm gathering over the country; they heard the agonising accounts that were almost daily received of the sick and wounded in the East. These things did not move them, but so soon as a member of opposition raised his hand to point the thunderbolt, they became conscience-stricken into a sense of guilt, and hoping to escape punishment, they ran away from duty.' Such would be their epitaph. Of the proposed inquiry itself,—an inquiry into the conduct of generals and troops actually in the field, and fighting by the side of, and in concert with, foreign allies, he observed-Your inquiry will never take place as a real inquiry; or, if it did, it would lead to nothing but confusion and disturbance, increased disasters, shame at home and weakness abroad; it would convey no consolation to those whom you seek to aid, but it would carry malignant joy to the hearts of the enemies of England; and, for my part, I shall ever rejoice, if this motion is carried to-night, that my own last words as a member of the cabinet of the Earl of Aberdeen have been words of solemn and earnest protest against a proceeding which has no foundation either in the constitution or in the practice of preceding parliaments; which is useless and mischievous for the purpose which it appears to contemplate; and which, in my judgment, is full of danger to the power, dignity and usefulness of the Commons of England.' A journalistic observer, while deploring the speaker's adherence to the dark dogmatisms of medieval religionists, admits that he had never heard so fine a speech. The language, he says, was devoid of redundance. The attitude was calm. Mr. Gladstone seemed to feel that he rested upon the magnitude of the argument, and had no need of the assistance of bodily vehemence of manner. His voice was clear, distinct, and flexible, without monotony. It was minute dissection without bitterness or illhumoured innuendo. He sat down amid immense applause from hearers admiring but unconvinced. Mr. Gladstone himself records of this speech: 'Hard and heavy work,

z See Appendix.

strength, so as to uphold an arbitrary standard of the balance of power—this he regarded as mischief and chimera, Rightly he dreaded the peril of alliances shifting from day to day, like quicksands and sea-shoals—Austria moved by a hundred strong and varying currents, France drawing by unforeseen affinities towards Russia, Every war with alliances, he once said, should be short, sharp, decisive, a alliances, he once said, should be short, sharp, decisive, animus against old friends. Herbert insisted that the Manwhat was worse, doctrinaires suspected of a spice of personal Lord Palmerston. They were stamped as doctrinaires, and doors. As it was, they threw the game into the hands of to tuo elqoeq ot estable advice to people out of friends said, they might have preached moderation to If Gladstone and Graham had gone slower, their very men we ought to avoid. As advocates for ending the war, they were out of court, for they were against beginning reaped by us. Ther the purposes of peace, they were the he cried, would be derived by them, and all the disrepute whole advantage of co-operation with the Manchester men, the war. Herbert was vehement in his remonstrances. government, and quitting it, besides, not on the issues of cause with the peace party, immediately after quitting a war Gladstone were grievously mistaken in making common and not unfriendly onlookers thought that Graham and had no more chance than Bright's glowing appeals. Shrewd in war-time is supreme. Mr. Gladstone's trenchant dialectic They ceased to argue, and sheer blatancy, at all times a power, untaken, excitement grew, people forgot the starting point. Meanwhile, as the months went on, Sebastopol still stood though mighty affairs should hang on the turn of the scale. a very slight thing may incline the balance either way, even on the balance of policy between one course and another; and has once left the scabbard. They are all matter of judgment sure aye or no to questions of peace and war, after the sword legitimately as the last. In fact, we can never say a plain logically against the war in all its stages, against the first as parted insisted that every one of his arguments told just as As was to be expected, the colleagues from whom he had to be disinclined. I inquired (1) whether Derby mentioned Graham? (2) Whether he had told Lord Palmerston if his persevering with the commission he had received would depend on the answer to this proposal. (3) How he was himself inclined. He answered the two first questions in the negative, and said as to the third, though not keenly, that he felt disinclined, but that if he refused it would be attributed to his contemplating another result, which other result he considered would be agreeable to the country. I then argued strongly with him that though he might form a government, and though if he formed it, he would certainly start it amidst immense clapping of hands, yet he could not have any reasonable prospect of stable parliamentary support; on the one hand would stand Derby with his phalanx, on the other Lord J. Russell, of necessity a centre and nucleus of discontent, and between these two there would and could be no room for a parliamentary majority such as would uphold his government. He argued only rather faintly the other way, and seemed rather to come to my way of thinking.

BOOK stre

1855.

00K IV. 855.

I said that even if the proposition were entertained, there would be much to consider; that I thought it clear, whatever else was doubtful, that we could not join without him, for in his absence the wound would not heal kindly again, that I could not act without Lord Aberdeen's approval, nor should I willingly separate myself from Graham; that if we joined, we must join in force. But I was disposed to wish that if all details could be arranged, we should join in that manner rather than that Derby should give up the commission, though I thought the best thing of all would be Derby forming a ministry of his own men, provided only he could get a good or fair foreign secretary instead of Clarendon, who in any case would be an immense loss. . . .

I went off to speak to Lord Aberdeen, and Palmerston went to speak to Clarendon, with respect to whom he had told Derby that he could hardly enter any government which had not Clarendon at the foreign office. When we reassembled, I asked Lord Palmerston whether he had made up his mind for himself independently of us, inasmuch as I thought that if he had, that was enough to close the whole question? He answered, Yes; that he should tell Derby he did not think he could render him useful sisted in a war condemned by him as unnecessary was scandal of a minister remaining in a government that perhave ended the war and led to an honourable peace. at the beginning of May the Austrian proposal ought to sitting in the cabinet, though he had held the opinion that war. At the very same time Lord John Russell was still or four most masterly deliverances evoked by the Crimean walls of parliament. In sober fact, it was one of the three bodings; the most unpatriotic speech ever heard within the and vindictive howl, of savage curses and dolorous foreand the trick of the stage actor; a mixture of pious grimace performances as something between the rant of the fanatic papers thought themselves safe in describing one of these hour unfortunately his influence was gone. Great newstenable, and he defended it with unsurpassed force. For the ordinary power of every kind. His position was perfectly House during the session of 1855 in two speeches of extraintolerable, and Lord John resigned (July 16).

1822

'AT'

BOOK

the head of a victorious army in the capital of the enemy. or faction to discover humiliation in a treaty dictated at would have been difficult in this case, he said, for patriotism The single exception was the peace of Paris in 1814. It peace of Versailles in 1783, and the peace of Amiens in 1801. Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, the peace of Paris in 1763, the He cited the peace of Utrecht in 1713, the peace of tised as humiliating and degrading, ignominious, hollow and cluded at the termination of our great wars had been stigmahis friends that, with a single exception, every treaty conmind was indubitably true. Well might Aberdeen recall to Bright, and Co. for anything.' 1 His account of the public British nation is unanimous, for I cannot reckon Cobden, conditions deemed by her essential were not secured. than a preliminary. England would go on by herself, if To drive the Russians out of the Crimea was to be no more 'rill then begin—a danger of peace and not a danger of war: Palmerston, 'Our danger,' he said in remarkable words, the summer of 1855, but this brought new alarms to Lord The hopes of the speedy fall of Sebastopol brightened in sions when he took office offered him so fine an opportunity as this; but he missed it.'

¹ Ashley, ii. pp. 320, 325.

On the previous day, Mr. Gladstone records:—'Saw Mr. Disraeli in the House of Lords and put out my hand, which was very kindly accepted.' To nobody was the hour fraught with more bitter mortification than to Mr. Disraeli, who beheld a golden chance of bringing a consolidated party into the possession of real power flung away.

Π

Next, at the Queen's request, soundings in the whig and Peelite waters were undertaken by Lord Lansdowne, and he sent for Mr. Gladstone, with a result that to the latter was ever after matter of regret.

Fcb. 2.—In consequence of a communication from Lord Lansdowne, I went to him in the forenoon and found him just returned from Windsor. He trusted I should not mind speaking freely to him, and I engaged to do it, only premising that in so crude and dark a state of facts, it was impossible to go beyond first impressions. We then conversed on various combinations, as (1) Lord J. Russell, premier, (2) Lord Palmerston, (3) Lord Clarendon, (4) Lord Lansdowne himself. Of the first I doubted whether, in the present state of feeling, he could get a ministry on its legs. In answer to a question from him, I added that I thought, viewing my relations to Lord Aberdeen and to Newcastle, and his to them also, the public feeling would be offended, and it would not be for the public interest, if I were to form part of his government (i.e. Russell's). Of the second I said that it appeared to me Lord Palmerston could not obtain a party majority. Aloof from him would stand on the one hand Derby and his party, on the other Lord J. Russell, who I took it for granted would never serve under him. Whatever the impression made by Russell's recent conduct, yet his high personal character and station, forty years career, onchalf of it in the leadership of his party, and the close connection of his name with all the great legislative changes of the period, must ever render him a power in the state, and render it impossible for a government depending on the liberal party to live independently of him. I also hinted at injurious effects which delight. The only rest he ever knew was change of effort. to which the putting forth of power was both necessity and could find. This was only emblematic of a temperament and vigorously breast the steepest bluffs and hills that he spell of serious work—he would stride forth staff in hand, and nothing was ever allowed to break or mutilate the daily upon the shore, but when the morning's labour was over-His children observed that he never lounged or strolled the most definite of his pursuits for two years or more. book on Homer, a striking piece of literature that became intensity of the times in the systematic production of his firmament above us. He now found a shelter from the out stars and aron has nus lo, adro has spacious suffered, as in narrower natures sometimes happens, to blot they took their place with other things, and were never 1856. were what they ought to be, a very serious part of life; but agitations of politics can never submerge. Political interests of my depth.' Alr: Gladstone was one of the men whom the ineffectual that the Crimean war was only the sangulary The vindication of the standing European order proved so Mahometan dominion there was never a beginning normalight shadow of smoke. Of the confidently promised reform of educed Turkish rule ever six millions of her subjects to the Principalities was raised in a form that in a couple of years oven at the Congress of Paris the question of the Danubian profited. The integrity of Turkey was so ill confirmed that any of its material interests. It was our French ally who arms, nor the power of its diplomacy, nor the strength of last victory at Waterloo did not now enhance the glory of its had been flung into the abyes. The nation that had won its hundred thousand men had perished. Countless treasure ships of every nation excluded from its waters. history, that the Black Sea was neutralised, and all warthe reader, with a view to a future incident in Mr. Chadstone's Paris (March 30, 1856), as to which I need only remind many checks and diplomatic difficulties, in the Treaty of peace were opened tolerably soon afterwards, ending, after siege of three hundred and fifty days. Negotintions for While he was on the Welsh coast Sebastopol foll, after a injurious to the public, if it contributed to the substitution as prime minister of Lord Palmerston for Lord Lansdowne,—a personage of greater dignity, and I think a higher level of political principle. There was no defect in Lord Lansdowne sufficient to warrant my refusal. He would not have been a strong or very active prime minister; but the question of the day was the conduct of the war, and I had no right to take exception to him as a head in connection with this subject. His attitude in domestic policy was the same as Palmerston's, but I think he had a more unprejudiced and liberal mind, though less of motive force in certain directions.'

BOOK

III

The next day Mr. Gladstone called on Lord Aberdeen, who for the first time let drop a sort of opinion as to their duties in the crisis on one point; hithertofore he had restrained himself. He said, 'Certainly the most natural thing under the circumstances, if it could have been brought about in a satisfactory form, would have been that you should have joined Derby.' On returning home, Mr. Gladstone received an important visitor and a fruitless visit.

At half-past two to-day Lord John Russell was announced; and sat till three—his hat shaking in his hand. A communication had reached him late last night from the Queen, charging him with the formation of a government, and he had thought it his duty to make the endeavour. I repeated to him what I had urged on Lord Lansdowne, that a coalition with advantages has also weaknesses of its own, that the late coalition was I thought fully justified by the eircumstances under which it took place, but at this juncture it had broken down. This being so, I thought what is called a homogeneous government would be best for the public, and most likely to command approval; that Derby if he could get a good foreign minister would have had immense advantages with respect to the great questions of war and peace. Lord John agreed as to Derby; thought that every one must have supported him, and that he ought to have persevered.

I held to my point, adding that I did not think Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston represented opposite principles, from whichever side the government were formed, so long as we were not absolutely incorporated into one or the other of the two great parties. For though we had few positively and regularly following us, yet we had indirect relations with others on both sides of the House, which tended to relax, and so far disable, party connections, and our existence as a section encouraged the formation of other sections all working with similar effects. I earried my feeling individually so far upon the subject as even to be ready, if I had to act alone, to surrender my seat in parliament, rather than continue a cause of disturbance to any government to rather than continue a cause of disturbance to any government to rather than continue a cause of disturbance to any government to but 'reunion of a body with a body.' contemplated an isolated return to the conservative ranks, urgency. He always protested that he never at any time The struggle in Mr. Gladstone's mind went on with growing it. Of these approaches in the spring of 1856 nothing came. political junction, and which might be seriously affected by upon which we might have to consider the question of and that I took it as one of the data in the case before us looking to it with doubt and dread, I felt he had this right; concerned) to hold the lead if he pleased; that besides my of the saddle; that it must rest with him (so far as we were repeated, that I thought we could not bargain Disraeli out to me, and could not be with Disraeli. I had said and lead the House of Commons? This he thought must come the question was of the most vital consequence, Who should went straight to what was a real point. 'He observed that doubted the expediency of such communications, and Graham at his request, had summoned for the purpose. to Graham, Herbert, and Cardwell, whom Lord Aberdeen, This exchange of views with Lord Derby he fully reported

1826.

ΊΛ

BOOK

Besides his sense of the vital importance of the reconstruction of the party system, he had two other high related sims. The commanding position that had first been held in the objects of his activity by the church, then, for a considerable space, by the colonies, was now filled by finance. As he put it in a letter to his sympathetic brother Robertson: He

K on as essential. Next to him, I think you are considered of vital importance in your present office. After all, rightly or wrongly, Lord Palmerston is master of the situation in the country; he is looked upon as the man. If the country sees you and Sidney Herbert holding aloof from him, it will be said the Peelites are selfish intriguers.' The same evening, another correspondent said to Mr. Gladstone: 'Two or three people have come in since eleven o'clock with the news of Brooks's and the Reform. Exultation prevails there, and the certainty of Palmerston's success to-morrow. There is a sort of rumour prevalent that Lord Palmerston may seek Lord J. Russell's aid. . . . This would, of course, negative all idea of your joining in the concern. Otherwise a refusal would be set down as sheer impracticability, or else the selfish ambition of a clique which could not stand alone, and should no longer attempt to do so. If the refusal to join Palmerston is to be a going over to the other side, and a definite junction within a brief space, that is clear and intelligible. But a refusal to join Lord Palmerston and yet holding out to him a promise of support, is a half-measure which no one will understand, and which, I own, I cannot see the grounds to defend.'

We shall now find how after long and strenuous dubitation, the Peelite leaders refused to join on the fifth of February, and then on the sixth they joined. Unpromising from the very first cabinet, the junction was destined to a swift and sudden end. Here is the story told by one of the two leading actors.

Sunday, Feb. 4.—Herbert came to me soon after I left him, and told me Palmerston had at last got the commission. He considered that this disposed of Lord Lansdowne; and seemed himself to be disposed to join. He said we must take care what we were about, and that we should be looked upon by the country as too nice if we declined to join Palmerston; who he believed (and in this I inclined to agree), would probably form a government. He argued that Lord Aberdeen was out of the question; that the vote of Monday night was against him; that the country would not stand him.

No new coalition ought to be formed, I said, without a prospect tician; but then even the consecrated affectations of our this sterling good sense may set many a snare for the poliand the smaller the man, the more will he make of it—that for doing it.' It is true, as the smallest of men may seetwentyfold, as by a system of wheels and pulleys, his power because he has helps and opportunities which multiply the good to the country that he would do when out of office, be a very bad minister indeed, who does not do ten times practice, which the public departments supply. He must command of that powerful machinery for information and within which to serve the country, and for access to the the desire of ardent minds for a larger space and scope The desire for office, said Mr. Gladstone, 'is freely use his powers for the common advantage of his of a public man's ambition, as that in which he can most declarations that office is the natural and proper sphere Palmerston was 'the manly frankness of his habitual One of the not too many things that he admired in Lord always roundly denounced as 'sentimental and mandlin.' repudiation of desire for official power, he at this time and Gladstone was always accustomed to make short work. The Of a certain kind of cant about public life and office Mr.

BOOK Of repud

he supposed reunion must pretty soon come off. A few permoved Mr. Gladstone's expulsion from the Carlton said that for the remnion of the party. Even the nobleman who had peer writes to assure him that there never was such a chance merged himself in the ordinary ruck of liberalism. A tory tive household, for unlike Sir James Graham, he had never himself. He would be a returned prodigal in the conservain a party must yield to a majority, and he stood almost by party. They were credulous, he was ingenious. The minority The tories, they said, wanted a leader, Mr. Gladstone wanted a ing of the next session figure at the head of the opposition. of the day announcing that Mr. Gladstone would at the openof December (1856) articles actually appeared in the prints often give to the public a trick of divination. In the middle with Lord Derby, but the intrinsic probabilities of a caso The world was not in the secret of the communications public life have their snares too.

00K una

[V.

855.

unanimous, not only from the generality, but from our own immediate political friends.

At 10.30 I went to Sir James Graham, who is still in bed, and told him the point to which by hard struggles I had come. case with me was briefly this. I was ready to make the sacrifice of personal feeling; ready to see him (Lord Aberdeen) expelled from the premiership by a censure equally applicable to myself, and yet to remain in my office; ready to overlook not merely the inferior fitness, but the real and manifest unfitness, of Palmerston for that office; ready to enter upon a new venture with him, although in my opinion without any reasonable prospect of parliamentary support, such as is absolutely necessary for the credit and stability of a government-upon the one sole and all-embracing ground that the prosecution of the war with vigour, and the prosecution of it to and for peace, was now the question of the day to which every other must give way. But then it was absolutely necessary that if we joined a cabinet after our overlooking all this and more, it should be a cabinet in which confidence should be placed with reference to war and peace. Was the Aberdeen cabinet without Lord Aberdeen one in which I could place confidence? I answer, No. He was vital to it; his love of peace was necessary to its right and steady pursuit of that great end; if, then, he could belong to a Palmerston cabinet, I might; but without him I could not.

In all this, Sir J. Graham concurred. Herbert came full of doubts and fears, but on the whole adopted the same conclusion. Lord Aberdeen sent to say he would not come, but I wrote to beg him, and he appeared. On hearing how we stood, he said his remaining in the cabinet was quite out of the question; and that he had told Palmerston so yesterday when he glanced at it. But he thought we should incur great blame if we did not; which, indeed, was plainly beyond all dispute.

At length, when I had written and read aloud the rough draft of an answer, Lord Aberdeen said he must strongly advise our joining. I said to him, 'Lord Aberdeen, when we have joined the Palmerston cabinet, you standing aloof from it, will you rise in your place in the House of Lords and say that you give that cabinet your confidence with regard to the question of war and

It all reminds one of the chorus in Greek plays, sagely expostulating with a hero bent on some dread deed of fate. and they would openly break with you in less than a year. would have neither their confidence nor their real good will, to him: 'If you were to join the tory party to-morrow, you whose prejudices are with themselves.' As Graham put it liberal, while the conservatives will always prefer a leader will prefer the men whose antecedents and mottoes are government must be liberal and progressive, the country are essentially progressive, and when the measures of any yet he would always be in a false position. Your opinions respectability into a party that stood much in need of both, told Mr. Gladstone that though he might infuse vigour and Then a reasonable chance might come. Herbert, in his turn, too likely soon to arrive from Palmerston's foreign policy. more tangible reasons would be needed, and they were only policy would be no intelligible ground for changing sides; would be unjustifiable; the bare apprehension of a vicious Lord Derby, after joining Palmerston only the previous year, another line, insisting that to make any sort of approach to probable under Derby and Disraeli? Lord Aberdeen took blessings are to be anticipated; but then are they more of public expenditure; it is not under Palmerston that such must be grafted on a pacific policy and on a moderate scale welfare; you alone and in high office can carry it; but it very spirit of Peel; it would be most conducive to national Your financial scheme, says Graham, is conceived in the sels were ever dictated by sincerer affection and solicitude. viewed the proceeding with entire disfavour, and no coun-His three friends, Graham, Aberdeen, and Herbert, still serve on the subject of public affairs, should it be his desire. I am ready to speak to him in confidence and without reonce his colleague, and placing entire reliance on his honour, tions of party, yet, he proceeds, 'remembering that I was simply as a political leader with whom he was not in relajustified in communicating with Lord Derby, considered ous language to Elwin, that though he should not be Mr. Cladstone wrote (Dec. 13, 1856) in sufficiently circuitcommunication. After much ruminating and consulting,

1856. BOOK

or and

CHYB

inter .

war. So long as he lived, he said with his own depth and force, it would be a weight upon his conscience. He had held similar language to me lately at Argyll House; but when I asked him at what point after the fleet went to Besika Bay it would have been possible to stop short, he alluded to the sommation, which we were encouraged howalluded to the sommation, which we were encouraged however, as he added, by Austria to send; and thought this ever, as he added, by Austria to send; and thought this was the false step.

Tet he did not seem quite firm in the

Dining the same evening at the palace, Mr. Gladstone had tribunal like a select committee. them were to allow them to be brought before another mands in the Crimea, if we without ourselves condemning involve on our part towards those holding responsible conwith vehemenee upon the breach of duty which it would the reconstructed cabinet. Air, Gladstone says he 'argued stood affirmed by a large majority when they took office in sequence of the appointment of the committee, because it struck. One minister said they could not resign in conposed to let the inquiry go forward. On this rock the ship upon it; if they could secure a fair committee, he was disfeeling in the House the night before, that they were set three days later. Palmerston said it was plain from the authority of the crown. The fatal subject came up again government would promise an investigation under the which he said he thought the House would give it up, if The question of the Roebuck committee was raised, on 'acephalous' than ever; 'less order; less unity of purpose.' the gloom of Arr. Gladstone's impressions. He found it more Then came the first cabinet (Feb. 10). It did not relieve 'noimigo,' a conversation on the subject both with the Queen and Prince Albert. 'The latter compared this appointment of a committee to the proceedings of the Convention of France; but still seemed to wish that the government should submit rather than retire. The Queen spoke openly in that sense, and trusted that she should not be given over into the hands of those "who are the least fit to govern." Without any positive and final declaration, I intimated to each that I did positive and final declaration, I intimated to each that I did not think I could bring my mind to acquiesce in the pro-

CHAPTER VIII

GENEEVT ELECTION-NEW MARRIAGE LAW

(L98T)

No wave on the great ocean of Time, when once it has floated past us, can be recalled. All we can do is to watch the new form and motion of the next, and launch upon it to try in the manner our best judgment may suggest our strength and skill.—Gladstone.

In spite of wise counsels of circumspection, Mr. Gladstone, clung to the chances that might come from personal communication between himself and Lord Derby. Under pressure from his friends, he agreed with Lord Derby to put off an interview until after the debate on the address. Then, after parliament met, they took the plunge. We are now at the beginning of February.

This afternoon at three I called on Lord Derby and remained with him above three hours, in prosecution of the correspondence which had passed between us.

I told him that I deliberately disapproved of the government of thord him that I deliberately disapproved of the government. That so proper measures which might lead to its displacement. That strong were my objections that I was continued that any one who inquiring who was to follow, for I was continued that any one who might follow would govern with less prejudice to the public interests. That in the existing state of public affairs I did not pretend to see far, but thus far I saw clearly. I also told him that I felt the isolated position in which I stood, and indeed in which we who are called Peelites all stand, to be a great evil as tending to prolong and aggravate that parliamentary discreding to prolong and aggravate that parliamentary discreding to prolong and aggravate that parliamentary of organization which so much clogs and weakens the working of organization which so much clogs and weakens the working of organization which said I denounced myself as a public nuisance,

ISPL IA. BOOK

899

34 .TÆ

.IV

 \mathtt{CHV}

intentions of the government with respect to the committee; unruly from the doubts that had gone abroad as to the He said that the House of Commons was becoming dangerous. Lord Palmerston met all this by a strong practical unanimously felt to be unprecedented, unconstitutional, and for the granting of a committee which the cabinet had the Peelite group the Duke of Argyll and Canning remained. Mr. Gladstone, Herbert, and Graham then resigned. 1O stock of the country. fortnight after taking office would make them the laughing-majority; to dissolve upon it would be ruinous; to resign a opposed it they should be beaten by an overwhelming that the House was determined to have it; that if they

the committee]. dis wish to begin the affair, on the proposal of the first name [of the old place devoted to ex-ministers. 1 Sir J. Graham expressed the Manchester school to yield us, at any rate for to-morrow, Feb. 22.—After considering various siles, we determined to ask

Cardwell came at 4 to inform me that he had declined to be my play. that he is reluctant; he is, however, the dest card they have to made, or had been made, to Sir Francis Baring, but it seems Cardwell's refusal were at a deadlock. Application was to be part he had acted a fortnight ago. The cabinet on receiving not make such a request to Cardwell, or again play the peculiar note he wrote in obscure terms the next morning), said he could and I considered to be his tone on Monday, but agreeing with a Caning that he disapproved (at variance here with what Graham But Lord Aberdeen, though he told prevail on him to retract. sent Canning to Lord Aberdeen to invoke his aid with Cardwell and It seems that Palmerston and Lord Lansdowne, who assists him, inclination to step into the cabinet over the bodies of his friends. successor; and showed me his letter, which gave as his reason dis-ex - ministers, place to night, i.e. Hayter, the government whip: 'We have arranged to sit in the orthodox Bright and his friends agreed to give hardly otherwise have escaped; and On Feb. 23, he writes to Mr. and comparisons which we could 1'eb. 28-On Sunday, Sir George Lewis called on me, and

This avoids constructions

second bench immediately below the

Rangway.

for us before prayers?? to have some cards put in the place it us. Might I trust to your kindness former. Both spoke very well. It was a night of triumph and Gladstone rose at same time. Speaker called the front; Gladstone on flank; John Russell in rear. Disraeli government was fired into from all quarters. Disraeli in his whole strength. When the time came (Feb. 3), the would appear to him if he did not oppose such plans with utterly reversed. He told his friends that the shade of Peel of our life. By this budget he found them in principle the tariff: these aims have been for fifteen years the labour character, and by associating it with beneficial changes in support to the income-tax by marking its temporary IV. chosen articles of extended consumption; and to conciliate fiscal system by concentrating its pressure on a few well

7381

There is another note of the proceedings on Lewis's for Gladstone, 1 budget:---

our opinions. figures of the case, and drafted two resolutions which expressed a minister of finance. At Lord Aberdeen's we examined the tained it; that it was the worst proposition I had ever heard from the government had bid high for support from those who enterdesire to revive and extend indirect taxation, I must allow that success. I said that if among the opposition there still lingered a resisted on the ground of deficit as a whole, to give a hope of it was hopeless to attack the scheme in detail, and that it must be it in subsequent years; and secondly, to say that in my opinion 1858-9 which is created by this budget, with the augmentations of rol enoillim xis bas evil abetween five and sind out the deficient for that he was to see his friends at noon. So I went to him on my and Cardwell at Lord Aberdeen's, and I knew from Lord Derby Saturday, Feb. 14.—I was engaged to meet Graham, Herbert, so much of his notice of Feb. 3 as had not been set aside by the first. But I did not doubt that Disraeli would still keep hold of As to the second I had no difficulty, could I have acceded to the announcing this to Lord J. Russell as well as to Lord Derby. to insist upon taking the motion of own hands; and The more serious point, however, was that they all wished me

46. A.A.

CHAP,

Were so graciously appreciated by H.M. and withdrew. repelled. . . . I expressed my comfort at finding that our motives when another attempt at encroachment was proposed and firmly traceable in the good conduct of the House of Commons last night, formidable invasion. . . . I thought the effect of the resistance was office that we might make our stand against what we thought a mobiled any resigning colleagues with myself to abandon country was strong enough to encroach. This was the consideraencroachments by the House of Commons. No other body in the year. I could see but one danger to the throne, and that was from has for a long time been gaining and not losing stability from year to that all these troubles are upon the surface, and that the throne is not agreeable. I said, True, madam, but it is a great consolation ness as respects the executive. She observed that the prospect that Y.M. will pass through a period of instability and weakthat result is to come about; but until it is reached, I fear that I perceived neither the time when, nor the manner how, parliament return to that state? I replied I grieved to say main position, as did the Prince, asked me: But when will brought about our overthrow.1 H.M. seeming to agree in my divisions of the ministerial party would a little later have and said I thought that even if he had deen steady, yet the evidently meaning Lord J. Russell. I named him in my answer, They intimated that there were peculiar disadvantages, too, Aberdeen, one in entire possession too of H.M.'s confidence. remarkable wisdom and powers of conciliation possessed by Lord been tried with remarkable advantage under a man of the elements of English society. The experiment of coalition had tinue to exist, for it embodied one of the great fundamental view; yet at the same time, the party continued and must couand consequently made reckless by acting without keeping it in experience of affairs as to be scarcely within the chances of office, jealousy, and intrigue; the opposition so weak in persons having Loud was the public outery. All the censure that had been foretold in case they should refuse to join, fell with double force upon them for first joining and then seceding.

This seems to contradict the proposition in the article on Greville in conscionce of the matter, or ever found the task more thank-less. Great as was the effect of the close and searching argument that accompanied all this invective, even Mr. Chadstone's friends thought it too impassioned and too sovere upon bewis, in whose favour there was consequently a reaction. The cool minister contented himself with a reaction. The cool minister contented himself with a reaction. The cool minister contented himself with in his bronze iteree nails or thewing hair, yet who fails in his bronze iteree nails or thewing hair, yet who fails because he lacks the art to seize the whole,² than eighty members of the House of Commons threatened and offered places to Gladstone and Herbert, that no less 1855, when Lord Derby attempted to form a government, the Peelites he would leave the party, and I remember in adherents, told me at Longleat that if we coalesced with The Duke of Beaufort, one of our staunchest Lord Malmesbury) for we should lose many of our sup-. He would only benefit us by his talents' (says too dearly: not sure that Ar. Chadstone's addresion would not cost them taken place. In their hearts the conserrative managers were eried out that the long-oxpected coalition had at length really undertake the government of the country. The newspapers sion of strength as would place their party in a position to of sentiment; and advised them not to decline such accesmen finding themselves drawn to the same lobby by identity Mr. Chadstone; justified political union when produced by tim and had his entire approval; spoke with admiration of by Mr. Disraeli apon the badget had been concerted with members, Lord Derby told his men that the course taken At the end of February (1857), at a party meeting of 160

1221

'AI

 $B00\kappa$

11

All these schemes and calculations were destined to be rudoly interrupted.

While he was acting with Lord Derby on the one hand, Mr. Gladstone sought counsel from Cobden on the other, having great confidence in his 'firmness and integrity of atatement of the controversy in Morth.

2 Ars Poetica, 32-5.

3 Malmeshury, Memoirs, ii. pp. ecte, Financial Policy, pp. 306-329.

56-7. See above, p. 536.

than eighty mem to leavo him.'³

Liverpool, Canning, Goderich, Wollington, Grey, Melbourne, he had served under ten prime ministers—Portland, Perceval, admiralty, war department, foreign office, home office; had been nearly forty years in office; he had worked at the interruption, installed for a decade. He was seventy-one; he it happened, Lord Palmerston was in tact, with one brief Mr. Gladstone himself gave it a twelvementh at most. As took for granted that his administration would be temporary. rate he now very steadily went on without them. Everybody urged him to sweep the Peelites from his path, and at any the crisis first began, Roobuck in energetic language had Lord Palmerston meanwhile sat tight in his saddle. When ALT. 46. tracted shock to his public influence. Mr. Gladstone's case, the transaction gave a rude and pro- CHAP.

tardily expiring, and the forces of a new orn were in their times, while old maxims of government and policy were of hand he was an expert, and he suited the temper of the knew how to manage. In every art of parliamentary sleight was above all else the man of this world. The press he terms of cool and reciprocated indillerence with one who The church in all its denominations was on detested him. landed interest was not with him. The Manchester men aristocratic tradition and its organ, the Bedford sect. The to the whigs, and he had none of the strength of that season gathering to a head.

Bussell, Aberdeen. He was not more than loosely attached

this time in parliament his slender majority failed him. about coalitions, combinations, and eloquent flourishes. replied by a stout piece of close argument, spiced by taunts and connected himself with almost every party. Palmerston prime minister who had professed almost every principle, of the party of progress and civilisation, and reprobated a new taxes, Canton blazing, Persia invaded,' as the programme began in outrage and ended in ruin, mocked at ' No reform, people.' Disraeli in turn denounced proceedings which

7881 BOOK

·ΛT

The repulse was transient. The minister appealed to the mere's Faust, being excited, which is rare with me. (Diary.) than any I ever remember. Home with C. and read Lord Elles-247-a division doing more honour to the House of Commons March 3, '57.—Spoke on Cobden's resolutions, and voted in 263-years earlier, whether they would have Louis Napoleon for compared to the plébiscite taken in France four or five was the helmsman for the hour. The result was justly tints should disappear; in the conviction that Palmerston definite views; in the resolution that the intermediate should be governed by men of intelligible opinions and the last eleven years; in the determination that the country to anoisrequib true of the party dispersions of the But the mainspring of the electoral victory was to be sought violated the British flag' was indeed made to play his part. had odw notaeD at thirothmy antibleiw arracted taslozari would not have Lord Palmerston for prime minister. The decide not upon the Canton river, but whether it would or expiring controversy of protection. The country was to on reform; nor like that of 1852, when the issue was the faction; nor like that of 1831, when Grey sought a judgment whether the crown should be the slave of an oligarchic tion like that of 1784, when Pitt appealed on the question of much besides. This, said Mr. Gladstone, was not an elecjunks, but of the great war against the Czar of Russia, and ratification not only of the little war among the Chinese were ruthlessly dismissed, and the election was a glorious Manchester politicians, with Bright and Cobden at their head, constituencies, and won a striking triumph. Nearly all the

Ær. 46.

CHAP.

The prospect of reducing Russia to some abstract level of with honour escape from it?' the sy near beying had emit edt tadt baim avo eid ai to hesitate a single moment when he was firmly convinced mental in bringing his country into this struggle, were if a man in my position, who feels that he has been instruhave been the most contemptible effeminacy of character, to silence? Would it not, on the contrary, he exclaimed, which he had assented on other grounds, was he bound In face of pleas so wretched for a prolongation of a war to been anxious to make peace on the basis of the Four Points. content themselves with the Vienna note, and in 1854 had a traitor, even by men who in 1853.had been willing to for saying No to this question, Mr. Gladstone was called parties concerned the loss of a thousand lives a day? a hundred million pounds a year, and involved to all the good ground for prolonging a war that was costing the allies degrees of the imperfect, the deficient, and the ineffective a allies were for limitation. Was this preference between two and limitation mixed. Russia preferred counterpoise, the the mysteries of limitation, of counterpoise, of counterpoise dubious, inefficient, and imperfect. I will spare the reader pounded. They were every one of them admitted to be seven different plans were simultaneously or in turn propreponderance of Russia in the Black Sea. No fewer than portion of the fourth. The special object was to cancel the named—and only demurred upon the plan for carrying out a out of the Four Points—so the bases of agreement were were attained in January 1855, when Russia agreed to three under Ottoman sway. These objects, Mr Gladstone insisted, and the destruction of Russian claims upon Greek Christians were the abolition of Ruszian rights in the Principalities, August angrily rejected. The essential objects of the war acceptance of the very points that he had in the previous extinguished, the Caar promising an almost unreserved in Mr. Gladstone's eyes, this aggressive spirit had been tone and policy of Russia in 1854. By the end of 1854, entangled Turkey. He persisted in condemning the whole said, to cut the meshes of the net in which Russia had

VOL, I,

رد يُخْتُ

BOOK IV, 1857.

began with political infancy, and which have lived through so many storms and so many subtler vicissitudes will never be replaced. You will never be able to get away from me as long as I can cling to you, and if at length, urged by your conscience and deliberate judgment, you effect the operation, the result will not be to throw me into the staff of Lord Derby. I shall seek my duty, as well as consult my inclination, first, by absconding from what may be termed general politics, and secondly, by appearing, whorever I must appear, only in the ranks.

trative, or financial, are I believe in as exact accordance as under all of whose views upon every public question, political, adminisit will be the first case on record of separation between two men, this opportunity, I believe it will be a novelty in political history: to be practically material or may not. If you make a gap upon certain amount of gap detiveen himself and me, which may come a watchword of present political action he has certainly inserted a -of yourself and Graham in particular. By adopting Reform as co-operation. I am now speaking for the House of Commons only except (and that slender and remote) such as presupposed the hand, I never have had any hope of conservative reconstruction original and principal bonds of union with it. So, on the other abandonment of the very principles and pledges which were ministry of Lord Palmerston, nor follow the liberal party in the I can neither give even the most qualified adhesion to the

His leaning towards the conservative party seemed to become more decided rather than less. Lord Aberdeen had vritten to him as if the amalgamation of Peel's friends with the liberal party had practically taken place. 'If that be true,' Mr. Gladstone replies (April 4, 1857), 'then I have been deception has reached its climax within the last fortnight, during which I have been chosen without opposition to represent Oxford under a belief directly contrary in the minds of the majority of my constituents.' He saw nothing but evil in Lord Palmerston's supremacy. That was his unending refrain. He tells one of his constituents, the antending refrain. He tells one of his constituents, the state of things 'is likely to end in much political constate of things 'is likely to end in much political constate.

chester school 'forgot that the people have flesh and blood, AII.

As a matter of fact, this was wholly untrue. Cobden and esption of the underlying realities of the Eastern question in 1854, than oither the Aberdeen or the Palmerston cabinet, or both of them put together. What was undeniable was that the public, with its habits of rough and ready judgment, that the public, with its habits of rough and ready judgment, stand, the new union of the Peelites with a peace party, in stand, the new union of the Peelites with a peace party, in which gave an excuse to Russia for interfering in the internal very concessions will tear to pieces all the ancient treaties promised by Russia contain sufficient guarantees. ang this motion, 'because in his opinion the concessions that he should undertake the grave responsibility of supporta sound and satisfactory peace. Mr. Gladstone said to him losing the opportunity of the Vienna conferences to make talked of Milner Gibson's motion censuring ministers for with Mr. Gladstone at the table of the Queen, and they concessions was pointed out to them. The envoy dined rest were quite astonished when the extent of the Russian stone seemed to have mastered the Vienna protocols: the Of the friends of peace, he says, only Lord Grey and Gladthe general ignorance of facts even among leading politicians. A foreign envoy then resident in England was struck by retion, i the objections which belong to almost every course of direct opposition to whose strongest views and gravest warnings they had originally begun the war. 'In Gladstone,' Cornewall Lewis said, 'people ascribe to faction, or ambition, or vanity, conduct which I believe to be the result of a conscientious, sorupulous, ingenuous, undecided mind, always gaivingam ban active of a question and magnifying

At all times stimulated rather than checked by a difficult situation, Mr. Gladstone argued the case for peace to the Landon, i. p. 170. A full account of 307, London, i. p. 170. A full account of 307, these parliamentary events from May social solution, to be in the slightest degree affected by all our social problems, whatever be the right or wrong world, men would suffer one of the most far-reaching of Mr. Gladstone's could dream that, at that age of the make one wonder the more how a mind so powerful as readers,—with a dialectical acuteness and force that only readers of Tetruchordon, —if, indeed, Tetruchordon have any himself upon the well-worn texts in the Bible familiar to the elaborate article in the Quarterly Review. 1 Here he flings side two centuries before. He began operations by an intense than the fervour of the mighty Milton on the other ably roused to a fervour on one side, not any less heated and the many connected questions of re-marriage, he was inevitcalled upon for a practical purpose to consider divorce and always felt the vividest concern. So, in short, being once that particular branch of morals, in which Mr. Gladstone to the root both of that deepest of human relations, and of ethics which delights a casuistic intellect. Above all, it went not be discussed without that admixing of legality and wrapped up with topics of history and of learning. It could and to the church what belongs to the church. It was the eternal question of rendering to Casar what is Casar's, and the church were involved. It raised at our own hearths peculiarly calculated to interest and excite him. Religion marriage law of catholic Europe. The subject was one the Council of Trent had succeeded in making the general terms and legal effects of loosening the marriage tie, that that he would incline to that view of marriage, and the With his prepossessions, there could be little doubt perhaps by Bishop Wilberforce, thoroughly to consider the interval of leisure that followed, Mr. Gladstone was pressed, become law, nor did a bill of similar scope in 1856. In the recommendations. For one reason or another it did not and introduced a bill substantially conforming to these the cabinet of which Mr. Gladstone was a member framed and recommending radical changes. In the following year the case against the existing system of dissolving marriage, A royal commission issued a report in 1853, setting forth

1857. BOOK

July 1857. Reprinted in Gleanings, vi. p. 47.

dr. 46

VTT.

CHVb'

While the storm was raging, Mr. Gladstone made his way with his family to Penmaenmawr, whonce he writes to Lord Aberdeen (Aug. 9): 'It was a charitable act on your part to write to me. It is hardly possible to believe one is not the greatest scoundrel on earth, when one is assured of it from all sides on such excellent authority. . . I am busy reading flomer about the Sebastopol of old time, and all manner of thomer about the Sebastopol of old time, and all manner of other fine fellows.' In another letter of the same time, written to Sir Walter James, one of the most closely attached of all his friends, he strikes a deeper note:—

We are on our way back, he writes at the end of Sepa day. private soldier who gives his life to his country at a shilling midst of such contingencies has need to take a lesson from the who can be capable of weighing his own fate and prospects in the effectually hide the gloom of thickening complications, the man of lives and millions of money, and that no glare of success can mitting grave errors, that those errors have cost many thousands for if indeed it be true, as I fear it is, that we have been comlittle difficult to pass over and make little of a personal matter: brings with it. Nor was there ever a case in which it was so recess is the year, the day, or the hour long enough for what it Tota noises are the first or such broodings: neither in session nor to realise, i.e. to dwell upon, the fact that a thing is painful. pressing pain. I never allow myself, in regard to my public life, absolutely requires the habits of resisting temper and of supand even spiritual discipline, and among these in particular it has, however, some excellent characteristics in regard to mental the midst of its (to me at least) essentially fevered activity. fearful thing for a Christian to look forward to closing his life in case. Public life is full of suarcs and dangers, and I think it a Hardinge's, but sueh, I beg you and him to believe, is not the perhaps think I make little of sympathy like yours and Lord Sept. 17.—If I say I care little for such an attack you will

We are on our way back, he writes at the end of September, 'after a month of sea-bathing and touring among the Welsh mountains. Most of my time is taken up with Homer and Homeric literature, in which I am immersed with great delight up to my ears; perhaps I should say out dissolved in another year or two. Still this view of the three ladies. Oh, their marriages may in all probability be absurdity of existing practice did not make a convert.

stone with insincerity. Mr. Gladstone, with a vivacity very to retaliate and provoke. Bethell boldly taunted Mr. Gladand Bethell, polished phrase barely hid unchristian desire long. In the hundred encounters between Mr. Gladstone ing to the standard of those primitive times, inordinately fewer than eighteen sittings, more than one of them, accord-The discussion of the bill in the Commons occupied no and church better, but perhaps even worse, than I found it. leave parliament, I shall not leave the great question of state fear grows upon me from year to year that when I finally mire. I am to speak to-night; it will do no good; and the plack; the poor church gets deeper and deeper into the at Hawarden: 'July 31.-Parliamentary affairs are very that stirred him was indicated in a phrase or two to his wife motives, had fought the marriage bill of 1753. The thought worldly fury with which Henry Fox, from very different fought the bill with a holy wrath as vehement as the more to Mr. Gladstone when the flame was once kindled, and he a carefully moderated course was the very last thing possible Aberdeen said, beyond a 'carefully moderated course.' proposal, Nothing would be intelligible to the public, Lord and with his own, cabinet responsibility for the very same opposition now would be contrasted with his past silence, collision with Lord Palmerston, They urged that violent They deprecated anything that would bring him into direct encouraging for the great fight on which he was intent In London he found the counsels of his friends by no means of the three was ever a favourite article of his consumption. paper made a triple abomination in a single dose, for none grounds.' Tobacco, brandy at odd hours, and the newsso that he had disabled me from objecting on personal and then brandy! This was followed by a proposal to smoke, stone, 'more genial than congenial, offered me his Times, companion in the railway carriage, he wrote to Mrs. Glad-Mr. Gladstone hastened up to London in the dog-days. A As soon as the bill came down to the House of Commons

.788I 'AT

BOOK

4. TH

,IIV

states. prelude to a yest subvorsion of the whole system of European OHAF

11

hold and to act together? These questions were communicate? Were they a party? Did they intend to in the cabinet of Lord Aberdeen? Did they systematically other members of the Peel government who had also been co-operation. What was the nature of his relations with know what were Mr. Gladstono's views on the possibility of what strength he might rely upon, and he was anxious to and he might be sent for by the Queen, he was bound to see municated, that as almost any day it might be overturned, William Heathcote, through whom he and Mr. Chadstone comstone had predicted that it would be. Lord Derby told Sir 1851 and in 1855. The government was weak, as Alr. Gladrepeated the overtures that he had made in specific form in with fatiguing iteration. In the spring of 1856 Lord Derby death of Peel was for three years to come traversed again mind. The old ground so constantly travelled over since the Other interests now camo foremost in Alr. Gladstone's growth and result of the past. were not, however, a covenant for the future, but a natural association, general agreement, and personal friendship; that they that our habits of communication were founded upon long political we did not seek to act, but rather eschewed acting, as a party; and I communicated together habitually and confidentially; that recommend it. On the second, I said Graham, Herbert, Cardwell the subject, if public affairs should assume such a shape as to there was nothing in them to prevent a further consideration of they are much like Lord Derby's own as I understand themdescribe my views for present purposes than by saying that On the first point, Air. Chadstone said, you cannot better union and weakness in the executive government, and must be so, We, the friends of Lord Aberdeen, were a main cause of dis-Droken and disorganized state of the House of Commons: conclusion the old story of the Peelite responsibility for the Then he proceeds to tell with a new and rather startling

.7681

'AT

ROOK

ranoing his grounds of objection. the fruit of his efforts, narrowing and abating, though not not wholly unsuccessful, and modifications were secured as clergymen to perform such marriages. Here the fight was bitterly did he resent the obligation imposed by the bill upon claim marriage by a clergyman in a church, and still more conferred by the government bill upon divorced persons to in his eyes much the more urgent of the two, was the right away in English public opinion. His second complaint, and was in Mr. Gladstone's middle life slowly beginning to melt inferiority of women to men, and wives to husbands, that Milton, who writes with a tyrannical Jewish belief in the at any rate, he speaks in a nobler and humaner temper than American Union. In this branch of the great controversy, of 'mental cruelty' has been carried in some States of the he might be, at the grotesque excess to which the doctrine limb, or health, though he was shocked in after years, as well this case to the cruelty of mere force importing danger to life, He attacks with just vigour the limitation of legal cruelty in morives less impure and ignoble than those of the man.

ΛT

Before the battle was over, he was torn away from the scene by a painful bereavement. Mrs. Gladstone was at Hagley nursing her beloved sister, Lady Lyttelton. He wrote to his wife in the flercest hours of the fight (11 Carlton Wrote to his wife in the flercest hours of the fight (11 Carlton of yesterday that your heart is heavy, and mine too is heavy along with yours. I have been in many minds about my duty to-day; and I am all but ready to break the bands duty to-day; and I am all but ready to break the bands even of the high obligations that have kept me here with the proportion of divorce decrees to population are both of them lower than they were a few years ago. Mr. Gladstone used to desire the protecting ings, until he learned the strong view of the president of the Court that the president of the Court that the hideous glare of this puratify acts probably as no inconsiderable deterrent, from the Quarterly (Gleanings, vi. p. 106), he says his arguments have been too sadly illustrated by the misconievous effects of the measure. The judicial statistics, however, hardly support this view, that petitions for divorce were constantly increasing, and at an accelerating rate of progression. In England the proportion graves of progression.

· TH

IIΛ

chv

of practical improvements at home, with a disinclination to equilibrium, of steady resistance to abuses, and promotion support—the policy of peace abroad, of economy, of financial general policy that Sir Robert Peel in 1841 took office to of the Quarterly: There is a policy going a begging; the so dangerous a leader.1 As he put it to Elwin, the editor friends he was not hopeful, but they were not committed to made financial improvement desperate. Of Lord Derby's determined to support the reigning foreign policy, and this either one of these aims or the other. The liberal party was Yet isolated as he was, he had little power over and to labour as hard as he could for the redemption of his of foreign policy. His duty, then, was to oppose that policy, forgotton. They were incompatible with Palmerston's spirit pledges were by the present ministers in danger of being believed, given financial pledges to the country. These tration, and finance to correspond. In 1853 he had, as he due reduction in our establishments, economy in adminisaffairs, a rational and pacific foreign policy, and second, the any two cardinal subjects for the present moment in public sensible men one of the rudiments of practical politics. nave a platform and work with a party. This indeed is for from which visibly to act.' In rougher phrase, a man must multiplied tenfold by the want of a clear and firm ground November 1856, the pain and strain of public duty is Junction with liberals. As he had said to Graham in vatives, than was the personality of Lord Palmerston to a any sharper obstacle to a definite junction with conserof Peel. The importunate presence of Mr. Distaeli was not nor Palmerstonian liberals would take up the broken clue amply proved, in his perception that neither Palmerston much in the right, as his tribulations of a later date so born warrior to count the lions in his path. He was only too they might be realised—it was not in the temperanent of this of this kind, and with sanguine visions of the road by which His whole mind beset, possessed, and on five with ideals questions of reform, gratuitously raised.

¹ To Robertson Gladatone, Dec. 16, 1856, ² To Mr. Elwin, Dec. 2, 1856,

CHVLLEE IX

THE SECOND DERBY GOVERNMENT.

(8231)

be termed accidental, -Gladstone. isties unduly exaggerated, by circumstances of the order that would favourably or unfavourably affected and their essential charactervaried distribution of the same elements in each, they are liable to be parties differ no more in their general outlines than by a somewhat moderate portion of the other. . . . But while the great English as dividing the more moderate portion of the one from the more diversities of political principles and tendencies, than can be noted English feelings. Each of them comprises within itself far greater them are composed in the main of men with English hearts and characteristic of either political party in this country. Both of EXTRAVACEMENT and exaggeration of ideas are not the essential powers against conspiracy. He in an instant became the answer the French despatch, but introduced a bill with new called for stronger law. Palmerston very sensibly did not of asylum. They hinted further that the amity of the crown James's to the fact that bodies of assassins abused our right the French government formally drew attention at St. miscarried, but feeling in France was greatly excited, and The bombs were manufactured in England. Orsini's design had been organized by a band of Italian refugees in London. threw Lord Palmerston. A plot to slay the French Emperor in the division on the Conspiracy to Murder bill that overthe table of the House of Commons as victorious tellers chester the year before, had the satisfaction of walking to Gibson, who had been ignominiously thrown out at Mandramatic than when, on February 20, Bright and Milner strange results, but none has ever been more strikingly THE turn of the political wheel is constantly producing 1828.

ΛT BOOK

1858. BOOK

was the paramount, absolute, and imperative duty of Her in Majesty's ministers to protest against the imputation upon us of favour for assassination, 'a plant which is congenial neither to our soil nor to the climate in which we live,' incidental observation that 'the House should remember that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, when there is a quarrel between two states, it is generally occasioned by some blunder of a ministry. Mr. Disraeli perhaps consoled himself by the pithy saying of Baron Brunnow, that if no one made any blunders, there would be no politics. The blood of the civis Romanus, however, was up, and Palmerston, defeated by a majority of nineteen, at once resigned.

Lord Derby, whose heart had failed him three years earlier, now formed his second administration, and made one more attempt to bring Mr. Gladstone over to the conservative ranks. Lord Lansdowne had told the Queen that no other government was possible, and an hour after he had kissed hands the new prime minister applied to Mr. Gladstone. The decisions taken by him in answer to this and another application three months later, mark one more of the curious turning points in his career and in the fate of his party.

Feb. 20, 1858.—Dined at Herbert's with Graham. We sat till I2½, but did not talk quite through the crisis. Palmerston has resigned. He is down. I must now cease to denounce him. 21.—St. James's morning, and holy communion. Westminster Abbey in evening, when I sat by Sir George Grey. From St. James's I went to Lord Aberdeen's. There Derby's letter reached me. We sent for Herbert and I wrote an answer. Graham arrived and heard it; with slight modifications it went. The case though grave was not doubtful. Made two copies and went the too radical tone of his often finer to the too radical tone of his often fine-spun argumentation. His thundering periods were received with thundering echoes of applause. —Vitzhum, St. Petersburg and London, i. p. 273.

the Hopsily for the reputation of the Hopsily for the ministry, the debate assumed once more, with Gladstone's eloquence, a statesmanlike character. The foremost speaker of the House showed himself worthy of his reputation

CHAI,

ATT. 4

III

In the autumn of 1856 ecclesiastical questions held a strong place in Mr. Gladstone's interests. The condemnation of Archdeacon Denison for heresy roused him to lively indignation. He had long interviews with the archdeacon, drafted answers for him, and flung his whole soul into the case, general tone. 'Gladstone tells me,' said Aberdeen, 'that he cannot sleep for it, and writes to me volumes upon volumes. He thinks that Denison ought to have been allowed to show articles, is in accordance with scripture. And he thinks the decision ought to have been in his case as it was in actions, that the articles are comprehensive, that the articles are comprehensive, that the articles are comprehensive, that the his being are comprehensive, that the his of or have been in his case as it was in the decision ought to have been in his case as it was in the decision ought to have been in his case as it was in the decision ought to have been in his case as it was in the decision ought to have been in his case as it was in admit Denison's view of the Eucharist as well as that of his opponents.'

His closing entry for the year (1856) depicts an inner

-: poour

all that the heart and all that the mind of man can supply. . . . hopes to Catherine and me, -what a network is here woven out of day the object of deeper thoughts and feelings, and of higher years and more; seven children growing up around us, and each exciting and arduous interest of romance for me now during nine family, which have had, with all their dry detail, all the most a new and powerful hold upon me; the fortunes of my wife's [interest] than I have heretofore; literature has of late acquired growing anxieties and struggles of the church I have no less how I stand. Into politics I am drawn deeper every year; in the please God to call me I might answer with reluctance. . . See growing and grown too many and powerful, and that were it to I look calmly around me, I see that these interests are for ever duties, life charged with every kind of interest. But now when known what tedium was, have always found time full of calls and I am enclosed in the invisible net of pendent steel. I have never It appears to me that there are few persons who are so much as

1 Simpson's Many Memories, p. 238.

1858. 'AI BOOK

I should bring you no party or group of friends to make up for a source of weakness in the heart of your own adherents, while the most dangerous ideas. I should thus, unfortunately, be to you portant section who avowedly regard me as the representative of moment in numbers, there is a small but active and not unimby the fact that in your party, reduced as it is at the present of an isolated person. The difficulty is even enhanced in my case return of the old influences to their places, and not by the junction reconstitution of a party can only be effected, if at all, by the traditions may well desire the reconstitution of a party; but the Those who lament the rupture of old through good report. many years been united through evil and (much more rarely) the position of those political friends with whom I have now for men with whom I had sympathies; and it in some degree affected having. The dissolution of last year excluded from parliament alone, as I must be, I could not render you service worth your best consideration which the moment allows, I think it plain that question I have mentioned is a needful preliminary. Upon the of public interest requiring to be noticed between us; but the time will, in my opinion, have strong claims upon me, and upon I must, however, add that a government formed by you at this reply to your letter must be in the negative..

For the reasons which I have thus stated or glanced at, my their defection or discontent.

have just expressed. and Sidney Herbert; and they fully concur in the sentiments I support. I have had an opportunity of seeing Lord Aberdeen absence of conscientious difference on important questions, for any one situated as I am, for favourable presumptions, and in the mark upon his meditations: believe that a sagacious letter from Mr. Bright made its the Manchester men at this moment, but we may well Mr. Gladstone had no close personal or political ties with less be in office with him if he succeeds in forming a government. I met a leading lawyer of Lord Derby's party, who will doubt-Reform Club, Feb. 21, '58.—Coming down Park Lane just now, adding that it would be an advantage if my doctor sent me abroad C for the session.

Mr. Bright to Mr. Aludstone.

He concurred in the general sentiments which I had expressed, but said it was material for him, as he had friends with and for hot sout whom to act, and as I had alluded to the possibility, in the event whom to act, and as I had alluded to the possibility, in the event of a change, of his being invited by the Queen to form a government, to consider beforehand on what strength he could rely. He said he believed his friends were stronger than any other single aid he believed his friends were aninority in both Houses. Weak in 1852, he was weaker now, for it was natural that four years of exclusion from office should thin the ranks of a party, and such had been his case. He described the state of feeling among his friends, and adverted to the offer he had made in 1851 and in 1855.

The fact of an overture made and not accepted had led to much bitterness or anger towards as among a portion of his adherents.

He considered that in 1855 Lord Palmerston had behaved far from well either to Herbert and me, or to him.¹

ductive power inherent in such operations; to simplify our for the relief of the people, and bearing in mind the reproreflected; to lower indirect taxes when excessive in amount, maintain a steady surplus of income over expenditure, he ministerial plan a prospective deficiency a year ahead. He thought moreover that he espied in the opinion of this sort kindled volcanic flame in Mr. Gladstone's The reader will believe how speedily an impious to redmun estindini na no yltdyil zraed tadt eno zi noitaxat step towards equality of burden, and that a good system of Arthur Young, that to multiply the number of taxes is a rashly quoted, and adopted as his own, the terrible heresy of their budget. In introducing his plan, Cornewall Lewis On February 13 the government presented at every stage. allies; them he kept accurately informed of all that passed that is to say, excepting also Mr. Gladstone's three personal length to which our communications have gone. 'Nobody, Lord Derby tells him, 'oxcept Disraeli knows the amendments, forms of words. They met at discreet dinners. Other interviews followed; resolutions were discussed, it, if honest, must go or wish to go, in an opposite direction, and it cannot therefore govern the country. Will you unite yourself with what must be, from the beginning, an inevitable failure?

1858. BOOK

Don't be offended, if, by writing this, I seem to believe you will join Lord Derby. I don't believe it—but I can imagine your seeing the matter from a point of view very different to mine—and I feel a strong wish just to say to you what is passing in my mind. You will not be the less able to decide on your proper course. If I thought this letter would annoy you, I would not send it. I think you will take it in the spirit in which it is vritten. No one knows that I am writing it, and I write it from written. No one knows that I am writing it, and I write it from no idea of personal advantage to myself, but with a view to yours, and to the interests of the country. I may be mistaken, but think and to the interests of the country. I may be mistaken, but think

Mr. Aladetone to Mr. Bright.

I am not. Don't think it necessary to reply to this. I only ask you to read it, and to forgive me the intrusion upon you-and further to believe that I am yours, with much respect.

10 Great George Street, Feb. 22, '58.—Your letter can only bear one construction, that of an act of peculiar kindness which ought not to be readily forgotten. For any one in whom I might be interested I should earnestly desire, upon his entering public life, that, if possible, he might with a good conscience end in the party where he began, or else that he might have broad and definite appears to be certainly within command, there remains a strong and paramount consolation in seeking, as we best can, the truth and paramount consolation in seeking, as we best can, the truth and the public interests; and I think it a marked instance of liberality, that you should give me credit for keeping this object in my view.

My seeking, however, has not on the present occasion been very difficult. The opinions, such as they are, that I hold on many questions of government and administration are strongly held; and although I set a value, and a high value, upon the power which office gives, I earnestly hope never to be tempted by its exterior allurements, unless they are accompanied with the reasonable prospect of giving effect to some at least of those reasonable prospect of giving effect to some at least of those opinions and with some adequate opening for public good. On budget. I said that from motives which I could neither describe nor conquer I was quite unable to undertake to enter into any squabble or competition with him for the possession of a post of prominence. We had much conversation on political prospects: Graham wishing to see me lead the Commons under Lord John as prime minister in the Lords; admitting that the same thing would do under Lord Derby, but for Disraeli, who could not be thrown away like a sucked orange; and I vehemently deploring our position, which I said, and they admitted, was generally condenned by the country.

CHA

I again went to Derby, as he had requested, at five; and he told me that he had with him Malmesbury, Hardwicke, Disraeli, Pakington, Walpole, Lytton. They had all agreed that the best motion would be a resolution (from Disraeli) on Monday, before the Speaker left the chair, which would virtually rest the question on deficit. I made two verbal suggestions on the resolution to improve its form.

betore or since ever, in Cromwellian phrase, made such a triffing with national interests. It is certain that no financier of a quarter of a century. It was deluding the people and deficiency, a deficiency unparalleled in the financial history the government showed a gross, a glaring, an increasing say of him who begins the undoing of it?' The proposal of blessed a work. But if it be a blessed work, what are we to British parliament during these years, bearing his part in so thankful to have been an Englishman and a member of the off without costing a farthing. 'A man may be glad and 1858 two and twenty millions of taxation had been taken terrific fusillade. He recounted how between 1842 and had incensed Mr. Gladstone still further, and he conducted a as twin champions of the cause of reduced expenditure. Time made, and Gladstone and Disraeli again fought side by side Yours ever, D. When Mouday came, the move was duly the note, 'I like the resolution as amended. It is improved. us as to the move on Monday night. 'My dear lord, runs granted that there is now a complete understanding between received at dinner from Disraeli, 'I hope I may take it for Late in the evening Lord Derby writes, enclosing a note guide the party of progress out of which the materials for that his cannot be the will to direct, nor the wisdom to he neither speaks nor votes. Is it not clear beyond dispute to the rightful influence of the House over foreign affairs, by diplomacy, but when a motion is made directly pointing is loudly indignant against the supersession of parliament should be wholly free to distribute honours as it pleases. He Havelock he resists it with the doctrine that the executive voice on the Thames demands higher honours for General voice in the Principalities on the Danube, but when the popular sense. He protests against unfair dealing with the popular a strong, unassailable executive in the old obstructive tory freedom, social and commercial reform, and a hankering after between love for righteous national action, good government, of civil life. His sympathies hover in hopeless inconsistency spirit and power, but not to be tamed into the ordinary ways him a mere bedouin of parliament, a noble being full of stage traces of an unhappy incoherence which is making some, with his bright, cold smile and subtlety of aspect, I face and straight black hair, and the latter eminently handsitting side by side, the former with his rather saturnine quoted: 'looking on Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Sidney Herbert intellectual zeal as from self-love. A shrewd observer is Gladstone. He supports his own interests as much from Society is to the Jesuit, his own individualism is to Mr. like one of the sons of Ignatius Loyola. What their sims at philosophy, he only reaches casuistry. He reasons can attain 'a grand moral vision,' When Mr. Gladstone the emotions that soar and thrill and enkindle, no man are no longer selected from the serfs of Aristotle. Without mere dialectician are over, and the rulers of Christendom The days of the quite unsuited for governing mankind. natures, men of mere intellect without moral passion, are very lips of the oracle itself, the public was told that 'cerebral decision. In phrases that must surely have fallen from the stone's fate is pronounced in different terms, but with equal In organs supposed to be inspired by Disraeli, Mr. Glad-the government of this country will have to be chosen?

1828. IA' BOOK

J. 18 1/2

is a frightful scourge upon the human race; but because it Christianity itself appeals to it. . . . War taken at the best yond Christianity; and which underlies Christianity, for than Christianity, because it extends to the world beit was in the world before Christianity; which is broader man to man; which is older than Christianity, because ground of natural justice,—'that justice which binds by municipal and international law, and on 'the higher and in most striking language. He examined it both years defore, he raised the dispute to higher planes case, as in the famous precedent of Don Pacifico seven examination of circumstance and fact in the special man in the House of Commons, Apart from a rigorous his speech was the finest delivered in the memory of achievements. It won several votes. Nobody denies that eloquence, and effect is unsurpassed by any of his former enthralled the House, and which for argument, dignity, 3), 'and delivered for nearly two hours an oration which 'Gladstone rose at half-past nine,' Phillimore says (Mar. made the most powerful speech in a remarkable debate. been stirred in early days, as the reader may recall, stone, whose hatred of high-handed iniquities in China had of Cobden, the House censured the proceeding. Alr. Cladthe Chinese. The cabinet supported him, On the motion by the way, a philosophic radical—had forced a war upon agent of the British government in the China seas-himself, magic at his disposal than his valiant foe believed. The were speedily to show that Lord Palmerston had more magician against whom it was vain to struggle. Events TH faint-hearted disposition to regard Lord Palmerston as a ΛĮΙ purpose,' and hoping for support from him in face of a SPEECH ON THE CHINA WAR

¹ See above, p. 225. whole might of England against the lives of a defenceless

morphosed consul is for sooth to be at liberty to direct the have turned a consul into a diplomatist, and that meta-

which shall act as a curb upon the wild passions of man. and usages, and has required formalities to be observed is so, the wisdom of ages has surrounded it with strict laws

... You have dispensed with all these precautions.

1858. BOOK

of my friends, naming Lord Aberdeen, Sir James Graliam, and that there was no active opposition to the government on the part He added that judging from the past he hoped he might assume as it could be effected compatibly with consistency in its opinions. wish of the government progressively to extend its basis, as far it was made was a desire that it should be taken to signify the ninediate vacancy being a specious; but the spirit in which he hoped it was not so. It was one made to me alone, the as one the acceptance of which would separate me from my friends, as leader of the House of Commons. With respect to the proposal been, but for the cause named, a desire to obtain his co-operation Sir James Graham; and he left me to infer that there would have of the speech, but of the position in which he thought it placed He at the same time spoke in the highest terms not only put it deyond the right of the government to make any proposal those with respect to parties in the House and to office), seemed to the expressions he had used in his speech of Thursday 1 (apparently Graham, if he were disposed to join the government; but that samel villingness to surrender the leadership to Sir James He, however, explained himself as follows, that Mr. Disraeli had had offered an absolute preliminary bar to the acceptance of office. connection with this subject, since the former of the two points in am yd banego vo beniatretteined or opened by me in

I told him with respect to the leadership that I thought it handsome on the part of Mr. Disraeli to offer to waive it on behalf of Sir James Graham; that it was a subject which did not enter into my decision for the reason I had stated; and I hinted also that it was one on which I could never negotiate or make stipulations. It was true, I said, I had no broad differences of principle from the party opposite; on the whole perhaps I differed more from Lord party

aitting on the opposite side of the House, and from recent kind communications I have resumed those habits of friendly intercourse and confidential communication with my noble friend (Lord John Russell) which formerly existed between us.—

I wish to state that it is by the courtesy of hon, gentlemen that I occupy a seat on this (the ministerial) side of the House, although I am no adherent of Her Majesty's government. By no engagement, express or implied, am I their supporter. On the contrary, my sympathies and opinions are with the liberal party

the Duke of Newcastle.

emperor or not. It was computed that no fower than one-sizth, or at best one-seventh, of the most conspicuous men in the former House of Commons were thrust out. The Derbyites were sure that the report of the coalition with the Peelites had done them irreparable harm, though their electioneering was independent. At Oxford blr. Gladstone was returned without opposition. On the other hand, his gallant attempt to save the seat of his brother-in-law in Flintshire failed, his unany speeches met much rough interruption, and to his extreme mortification sir Stephen Glynne was thrown out.

The moral of the general election was undoubtedly a heavy shock to Mr. Gladstone, and ho was fully conscious of the new awkwardness of his public position. Painful change seemed imminent even in his intimate relations with as for Gladstone, Graham, and himself, they were not only broken up as a party, but the country intended to break them up and would resent any attempt at resuscitation; they ought on no account to reappoar as a triumvirate on their old bench. Mr. Gladstone's reply discloses in some of its phrases a peculiar warmth of sensibility, of which he was not often wont to make much display:—

To Sidney Herbert.

March 22, 1857.—I did not reply to your letter when it arrived, because it touches principally upon subjects with respect to which I feel that my mind has been wrought into a state of sensitiveness which is excessive and morbid. For the last eleven years, with the exception of only two among them, the pains of political strife have not for us found their usual and proper compensation in the genial and extended sympathies of a great body of comrades, while suspicion, mistrust, and criticism have flanked of comrades, while suspicion, mistrust, and criticism have flanked been a concurrence of opinion which has been upon the whole remarkably close, and which has been comented by the closer bonds of feeling and of triendship. The lose of this one comfort I have no strength to face. Contrary to your supposition, I have I have no strength to face. Contrary to your supposition, I have nothing with which to replace it; but the attachments, which nothing with which to replace it; but the attachments, which from Walpole expressing Lord Derby's wish in the following, words: 'That before you finally decide on refusing to accept the offer he has made either of the colonies or of the India board he wishes you would consult Sir James Graham and Lord Aberdeen.' In order to meet this wish, I have put down the foregoing state-In order to meet this wish, I have put down the foregoing state.

.8581

'AI

BOOK

Lord Aberdeen agreed with Mr. Gladstone that on the whole the balance inclined to no.

in vain expectation of better. powers, and present opportunities were not to be neglected away, Gladstone had reached the utmost vigour of his ditions what they might. In fine, time was wearing fast Commons pre-eminence would be Gladstone's, be the conbut the concession would somehow be made, and in the tion of Disraeli could not be made a condition precedent, events had qualified this opinion. Of course, the abdicafor his leader would be humiliation and dishonour. Later Gladstone to sit on the treasury bench with Disraeli in the Commons, Graham had once thought that for the shape and body of the times. As for the leadership leaven the whole lump and bring it into conformity with were strong, and his 'honest liberal tendencies' would soon with Lord Derby with perfect honour. His natural affinities and his future fame. He might form an intimate alliance active official duties would conduce to his present happiness the result was that he stood alone. Fixed party ties and catalogue of Mr. Gladstone's most intimate political friends; this occasion, balanced like your own.' He ran through the affectionate and faithful friend, said, 'My judgment is, on Graham; in an admirable letter, truly worthy of a wise,

III

Before this letter of Graham's arrived, an unexpected thing happened, and Mr. Disraeli himself advanced to the front of the stage. His communication, which opens and closes without the usual epistolary forms, just as it is reproduced here, marks a curious episode, and sheds a strange light on that perplexing figure:—

country as myself! a person who had so thoroughly worried both it and the of its own dignity and of its proper functions, if let alone by Commons would sooner and more healthily return to a sense guided my conduct since the dissolution, that the House of but I arrived some time ago at the conclusion, which has affairs to restrain mo from the discharge of a public duty; (June 16, 1857), allow any disgust with the state of public ministers. 'I should not knowingly, Mr. Chadstone replies new parliament, to take up some position adverse to the Cobden asked him in the course of the first session of the moral courago I havo never seen a minister so deficient. fights against the infirmities of ago, though in political and viow with regret, for I admire the pluck with which he physical force, the only way of stopping it which I could first if it is not stopped by the failure of Lord Palmerston's theory of divorce. 1 it was antagonistic, therefore, to the whole ecclesiastical sacrament, to the bleak and frigid zone of civil contract; obviously removed it from sacrament, or anything like a The conception of marriage underlying such a change had begun with the legalisation of civil marriage in 1836. essential to a good marriage. A further fundamental change observance of certain requirements then set up by law wicke's famous act of 1753, for that measure made the established against the theological doctrine by Lord Hard-The legal doctrine of marriage had been Railisy ansyriling. up, with so much weight of reading and thought, a case so against which, in his book of 1838, Mr. Chadstone had drawn in that immense process of the secularisation of the state, It marked one more stage of the history of English laws that stirred him to the very depths of heart and conscience. end of the session a subject was brought before parliament This stern resolve to hold aloof did not last. Towards the

111

I is a striking indication of the tensity of custom against logic that was banished from French law from in France, though civil marriage was made not merely permissive, as with

.888 I

.VI

BOOK

I have ever thought identical with your accepting office in a conservative government.

Don't you think the time has come when you might deign to

Mr. Canning was superior to Lord Castlereagh in capacity, in acquirements, in eloquence, but he joined Lord C. when Lord C. when Lord Liverpool's lieutenant, when the state of the tory party was Lord Liverpool's lieutenant, when the state of the tory party rendered it necessary. That was an enduring, and, on the whole, not an unsatisfactory connection, and it certainly terminated very gloriously for Mr. Canning.

I may be removed from the scene, or I may wish to be removed from the scene.

Every man performs his office, and there is a Power, greater than ourselves, that disposes of all this.

The conjuncture is very critical, and if prudently yet boldly managed, may rally this country. To be inactive now is, on your part, a great responsibility. If you join Lord Derby's cabinet, you vill meet there some warm personal friends; all its members are your admirers. You may place me in neither category, but in vacant post is, at this season, the most commanding in the commonvacant post is, at this season, the most commanding in the commonvacant jost is it it were not, whatever office you filled, your shining qualities would always render you supreme; and if party necessities retain me formally in the chief post, the sincere and delicate respect which I should always offer you, and the unbounded contespect which on my part, if you choose you could command, would flence, which on my part, if you choose you could command, would prevent your feeling my position as anything but a form.

Think of all this in a kindly spirit. These are hurried lines, but they are heartfelt. I was in the country yesterday, and must return there to-day for a county dinner. My direction is Langley Park, Slough. But on Wednesday evening I shall be in town.—

B. Disraeli. Grosvenor Gale, May 25, 1858.

None of us, I believe, were ever able to persuade Mr Gladstone to do justice to Disraeli's novels,—the spirit of whim in them, the ironic solemnity, the historical paradoxes, the fantastic glitter of dubious gems, the grace of high comedy, all in union with a social vision that often pierced deep below the surface. In the comparative stiff-a Greek word or two of utterly disputable and unfixed significance.

TH.

I may note in passing that in another department of supposed Levitical prohibition—the case of the wife's sister—he had in 1849 strongly argued against relaxation, mainly on the bad in 1849 strongly argued against relaxation, mainly on the ground that it would involve an alteration of the law of Christianity. Laxperience and time revolutionised his point of view, and in 1869, in supporting a bill legalising these marriages, he took the secular and utilitarian line, and said that twelve or fourteen years carlier (about the time on which we are now engaged) he formed the opinion that it was the mass of the community to which we must look in dealing with such a question, and that the fairest course would be to legalise the marriage contracts in question, and legitimise their issue, leaving to each religious community the question of attaching to such marriages a community the question of attaching to such marriages a religious.

religious character.

other man? Oh, he was divorced last week, And those men whose marriages were dissolved last year. gentlemen listening so intently? Oh, these are two gentle-But who, he might have asked, are those two indissoluble by the law of England and by the law of the and reverend prelates lay down the canon that marriage is being taken to the House of Lords and hearing learned lords Andstone at this date pictures Alacaulay's New Nealander theory in the century.3 Lord Mahon in a letter to Mr. This, I fancy, is the high-water mark of the ecclesiastical actually imposing a fine or imprisonment on either of them. prohibiting the inter-marringe of the guilty parties, but carrying amendments (ultimately rejected), not only for Wilberforce were violently hostile, even at one stage Anthorities no less exalted than Bishop other prelates: supported by the Archbishop of Canterbury and nine and passed by them without effective resistance. The Divorce bill of 1857 was introduced in the Lords,

House of Commons, June 20, 1849. Thungs be said that the exaction I bid., July 20, 1869. See also of damages comes to the same thing. Gleanings, vi. p. 50.

.8381

'ΛΤ

BOOK

to do. He declined to join. advice at all, as Mr. Gladstone was in so grave a case bound positive advice, approval, he is going to act without any man draws all these distinctions, between affirmative advice, recorded against him. We may be quite sure that when a Balak, when notwithstanding the command, the act was orders to Balaam, that he should go with the messengers of Aberdeen's. On the contrary it would have been like the had it even been more positive, was not approval, nor was Lord ance would be for the public good. Your affirmative advice, only the man himself could decide, yet he also said that accepttion, though the counsellor said that this was a case in which ance, 'yet the counsel was indecisive.' On ordinary constructhat although Graham appeared to lean in favour of acceptalready described. The interpretation that he put upon it was The next day Mr. Gladstone received Graham's letter

Mr. Audstone to Lord Derby.

Private.

II C. II. Terrace, May 26, '58,—I have this morning received Sir James Graham's reply, and I have seen Lord Aberdeen before and since. Their counsel has been given in no narrow or untriendly spirit. It is, however, indecisive, and leaves upon me the responsibility which they would have been glad if it had been in their power to remove. I must therefore adhere to the reply which I gave to Mr. Walpole on Saturday; for I have not seen, which I gave to Mr. Walpole on Saturday; for I have not seen, and I do not see, a prospect of public advantage or of material and I do not see, a prospect of public advantage or of material angele-handed.

Had it been in your power to raise fully the question whether those who were formerly your colleagues, could again be brought into political relation with you, I should individually have thought it to be for the public good that, under the present circumstances of the country, such a scheme should be considered deliberately and in a favourable spirit. But I neither know that this is your power, nor can I feel very sangnine hopes that the obstacles in the way of this proposal on the part of those whom it would in the way of this proposal on the part of those whom it would embrace, could be surmounted. Lord Aberdeen is the person who could best give a dispassionate and weighty opinion on that able length. Sometimes he was argumentative, frequently made nine-and-twenty speeches, some of them of considerexplanations, and interlocutory suggestions, Mr. Gladstone sitting (August 14) on a single clause: 'Including questions, but not wholly unverscious chronicler says of this ten hours' proification, but still tough and prolonged.' An unfriendly Yesterday ten and a-half hours, rather angry; to-day with ment for this (almost) as I was for the China vote. . . . me add, to my surprise. I am as thankful to be in parlia-Graham is with us, much to my delight, and much too, let shoulder to shoulder, and this, please God, we will do. 'All we can do,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to his wife, 'is to put affirmed the principle of the bill were at least two to one. addressed to the chair.' On every division those who ously turned on me for the last ten minutes, instead of being from those eloquent eyes of his, which have been continuwhich have not only proceeded from his mouth but gleamed abusing the privileges of speech by accusations of insincerity, hewer of wood and drawer of water to the cabinet who forced the bill into his charge; with being disorderly and like downright anger, reproached Bethell with being a mero of instances where the woman falls into sin, she does so from sexes under the Christian law.' Again, 'in the vast majority the broad, the indestructible basis of the equality of the man or woman, to the person of Christ, that form the firm, 'respecting the personal relation of every Christian, whether the special and peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, he said, between the respective rights of husband and wife. It is of which he made most was the inequality in the bill the matter in hand is susceptible.' One of the complaints say that it does not carry out all the improvements of which standard set-up form of objecting to any improvement, to He resorted abundantly to what Palmerston called 'the old the legislative question of dissolubility and its conditions. held himself free, if that view were repudiated, to consider a vinculo anything but an immense evil, but he still He made no pretence of thinking the principle of divorce ingenious and critical, often personal, and not less often indignant at the alleged personality of others,'

CH'

.888I ' \ \ T BOOK

Mr. Gladstone from Constantinople that the clearness of his those who mocked it as a bubble. M. de Lesseps wrote to that were not foreseen either by those who favoured it or the canal was made, with some very considerable consequences it was in the case of the seven cardinals against Galileo. Still wholly selfish? The majority against the motion was large, as par behaim-worren ylerly purely narrow-minded and interest of Turkey merely thrust hypocritically in for the contingent danger to interests of our own, with the alleged beneficial to mankind, on no better ground than remote and to the world as the opponents of a scheme on the face of it Finally, what could be more unwise than to present ourselves Europe? And what could that power be but ourselves? fall within the control of the strongest maritime power in danger to our own interests, was it not a canal that would would tend to sever Turkey from Egypt. As to possible reasoning, he argued against the proposition that the canal Canal stand or fall upon commercial grounds. With close bubble schemes. As a commercial project, let the Suez and ex-governments coming down to instruct us here on Gladstone followed. Don't let us, he said, have governments reveries! So much for the sound practical man. Mr. of Great Britain to philanthropic schemes and philosophic not at ours. Away, then, with such a sacrifice of the interest ocean, which would be at the command of other nations and opening a passage between the Mediterranean and the Indian empire; it would tend to dismember our own empire by THE SECOND DERBY GOVERNMENT

flag of modern civilisation. of which it is the natural mission to hold aloft together the avoid the troubling of the relations between two countries tion of a question of itself perfectly clear and simple, and to contribute more still to hinder the darkening and complicato your character, have already contributed much and will authority of your name, and the consideration that attaches negotiations with the Porte. Your eloquent words, the speech had enabled him to use it with good effect in his

Mr. Disraeli for the transfer of the government of India from measures—some of them extremely singular—proposed by Mr. Gladstone took an active interest in the various reference to the marriage bill. You have only to speak the word by telegraph or otherwise, showing that I can help to give any of the support you need, and I come to you. As matters stand I am wanted in the House to-day, and am wanted for the Divorce bill again on Monday. Before Monday came, Lady Lyttelton was no more. Four days after her death, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Mr. Arthur Gordon after her death, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Mr. Arthur Gordon from Hagley:—

TAY

The loss suffered here is a dreadinl one, but it is borne in the way which robs death and all evil of its sting. My deceased sister-in-law was so united with my wife; they so drew from their very carliest years, and not less since marriage than before it, their breath so to speak in common, that the relation I bore to her conveys little even of what I have lost; but that again is little compared to my wife's bereavement; and far above all to that of Lyttelton, who now stands lonely among his twelve children. But the retrospect from first to last is singularly bright and pure. But the retrospect from first to last is singularly bright and pure. She seemed to be one of those rare spirits who do not need affiction to draw them to their Lord, and from first to last there was tion to draw them to their Lord, and from first to last there was die, her pulse did not change; the last communion appeared wholly to sever her from the world, but she smiled upon her wholly to sever her from the world, but she smiled upon her bushand within a minute of the time when the spirit fled.

ÆT. 49.

and willingly threw all the responsibility for affairs on the CHAP. British government. The official class, more numerous in proportion to population than in any country in Europe, scrambled for the petty salaries of paltry posts allotted by popular election. Since 1849 they had increased by twentyfive per cent., and were now one in a hundred of the inhabitants. The clergy in a passive way took part with the demagogues. Men of ability and sense were not wanting, but being unorganized, discouraged, and saturated with distrust, they made no effort to stem the jobbery, corruption, waste, going on around them. Roads, piers, aqueducts, and other monuments of the British protectorate reared before 1849, were falling to pieces. Taxes were indifferently collected. Transgressors of local law went unpunished. In ten years the deficit in the revenue had amounted to nearly £100,000, or two-thirds of a year's income. The cultivators of the soil figured in official reports as naturally well affected, and only wishing to grow their currants and their olives in peace and quietness. But they were extremely poor, and they were ignorant and superstitious, and being all these things it was inevitable that they should nurse discontent with their government. Whoever wanted their votes knew that the way to get them was to denounce the Englishman as έτερόδοξος καλ ξένος, heretic, alien and tyrant. There was a senate of six members, chosen by the high commissioner from the assembly. The forty-two members of the assembly met below galleries that held a thousand persons, and nothing made their seats and salaries so safe as round declamations from the floor to the audience above, on the greatness of the Hellenic race and the need for union with the Greek kingdom. The municipal officer in charge of education used to set as a copy for the children, a prayer that panhellenic concord might drive the Turks out of Greece and the English out of the seven islands.

Cephalonia exceeded the rest of the group both in population and in vehemence of character, while Zante came first of all in the industry and liveliness of its people.1 These

¹ See Sir C. Napier's The Colonies: treating of their value generally and of the Ionian Islands in particular.

year before was now hooted in the Park. most unpopular man in the country, and the idol of the mind. To Mrs. Gladstone he writes (Feb. 17):-

Mr. Gladstone was at first doubtful, but soon made up his Ar.

paid by one human being to another.] that the compliment was the highest I have ever known to be brains.' I have often told the story with this brief commentary, of my walking power; and you should give me some of your wish I could make an exchange with you. I would give you some raptures and used these words: 'I tell you what, Lyndhurst, I weiv to triog sid mort year evonimul Brougham went into Frenchman. [Lord Lyndhurst expounded the matter in a most somewhat inclines to it; being, as Lord Lyndhurst says, half a rock. Lord Lyndhurst is decidedly against the bill, Brougham not a little rambling, the other calm and clear as a deep pool upon faculties, Brougham vehement, impulsive, full of gesticulation, and next birthday) respectively, both in the fullest possession of their followed with these two wonderful old men at 80 and 86 (coming found Lord Brougham with him. A most interesting conversation against it. From him I went to-day to Lord Lyndhurst, and I into the House of Lords it will pass. Lord Aberdeen is strong having plenty of fight; the result is doubtful; but if the bill gets As respects the Conspiracy bill, you may depend upon our honour was not henceforth to be a shadow and a name, it the failings of his countrymen, contended that if national perhaps too often made it his business to call attention to Mr. Gladstone (Feb. 19), on the other hand, 'as one who has tooting in respect of certain offences as the British subject. doing no worse than placing the foreign refugee on the same he was doing no more than international comity required, and played by eminent men. Palmerston vainly explained that The debate showed a curious inversion of the parts usually difficulties. Peel said to your hus-band, "That is not your way, Lynd-hurst." Of all the intellects I have ever known, his, I think, worked with the least friction." are such) who was too fond of making happened to touch some man (there in the Peel cabinet the conversation of some of them. Once I remember the disadvantage in certain respects my colleagues in cabinet: much to cellors who since his time have been mind with the five other lord chanfrom a letter of Mr. Gladstone's and Lady Lyndhurst, Aug. 31, 1883, and he continues:—'I have often compared Lord Lyndhurst in my own pared Lord Lyndhurst in and own mind with the face of the face o The portion within brackets is

and willingly threw all the responsibility for affairs on the CHAP. British government. The official class, more numerous in proportion to population than in any country in Europe, scrambled for the petty salaries of paltry posts allotted by popular election. Since 1849 they had increased by twentyfive per cent., and were now one in a hundred of the inhabit-The clergy in a passive way took part with the dem-Men of ability and sense were not wanting, but agogues. being unorganized, discouraged, and saturated with distrust, they made no effort to stem the jobbery, corruption, waste, going on around them. Roads, piers, aqueducts, and other monuments of the British protectorate reared before 1849, were falling to pieces. Taxes were indifferently collected. Transgressors of local-law went unpunished. In ten years the deficit in the revenue had amounted to nearly £100,000, or two-thirds of a year's income. The cultivators of the soil figured in official reports as naturally well affected, and only wishing to grow their currants and their olives in peace and quietness. But they were extremely poor, and they were ignorant and superstitious, and being all these things it was inevitable that they should nurse discontent with their government. Whoever wanted their votes knew that the way to get them was to denounce the Englishman as έτερόδοξος καλ ξένος, heretic, alien and tyrant. There was a senate of six members, chosen by the high commissioner from the as-The forty-two members of the assembly met below galleries that held a thousand persons, and nothing made their seats and salaries so safe as round declamations from the floor to the audience above, on the greatness of the Hellenic race and the need for union with the Greek kingdom. The municipal officer in charge of education used to set as a copy for the children, a prayer that panhellenic concord might drive the Turks out of Greece and the English out of the seven islands.

Cephalonia exceeded the rest of the group both in population and in vehemence of character, while Zante came first of all in the industry and liveliness of its people.1 These

Æт. 49.

¹ See Sir C. Napier's The Colonies: treating of their value generally and of the Ionian Islands in particular.

the fervent wish that in public life we might never part. off before 6 with S. Herbert. We separated for the evening with CH

Two or three letters exhibit the situation:

Lord Derby to Mr. Gladstone.

Russell to make it possible for him to accept. in this offer; but I fear he is too intimately associated with John distribution of offices. I would willingly include Sidney Herbert sincere desire to consult your wishes, as far as possible, as to the so fortunate as to do so, I am sure there would be on all hands a ed bluode I ii bas ; tenidas besoqorq ym gainrot ni bis eldadlav it would afford me very great satisfaction if I could obtain your patible with my own. Believing that you stand in this position, moment fettered by other ties, and whose principles are not incomobtaining the eo-operation of men of eminence, who are not at this ministration. In doing so, I am very desirous, if possible, of which I have felt it my duty not to decline, of forming an adand I have been entrusted by the Queen with the difficult task, tinguished a part, the government, as you know, has resigned; vote of the other night, in which you took so prominent and dis-St. James's Square, Feb. 21, 1858.—In consequence of the adverse avail to deter me from forming part of it. hin the fact of your being the head of a ministry, which would were colleagues, I may be permitted to say that there is nothing if possible, in such a task; and remembering the years when we giving it full effect. It would therefore be my first wish to aid, of that vote. The honour of the House is materially involved in lament to see the House of Commons trampled on in consequence importance of the vote taken on Friday; and I should deeply 10 Great George Street, Feb. 21, 1858.—I am very sensible of the

Mr. Aludstone to Lord Derby.

which we have been separated, there would be various matters to render you material service. After the long years during in my power by accepting it, either alone or in concert with others, and flattering terms, has been the question whether it would be sequence of the offer which you have conveyed in such friendly Among the first questions I have had to put to myself, in conthe best thing would be by a bold coup d'état to sweep CHAP. away the constitution.1

Ær. 49.

III

Immediately after Mr. Gladstone had started, what the seeretary of state described as the most serious misfortune conceivable happened. A dispatch was stolen from the pigeonholes of the colonial office, and a morning paper printed it. It had been written home some eighteen months before by Sir John Young, and in it he advised his government, with the assent of the contracting powers, to hand over either the whole of the seven islands to Greece, or else at least the five southern islands, while transforming Corfu and its little satellite of Paxo into a British colony. It was true that a few days later he had written a private letter, wholly withdrawing this advice and substituting for it the exact opposite, the suppression namely of such freedom as the islanders possessed. This second fact the public did not know, nor would the knowledge of it have made any difference. The published despatch stood on record, and say what they would, the startling impression could not be effaced. Well might Lytton call it an inconceivable misfortune. It made Austria uneasy, it perturbed France, and it irritated Russia, all of them seeing in Mr. Gladstone's mission a first step towards the policy recommended in the despatch. In the breasts of the islanders it kindled intense excitement, and diversified a chronic disorder by a sharp access of fever. It made Young's position desperate, though he was slow to see it, and practically it brought the business of the high commissioner extraordinary to nought before it had even begun.

He learned the disaster, for disaster it was, at Vienna, and appears to have faced it with the same rigorous firmness and self-eommand that some of us have beheld at untoward

Ioniennes. Lettre à Lord John Russell, par François Lenormant. (Paris, Amyot, 1861.) The Ionian Islands in relation to Greece. By John Dunn Gardner, Esqr., 1859. Four years in the Ionian Islands. By Whittingham. Pamphet by S. G. Potter, D.D. See also Gleanings, iv. p. 287.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, relative to the mission of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to the Ionian Islands in 1858. Presented in 1861. Finlay's History of Greece, vii. p. 305, etc. Letters by Lord Charles Fitzroy, etc., showing the anomalous political and financial position of the Ionian Islands. (Ridgway, 1850). Le Gouvernement des Res

TH.

He told me that Lord Derby and his friends were expecting to be CHA able to induce you to join them.

If you agree rather with the men opposite than with those high office. member of the House who has or can have any claim to that being prime minister before you approach the age of every other to see you leave them—and I know nothing that can prevent your You have many friends there, and some who would grieve much with the majority, and no government can be formed without you. and in power. If you remain on our side of the House, you are a party in the country which is every day lessening in numbers Derby, you link your fortunes with a constant minority, and with not forgive their members if they support it. If you join Lord than his own vote and speeches, for the liberal constituencies will may give it his support for a time, but he can give it little more venient for us and the whigs to overthrow it. Lord Palmerston can only exist upon forbearance, and will only last till it is conround him, as Peel was supported in 1841. A Derby government confidence in him. There is no party in the country to rally his own party in the country, and in the House, have not much they dislike his former leader in the Commons; and notoriously himself. The whole liberal party in the country dislike him, and leave him in no better position than that in which he now finds and any appeal to the country, now or hereafter, must, I think, the House is greater and more powerful than it is in the country tion, to convert this minority into a majority. His minority in him-and it is impossible by any management, or by any dissolu-Derby has only about one-third of the House of Commons with fidence that you will not misinterpret what I am doing. nothing but in the most friendly spirit, and I have some con-Will you forgive me if I write to you on this matter? I say among whom you have been sitting of late, I have nothing to say. I am sure you will follow where 'the right' leads, if you only discover it, and I am not hoping or wishing to keep you from the right. I think I am not mistaken in the opinion I have formed of the direction in which your views have for some years been bending. You know well enough the direction in which the opinions of the country are tending. The minority which invites you to join of the country are tending. The minority which invites you to join disclaiming any designs of that kind. He held levees, he called upon the archbishop, he received senators and representatives, and everywhere he held the same emphatic Ex. 4 language. He soon saw enough to convince him of the harm done to British credit and influence by the severities in Cephalonia; by the small regard and frequent contempt shown by many Englishmen for the religion of the people for whose government they were responsible; by the diatribes in the London press against the Ionians as brigands, pirates, and barbarians; and by the absence in high commissioners and others 'of tact, good sense, and good feeling in the sense in which it is least common in England, the sense namely in which it includes a disposition to enter into and up to a certain point sympathise with those who differ with us in race, language, and creed.' Perhaps his penetrating eye early discovered to him that forty years of bad rule had so embittered feeling, that even without the stolen despatch, he had little chance.

He made a cruise round the islands. His visit shook him a good deal with respect to two of the points-Corfu and Ithaca—on which it has been customary to dwell as proving Homer's precise local knowledge. The rain poured in torrents for most of the time, but it cleared up for a space to reveal the loveliness of Ithaca. In the island of Ulysses and Penelope he danced at a ball given in his honour. In Cephalonia he was received by a tumultnous mob of a thousand persons, whom neither the drenching rains nor the unexpected manner of his approach across the hills could baffle. They greeted him with incessant cries for union with Greece, thrust disaffected papers into his carriage, and here and there indulged in cries of κάτω ή προστασία, down with the protectorate, down with the tyranny of fifty years. This exceptional disrespect he ascribed to what he leniently called the history of Cephalonia, meaning the savage dose of martial law nine years before. He justly took it for a marked symbol of the state of excitement at which under various influences the popular mind had arrived. Age and infirmity prevented the archbishop from coming to offer his respects, so after his leves

the present occasion I have not seen such a prospect; and before I received your letter yesterday afternoon I had made my choice.

This ended the first scene of the short fifth act. The new government was wholly conservative.

 Π

Derby's followers.' incurred the strong dislike of a considerable portion of Lord possess the sympathy of the House at large, while you have power above any other member, I fear that you do not really With an admitted superiority of character and intellectual Cladatone that his position in the House was 'very peculiar.' be transcribed. At the end of 1856 Lord Aberdeen told Mr. sonage which at this cooling distance of time need not here Then comes some angry language about that enigmatic perespecially when the alternative is such a man as Dizzy. sole ruling motive of Gladstone's and Graham's coursegood ground for the violent personal prejudice which is the aton is the one absorbing feeling with him, . . . aee no be the true one, that personal dislike and distrust of Palmeronly account for it on the supposition, which I suppose to moral sense of feeling being able to bean with Dizzy. I can confessed that he was 'amazed at a man of Gladstone's high abneirl aid to aremime taom edt to enO .evil-vanees ot no gni Graham was nearer seventy than sixty; and Aberdeen drawnot wonder at it. Mr. Gladstone was now approaching fifty; though at Gladstone's age and with his abilities he could dent notices a restless anxiety for a change of position, (Dec. 1856), and a year and a half later the same corresponsays and does too much, Graham had told Lord Aberdeen political friends were uneasy about him, 'He writes and Throughout the whole of this period, Mr. Gladstone's

Things grew worse rather than better. Even friendly journalists in the spring of 1858 wrote of him as 'the most signal example that the present time affords of the man of speculation misplaced and lost in the labyrinth of practical politics.' They call him the chief orator and the weakest man in the House of Commons. He has exhibited at every night embarked on the Terrible on his way to Athens. His stay in the immortal city only lasted for three or four days, and I find no record of his impressions. They were probably those of most travellers educated enough to feel the spell of the Violet Crown. Illusions as to the eternal summer with which poets have blessed the Isles of Greece vanished as they found deep snow in the streets, icicles on the Acropolis, and snow-balling in the Parthenon. He had a reception only a shade less cordial than if he were Demosthenes come back. He dined with King Otho, and went to a Te Deum in honour of the Queen's birthday. Finlay, the learned man who had more of the true spirit of history than most historians then alive, took him to a meeting of the legislature; he beheld some of the survivors of the war of independence, and made friends with one valiant lover of freedom, the veteran General Church. Though, thanks to the generosity of an Englishman, they had a university of their own at Corfu, the Ionians preferred to send their sons to Athens, and the Athenian students immediately presented a memorial to Mr. Gladstone with the usual prayer for union with the Hellenie kingdom. On the special object of his visit, he came away from Athens with the impression that opinion in Greece was much divided on the question of immediate In truth his position had union with the Ionian islands. been a false one. Everybody was profoundly deferential, but nobody was quite sure whether he had come to pave the way for union, or to invite the Athenian government to check it, and when Rangabé, the foreign minister, found him without credentials or instructions, and staved off all discussion, Mr. Gladstone must have felt that though he had seen one of the two or three most wondrous historic sites on the globe, that was all.

CHAP.

Ær. 49.

Of a jaunt to wilder scenes a letter of Mr. Arthur Gordon's gives a pleasant glimpse:—

You will like an account of an expedition the whole party made yesterday to Albania to pay a visit to an old lady, a great proprietress, who lives in a large ruinous castle at a place called Filates. She is about the greatest personage in these regions, and have often thought that I was beholding the Jesuit of the closet really dovout, and the Jesuit of the world, ambitious, artful, and always on the watch for making his rapier thrusts. Mr. Gladstone, in a word, is extremely eminent, but strangely eccentric, a Simeon Stylites among the statesmen of his time.

In May an important vacancy occurred in the ministerial ranks by Lord Ellenborough's resignation of the presidency of the board of control. This became the occasion of a nemorandum prepared (May 22) for submission to Aberamentandum prepared (May 22) for submission to Aberamentandum prepared (May 22) for submission to Aberacement and Graham, whom Lord Derby urged him to consult.

Memorandum by Mr. Gladstone submitted to Lord Aberdeen and Sir James Graham. May 22, '58.

debate began, Mr. Walpole, after previously sounding Sir William debate began, Mr. Walpole, after previously sounding Sir William Heathcote to a similar effect, called me aside in the lobby of the thouse of Commons and inquired whether I could be induced to take office. I replied that I thought that question put by him of his own motion—as he had described it—was one that I could hardly answer. It seemed plain, I said, that the actual situation hardly answer. It seemed plain, I said, that the actual situation they must plainly work through it unchanged; that the head of the government was the only person who could make a proposal or put a question about taking office in it; I added, however, that or put a question about taking office in it; I added, however, that my general views were the same as in February.

This morning I had a note from Walpole asking for an appointment; and he called on me at four o'clock accordingly. He stated that he came by authority of Lord Derby to office. That he had of control or, if I preferred it, the colonial office. That he had told Lord Derby I should, he thought, he likely to raise difficulties on two points: first, the separation from those who have been my friends in public life; secondly, the leadership of the House of triends in public life; secondly, the leadership of the House of option to speak or to be silent on the latter of these subjects; the head of the stairs and ushered us into a large room with a divan round three sides of it. Sweetmeats and water and pipes and coffee were brought as usual, some of the cups and their filigree stands very handsome. We went out to see the town, preceded by a tall black slave in a gorgeons blue velvet jacket, with a great silver stick in his hand. Under his guidance we visited the khans, the bazaar and the mosque; not only were we allowed to enter the mosque with our shoes on, but on Gladstone expressing a wish to hear the call to prayer, the muezzin was. sent up to the top of the minaret to call the azan two hours before the proper time. The sight of the green-turbaned imam crying the azan for a Frank was most singular, and the endless variety of costume displayed by the crowds who thronged the verandahs which surround the mosque was most picturesque. The gateway of the castle too was a picturesque scene. Retainers and gnards, slaves and soldiers, and even women, were lounging about, and a beautiful tame little pet roedeer played with the pretty children in bright coloured dresses, clustering under the cavernous archway.

CHAP.

Ær. 49.

We had dinner in another large room. I counted thirty-two dishes, or I may say courses, for each dish at a Turkish dinner is brought in separately, and it is rude not to eat of all! The most picturesque part of the dinner, and most unusual, was the way the room was lighted. Eight tall, grand Albanians stood like statues behind us, each holding a candle. It reminded me of the torch-bearers who won the laird his bet in the Legend of Montrose.

After dinner there was a long and somewhat tedious interval of smoking and story-telling in the dark, and we called upon Lacaita to recite Italian poetry, which he did with much effect, pouring out sonnet after sonnet of Petrarch, including that which my father thinks the most beautiful in the Italian language, that which has in it the 'lampeggiar del angelico riso.' This showed me how easy it was to fall into the habits of a country. Gladstone is as unoriental as any man well can be, yet his calling on Lacaita to recite was really just the same thing that every Pasha does after dinner, when he orders his tale-teller to repeat a story. The ladies meanwhile were packed off to the harem for the night, Lady Bowen acting as their interpreter. My L. H. C., his two secretaries, his three aide-de-camps, Captains Blomfield and Palmerston than from almost any one, and this was more on account of his temper and views of public conduct, than of any political opinions. May more, it would be hard to show broad differences of public principle between the government and the bench opposite.

I said, however, that in my view the proposal which he had made to me could not be entertained. I felt the personal missiontands to me could not be entertained of being thrown out of party connection; but a man at the bottom of the well must not try to get out, however disagreeable his position, until a rope or a ladder is put down to him. In this case my clear opinion was that by joining the government I should shock the public sentities that by joining the government I should shock the public sentitient and should make no essential, no important, change in their ment and should make no essential, no important, change in their position.

I expressed much regret that accidental causes had kept back from my view at the critical moment the real extent of Lord Derby's proposals in Pebruary; that I answered him then as an individual with respect to myself individually. . . . I could not separate from those with whom I had been acting all my life long, in concert with whom all the habits of my mind and my views of public affairs had been formed, to go into what might justly be called a cabinet of strangers, since it contained no man to whom I had ever been a colleague, with the single exception of Lord I had ever been a colleague, with the single exception of Lord Derby, and that twelve or fourteen years ago.

While I did not conceive that public feeling would or ought to approve this separation, on the other hand I felt that my individual junction would and could draw no material accession of strength acceptance must be without the approval of friends, that in ust acceptance must be without the approval of friends, that in ust and oubtedly be an element of great weight in the case. This showed clearly that Lord Derby was looking to me in the first place, and then to others beyond me. He did not, however, found upon this any request, and he took my answer as an absolute refusal. His tone was, I need not say, very cordial; and I think I have stated all that was material in the conversation, except I have stated all that was material in the conversation, except that he signified they were under the belief that Herbert entertained strong personal feelings towards Disraeli.

Returning home, however, at seven this evening I found a note

Mr. Disraeli to Mr. Gladstone.

Confidential

I think it of such paramount importance to the public interests, that you should assume at this time a commanding position in the administration of affairs, that I feel it a solemn duty to lay before yon some facts, that you may not decide under a misapprehension. Our mutual relations have formed the great difficulty in accomplishing a result, which I have always anxiously desired.

Listen, without prejudice, to this brief narrative.

In 1850, when the balanced state of parties in the House of Commons indicated the fature, I endeavoured, through the medium of the late Lord Londonderry, and for some time not without hope, to induce Sir James Graham to accept the post of leader of the conservative party, which I thought would remove all difficulties.

When he finally declined this office, I endeavoured to throw the game into your hands, and your conduct then, however minitentional, assisted me in my views.

The precipitate ministry of 1852 baffled all this. Could we have postponed it another year, all might have been right.

Nevertheless, notwithstanding my having been forced publiely into the chief place in the Commons, and all that occurred in consequence, I was still constant to my purpose, and in 1855 suggested that the leadership of the House should be offered to Lord Palmerston, entirely with the view of consulting your feelings and facilitating your position.

Some short time back, when the power of dissolution was certain, and the consequences of it such as, in my opinion, would be highly favourable to the conservative party, I again confidentially sought fir James Graham, and implored him to avail himself of the favourable conjuncture, accept the post of leader in the H. of C., and allow both of us to serve under him.

He was more than kind to me, and fully entered into the state of affairs, but he told me his course was run, and that he had not strength or spirit for such an enterprise.

Thus you see, for more than eight years, instead of thrusting myself into the foremost place, I have been, at all times, actively prepared to make every sacrifice of self for the public good, which a reality, and this operation he proposed to earry out with _ a bold hand. The details of this enlargement of popular Ær. 49. rights and privileges, and the accompanying financial purgation, do not now concern us. Whether the ease either demanded or permitted originality in the way of construc-tion I need not discuss. The manufacture of a constitution is always the easiest thing in the world. The question is whether the people concerned will work it, and in spite of that buoyant optimism which never in any eireumstances deserted him in respect of whatever business he might have in hand, Mr. Gladstone must have doubted whether his islanders would ever pretend to accept what they did not seek, as a substitute for what they did seek but were not allowed to have. Before anybody knew the scope of his plan, the six newspapers flew to arms with a vivacity that, whether it was Italian or was Greek, was in either ease a fatal sign of the public temper. What, they cried, did the treaty of 1815 mean by describing the Ionian state as free and independent? What was a protectorate, and what the rights of the protector? Was there no difference between a protector and a sovereign? What could be more arrogant and absurd than that the protector, who was not sovereign, should talk about 'conceding' reforms to a free and independent state? All these questions were in themselves not very easy to answer, but what was a more serious obstacle than the argumentative puzzles of partisans was a want of moral and political courage; was the sycophancy of one class, and left open was to turn the mockery of free government into CHAP.

the greediness of others.1 Closely connected with the recommendations of constitutional reform was the question by whom the necessary communications with the assembly were to be conducted. Sir John Young was obviously impossible, though he was not at once brought to face the fact. Mr. Gladstone upon this made to the colonial secretary (December 27) an offer that the same accents of guarded reprobation: ness of Mr. Gladstone's reply on this occasion, I seem to hear you will not be sorry to part. I trust, to remove from your mind some impressions with which letter you have been so kind as to address to me will enable me, 11 Carlton House Terrace, May 25, '58. —My dear Sir, —The

¹ May 7, 1861. Hans. 3rd Ser. that may in the course of generations 162, p. 1687. The salaries of the deputies struck him as especially excessive, and on the same occasion he tet fall the obiter dictum; 'For my next I trust that of all the claraters.' part I trust that of all the changes

Mr. Gladstone to Mr. Disraeli.

James Graham. the handsomeness of your conduct in offering to resign it to Sir to you, and on Saturday last I acknowledged to Mr. Walpole never thought your retention of that office matter of reproach reference to your position as leader of your party. But I have You have given me a narrative of your conduct since 1850 with life taken a decision which turned upon those relations. ments. Will you allow me to assure you that I have never in my proved the main difficulty in the way of certain political arrange-You consider that the relations between yourself and me have

You assure me that I have ever been mistaken in failing to place in sharp political conflict, have I either felt any enmity towards period of my life, not even during the limited one when we were towards any one who had the slightest claim to it, and that at no me say that I have never known you penurious in admiration you among my friends or admirers. Again I pray you to let you, or believed that you felt any towards me.

government, in order to make any change worth a trial. what change would be requisite in the constitution of the present them—what connections can be formed with public approval—and co-operation in cabinet possible—how largely old habits enter into what are the conditions which make harmonious and effective not do it in virtue of party connections. I must consider then supposed. Were I at this time to join any government I could me to find means of overcoming, are broader than you may have Derby's wish I have sought. But the difficulties which he wishes At the present moment I am avaiting counsel which at Lord public life to be very narrow.—I remain, etc. disposes of what we are and do, and I find the limits of choice in yourself well reminded me that there is a Power beyond us that I state these points fearlessly and without reserve, for you have left open was to turn the mockery of free government into CHAP. a reality, and this operation he proposed to carry out with a bold hand. The details of this enlargement of popular Ær. 49 rights and privileges, and the accompanying financial purgation, do not now concern us. Whether the case either demanded or permitted originality in the way of construction I need not discuss. The manufacture of a constitution is always the easiest thing in the world. The question is whether the people concerned will work it, and in spite of that buoyant optimism which never in any eircumstances deserted him in respect of whatever business he might have in hand, Mr. Gladstone must have doubted whether his islanders would ever pretend to accept what they did not seek, as a substitute for what they did seek but were not allowed to have. Before anybody knew the scope of his . plan, the six newspapers flew to arms with a vivacity that, whether it was Italian or was Greek, was in either case a fatal sign of the public temper. What, they cried, did the treaty of 1815 mean by describing the Ionian state as free and independent? What was a protectorate, and what the rights of the protector? Was there no difference between a protector and a sovereign? What could be more arrogant and absurd than that the protector, who was not sovereign, should talk about 'conceding' reforms to a free and independent state? All these questions were in themselves not very easy to answer, but what was a more serious obstacle than the argumentative puzzles of partisans was a want of moral and political courage; was the sycophaney of one class, and the greediness of others.1

Closely connected with the recommendations of constitutional reform was the question by whom the necessary communications with the assembly were to be conducted. Sir John Young was obviously impossible, though he was not at once brought to face the fact. Mr. Gladstone upon this made to the colonial secretary (December 27) an offer that that may in the course of generations be made in the constitution of this country, the very last and latest will be the payment of members of this House.'

¹ May 7, 1861. Hans. 3rd Ser. 162, p. 1687. The salaries of the deputies struck him as especially excessive, and on the same occasion he let fall the obiter dictum; 'For my part I trust that of all the changes

subject. For me the question, confined as it is to myself, is a Canstrow one, and I am bound to say that I arrive without doubt at the result.

'I hope and trust,' said Graham, when he knew what Mr. Gladstone had done, 'that you have decided rightly; my judgment inclined the other way. I should be sorry if your letter to Lord Derby led him to make any more extended proposal. It could not possibly succeed, as matters now stand; and the abortive attempt would be injurious to him. The reconstruction of the fossil remains of the old Peel party is a hopeless task. No human power can now reanimate it with the breath of life; it is decomposed into atoms and will be remembered only as a happy accident, while it lasted.' I would be a step towards the dismemberment of the Turkish would always beat traffic by steamer through the canal; it up by a pack of foreign projectors; traffic by the railway of this country; the public meetings on its behalf were got was imposed upon the credulity and simplicity of the people persisted that the scheme was the greatest bubble that ever was made in the House of Commons. Lord Palmerston from sanctioning the project. In June a motion of protest all their influence at Constantinople to prevent the Sultan Europe. For fifteen years the British government had used engineers, statesmen, and diplomatists in every country in genius of Lesseps, and was at this time the battle-ground of Their dream had taken shape in the fertile and persevering Simonian visionaries in the earlier half of the century. Canal, that first emanated from the French group of Saint the memorable scheme for the construction of the Suez statesman descended from his pillar. Now was the time of In one remarkable debate of this summer the solitary

ΛI

Vitzthum reports a conversation with Mr. Disraeli in January 1858, of a different tenour:—'We are at all times ready,' he said, 'to take back this deserter, but only if he surrenders unconditionally.'—Vitzthum, i. p. 269.

i'I wish,' said Mr. Disraeli to Bishop Wilberforce in 1862, 'you could have induced Gladstone to join Lord Lord Derby's government when Lord Ellenborough resigned in 1853. It was not my fault that he did not: I almost went on my knees to him.'— home as to himself. Politicians above all men can never CHAP safely count on the charity that thinketh no evil. Lord John -Russell told Lord Aberdeen that it was clear that Gladstone was staying away to avoid a discussion on the coming Reform bill. There was a violent attack upon him in the Times (January 13) as having supplanted Young. The writers of leading articles looked up Greek history from the days of the visit of Ulysses to Aleinons downwards, and they mocked his respect for the countrymen of Miltiades, and his reverence for the church of Chrysostom and Athanasius. satirists of the eleverest journal of the day admitted his greatness, the brilliance and originality of his finance, the incomparable splendour of his cloquence, and a courage equal to any undertaking, that quailed before no opposition and suffered no abatement in defeat, and they only marvelled the more that a statesman of the first rank should accept at the hands of an insidious rival a fifth-rate mission-insidious rival not named but easy to identify. The fact that Mr. Gladstone had hired a house at Corfu was the foundation of a transcendent story that Mr. Disraeli wished to make him the king of the Ionian islands. 'I hardly think it needful to assure you,' Mr. Gladstone told Lytton, 'that I have never attached the smallest weight to any of the insinuations which it seems people have thought worth while to launch at some member or members of your government with respect to my mission.' Though Mr. Gladstone was never by any means unconscious of the hum and buzz of paltriness and malice that often surrounds conspicuous public men, nobody was ever more regally indifferent. Graham predicted that though Gladstone would always be the first man in the House of Commons, he would not again be what he was before the Ionian business. They all thought that he would be attacked on his return. 'Ah,' said Aberdeen, 'but he is terrible in the rebound.'

After much perplexity and running to and fro in London, it was arranged between the secretary of state and Mr. Gladstone's friends, including Phillimore principally, and then Northcote and M. Bernard, that a course of proceeding should be followed, which Mr. Gladstone when he knew it

X. Ær. 50 Britain was 'to employ a particular solicitude with regard to the legislation and general administration of those states,' and was to appoint a lord high commissioner to reside there with all necessary powers and authorities. The Duke of Wellington foretold that it would prove 'a tough and unprofitable job,' and so in truth it did. A constitutional charter in 1817 formed a system of government that soon became despotic enough to satisfy Metternich himself. The scheme has been justly described as a singularly elever piece of work, appearing to give much while in fact giving nothing at all. It contained a decorous collection of chapters, sections, and articles imposing enough in their outer aspect, but in actual operation the whole of them reducible to a single clause enabling the high commissioner to do whatever he pleased.

This rough but not ill-natured despotism lasted for little more than thirty years, and then in 1849, under the influence of the great upheaval of 1848, it was changed into a system of more popular and democratic build. The old Venetians, when for a couple of centuries they were masters in this region, laid it down that the islanders must be kept with their teeth drawn and their claws clipped. Broad and the stick, said Father Paul, that is what they want. This view prevailed at the colonial office, and maxims of Father Paul Sarpi's sort, incongruously combined with a paper constitution, worked as ill as possible. Mr. Gladstone always applied to the new system of 1849 Charles Buller's figure, of first lighting the fire and then stopping up the chimney. The stick may be wholesome, and local self-government may be wholesome, but in combination or rapid alternation they are apt to work nothing but mischief either in Ionian or any other islands. Sir Charles Napier-the Napier of Scindewho had been Resident in Cephalonia thirty years before. in Byron's closing days, describes the richer classes as lively and agreeable; the women as having both beauty and wit, but of little education; the poor as hardy, industrious, and intelligent-all full of pleasant humour and vivacity, with a striking resemblance, says Napier, to his countrymen, the Irish. The upper class was mainly Italian in origin, home as to himself. Politicians above all men can never safely count on the charity that thinketh no evil. Lord John ... Russell told Lord Aberdeen that it was clear that Gladstone was staying away to avoid a discussion on the coming Reform bill. There was a violent attack upon him in the Times (January 13) as having supplanted Young. The writers of leading articles looked up Greek history from the days of the visit of Ulysses to Alcinous downwards, and they mocked his respect for the countrymen of Miltiades, and his reverence for the church of Chrysostom and Athanasius. The satirists of the eleverest journal of the day admitted his greatness, the brilliance and originality of his finance, the incomparable splendour of his eloquence, and a courage equal to any undertaking, that quailed before no opposition and suffered no abatement in defeat, and they only marvelled the more that a statesman of the first rank should accept at the hands of an insidious rival a fifth-rate mission-insidious rival not named but easy to identify. The fact that Mr. Gladstone had hired a house at Corfu was the foundation of a transcendent story that Mr. Disraeli wished to make him the king of the Ionian islands. 'I hardly think it needful to assure you.' Mr. Gladstone told Lytton, 'that I have never attached the smallest weight to any of the insinuations which it seems people have thought worth while to launch at some member or members of your government with respect to my mission.' Though Mr. Gladstone was never by any means unconscious of the hum and buzz of paltriness and malice that often surrounds conspicuous public men, nobody was ever more regally indifferent. Graham predicted that though Gladstone would always be the first man in the House of Commons, he would not again be what he was before the Ionian business. They all thought that he would be attacked on his return. 'Ah,' said Aberdeen, 'but he is terrible in the rebound!

CHAP

Ær. 50

After much perplexity and running to and fro in London, it was arranged between the secretary of state and Mr. Gladstone's friends, including Politimore principally, and then Northcote and M. Bernard, that a course of proceeding should be followed, which Mr. Gladstone when he know it.

OK 7. 58.

Britain was 'to employ a particular solicitude with regard to the legislation and general administration of those states,' and was to appoint a lord high commissioner to reside there with all necessary powers and authorities. The Duke of Wellington foretold that it would prove 'a tough and unprofitable job,' and so in truth it did. A constitutional charter in 1817 formed a system of government that soon became despotic enough to satisfy Metternich himself. The scheme has been justly described as a singularly clever piece of work, appearing to give much while in fact giving It contained a decorous collection of nothing at all. chapters, sections, and articles imposing enough in their outer aspect, but in actual operation the whole of them reducible to a single clause enabling the high commissioner to do whatever he pleased.

This rough but not ill-natured despotism lasted for little more than thirty years, and then in 1849, under the influence of the great upheaval of 1848, it was changed into a system of more popular and democratic build. The old Venetians, when for a couple of centuries they were masters in this region, laid it down that the islanders must be kept with their teeth drawn and their claws clipped. Bread and the stick, said Father Paul, that is what they want. This view prevailed at the colonial office, and maxims of Father Paul Sarpi's sort, incongruously combined with a paper constitution, worked as ill as possible. Mr. Gladstone always applied to the new system of 1849 Charles Buller's figure, of first lighting the fire and then stopping up the chimney. The stick may be wholesome, and local self-government may be wholesome, but in combination or rapid alternation they are apt to work nothing but mischief either in Ionian or any other islands. Sir Charles Napier—the Napier of Scinde who had been Resident in Cephalonia thirty years before, in Byron's closing days, describes the richer classes as lively and agreeable; the women as having both beauty and wit, but of little education; the poor as hardy, industrious, and intelligent—all full of pleasant humour and vivacity, with a striking resemblance, says Napier, to his countrymen, the Irish. The upper class was mainly Italian in origin, constitution, to have dissolved them, and above all to have CHAP. stopped their pay. Instead of this he informed them that they must put their wishes into the shape of a petition to the Queen. The idea was seized with alacrity (January 29). Oligarchs and demagogues were equally pleased to fall in with it, the former because they hoped it would throw their rivals into deeper discredit with their common master, the latter because they knew it would endear them to their constituents.

The Corfiotes received the declaration of the assembly and the address to the Queen with enthusiasm. Great crowds followed the members to their homes with joyous acclamations, all the bells of the town were set ringing, there was a grand illumination for two nights, and the archbishop ordered a Te Deum. Neither te-deums nor prayers melted the heart of the British cabinet, aware of the truth impressed at the time on Mr. Gladstone by Lytton, that neither the English public nor the English parliament likes any policy that 'gives anything up.' The Queen was advised to reply that she could neither consent to abandon the obligations she had undertaken, nor could permit any application from the islands to other Powers in furtherance of any similar design.

Then at last came the grand plan for constitutional reconstruction. Mr. Gladstone after first stating the reply of the Queen, read an eloquent address to the assembly (February 4) in Italian, adjuring them to reject all attempts to evade by any indirect devices the duty of pronouncing a clear and intelligible judgment on the propositions now laid before them. His appeal was useless, and it was received exactly as plans for assimilating Irish administration to English used to be. The nationalists knew that reform would be a difficulty the more in the way of separation, the retrogrades knew it would be a spoke in the wheel of their own jobbery. Mr. Gladstone professed extreme and truly characteristic astonishment in respect of the address to the Queen, that they should regard the permission to ask as identical with the promise to grant, and the right to petition as equivalent to the right to demand.

ÆT. 50.

BOOK IV. 1858.

two islands were the main scene and source of difficulty. In Cephalonia nine years before the date with which we are now dealing, an agrarian rising had occurred more like a bad whiteboy outrage than a national rebellion, and it was suppressed with cruel rigour by the high commissioner of the day. Twenty-two people had been hanged, three hundred or more had been flogged, most of them without any species of judicial investigation. The fire-raisings and destruction of houses and vineyards were of a fierce brutality to match. These Ionian atrocities were the proceedings with which Prince Schwarzenberg had taunted Lord Aberdeen by way of rejoinder to Mr. Gladstone's letters on barbarous misgovernment in Naples, and the feelings that they had roused were still smouldering. Half a dozen newspapers existed, all of them vehemently and irreconcilably unionist, though all controlled by members of the legislative assembly who had taken an oath at the beginning of each parliament to respect and maintain the constitutional rights of the protecting sovereign. The liberty of unlicensed printing, however, had been subject to a pretty stringent check. By virtue of what was styled a power of high police, the lord high commissioner was able at his own will and pleasure to tear away from home, occupation, and livelihood anybody that he chose, and the high police found its commonest objects in the editors of newspapers. An obnoxious leading article was not infrequently followed by deportation to some small and barren rock, inhabited by a handful of fishermen. Not Cherubim and Seraphim, said Mr. Gladstone, could work such a system. A British corporal with all the patronage in his hands, said another observer, would get on better than the greatest and wisest statesman since Pericles, if he had not the patronage. It was little wonder that a distracted lord high commissioner, to adopt the similes of the florid secretary of state, should one day send home a picture like Salvator's Massacre of the Innocents, or Michel Angelo's Last Judgment, and the next day recall the swains of Albano at repose in the landscapes of Claude; should one day advise his chiefs to wash their hands of the Ionians, and on the morrow should hint that perhaps there were only seven dissentients. Mr. Gladstone sums up the case in a private letter to Sidney Herbert.

CHAP. X. Ær. 50.

Corfu, 17th Feb. 1859.—This decision is not convenient for me personally, nor for the government at home; but as a whole I cannot regret it so far as England is concerned. I think the proposals give here almost for the first time a perfectly honourable and tenable position in the face of the islands. The first set of manœuvres was directed to preventing them from being made; and that made me really uneasy. The only point of real importance was to get them out. . . . Do not hamper yourself in this affair with me. Let me sink or swim. I have been labouring for truth and justice, and am sufficiently happy in the consciousness of it, to be little distressed either with the prospect of blame, or with the more serious question whether I acted rightly or wrongly in putting myself in the place of L.H.C. to propose these reforms, -a step which has of course been much damaged by the early nomination of Sir H. Storks, done out of mere consideration for me in another point of view. Lytton's conduct throughout has been such that I could have expected no more from the oldest and most confiding friend.

To Lytton himself he writes (Feb. 7, 1859):—

I sincercly wish that I could have repaid your generous confidence and admirable support with recommendations suited to the immediate convenience of your government. But in sending me, you grappled with a difficulty which you might have postponed, and I could not but do the same. Whether it was right that I should come, I do not feel very certain. Yet (stolen dispatch and all) I do not regret it. For my feelings are those you have so admirably described; and I really do not know for what it is that political life is worth the living, if it be not for an opportunity of endeavouring to redeem in the face of the world the character of our country wherever, it matters not on how small a scale, that character has been compromised.

Language like this, as sincere as it was lofty, supplies the true test by which to judge Mr. Gladstone's conduct both in the Ionian transaction and many another. From the point of personal and selfish interest any simpleton might see that moments long after. The ambassador told him that he ought to see the Austrian minister. With Count Buol he had a long interview accordingly, and assured him that his mission had no concern with any question of Ionian annexation whether partial or total. Count Buol on his part disclaimed all aggressive tendencies in respect of Turkey, and stated emphatically that the views and conduct of Austria in her Eastern policy were in the strictest sense conservative.

OOK

Embarking at Trieste on the warship Terrible, Nov. 21, and after a delightful voyage down the Adriatic, five days after leaving Vienna (Nov. 24th) Mr. Gladstone found himself at Corfu—the famous island of which he had read such memorable things in Thucydides and Xenophon, the harbour where the Athenians had fitted out the expedition to Syracuse, so disastrous to Greek democracy; where the young Octavian had rallied his fleet before the battle of Actium, so critical for the foundation of the empire of the Cæsars; and whence Don John had sallied forth for the victory of Lepanto, so fatal to the conquering might of the Ottoman Turks. It was from Corfu that the brothers Bandiera had started on their tragic enterprise for the deliverance of Italy fourteen years before. Mr. Gladstone landed under a salute of seventeen guns, and was received with all ceremony and honour by the lord high commissioner and his officers.

He was not long in discovering what mischief the stolen despatch had done, and may well have suspected from the first in his inner mind that his efforts to undo it would bear little fruit. The morning after his arrival the ten members for Corfu came to him in a body with a petition to the Queen denouncing the plan of making their island a British colony, and praying for union with Greece. The municipality followed suit in the evening. The whole sequel was in keeping. Mr. Gladstone with Young's approval made a speech to the senate, in which he threw over the despatch, severed his mission wholly from any purpose or object in the way of annexation, and dwelt much upon a circular addressed by the foreign office in London to all its ministers abroad

there were only seven dissentients. Mr. Gladstone sums up the case in a private letter to Sidney Herbert.

CHAP. X. Ær. 50.

Corfu, 17th Feb. 1859.—This decision is not convenient for me personally, nor for the government at home; but as a whole I cannot regret it so far as England is concerned. I think the proposals give here almost for the first time a perfectly honourable and tenable position in the face of the islands. The first set of manœuvres was directed to preventing them from being made; and that made me really uneasy. The only point of real importance was to get them out. . . . Do not hamper yourself in this affair with me. Let me sink or swim. I have been labouring for truth and justice, and am sufficiently happy in the consciousness of it, to be little distressed either with the prospect of blame, or with the more serious question whether I acted rightly or wrongly in putting myself in the place of L.H.C. to propose these reforms, -a step which has of course been much damaged by the early nomination of Sir H. Storks, done out of mere consideration for me in another point of view. Lytton's conduct throughout has been such that I could have expected no more from the oldest and most confiding friend.

To Lytton himself he writes (Feb. 7, 1859):—

I sincerely wish that I could have repaid your generous confidence and admirable support with recommendations suited to the immediate convenience of your government. But in sending me, you grappled with a difficulty which you might have postponed, and I could not but do the same. Whether it was right that I should come, I do not feel very certain. Yet (stolen dispatch and all) I do not regret it. For my feelings are those you have so admirably described; and I really do not know for what it is that political life is worth the living, if it be not for an opportunity of endeavouring to redeem in the face of the world the character of our country wherever, it matters not on how small a scale, that character has been compromised.

Language like this, as sincere as it was lofty, supplies the true test by which to judge Mr. Gladstone's conduct both in the Ionian transaction and many another. From the point of personal and selfish interest any simpleton might see that

ЭК

Mr. Gladstone with his suite repaired to the archbishop. 'We found him,' says Mr. Gordon, 'seated on a sofa dressed in his most gorgeous robes of gold and purple, over which flowed down a long white beard. . . . Behind him stood a little court of black-robed, black-bearded, black-capped, dark-faced priests. He is eighty-six years old, and his manners and appearance were dignified in the extreme. Speaking slowly and distinctly he began to tell Gladstone that the sole wish of Cephalonia was to be united to Greece, and there was something very exciting and affecting in the tremulous tones of the old man saying over and over again, "questa infelice isola, questa isola infelice," as the tears streamed down his cheeks and long silvery beard. It was like a scene in a play.'

At Zante (Dec. 15), the surface was smoother. A concourse of several thousands awaited him; Greek flags were flying on all sides in the strong morning sea-breeze; the town bands played Greek national tunes; the bells were all ringing; the harbour was covered with boats full of gaily dressed people; and the air resounded with loud shouts $\zeta \dot{\eta} \tau \omega$ $\dot{\delta} \phi \iota \lambda \dot{\delta} \lambda \eta \nu \Gamma \lambda \dot{\delta} \delta \sigma \tau \omega \nu$, $\zeta \dot{\eta} \tau \omega$ $\dot{\eta}$ $\ddot{\epsilon} \nu \omega \sigma \iota s$ $\mu \epsilon \tau \dot{\alpha}$ $\tau \dot{\eta} s$ E $\lambda \lambda a \delta o s$, Long live Gladstone the Philhellene, hurrah for union with Greece.

Every room and passage in the residency, Mr. Gordon writes to Lord Aberdeen, was already thronged. . . . Upstairs the excitement was great, and as soon as Gladstone had taken his place, in swept Gerasimus the bishop (followed by secres of swarthy priests in their picturesque black robes) and tendered to him the petition for union. But before he could deliver it, Gladstone stopped him and addressed to him and to the assembly a speech in excellent Italian. Never did I hear his beautiful voice ring out more clear or more thrillingly than when he said, 'Ecco l' inganno.' . . . It was a seene not to be forgotten. The priests, with eye and hand and gesture, expressed in lively pantomime to each other the effect produced by each sentence, in what we should think a most exaggerated way, like a chorus on the stage, but the effect was most picturesque.

He attended a banquet one night, went to the theatre the next, where he was greeted with lusty zetos, and at mid-

there were only seven dissentients. Mr. Gladstone sums up the case in a private letter to Sidney Herbert.

Ær. 50.

CHAP.

Corfu, 17th Feb. 1859.—This decision is not convenient for me personally, nor for the government at home; but as a whole I cannot regret it so far as England is concerned. I think the proposals give here almost for the first time a perfectly honourable and tenable position in the face of the islands. The first set of manœuvres was directed to preventing them from being made; and that made me really uneasy. The only point of real importance was to get them out. . . . Do not hamper yourself in this affair with me. Let me sink or swim. I have been labouring for truth and justice, and am sufficiently happy in the consciousness of it, to be little distressed either with the prospect of blame, or with the more serious question whether I acted rightly or wrongly in putting myself in the place of L.H.C. to propose these reforms, -a step which has of course been much damaged by the early nomination of Sir H. Storks, done out of mere consideration for me in another point of view. Lytton's conduct throughout has been such that I could have expected no more from the oldest and most confiding friend.

To Lytton himself he writes (Feb. 7, 1859):—

I sincerely wish that I could have repaid your generous confidence and admirable support with recommendations suited to the immediate convenience of your government. But in sending me, you grappled with a difficulty which you might have postponed, and I could not but do the same. Whether it was right that I should come, I do not feel very certain. Yet (stolen dispatch and all) I do not regret it. For my feelings are those you have so admirably described; and I really do not know for what it is that political life is worth the living, if it be not for an opportunity of endeavouring to redeem in the face of the world the character of our country wherever, it matters not on how small a scale, that character has been compromised.

Language like this, as sincere as it was lofty, supplies true test by which to judge Mr. Gladstone's conduct the Ionian transaction and many another. From the of personal and selfish interest any simpleton might it was thought that the lord high commissioner should pay her a visit if he wished to see Albania. . . . It was a lovely morning, and breakfast was laid on the balcony of the private apartments looking over the garden and commanding the loveliest of views across the strait. Gladstone was in the highest spirits, full of talk and romping boyishly. After breakfast the L. H. C.'s barge and the cutters of the Terrible conveyed us on board the pretty little gunboat.

ЭК

We reached Sayada in about two hours, and were received on landing by the governor of the province, who had ridden down from Filates to meet us. We went to the house of the English vice-consul, whilst the long train of horses was preparing to start, but after a few minutes' stay there Gladstone became irrepressibly restless, and insisted on setting off to walk-I of course walked The old steward also went with us, and a guard of eight white-kilted palikari on foot. The rest of the party rode, and from a slight hill which we soon reached, it was very pretty to look back at the long procession starting from Sayada and proceeding along the narrow causeway running parallel to our path, the figures silhouetted against the sea. Filates is about 12 miles from Sayada, perhaps more, the path is rugged and mountainous, and commands some fine views. Our palikari guards fired off their long Afghan-looking guns in every direction, greatly to Gladstone's annoyance, but there was no stopping them.

Scouts on the hills gave warning of our approach, and at the entrance to Filates we were met by the whole population. First the Valideh's retainers, then the elders, then the moolahs in their great green turbans, the Christian community, and finally, on the top of the hill, the Valideh's little grandson, gorgeously dressed, and attended by his tutor and a number of black slaves. The little boy salaamed to Gladstone with much grace and self-possession, and then conducted us to the castle, in front of which all the townsfolk who were not engaged in receiving us were congregated in picturesque groups on the smooth grassy lawns and under the great plane trees. The castle is a large ruinous enclosure of walls and towers, with buildings of all sorts and ages within. The Valideh herself, attired in green silk and a fur pelisse, her train held by two negro female slaves, received us at

Æт. 50.

up the broad doctrine that a people are the only true judges CHAP. who should be their rulers—a proposition that was at once seized and much used by the Dandolos, Lombardos, Cavalieratos and the rest at Corfu. Scarcely anybody pretended that England had any separate or selfish interest of her own. 'It is in my view,' said Mr. Gladstone, 'entirely a matter of that kind of interest only, which is in one sense the highest interest of all-namely the interest which is inherent in her character and duty, and her exact and regular fulfilment of obligations which she has contracted with Europe.'1

But he held the opinion that it would be nothing less than a crime against the safety of Europe, as connected with the state and course of the Eastern question, if England were at this moment to surrender the protectorate; for if you should surrender the protectorate, what were you to say to Candia, Thessaly, Albania, and other communities of Greek stock still under Turkish rule? Then there was a military question. Large sums of British money had been flung away on fortifications,2 and people talked of Corfu as they talked in later years about Cyprus, as a needed supplement to the strength of Gibraltar and Malta, and indispensable to our Mediterranean power. People listened agape to demonstrations that the Ionian islands were midway between England and the Persian Gulf; that they were two-thirds of the way to the Red Sea; that they blocked up the mouth of the Adriatic; Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria, Naples, formed a belt of great towns around them; they were central to Asia, Europe and Africa. And so forth in the alarmist's well-worn currency.

Lord Palmerston in 1850 had declared in his highest style that Corfu was a very important position for Mediterranean interests in the event of a war, and it would be great folly to give it up. A year later he repeated that though he should

¹ Mr. Gladstone, May 7, 1861.—
Hans. Third Ser. 162, p. 1687.
2 Napier in his Memoir on the Roads of Cephalonia (p. 45) tells how Maitland had a notion of building a fort on that island, and on his best fort on that island, and on his boat one day asked the commanding engineer how much it would cost. The engineer talked about £100,000. 'Upon this Sir Thomas turned round in the boat, with a long and loud whistle. After this whistle I thought it best to let at least a year pass without again mentioning the subject.'

OK V. 58. Mandricardi, and the vice-consul, all slept in the same room, and that not a large one, and we were packed tight on the floor, under quilts of Brusa silk and gold, tucked up round us by gorgeous Albanians. Gladstone amused himself with speculating whether or no we were in contravention of the provisions of Lord Shaftesbury's lodging-house act!

After a month of cloudless sunshine it took it into its head to rain this night of all nights in the year, and rain as it only does in these regions. Gladstone and I walked down again despite of wind, rain, and mud, and our palikari guard—to keep up their spirits, I suppose—chanted wild choruses all the way. We nearly got stuck altogether in the muddy flat near Sayada, and got on board the Osprey wet through, my hands so chilled I could hardly steer the boat. Of course we had far outwalked the riding party, so we had to wait. What a breakfast we ate! that is those of us who could eat, for the passage was rough and Gladstone and the ladies flat on their backs and very sorry for themselves.

Mr. Gladstone's comment in his diary is brief:—'The whole impression is saddening; it is all indolence, decay, stagnation; the image of God seems as if it were nowhere. But there is much of wild and picturesque.' The English in the island, both civil and military, adopted the tone of unfriendly journals in London, and the garrison went so far as not even to invite Mr. Gladstone to mess, a compliment never omitted before. The Ionians, on the other hand, like people in most other badly governed countries did not show in the noblest colours. were petitions, letters, memorials, as to which Mr. Gladstone mildly notes that he has to 'lament a spirit of There was a exaggeration and obvious errors of fact.' stream of demands from hosts of Spiridiones, Christodulos, Euphrosunes, for government employ, and the memorial survives, attested by bishop and clergy, of a man with a daughter to marry, who being too poor to find a dowry 'had decided on reverting to your Excellency's well-known philhellenism, and with tears in his eyes besought that your Excellency,' et cetera.

CHAPTER XI

JUNCTION WITH THE LIBERALS

(1859)

Conviction, in spite of early associations and long-cherished prepossessions-strong conviction, and an overpowering sense of the public interests operating for many, many years before full effect was given to it, placed me in the ranks of the liberal party .-GLADSTONE (Ormskirk, 1867).

WHEN Mr. Gladstone returned to England in March 1859, he found the conservatives with much ineffectual industry, some misplaced ingenuity, and many misgivings and divisions, trying their hands at parliamentary reform. infringement of what passed for a liberal patent was not turning out well. Convulsions in the cabinet, murmurs in the lobbies, resistance from the opposite benches, all showed that a ministry existing on sufferance would not at that stage be allowed to settle the question. In this contest Mr. Gladstone did not actively join. Speaking from the ministerial side of the House, he made a fervid defence of nomination boroughs as the nurseries of statesmen, but he voted with ministers against a whig amendment. desire, he said, was to settle the question as soon as possible, always, however, on the foundation of trust in the people, that 'sound and satisfactory basis on which for several years past legislation had been proceeding.' The hostile amendment was carried against ministers by statesmen irreconcilably at variance with one another, alike in principle and The majority of thirty-nine was very large for those days, and it was decisive. Though the parliament was little more than a couple of years old, yet in face of the desperate confusion among leaders, parties, and groups, and

CHAP. XI.

Æт. 50.

58.

)OK

IV

Mr. Gladstone applied himself with the utmost gravity to the affairs of a pygmy state with a total population under 250,000. His imagination did its work. While you seem, he said most truly, to be dealing only with a few specks scarcely visible on the map of Europe, you are engaged in solving a problem as delicate and difficult as if it arose on a far more conspicuous stage. The people he found to be eminently gifted by nature with that subtlety which is apt to degenerate into sophistry, and prone to be both rather light-minded and extremely suspicious. The permanent officials in Downing Street, with less polite analysis, had been accustomed to regard the islanders more bluntly as a 'pack of scamps.' This was what had done the mischief. The material condition of the cultivators was in some respects not bad, but Mr. Gladstone laid down a profound and solid principle when he said that 'no method of dealing with a civilised community can be satisfactory which does not make provision for its political action as well as its social state.'1 idea of political reform had for a time made head against the idea of union with the Greek kingdom, but for some years past the whole stream of popular tendency and feeling set strongly towards union, and disdained contentment with anything else. Mankind turn naturally to the solutions that seem the simplest. Mr. Gladstone condemned the existing system as bad for us and bad for them. Circumstances made it impossible for him to suggest amendment by throwing the burden bodily off our shoulders, and at that time he undoubtedly regarded union with Greece as in itself undesirable for the Ionians. Circumstances and his own love of freedom made it equally impossible to recommend the violent suppression of the constitution. The only course

¹ Finlay, History of Greece, vii. p. 306, blames both Bulwer and Mr. Gladstone because they 'directed their attention to the means of applying sound theories of government to a state of things where a change in the social relations of the inhabitants and modifications in the tenure reform?

but the treasury whip, on ! after the election gave his own of infinite computation among the The chances of turning out the go before the new parliament met. This ca ment were to attempt some reconstructive told Acland that he would not be surprise important measure, alike in domestic and in f the dissolution as being a most improper as r the phalanx should combine? Mr. Gladstone, w' their various opponents combined, but was it pos This was not enough to outnumber the pha ment at the election improved their position by some + hand, and Derby and Disraeli on the other. The gove moderation, as between Palmerston and Russell on the or not so much between democratic change and conservative the real question lay not so much between measures as men; Lord Palmerston the victory two years before. Once more the same essentially conservative feeling that had given The constituencies displayed an extension of noitisoqqo. Mr. Gladstone held the Oxford seat without .gaivloa as an issue to the country, Lord Derby felt justified in disupon the plea that reform had not been formally submitted INNCLION MITH THE LIBERALS 779 anxious to keep Russell in With a view, however, to for he could not trust intimates that he un crisis with a m dide rords, an one of the it comprehens riodt otai tanom until it was certair would be both impo John should be at 14 administration could be uncertain. The prime p confident of a majority of

*698I

.VI

BOOK

1829. BOOK

This step Palmerston explained by her German sympathies, which made her adverse alike to Lord John and himself. Lord Granville first applied to Palmerston, who said that the Queen ought to have sent for himself first; still he agreed to serve. Lord John would only serve under Granville joined—so he argued—and if Palmerston were leader in the Joined—so he argued—and if Palmerston were leader in the on that point his answer was final. So Lord Granville on that point his answer was final. So Lord Granville threw up a commission that never had life in it; the Queen handed the task over to Palmerston, and in a few days handed the task over to Palmerston, and in a few days a great difference in point of weight. would, especially as an addition to the former, have made country. I am very glad we have Gibson; but Cobden the practical administration of the government of this able trial of the experiment of connecting his friends with person that there seemed to be the best chance of a favour-2), 'to find that Cobden does not take office. It was in his sorry, wrote Mr. Gladstone to his brother Robertson (July Cobden, as we know, declined to join.1 'I am exceedingly junction with the men who had thrown that government out. in favour of keeping a tory government in, followed by a Lord Palmerston. The plain man was puzzled by a vote tuods aqil sid no nommoo nəəd bad es əgsuynsı zaringanu noine beau stagy ruot to serth tor had ed mody to retainim a nioi ot Heamid gaind bluos ed wod betebrow abneirl Even some among Mr. Gladstone's private "," su to ano could on behalf of Lord Derby; why is he here to keep out liberal side; they naturally say, "This man has done all he to his Oxford chairman, 'is among the extreme men on the without considerable remark. 'The real scandal,' he wrote The appointment did not pass department of finance. quitted four yeurs and a half defore, and undertook the Mr. Gladstone went back to the office that he had

 \mathbf{II}

r Life of Cobden, ii. pp. 229-233.

2 There is a strange story in the ing much ill humour. 'He cannot falifax Papers of Bright at this time reconcile himself to not being con.

00K IV. 859. if he had already determined on Young's recall, and if he thought reform would stand a better chance if introduced by Mr. Gladstone himself, he was willing to serve as lord high commissioner for the very limited time that might be necessary. We may be sure that the government lost not an hour in making up their minds on a plan that went still further both in the way of bringing Mr. Gladstone into still closer connection with them, and towards relieving themselves of a responsibility which they never from the first had any business to devolve upon Mr. Gladstone or anybody else. The answer came by telegraph (January 11), 'The Queen accepts. Your commission is being made out.'

All other embarrassments were now infinitely aggravated by the sudden discovery from the lawyers that acceptance of the new office not only vacated the seat in parliament, but also rendered Mr. Gladstone incapable of election until he had. ceased to hold the office. 'This, I must confess,' he told Sir Edward, 'is a great blow. The difficulty and the detriment are serious' (January 17). If some enemy on the meeting of the House in February should choose to move the writ for the vacant seat at Oxford, the election would necessarily take place at a date too early for the completion of the business at Corfu, and Mr. Gladstone still at work as high commissioner would still therefore be ineligible. Nobody was ever by constitution more averse than Mr. Gladstone to turning backward, and in this case he felt himself especially bound to go forward not only by the logic of the Ionian situation at the moment, but for the reason which was also characteristic of him, that the Queen in approving his appointment (January 7) had described his conduct as both patriotic and most opportune, and therefore he thought there would be unspeakable shabbiness in turning round upon her by a hurried The Oxford entanglement thus became almost withdrawal. desperate. Resolved not to disturb the settled order of proceeding with his assembly, Mr. Gladstone with a thoroughly characteristic union of ingenuity and tenacity tried various ways of extrication. To complete the mortifications of the position, the telegraph broke down.

The scrape was nearly as harassing to his friends at

BOOK

.658I

be the one remaining Ishmael in the House of Commons ? these circumstances, say, I will have nothing to do with you, and premier, and the new foreign secretary. How could I, under second I am in real and close harmony of sentiment with the new my duty to assist those who perhaps may settle it. Upon the chance of settling it; and, as I desire to see it settled, it seems the first I think that Lord Derby had by dissolution lost all immediate action are those of reform and foreign policy. On moment's hesitation. . . . former government in relation to it, led me to decide without one policy in connection with it, joined to my entire mistrust of the interest and weight of the Italian question, and of our foreign but taking his position in the party. And the overwhelming knew would enlist: Sir James Graham indeed declining office, disaster that it was to undergo. My friends were enlisted, or I settling the question of the franchise, and failed to anticipate the much useful work to be done. I was desirous to co-operate in on the positive side. I felt sure that in finance there was still opinion or tendency likely to disturb the new government. organization of parliament. And I was aware of no differences of mischievous in an isolated position, outside the regular party collisions, but there were no resentments. I felt myself to be the first, there were these. There had been differences and negative and several positive reasons for accepting it. Of When I took my present office in 1859, I had several wavering on the question of a deceased wife's sister. even Sir John Coleridge was alarmed at some reported on his behalf, now refused to serve on his committee, while Phillimore and Bernard had hitherto fought every election for his new antagonist, and Stafford Northcote, who with of Buckingham. His London chairman became chairman in the person of Lord Chandos, the eldest son of the Duke most formidable candidate that he lad yet encountered, re-election to be opposed, but the enemy had secured the 18) disturbing news came from Oxford. Not only was his On the day on which Mr. Gladstone kissed hands (June

Writing to Sir John Acton in 1864, Mr. Gladstone said:

OOK 859.

if he had already determined on Young's recall, and if he thought reform would stand a better chance if introduced by Mr. Gladstone himself, he was willing to serve as lord high commissioner for the very limited time that might be necessary. We may be sure that the government lost not an hour in making up their minds on a plan that went still further both in the way of bringing Mr. Gladstone into still closer connection with them, and towards relieving themselves of a responsibility which they never from the first had any business to devolve upon Mr. Gladstone or anybody else. The answer came by telegraph (January 11), 'The Queen accepts. Your commission is being made out.'

All other embarrassments were now infinitely aggravated by the sudden discovery from the lawyers that acceptance of the new office not only vacated the seat in parliament, but also rendered Mr. Gladstone incapable of election until he had. ceased to hold the office. 'This, I must confess,' he told Sir Edward, 'is a great blow. The difficulty and the detriment are serious' (January 17). If some enemy on the meeting of the House in February should choose to move the writ for the vacant seat at Oxford, the election would necessarily take place at a date too early for the completion of the business at Corfu, and Mr. Gladstone still at work as high commissioner would still therefore be ineligible. Nobody was ever by constitution more averse than Mr. Gladstone to turning backward, and in this case he felt himself especially bound to go forward not only by the logic of the Ionian situation at the moment, but for the reason which was also characteristic of him, that the Queen in approving his appointment (January 7) had described his conduct as both patriotic and most opportune, and therefore he thought there would be unspeakable shabbiness in turning round upon her by a hurried The Oxford entanglement thus became almost withdrawal. desperate. Resolved not to disturb the settled order of proceeding with his assembly, Mr. Gladstone with a thoroughly characteristic union of ingenuity and tenacity tried various ways of extrication. To complete the mortifications of the position, the telegraph broke down.

The scrape was nearly as harassing to his friends at

weighed with me are in some degree peculiar, and I daresay in the course of the contest. The interests that have 'My conscience is light and clear,' he wrote to Heathcote takes a long time in dying.' In the end (July 1), he won the battle by a majority of 191—Gladstone, 1050, Chandos, 859. their industry through your legislation. But old Oxford is all with you. Every year more men obtain the reward of the university and really connected with it. Young Oxford you will have the vote of every one of heart and brain in it was the old story. Goldwin Smith tells him, Win or lose, hostility of the evangelicals was no longer keen; otherwise The clamour against Puseyism had died down, and the Oxford, and he was suspected of being their accomplice. warned that Cobden, Bright, and Gibson were odious in a government with Lord Palmerston at its head?' He was uncertainty exist as to the intentions in regard to defence in Other correspondents were uneasy about his soundness on rifle corps and rifle clubs. How, he replied, can any was taken from them in consequence of my endeavours.

 ${f a}{f pt}$ to slacken the nerve and rust the sword. chagrin that, in natures of less lofty fortifude than his, are and dispelled the inevitable hours of disappointment and of Mr. Gladstone's philosophy of public life. It lightened struck in this last sentence is a characteristic fragment will endure, while the former will pass away.' The balance between suffering and enjoyment, my belief is that the latter ways a field. And even as to the contemptible summing up I have been happy, that the times afforded me in various Oxford; and secondly, because in this respect at least capable of labouring for anything, I have laboured for some satisfaction, first, because I feel that as far as I am and evil, I can look back upon the last twelve years with the heavier, and sharper. In the true estimates of good ai retter is a seconnt is long on both sides, the latter is the representation of the university is not worth my having; good bargain. In the estimate of mere pleasure and pain, have had much reason to complain, I have not had an overcannot merge the man in the representative. While they it is a fault in me, especially as member for Oxford, that I thought unfortunate. A new commission naming a successor was issued, and Mr. Gladstone then became ipso facto liberated. Sir Henry Storks was the officer chosen, and as soon as his commission was formally received by him, he was to execute a warrant under which he deputed all powers to Mr. Gladstone until his arrival. Whether Mr. Gladstone was lord high commissioner when he came to propose his reform, is a moot point. So intricate was the puzzle that the under-secretary addressed a letter to Mr. Gladstone by his name and not by the style of his official dignity, because he could not be at all sure what that official dignity really was. What is certain is that Mr. Gladstone, though it was never his way to quarrel with other people's action taken in good faith on his behalf, did not perceive the necessity for proceeding so rapidly to the appointment of his successor, and thought it decidedly injurious to such chances as his reforms might have possessed.1

> 1826 BOOK

The assembly that had been convoked by Sir John Young for an extraordinary session (January 25), at once showed that its labours would bear no fruit. Mr. Gladstone as lord high commissioner opened the session with a message that they had met to consider proposals for reform which he desired to lay before them as soon as possible. The game began with the passing of a resolution that it was the single and unanimous will (θέλησις) of the Ionian people that the seven islands should be united to Greece. Mr. Gladstone fought like a lion for scholar's authority to treat the word as only meaning wish or disposition, and he took for touchstone the question whether men could speak of the $\theta \acute{\epsilon} \lambda \eta \sigma \iota s$ of the Almighty; the word in the Lord's Prayer was found to be $\theta \dot{\epsilon} \lambda \eta \mu a$. As Finlay truly says, it would have been much more to the point to accept the word as it was meant by those who used it. As to that no mistake was possible. Some say that he ought plainly to have told them they had violated the

1 On Feb. 7, the sceretary of the treasury moved the writ, and the next day the vice-chancellor notified that there would be an election, Mr. Gladstone having 'vacated his seat by accepting the office of lord high commissioner of the Ionian Islands, which he no longer holds.' He was re-elected (Feb. 12) without opposition.

1859. IV.

that Bright was not wrong when he warned him that a the tone of thought then engaging the statesman's mind: it to be, and he expresses the great interest that he feels in stone's present position, so he put down what he conceived that various persons had asked how he understood Mr. Glad-It was admirably done. Mewman in this letter told him sent me a letter giving his own explanation of my position. question of Maynooth, Mr. Gladstone says to him, ' Newman to Manning in 1845 (April 25) after his retirement on the away the foundations on which he had first built. In writing the Maynooth grant, and the Gorham case, that swept long before. It was the fates that befell his book, it was The really great dislodgment in his life had occurred Lord Palmerston's temper implied no wonderful dislodgment. ment. With such purposes an alliance with liberals of the general sympathy of the people of England for improveupon the moral sense and honest feeling of the House, and boldness and power, grappling with abuses, and relying distry with men in it acting with some measure of describe Mr. Gladstone's point of view; the need for a Bright's own words already referred to (p. 625) sufficiently

I say then [writes Newman, addressing an imaginary interlocutor]:—'Mr. Gladstone has said the state ought to have a conscience, but it has not a conscience on the give it a conscience? Is he to impose his own conscience on the state? He would be very glad to do so, if it thereby would become the state's conscience. But that is absurd. He must deal with facts. It has a thousand consciences, as being in its legislative and executive capacities the aggregate of a hundred minds; that is, it has no conscience.

You will say, "Well the obvious thing would be, if the state has not a conscience, that he shall cease to be answerable for it." So he has—he has retired from the ministry. While he thought what it was his duty to cherish as long as ever he could, the notion what it was his duty to cherish as long as ever he could, the notion what it was his duty to cherish as long as ever he could, the notion of the British empire was a subject and servant of the kingdom of Christ—he served the state. Now that he finds this to be a

If the affair had been less practically vexations, we can imagine the Socratic satisfaction with which Mr. Gladstone would have revelled in pressing all these and many other distinctions on those who boasted of being Socrates' fellow-countrymen.

From day to day anxiously did Mr. Gladstone watch what he called the dodges of the assembly. Abundant reason as there was to complain of the conduct of the Ionians in all these proceedings, it is well to record the existence of a number of sincere patriots and enlightened men like the two brothers Themistocles, Napoleon Zambelli, and Sir Peter Braila, afterwards Greek minister in London. This small band of loval adherents gave Mr. Gladstone all the help they could in preparing his scheme of reform, and after the scheme was launched, they strained every nerve to induce the assembly to assent to it in spite of the pressure from the people. Their efforts were necessarily unavailing. The great majority, composed as usual of the friends of England who trembled for their own jobs, joining hands with the demagognes, was hostile to the changes proposed, and only flinched from a peremptory vote from doubt as to its reception among the people. Promptitude and force were not to be expected in either way from men in such a frame of mind. 'On a preliminary debate,' Mr. Gladstone wrote mournfully to Phillimore, 'without any motion whatever, one man has spoken for nearly the whole of two days.' Strong language about the proposals as cheating and fraudulent was freely used, but nothing that in Mr. Gladstone's view justified one of those high-handed prorogations after the manner of the Stuarts, that had been the usual expedient in quarrels between the high commissioner and a recalcitrant assembly. These doings had brought English rule over the islands to a level in the opinion of Southern Europe with Austrian rale at Venice and the reign of the cardinals in the pontifical state.

Sir Henry Storks arrived on the 16th of Pebrury, and the came day the accountly which before had been took included delay, in a case a hurry gave a vote against the projectly which, it each in form prefindingly, and insulation desires; and taints even his virtuous actions at their source.' places himself in continual danger of dallying with wrong, his ears, plays false to his noble destiny as a Christian man, that the echo of them may come back as a soft music in and a bastard motive; and he who does his acts in order but the fame of the moment is a dangerous possession an enduring fame is near akin to the love of true excellence; of his own inner life, when he told them: 'The thirst for we who have it all before us know that it was a maxim moral stature, beneath your darkest reckonings.' So too, of it will make you dwindle, alike in intellectual and in beyond your most sanguine dreams, and that the waste of time will repay you in after life with an usury of profit he exclaimed: 'Believe me when I tell you that the thrift youthful hearers gave new depth to a trite lesson, when discourse momentum. It was his own example that to career, intellectual as well as political, that gave to his that kindle sacred fire in young hearts. It was his own thrift of time and thirst for fame and the glory of knowledge, and glowing image those ever-needed commonplaces about. strongly or too often; and impressing in melodious period functions of a university that can never be enforced too parable buoyancy; enforcing a conception of the proper ticularly pregnant, original, or pithy, but marked by incom-Westminster, and delivered his rectorial address 1-not parsession of his life, he went down from the battle-ground at April the following year, in the midst of the most trying Neaves, excellent as lawyer, humourist, and scholar. In conferred by a recent law. His unsuccessful rival was Lord lord rector of the university of Edinburgh under powers Later in this year Mr. Gladstone was chosen to be the first

BOOK

.6681

 ΛI

The Address is in Gleanings, vii.

300K IV. 1859. If the affair had been less practically vexatious, we can imagine the Socratic satisfaction with which Mr. Gladstone would have revelled in pressing all these and many other distinctions on those who boasted of being Socrates' fellow-countrymen.

From day to day anxiously did Mr. Gladstone watch what he called the dodges of the assembly. Abundant reason as there was to complain of the conduct of the Ionians in all these proceedings, it is well to record the existence of a number of sincere patriots and enlightened men like the two brothers Themistocles, Napoleon Zambelli, and Sir Peter Braila, afterwards Greek minister in London. small band of loyal adherents gave Mr. Gladstone all the help they could in preparing his scheme of reform, and after the scheme was launched, they strained every nerve to induce the assembly to assent to it in spite of the pressure from the people. Their efforts were necessarily unavailing. The great majority, composed as usual of the friends of England who trembled for their own jobs, joining hands with the demagognes, was hostile to the changes proposed, and only flinched from a peremptory vote from doubt as to its reception among the people. Promptitude and force were not to be expected in either way from men in such a frame of mind. 'On a preliminary debate,' Mr. Gladstone wrote monrafully to Phillimore, 'without any motion whatever, one man has spoken for nearly the whole of two days." Strong language about the proposals as cheating and fraudulent was freely used, but nothing that in Mr. Gladstone's view justified one of those high-handed prorogations after the manner of the Stuarts, that had been the usual expedient in quarrels between the high commissioner and a recalcitrant assembly. These doings had brought English rule over the islands to a level in the opinion of Southern Europe with Austrian rule at Venice and the reign of the cardinals in the pontifical state.

Sir Henry Storks arrived on the 16th of February, and the same day the nesmbly which before had been veri in; for delay, in a great lenery gave a vote against the prayer it, which then de in form preliminary, earlies the tenre decise;

the future. for me my place in the present and my direction towards offacing my old sense of reverence for the past, determined continuous in their operation, which, without in any way tributed to forward the action of those home causes more the Turkish empire (1853), I will only say that they all conpolitan kingdom (1851), and in the Balkan peninsula and awares with foreign affairs in Greece (1850), in the Nea-Braemar, July 16, 1892, 'which associated me almost unand important incidents,' he writes in a memorandum, dated commanding hold than on Mr. Gladstone. 'Of the various doctrine of Nationality. On no statesman of this time did that flery doctrine with all its tributaries gain more vague, indefinable, shifting, but most potent and inspiring accredited catchwords of history were giving place to the sovereign independence of the papacy,—these and the other providential pre-eminence of dynasties, balance of power, seemed to have grown decrepit. Divine right of kings, of the European state-system, and the old principles that

ing with it the principle or idiosyncrasy of its new ruler, Italy and Hungary. The rise of the French empire, bringrevolts of race against alien dominion broke out afresh in to shake off the yoke of Austria and of Russia. In 1848 the Dutch; then Italians and Poles strove hard but in vain right; Belgium cut herself asunder from the supremacy of suzerainty. In 1830 Paris overthrew monarchy by divine the Turk over Roumanians and Serbs from despotism to Then followed the transformation of the power of the kings after Waterloo, was the independence of Greece in The first breach in the ramparts of European order set up by Venice, Rome, Sedan, Versailles, came to their close in 1871. to conflicts that after strange and mighty events at Sadowa, chaos. The perilous distractions of 1859-62 were the prelude of the European states with one another had fallen into · years of such moment for our western world—the relations At the opening of the seventh decade of the century—ten

> .6681 BOOK

10K

If the affair had been less practically vexations, we can imagine the Socratic satisfaction with which Mr. Gladstone would have revelled in pressing all these and many other distinctions on those who boasted of being Socrates' fellow-countrymen.

From day to day anxiously did Mr. Gladstone watch what he called the dodges of the assembly. Abundant reason as there was to complain of the conduct of the Ionians in all these proceedings, it is well to record the existence of a number of sincere patriots and enlightened men like the two brothers Themistocles, Napoleon Zambelli, and Sir Peter Braila, afterwards Greek minister in London. This small band of loyal adherents gave Mr. Gladstone all the help they could in preparing his scheme of reform, and after the scheme was launched, they strained every nerve to induce the assembly to assent to it in spite of the pressure from the people. Their efforts were necessarily unavailing. The great majority, composed as usual of the friends of England who trembled for their own jobs, joining hands with the demagogues, was hostile to the changes proposed, and only flinched from a peremptory vote from doubt as to its reception among the people. Promptitude and force were not to be expected in either way from men in such a frame of mind. 'On a preliminary debate,' Mr. Gladstone wrote monrufully to Phillimore, 'without any motion whatever, one man has spoken for nearly the whole of two days." Strong language about the proposals as cheating and fraudulent was freely used, but nothing that in Mr. Gladstone's view justified one of those high-handed prorogations after the manner of the Stuarts, that had been the usual expedient in quarrels between the high commissioner and a recalcitrant assembly. These doings had brought English rale over the islands to a level in the opinion of Southern Europe with Austrian rule at Venice and the reign of the cardinals in the positional states

Sir Henry Stork, arrived on the 16th of February, and the same day the accountly which is fore had been corbing for delay, in a great hurry gave a vote against the proper de, uhich, doorgh in form preliminary too in outstanswife like t in Italy was the oldest of European stories, and for that and dark with suspicion. The rivalry of France and Austria her dulness for dishonesty. For the diplomatic air was thick with too little need to substance; and neighbours mistook slow for a moving age; she entrenched herself behind forms still pronounced unpardonable. Austria, in turn, was far too vengeance on Austria for offences during the Crimean war, enthusiasm of the French Emperor; next to wreak her twoen England and France, by flattering the ambition and the peace had been, first to break down the intimacy belike sick men on their beds. The object of Russia ever since more and more uneasy, turning restlessly from side to side, alliance between France and England. Other powers grew virtually independent state. Meanwhile, much against Napoleon's wish and policy, these proceedings chilled the In no long time (1858) Roumania was created into a the illusions and deceptions of the Crimean war creep forth. it goes another broken promise to a people.' So soon did motion on the Principalities. Lost by 292:114; and with stone wrote in his diary: -- May 4.-H. of C.-Made my ing it, and it was rejected by a large majority. Mr. Glad-Robert Cecil, but Disraeli and Palmerston joined in opposmotion was supported by Lord John Russell and Lord powerful than any that could be bought with money. The raise up antagonists to the ambitions of Russia more breast of freemen. The union of the Principalities would between Russia and Turkey. There is no durrier like the have to resist her. You want to place a living barrier words; a sentence to an ambassador at a public audience on secured him predominance abroad. Europe hung upon his designs and in the grandeur of his military power had his dynasty at home, while faith in the depth of his political France. The Crimean war appeared to have strengthened the time on which we are now about to enter was the ruler of The central figure upon the European stage throughout eighth of her population, it contributed one-fourth of her material value to Austria, for while only containing onematter the Lombardo-Venetian province was a possession of

.6981

BOOK

ΟK

he made a mistake, but measured by his own standard of public virtue, how is he to be blamed, how is he not to be applauded, for undertaking a mission that, but for an unforeseen accident, might have redounded to the honour and the credit of the British power?

V

On February 19 he quitted the scene of so many anxieties and such strenuous effort as we have seen. The Terrible fell into a strong north-easter in the Adriatic, and took thirty-six hours to Pola. There they sought shelter and got across with a smooth sea to Venice on the 23rd. He saw the Austrian archduke whom he found kind, intelligent, earnest, pleasing. At Turin a few days later (March 3), he had an interview with Cavour, for whom at that moment the crowning scenes of his great career were just opening. 'At Vicenza,' the diary records (Feb. 28), 'we had cavalry and artillery at the station about to march; more cavalry on the road with a van and pickets, some with drawn swords; at Verona regiments in review; at Milan pickets in the streets; as I write I hear the tread of horse patrolling the streets. Dark omens!' The war with Austria was close at hand.

I may as well in a few sentences finally close the Ionian chapter, though the consummation was not immediate. Gladstone, while he was for the moment bitten by the notion of ceding the southern islands to Greece, was no more touched by the nationalist aspirations of the Ionians than he had been by nationalism and unification in Italy in 1851. Just as in Italy he clung to constitutional reforms in the particular provinces and states as the key to regeneration, so here he leaned upon the moderates who, while professing strong nationalist feeling, did not believe that the time for its realisation had arrived. A debate was raised in the House of Commons in the spring of 1861, by an Irish member. The Irish catholics twitted Mr. Gladstone with flying the flag of nationality in Italy, and trampling on it in the Ionian islands. He in reply twitted them with crying up nationality for the Greeks, and running it down when it told against the pope. In the Italian case Lord John Russell had (1860) set position and policy to 'one of the sincerest and most imand grimedo the chance of freely opening his and other distinguished persons were present, and Cavour italianissimo. Ministers, the president of the chamber, faction of hearing his host speak of Hudson as quel uomo foreign office, where, among other things, he had the satisbody politic.' Mr. Gladstone dined at Cavour's table at the yourself, lead to very serious disturbances in the European handled by some such calm unprejudiced statesman as means possibly of composing differences, which may, if not this government, and that I look to your coming here as a can only say I think your counsels may be very useful to message to Mr. Gladstone (Feb. 7, 1859), Hudson adds, 'I will less steadfast than his own. made one of those momentous visits to Paris that forced a tion. Two or three days later the Piedmontese minister identifying peace with the continuance of Austrian dominacountry is calm; we will do our duty; England is wrong in et ilinparat era ew ered ; au seeram onw aritanA ai ti and in Lombardy, he said, 'You behold for yourself, that Mr. Gladstone, who had seen the Austrian forces in Venetia the illegitimate predominance of Austria in Italy?' Sardinia to oppose the propaganda of moral influences to peninsula, and is it not England that has encouraged have worked for years to kindle political passion in our for the troubled situation of Italy; for is it not they who the diplomatists, the writers of England, who are responsible peace of Europe. 'No, said Cavour, 'it is the statesmen, sympathies of the court, accused Italy of endangering the true to the Austrian sympathies of his party, and the German was the attitude of England. The government of Lord Derby, Among Cavour's difficulties at this most critical moment Portant friends that Italy had.' 1

Chizot, 'at this moment divide the attention of Hurope, the and better informed intellect than his own.' Two men, said tangled himself, in Mr. Gladstone's phrase, with 'a stronger The French Emperor in his dealings with Cavour had en-

1 Il Coute di Cavour. Ricordi biografici. Per A. Massari (Turin, 1875),

1829

IV. 859.

OOK

not object to the annexation of the southern islands to Greece, Corfu was too important a military and naval post ever to be abandoned by us.1 As Lord Palmerston changed, so did Mr. Gladstone change. 'Without a good head for Greece, I should not like to see the Ionian protectorate surrendered; with it, I should be well pleased for one to be responsible for giving it up.' Among many other wonderful suggestions was one that he should himself become that 'good head.' 'The first mention,' he wrote to a correspondent in parliament (Jan. 21, 1863), 'of my candidature in Greece some time ago made me laugh very heartily, for though I do love the country and never laughed at anything else in connection with it before, yet the seeing my own name, which in my person was never meant to carry a title of any kind, placed in juxtaposition with that particular idea, made me give way.'

Meanwhile it is safe to conjecture, for the period with which in this chapter we are immediately concerned, that in conceiving and drawing up his Ionian scheme, close contact with liberal doctrines as to free institutions and popular government must have quickened Mr. Gladstone's progress in liberal doctrines in our own affairs at home. In 18632 Lord Palmerston himself, in spite of that national aversion to anything like giving up, of which he was himself the most formidable representative, cheerfully handed the Ionians over to their kinsfolk, if kinsfolk they truly were, upon the mainland.8

¹ Ashley, ii. pp. 184, 186. ² Dec. 8, 1862.—Cabinet. Resolution to surrender the Ionian protectorate. Only Lord W[estbury]

opposing.
Mr. Gladstone sent home and three elaborate revised alterwards three elaborate reports on the mischiefs of Ionian government and the constitutional remedies proper for them. They were printed for the use of the cabinet, though whether these fifty large pages, amounting to about a quarter of this volume, received much attention from volume, received much attention from that body, may without scandalum magnatum be doubted, nor do the reports appear to have been laid before parliament. The Italian war was then ereating an agitation in Europe upon nationality, as to which the people of the Ionian islands were people of the Ionian islands were sensitively alive, and the reports would have supplied a good deal of fuel. There was a separate fourth report upon the suppression of disorder in Cephalonia in 1848, which everybody afterwards agreed that it was not expedient to publish. It still exists in the archives of the colonial office. colonial office.

.098I

.ν

BOOK

city,—centre of undying beauty and so many glories in the sounds, he now for the first time in his life beheld the famed into Florence. Cavour attended him, and strange as it Lombardy, and in the latter half of April he made his entry annexation of the four central states to Piedmont and March (1860) Victor Emmannel legalised in due form the pass she passionately resented. In the first three weeks of opened the way to a certain proceeding that when it came to north. Here it was that England directly and unconsciously the annexation of central Italy to the new kingdom in the powers in Italian affairs; it was she who strongly favoured she who secured the principle of non-intervention by foreign And England, too, had no inconsiderable share; for it was in these eight months made the consummation possible. the people and statesmen of northern and central Italy who of France the work could not have been begun; but it was ment of a constructive revolution. Without the sword cipline, energy, legality, order, self-control, to the achieveguiding a people through the ferments of revolt, with disleaders, Cavour, Farini, Ricasoli, the Piedmontese king, no more wonderful case in history of strong and sagacious the demagogue might have stirred up, there can surely be been forced forward, what mischief the voice and spirit of what unseasonable questions might not unnaturally have side, how easily France might have been irritated or estranged, Florence. When we think of the pitfalls that lay on every Commonwealth, were again alive in Bologna, Parma, Modena, the deep and politic temper that built up the old Roman Italy. For eight months after Villafranca, it seemed as if his daring, had passed into the whole population of central political tact, his prudence, his suppleness, his patience, and the interval the movement went forward as if all his Before many months he once more grasped the helm. In from the triumph of Novara down to the defeat of Solferino. for ten years past, that had brought the hated Austrian abortive end of all the astute and deep-laid combinations quitted office, rather than share responsibility for this Italian aspirations. Cavour in poignant rage peremptorily Whatever the motive, Villafranca was a rude check to was all for a strong government, and was ready to was reming one. Then the personage to whom this in stable inference by declaring there was nothing in eration incompatible with a Derby junction. Sirects in his journal:—

Learn Mrs. Chadstone, who did not seem to contemplate in with Palmerston but rather that he should join Derby. In with Palmerston but rather that the strongest governsible under present circumstances would be by such as the give under Aberdeen. To effect this, all people the same and not different ways as of late years. I said the same and not different ways as of late years. I said the same and not different ways as of late years. I said on's government in 1855, as well as Lord John; that in letween Lord John and Gladstone the former had II, and the latter well.

7.—Gladstone dined here. . . . He would vote a conar of the dissolution, and is afraid of the foreign affairs at a moment being left in the hands of Malmesbury; says he opposition, are not only justified but called upon by ngo in the Queen's specch on the dissolution, to test the ngo in the Queen's specch on the dissolution, to test the parties; but that he is himself in a different position, of parties; but that he is himself in a different position, of parties is not that the dissolution, but hesitates

Long interview with Gladstone. He entered most without any reserve into his views on the state of sarties and on the dutics of a statesman at this juncture. The only chance of a strong government was an engratical merston upon Lord Derby, dethroning Disraeli from almerston upon Lord Commons, arranging for a moderate schip of the House of Commons, arranging for a moderate bert Phillimore, gives us other glimpses during this

onfidence,

almerston upon Lord Derby, dethroning Disraeli from ship of the House of Commons, arranging for a moderate ill, placing the foreign office in other hands, but not in cowever, Sir Robert until coming Queen's advocate. He was in he was knighted on be-created baronet in 1881, outrage the eatholic world and bring down his own throne. if only he were sure that no catastrophe would result to and hated.1 The Emperor was eager to withdraw his force, that the cardinals with undisguised ingratitude distrusted thousand French bayonets—the bayonets of the empire maintained in their evilly abused authority by twenty head of a rival faith. For ten years the priests had been same course of territorial partition as had befallen the Crescent in another, and the pope was now to undergo the as grave a danger in one quarter of Europe as was the The Cross seemed in truth stubborn impenetrability. the same vacillation, the same shifty helplessness, the same him of nothing so much as the sultan and his ulemasment in Paris that the pope and his cardinals reminded had diplomatic experience in Turkey. He wrote to his governambassador at the Vatican in those days chanced to have The great unsolved problem was the pope. The French from the whole army of eatholies all over the world; and French Emperor, with hostile clericals in France to face; Austria, deeming her hold upon Venetia at stake; from the instantly expose him in every quarter of the horizon-from alive to all the risks to which Garibaldi's enterprise must of Austria, we do not authentically know. He was at least tion of Louis Napoleon, how far he had realised the weakness not established. How far he had made certain of the abstena federation between a northern kingdom and a southern, is kingdom, or would have preferred, as indeed he attempted, he even really desired the acquisition of the Neapolitan as accomplice in the adventure is still obscure. Whether marked the path that led to Rome. The share of Cavour eyes of Garibaldi and his Thousand, Sicily and Maples Genoa for the deliverance of the Sicilian insurgents. 'a summary of the lives of Plutarch, sailed forth from four central states, the hero whom an admirer described as in May (1860), soon after the annexation to Piedmont of the Unluckily for this design, Garibaldi interposed. One night

1860. V.

French Emperor had made a bargain vith the Devil, and frequently con-, sulted him.

I One of the pope's chamberlains gravely assured the English resident in Rome that he knew from a sure and trustworthy source that the

It would be for the sovereign to decide. Alr. Bright spoke in cannot be tor the would be for the sovereign to be a highly reasonable vein, and they all broke up in great spirits. The whip pored over his lists, and made out that they could not beat the government by less than seven. This was but a slender margin for a vote of no confidence, but it was felt that mere numbers, though a majority might be an indispensable incident, were in this case not the only test of the conditions required for a solid government. Lord Hartington, the representative for a solid government. Lord Hartington, the representative for a solid government.

of office than any government that had existed for many hope that the new government would have a longer tenure England for improvement in our legislation, he was bold to of the Honse, and the general sympathy of the people of to exist, and relying upon the moral sense and honest feeling and power, grappling with the abuses that were admitted reconciled sections, acting with some measure of boldness there should be found men adequately representing these generally feeble and paltering: if in the new government exclusive, the policy had been sometimes wholly wrong, and of the liberal party in the House: the cabinet had been of Sir Robert Peel, he said, there had been no good handling expressed by Mr. Bright. Since the fall of the government The general sense of the majority was probably best wirepullers, by going into the lobby with Disraeli and his answered the riddle that had for long so much harassed the and thirty-seven, the Chadstone and not speak, but he by the narrow figure of thirteen in a House of six hundred After three days' debate, ministers were defeated (June 11) years past.

The Queen, in the embarrassment of a choice between the two whig reterans, induced Lord Granville, whose cabinet life as yet was only some five years, to try to form a government.

possess the confidence of this House and of the country; and we deem it our duty respectfully to submit to your Majesty that such confidence is not reposed in the present advisers of your Alajesty.

3 E

Lord Hartington's motion was—
'That it is essential for the satisfactory result of our deliberations, and for facilitating the disclurge of your Majesty's high functions, that disclured in the disclured of the control of the cont

of no confidence.

1860

BOOK

occasion offers.

brini family, and elaborate accounts in his own handwriting remain. In 1855 he wrote to Lord John Russell, then starting for Vienna, as to a rumour of the adhesion of Naples to the alliance of the western powers:—'In any case I can conceive it possible that the Vienna conferences may touch upon Italian questions; and I sincerely rely upon your burnanity as well as your love of freedom, indeed the latter is but little in question, to plead for the prisoners in the kingdom of the two Sicilies detained for political offences, kingdom of the two Sicilies detained for political offences, real or pretended. I do not ask you to leave any greater real or pretended. I do not ask you to leave any greater

As we have already seen, it was long before he advanced to the view of the thoroughgoing school. Like nearly all his countrymen, he was at first a reformer, not a revolutionary. To the Marquis Dragonetti, Mr. Gladstone wrote from Broadstairs in 1854:—

duty undone, but to bear in mind the singular claims on your commiseration of these most unhappy persons, if and next to the institutions which are the necessary guarantees under every law divine and human, first to good government, any remote or abstract proposition, but upon the right of man, that the champion of liberty should take his ground, not upon top downwards . . . abla ence pace has been to the effect view this is not building from the bottom upwards, but from the instincts, all our history lead us in another direction. In our mode of looking at the Italian question. All our habits, all our of a fact, if I say, we in England cannot bring our minds to this . . . Do not think it presumption, for it is the mere description Italian union and national independence for his watchwords. country now suffers through some of its governments, adopts from the face of the earth of the immeasurable evils which your every Italian who heartily desires the removal from Italy and of the existing system with its hideous mischiefs. political sectaries, I see the best and most available defence be for the better. But in the wild opinions of some of your those countries I can hardly imagine any change that would not evils of the worst government and the most entire anarchy. In Naples has a government as bad as anarchy; Rome unites the

TH.

CH

Mr. Chadstone, with no special anxiety to defend himself, was clear about his own course. 'Nover,' he says,' had I an easier question to determine than when I was asked to join the government. I can hardly now think how I could have looked any one in the face, had I refused my aid (such as it is) at such a time and under such circumstances,' at a moment,' he wrote to the warden of All Souls,' when is the only instrument through which there is any hope, humanly speaking, of any safe and early settlement, and humanly speaking, of any safe and early settlement, and ought to be strengthened, I have joined the only administration that could be formed, in concert with all the friends tration that could be formed, in concert with all the friends (setting aside those whom age excludes) with whom I joined and acted in the government of Lord Aberdeeu,'

To the provost of Oriol he addressed a rather claborate explanation, but it only expands what he says more briefly in a letter (June 16) to Sir William Heathcote, an excellent and honourable man, his colleague in the representation of Oxford:—

I am so little sensible of having had any very donbtful point to consider, that I feel confident that, given the antecedents of the problem as they clearly stood before me, you would have decided in the way that I have done. For thirteen years, the middle space of life, I have been east out of party connection, one. So long have I adhered to the vague hope of a reconstruction, that I have been left alone by every political triend in and tion, that I have been left alone by every political triend in such association with whom I had grown up. My votes too, and such ampport as I could give, have practically been given to I ord Derby's government, in such a manner as undoubtedly to divest me of all claims whatever on the liberal party and the incoming government. Under these circumstances I am asked incoming government. Under these circumstances I am asked to take office. The two leading points which must determine to take office. The two leading points which must determine ord think it not a bad scheme' (June 15, ling 1859). Many curious things sprang ads. up in men's minds at that moment, y of 'I Reproduced in Mr. Russell's to book on Mr. Gladstone, pp. 144-5.

sidered capable of taking office. Lord John broached a scheme for sending him as governor-general to Canada. I rather doubted the expediency of this, but Mr. Gladstone seemed to confined. But her sentiments cannot change, because they are founded upon a regard to the deepest among those principles which regulate the intercourse of men and their formation into political societies. By the end of the year, he softened his judgment of the proceedings of the French Emperor.

BOOK V.

The heavy load of his other concerns did not absolve him in his conscience from duty to the Italian cause:—

Jan. 3, 1860.—I sat up till 2 A.M. with my letter to Ld. J. Russell about Italy, and had an almost sleepless night for it. 4.—2½ hours with the Prince Consort, à deux reprises, about the Italian question, which was largely stated on both sides. I thought he admitted so much as to leave him no standing ground. 5.—Went down to Pembroke Lodge and passed the evening with Lord John and his family. Lord John and I had much conversation on Italy.

if Mapoleon III. had not unsheathed his sword. the freedom of Italy would have remained an empty hope Englishmen have perhaps been too ready to forget that more than justice, it is even less; and both Italians and that measure of insincerity or indifference.' This was no when fairly judged, he can be said to have given proof by which his powers were unequal; but I do not think that, doubt he showed then that he had undertaken a work to least criticism; no one else gave him anything at all. No gave him verbal sympathy and encouragement, or at Europe might have stood combined against him. that he stood single-handed in a cause when any moment he may reply—and the answer is not without force to all that, we fling in his face the truce of Villafranca, Italian cause in the face of the world. When in reply this he has committed himself very considerably to the of a genuine feeling for the Italians—and far beyond had shown, 'though partial and inconsistent, indications himself bound in candour to admit that the Emperor In a cabinet memorandum (Jan. 3, 1860), he declared

After discussing details, Mr. Gladstone laid down in his memorandum a general maxim for the times, that the

would gain any votes at that last moment, while it is believed at that time. If you were heard, it is doubtful whether you more unreasonable and ferecious mob than convocation was Sir Robert Peel's election testify that there never was a hearing. 'Those,' he told Mr. Chadstone, 'who remember ever, thought it very doubtful whether he would get a convocation in person. The dean of Christ Church, howwas raised whether he ought not to go down and address with himself as their strongest confederate. A question him was simply that the tories were out and the liberals in, he had no confidence. After all, the root of the anger against the government in which he declared by anticipation that confidence in a Palmerston government, yet he had joined a vote of confidence in a Derby government, and of want of that men asked whether his very last vote had not been mell he might be.' The provost of Oriel explains to him 'Gladstone, angry, harassed, sore, Phillimore records, 'as have been further reduced: but neither a man nor a shilling In the next year, 1857, I considered that they ought to at all to the establishment or expenditure of the year. was over, that is in the year 1856, I did not take objection two fleets, and break faith with our seamen. When the war ment to reduce their estimates, diminish the army, disband 2. That as soon as the war was over I caused the govern-There is not a shadow of truth in this statement. Orimean war: that is to say limited the expenditure upon L. That as chancellor of the exchequer I "starved" the ing me are wholly unfounded. I mean these two:to re-assure them. The two assertions of fact respectcandidate was obliged to spend thankless hours on letters apprehension that he was for peace at any price. Lyc estimates, and this moved the country clergy to angry asserted that Mr. Chadstone meant to cut down naval The usual waterspout began to pour. The newspapers classes who will now give you many votes.

you would lose some. You would be questioned as to the celesiastical policy of the cabinet. Either you would not be able to answer fully, or you would answer in such terms as to alienate one or other of the two numerous gratitude in their homes, and that it was hailed as worth the translation from each other, weeping over it for joy and words as these spread in Italy like flame, that people copied the language of Lord John. We cannot-wonder that such the King of Sardinia for assisting them. So downright was Majesty's government, therefore, could not pretend to blame ing off their allegiance to their former governments. Her people of Southern Italy had not good reasons for throwgovernment did not feel justified in declaring that the themselves the best judges of their own affairs. Her Majesty's Majesty's government held that the people in question are government for good reasons? Upon this grave matter, her of Naples and the Roman States take up arms against their brave men in the defence of their liberties. Did the people oppressor, it is but an act of justice and generosity to assist when a people for good reasons take up arms against an interests. Vattel, that eminent jurist, had well said that

BOOK V. 1860.

1 Walpole's Russell, ii. pp. 335-339. 2 Martin's Prince Consort, v. p. 226. papal states ordinary justice was administered by roughof the subjects of the king were in prison or in exile; in the under which in Naples thousands of the most respectable that bind nations to their sovereigns, in respect of a system ask ourselves, was it not a little idle to talk of the holy ties of the Italian affair with cleaner hands. Yet to-day we may grave error; and even Garibaldi and Mazzini would come out doctrine that it contained; it was a great public wrong, a Ireland, Canada would await the application of the fatal cabinet or received the approval of a British sovereign; India, that such a document could have passed through a British Graham, for instance, said that he would never have believed Many in England were equally shocked. Even Sir James and of the holy ties that bind peoples to their sovereigns.2 that it was a tough morsel, a disruption of the law of nations Prussia, afterwards the Emperor William, told Prince Albert regret, but more resembled horror. The Prince Regent of despatch with an emotion that was diplomatically called very different. The three potentates at Warsaw viewed the The sensation elsewhere was no less profound, though more than a force of a hundred thousand men.

as with Districli; or far better, for the election had shown that he saw as good a chance of great work with Palmerston covered by events. Meanwhile he may well have thought had not yet disclosed itself to him. This was soon disforce, and amending the machinery of the constitution, the individual. The necessity of summoning new driving well handled, of a state that should emancipate and serve of just practical laws, of wise improvement, of public business reformer of Turgol's type, a born lover of good government, Mr. Chadstone was at this time in his politics a liberal significance of the party wrench, but it was not a conversion. changed principles. I am far from denying the enormous administration, then, marked a party severance but no identity of the two leaders was recognised. To join the new favoured by Palmerston's men. In either case, the political possibility of a reverse process—a Derbyito government and his men. Mr. Bright had contemplated (p. 579) the its long spell of office and power to the countenance of Derby government, which Alr. (Badstone was now entering, owed on the other hand was so much of a Derbyite tory, that his not remark from the Debyte tories. Lahmerston ences of opinion on public questions of principle, that 1858 (p. 584), that there were 'no broad and palpable differits goal. As we have seen, he told Mr. Walpole in May along a road of his own, perhaps not even now perceiving generation between them, and Arx Gladstone had travelled with Canning for their common master; but there was a and his chancellor of the exchequer had both of them started choice between two political ereeds. The new prime minister between joining Derby and joining Palmerston was no vital protracted fourney from tory to liberal. The dilemma Lord Palmerston as a chief landmark in Mr. Gladstone's It seems a mistake to treat the acceptance of office under sion to office in 1858. there after the second Derby accesgovernment side; and he remained pe sut pelon the gangway on the Palmerston administration of 1855 te is worth noticing that he sat on the opposition side; during the 1853 to 1866. During the first Derby government, as we have already seen (p. 423), he sat below the gaugway without breach of continuity from on the ministerial side of the House

CHAPTER II

THE GREAT BUDGET

(1981-0981)

Ir was said that by this treaty the British nation was about blindly to throw herself into the arms of this constant and uniform foe... Did it not much rather, by opening new sources of wealth, speak this forcible language—that the interval of peace, as it would enrich the nation, would also prove the means of enabling her to combat her action, would also prove the means of enabling her to combat her did more than this; by promoting habits of friendly intercourse and of mutual beneft, while it invigorated the resources of Britain, it made it less likely that she should have occasion to call forth these resources.—Pirr (February 12, 1787).

As we survey the panorama of a great man's life, conspicuous peaks of time and act stand out to fix the eye, and in our statesman's long career the budget of 1860 with its spurs of appendant circumstance, is one of these commanding points. In the letter to Acton already quoted (p. 1), Mr. Gladstone says:—

Before parliament met in 1860, the 'situation' was very greatly tightened and enhanced by three circumstances. First, the disaster in China.¹ Secondly, a visit of Mr. Cobden's to Hawarden, when he proposed to me in a garden stroll, the French treatly, and I, for myself and my share, adopted it (nor have I ever for a moment repented or had a doubt) as rapidly as the tender of office two months before. Thirdly, and the gravest of all, the Savoy affair. It, as is supposed, I have Quixotism in my nature, I can assure you that I was at this juncture much more than satisfied, assure you that I was at this juncture much more than satisfied, was repulsed by the fire of the Chinese forts (June 25, 1859). In the following year a joint Anglo-French expedition captured the Taku forts and occupied Pekin (Oct. 12, 1860).

I The disaster was the outcome of the Chinese refusal to receive Mr. Bruce, the British minister at Pekin. Admiral Hope in endeavouring to force an entrance to the Peiho river mere dream, much as it ought to be otherwise, and as it once was otherwise, he has said, I cannot serve such a mistress.

'6981

BOOK

THT.

'But really,' I continue, 'do you in your heart mean to say that he should absolutely and for ever give up the state and country? I hope not. I do not think he has so committed himself. That the conclusion he has come to is a very grave one, and not consistent with his going on blindly in the din and hurry of business, without having principles to guide him, I admit; and this, I conceive, is his reason for at once retiring from the ministry, that he may contemplate the state of things calmly and from without. But I really cannot pronounce, nor can you, nor can he perhaps at once, what is a Christian's duty under these new circumstances, whether to remain in retirement from public affairs or not. Retirement, however, could not be done by halves. If he is absolutely to give up all management of public affairs, he must retire not only to give up all management of public affairs, he must retire not only trom the ministry but from parliament.

'I see another reason for his retiring from the ministry. The public thought they had in his book a pledge that the government would not take such a step with regard to Maynooth as is now before the country. Had he continued in the ministry he would to a certain extent have been misleading the country.

to a certain extent have been misleading the country.

You say, "He made some show of seeing his way in future, for he gave advice; he said it would be well for all parties to yield something. To see his way and to give advice is as if he had found some principle to go on." I do not so understand him. I hought he distinctly stated he had not yet found a principle. But he gave that advice which facts, or what he called circumstances, he gave that advice which if followed out, will, it is to be hoped, lead to some basis of principle which we do not see at present.'

Compared to the supreme case of conscience indicated here, and it haunted Mr. Gladstone for nearly all his life, the perplexities of party could be but secondary. Those perplexities were never sharper than in the four years from 1854 to 1859; and with his living sense of responsibility for the right use of transcendent powers of national service, it was practically inevitable that he should at last quit the barren position of 'the one remaining Ishmael in the House of Commons,' also, he became a convert and did not shrink. hesitated before proceeding to alienate the protectionists by his Italian policy, the ruler of France might well have sionable mind. Although, having alienated the clericals persuasion, was the very man to strike Napoleon's impreselements, and his incomparable gifts of argumentative Cobden, with his union of economic, moral, and social the idea of a more open trade for five or six years, and his head a little at times. The Emperor had played with hve years' standing who is not afraid to let his heart guide to Mr. Bright, 'is really almost the only cabinet minister of upon his volunteered mission, 'Gladstone,' vrote Cobden encouragement, at least he was not forbidden to proceed see Lord John Russell, and though he hardly received Cobden saw Palmerston and tried to cation of feeling. and in both countries produce a solid and sterling pacifionce open the way to a great fiscal reform in both countries, work out with them the scheme of a treaty that should at into communication with the Emperor and his ministers, and the informal sanction of the British government, put himself more definite and more energetic. Why should he not, with way of inquiry. Conversation expanded this into something Paris, he might perhaps be of use to Mr. Gladstone in the been that as he was about to spend a part of the winter in tunity, Gladstone seized it. Cobden's first suggestion had had followed it up, Persigny agreed, Cobden made an opporwith France was in the air. Bright had opened it, Chevalier seed into rich ground. The idea of a commercial treaty where Cobden, the ardent hopeful sower, scattered the good This was the garden walk of which we have just heard, talk with Cobden who, I think, pleases and is pleased. strong with local clergy. I have had a walk and long Iuncheon, but I am afraid the dinner will be rather Cobden came early. Nothing could be better than the

6981

BOOK

Both Cobden and I, says Mr. Gladstone, were keenly in favour of such a treaty (I myself certainly), without intending thereby ny Life of Cobden, ii. chap. xi. For Gorce, Hist. du Second Empire, iii. the French side of the transaction, pp. 213-32.

U HOOSE

898I-698I

CHAPTER 1

THE ITALIAN REVOLUTION

(0987-6287)

RARILLY, if ever, in the centee of our history has there been such a mixture of high considerations, legislative, military, commercial, foreign, and constitutional, each for the most part traversing the rest, and all capable of exercising a vital influence on public policy, as in the long and complicated session of 1860. The commercial treaty first struck the keynote of the year; and the most deeply marked and peculiar feature of the year; and the conflict between the motives and provisions of the treaty on the one hand, and the excitement and exasperation of military sentiment hand, and the exhere.—Gransreau.

This description extends in truth much beyond the session of a given year to the whole existence of the new cabinet, and through a highly important period in Mr. Gladstone's descer. More than that, it directly links our biographic story to a series of events that ereated kingdoms, awoke nations, and re-made the map of Europe. The opening of this long and complex episode was the Italian revolution this long and complex episode was the Italian revolution one of the budget of 1860, When viewed as a whole, it is one of the few cases in which my fortunes as an individual have been closely associated with matters of a public and to the reader's memory the ampler background of this striketo the reader's memory the ampler background of this striking epoch in Mr. Gladstone's public life. The old principles ing epoch in Mr. Gladstone's public life. The old principles

1 Eng. Hist. Rev., April 1887, p. 296.

1860

BOOK

Newcastle, I think, ditto. Thank God. tone of questioning was favourable, Granville and Argyll delighted, but there was no general [resistance], no decided objection; the decided, for I did not ask it, and indeed the case was not complete, and that I could not have hoped a better reception. Mothing I have opened the fundamental parts of my budget in the cabinet, European operation. [A fortnight later (Jan. 28):-] A word to say has been excellent, Palmerston rather neutral. It is really a great power now, if the French will do what is reasonable. Lord John be without it. It has required pressure, but we have got sufficient There are four or five zealous, perhaps as many who would rather he writes:--] The cabinet has been again on the French treaty. will need my closest and most anxious attention. [Two days later find his opinions satisfactory. Till it is through, this vital question with Lewis on other matters, but in trade and finance I do not averse, but they have dehaved very well. I almost always agree difficulties. In fact, a majority of the cabinet is indifferent or passion is for enormous expenditure, and in a case beset with great half or two millions of revenue at a time when all the public well, but it is no small thing to get a cabinet to give up one and a it all depends on me. Lord John backs me most cordially and

To Cobden, Jan. 28.—Criticism is busy; but the only thing really formidable is the unavowed but strong conflict with that passionate expectation of war, which no more bears disappointment than if it were hope or love. Feb. 6.—Cobbett once compared an insignificant public man in an important situation to the lineh-pin in the carriage, and my position recalls his very apt figure to my mind.

Of course in his zeal for the treaty and its connection with tariff reform, Mr. Gladstone believed that the operation would open a great volume of trade and largely enrich the country. But in one sense this was the least of it:—

I had a reason of a higher order. The French Emperor had launched his project as to Savoy and Nice. It should have been plain to all those who desired an united Italy, that such an Italy ought not to draw Savoy in its wake; a country severed from it by the mountains, by language, by climate, and I suppose by pursuits. But it does not follow that Savoy should have been by pursuits. But it does not follow that Savoy should have been tacked on to France, while for the annexation of Nice it was carried this movement of race into its full ascendant. Treatices of were confronted by the dectrine of Nationality. What called itself Order quaked before something that for lack of a better name was called the Revolution. Reason of State of a better name was called the Revolution. Reason of State was celipsed by the Rights of Peoples. Such was the spirit of the new time.

(Sept. 10, 1857):— Mr. Gladstone, not then in office, wrote to Lord Aberdeen insisted that the question of union should be put afresh. sanguine about Turkish civilisation); western diplomacy French was one of the odd reasons why Lord Palmerston was ingeniously falsified by the sultan (whose ability to speak evangel by others—a popular vote was takem. Its result was time—called a comedy by some, a homage to the democratic union, politically divided. According to the fashion of that for keeping the two provinces, although in fiscal and military in her Turcophil humour, went with Anstria against France Austria for reasons of her own objected, and England, still Turkey which the Crimean war had been waged to prevent. This was obviously a firther step towards that partition of Dannbian principalities in a single quasi-independent state. constitution of a Rommanian nationality, by uniting the two the trumpet of Order, made a beginning in urging the ruler, by strange irony at once the sabre of Revolution and brought a temporary and superficial repose. The French The end of the Crimean war and the peace of Paris

The course taken about the Principalities has grieved me. I do not mean so much this or that measure, as the principle on which it is to rest. I thought we made war in order to keep Russia out, and then suffer life, if it would, to take the place of death. But it now seems to be all but avowed, that the fear of danger, not to Rusope, but to Islam—and Islam not from Russia, but from the Ohristians of Turkey,—is to be a ground for stinting their liberties.

In 1858 (May 4) he urged the Derby government to support the declared wish of the people of Wallachia and Moldavia, and to fulfil the pledges made at Paris in 1856. Surely the best resistance to be offered to Russia, he said, is by the strength and freedom of those countries that will its zenith. he used to say, the movement in favour of free trade reached 1842, in 1845, in 1846, and 1853. With the French treaty, a series of which the four earlier terms had been reached in by the imposition of certain small charges and minor of paper. Mearly one million of all this loss he recouped to abolish the reratious excise duty upon the manufacture articles from duties of customs, and a third million in order 178 gaizseler to sake soft rot erom noillim a ylraen bedainpailer a million for the sake of the French treaty, now further course, Mr. Gladstone after having relinquished upwards of ninepence to a shilling. Instead of taking this easy mon xat-emooni edt besiar bas, etar esee to taguz of the long annuities. Or he might have reduced tea and by the French treaty out of the sum released by the expiry tea and sugar as they were, meeting the remissions needed tented himself with keeping the income-tax and duties on be to balance his account, Mr. Gladstone might have conmillions. If the sole object of a chancellor of the exchequer budget seven years before, that charge stood at fifty-two seventy millions; when Mr. Gladstone framed his famous unpopular and difficult. The annual estimates stood at ever was required; more than ever economy was both insecurity in our own borders. Thus more money than officers after the plot of Orsini had bred a sense of broken out with the Chinese. The threats of French In the far East a quarrel had demanded of new type. was a remarkable era in artillery, and guns were urgently revolutionised by the use of iron in place of wood. in national expenditure. The structure of warships was Various circumstances had led to an immense increase the western world, will find in this fabric ample material.1 mi seirs omparison with any of his contemporaries in who seeks to take the measure of Mr. Gladstone as of the boldest of all his achievements, and the reader ono erw yteott oht more from the treaty was one

0981

BOOK

I The reader who wishes to follow these proceedings in close detail will, of course, read the volume of The Financial Statements of 1853, 1860-63, containing also the speech on tax-bills, 1861, and on charities, 1863. (Murray, 1863).

sight of that country filling its right place in the world. The reader will remember that at Turin on his way home Frenchman for being nothing in his own country, was the zenith. Thiers said that the greatest compensation to a of the Emperor of the French. The French empire was at its hear one of them communicate to the other two the orders the conference of Warsaw as three sovereigns assembling to have been a coalition against France, and the pope described victim for a rendezvous. Russia declined to join what would saw the three crowned pirates choose the capital city of their met the Czar at the end of 1860,—Poland quivering as she It was at Warraw that the rulers of Austria and Prussia Europe had interviews at Stuttgart, at Teplitz, at Warsaw. Bismarck. Meanwhile the sovereigns of central and northern the stern, rough genius of the north in the person of Count years later the same nemesis brought him into collision with representatives of this genius that Italy ever had; just as ten practical genius of Italy in the person of one of the hardiest mock Napoleon into fatal conflict with the supple, positive, sidt thguord enutrof do etiqs edt emit ni bas aatslate s The spining our modern politics is usually something of fact, the man of half-shaped end with no sure eye to means. say, the man of fluctuating hope without firm calculation of you will find the political rejugee. You will find, that is to was said by one who knew him well, Serutch the emperor and shadowy home of vagrant ideals and fugitive chimeras. mind of this imposing and mysterious potentate was the Vatican, with emotions pitched in every key. Yet the inspired, was enough to shake Vienna, Turin, London, the his parliament of puppets, a pamphlet supposed to be new year's day, a paragraph in a speech at the opening of CH

The reader will remember that at Turin on his way home from the Ionian Islands in the spring of 1859, Mr. Gladstone saw the statesman who was destined to make Italy. Sir James Hudson, our ambassador at the court of Piedmont, had sounded Cavour as to his disposition to receive the returning traveller. Cavour replied, 'I hope you will do all you can to bring such a proceeding about. I set the highest value on the visit of a statesman so distinguished and such a friend of Italy as Mr. Gladstone.' In conveying this a friend of Italy as Mr. Gladstone.' In conveying this you got in 1863, and then operate in a quiet way, without disturbing anybody? His answer was that the surplus would not have come at all, because it was created by his legislation. The principle adopted, he said, 'was this We are now (1860) on a high table-land of expenditure. This being so, it is not as if we were merely meeting an occasional and momentary charge. We must consider how best to keep ourselves going during a period of high charge. In order to do that, we will aggravate a momentary deficiency that we may thereby make a great and permanent activitiency to productive power. This was his ceaseless refrain—the steadfast pursuit of the durable enlargement of productive steadfast pursuit of the durable enlargement of productive power as the commanding aim of high fuance.

in Appendix.

TTT

-: saw od za zu eroted mid zaird Iliw karwej disorder was diplomatic. An entry or two from Phillimoro's ill, and here again political benevolence surmised that his day for lifting the veil was close at hand, Mr. Cladstone fell pitch in the budget and the commercial treaty. As the the interest of the country had become centred at its highest is not true; but what is true is that when February opened, The explanation is not good-natured, and we know that it and in definice of his foes, for his own unisteil or innings. vincible resolution to come forward in spite of his friends, acter of the session was changed by Alr. Gladstone's inpartisans of another sort assure us that 'the whole charthat on reform they would pull down the ministry. The the eager partisans at the Carlton Olub were confident in the approaching battle of parliamentary reform, and was fixed upon Lord John Russell as the protagonist At the beginning of the year the public expectation

Jan. 29.—Gladstono's emaciation in the past fortnight alarms me, as it has, I find, many other persons. Reb. 5.—Gladstone serionsly ill; all the afternoon in Downing Street; a slight congestion of the lungs. Great treaty and financial speech put off of the lungs. Great treaty and financial speech put off.

ВООК УС У. di

11.9

the relations of the two western powers with one another. ever, as Mr. Chadscone speedily found, much trouble into in the history of contemporary Europe. It brought, how-Cavour executed the mest striking political transformation management of the two western powers, England and France, time England appeared upon the scene, and by his flexible homage to the principle of appeal to the popular voice. In chained the doctrine of nationality, and paid decorous organ of European rovolution in a double sense. He procountry by the ungic of freedom. Let Mapoleon was an eid to oonerovilob odt enn otil oeodw to oeograg zarigeni of a constitution, to keep in step with a statesman, the power by bloodstained usurpation and the perfidious ruin played. It was difficult for the ruler who had risen to gun. I back Count Carour? The game was long and subtly Emperor Anpoleon and Count Cavour. The match has beto averge the repulse of Austria on the Po and the Mincio. ality; above all, Germany might stride forward to the Rhine general conflagration by the freshly lighted torch of Mationthe case of Hungary, might almost any day be kindled into of a war that must put the pope in peril; the case of Poland, the clerical party at home fiercely assailed the prolongation that their ruler had none of the genius of a great commander; unnerved him; he had revealed to his soldiers and to France by mixed motives. The earnage of Solferino appalled or its turn. The Emperor of the French was driven to peace member. The scheme was intrinsically futile, but it served of Wenetia, still remaining Austrian, should be a over which it was hoped that the peop might preside, and kingdom, and the proposed erection of an Italian federation conclusive war by the union of Lombardy to the Piedmontese Villafranca (July 11, 1859), which summarily ended an inand King Victor Emmannel signed those preliminaries of Mr. Chadetone took office, the French and Austrian emperors bloody fields of Magenta and Solfering. A few days after between Austria and the Franco-Sardinian allies on the of the whigs exactly coincided in time with the struggle The overthrow of the Derby government and the accession

1 See L'Empire Libéral, by Émile Ollivier, iv. p. 217.

VOL. I.

SZ

1866

BOOK

(March 17), 'Gladstone is now the real leader of the House, grandeur of his views. Prince Albert wrote to Stockmar eloquence is of a lofty character commensurate with the souvenir of a man who has my thorough esteem, and whose sent him, which he said he would preserve 'as a precious to Mr. Gladstone for the copy of his budget speech he had lasts. Napoleon begged Lord Cowley to convey his thanks monuments of English eloquence as long as the language 'The speech, said Bulwer, 'will remain among the who had now acquired the supremacy that was once his Commons, and for four hours listeped intently to the orator his triumphs a generation before, came to the House of who for the first time since he had quitted the scene of accept them. Among other hearers was Lord Brougham, so marvellous that it would be a waste of all three not to an accord between the occasion, the man, and the measure, of the scheme its greatest recommendation, as suggesting actually served Mr. Gladstone. Even the censorious critics of the leading journal found in the largeness and variety suspense that would have been fatal to mediocrity hints dropped by friends in the secret had added to the general excitement; and as was truly said by contemporaries, casual delay of a week had raised expectation still higher;

Almost every section of the trading and political community looked with favour upon the budget as a whole, though it was true that each section touched by it found fault with its own part. Mr. Gladstone said that they were without exception free traders, but not free traders without exception. The magnitude and comprehensiveness of the enterprise seized the imagination of the country. At the same time it multiplied sullen or uneasy interests.
The scheme was no sooner launched, than the chancellor of the exchequer was overwhelmed by delegates from the paper couple of days he was besieged by delegates from the paper makers; distillers came down upon him; merchants interested in the bonding system, wholesale stationers, linen manufacturers, maketers, licensed victuallers, all in turn manufacturers, maketers, licensed victuallers, all in turn and works with an energy and vigour almost incredible.'

GI

history of his country and the genius of mankind. In one spot at least his musings might well have been profound—the tomb of Machiavelli, the champion of principles three centuries before, to guide that armed reformer, part fox part lion, who should one day come to raise up an Italy one and independent. The Florentine secretary's orb never quite sets, and it was now rising to a lurid ascendant in the politics of Europe for a long generation to come, lighting up the unblest gospel that whatever policy may demand justice will allow.¹

stance, opened a few weeks later. with policy at double play with all the shifts of circummost picturesque of all, an incomparable union of heroism Bourbons and the Vatican. The third act, most romantic, Ten millions still remained in the south under the yoke of millions of inhabitants. Greater things were yet to follow. state, had now grown to be a kingdom with eleven or twelve fusion of central with upper Italy. Piedmont, a secondary at Villafranca. The curtain fell next at Florence upon the have seen, the first act of the extraordinary draina closed and heavy clouds floated into the European sky. As we way, took fierce umbrage at the aggrandisement of France, the bargain closed for which she had herself prepared the the stroke with wise fortitude, but England when she saw Savoy and Nice was what had been anticipated. Italy bore people then ruling in Europe. The issue of the operation in from the doctrines of nationality and the sovereignty of the paid by violence or intrigue to public right, was a derivative critical farce, and often no better than a formal homnge matic act. The piebiscite, though stigmatized as a hypothe first time found a place among the clauses of a diploplebiseite, or direct popular vote upon a given question, for hero of the people. In this transaction the theory of the of the royal race, the other the birthplace of Garibaldi, the of Savoy and Nice, provinces that were, one of them the cradle. assent to annexation, by acquiescing in the cession to France On March 24 Cavour paid Napoleon a bitter price for his

It is a notable thing that in 1859 tion of a complete edition of Machiathe provisional government of Tuscany made a decree for the publica-

.0981 complex as they were, had not proceeded beyond their early treaty and the financial proposals of the year, numerous and BOOK beginning of March, only escaped defeat on May 8 by a majority which would have passed the Commons by a large majority in the apprehended by many men usually rational. The Paper Duty bill, the prospects of the harvest were bad; French invasion was Savoy and Nice explosion; settlement with China was uncertain; outlived its parliamentary honeymoon. There had intervened the narriage effected by the treaty between England and France had delaying the tail of the financial measures until a time when the and it was withdrawn on June 11. But it had done its work, by defeated by the pure vis inertie of the House skilfully applied: mittent, and languid. No division was taken against it. It was franchise. The discussions on it were at once protracted, interthe House were in disguised hostility to the extension of the office by prolonged debating on the finance. A large majority of on reform, and the enemies of reform to discharge a corresponding treaty were thus invited to obstruct it through prolonged debating fond of quoting: 'Never overlap business.' The enemies of the more weighty now than in his time, which Sir James Graham was This was in flat violation of a rule of Lord Bacon's, even enters in an autobiographic memorandum of his latest in order to fix a day for his second reading, Mr. Gladstone When Lord John had asked the cabinet to stop the budget organize the finance of the year. The opposition to the Paper bill sufficient to destroy my accruing balance, and thus to dis-... China, which demanded at once an increase of outlay ... and in the midst of it there came upon us the news of hostilities got rid of, in order to prosecute finance we had much to do, the budget and to the French treaty. When reform was at last this although he was both a loyal colleague and a sincere friend to to entreat you not to press that request.' But he persevered; and I said to him, Lord John, I will go down on my knees to you,

¹ Eng. Hist. Rev. April 1887, p. 301. The majority in the Lords was 193. 104.

Piedmont to the redress of grievances. the famous grido di dolore. The congress of Paris wedded Modena, vacillation in Tuscany, crucity in Maples, constitute heavy taxation and dearth in Lombardy, misgovernment in Piedmont) if she would. Misgovernment in central Italy, from the accidental existence of constitutional liberty (in mont cannot separate the question of national independence wrote to Mr. Gladstone from Turin (April 3, 1859)-' Piedthe case of Italy was overwhelming. Sir James Hudson Stained and turbid are the whirlpools of revolution. Yet all the prudence and all the imprudence of the true statesman. of the Possible. Well did Manzoni say of him, 'Cavour has he used to tell his friends, must above all things have the tact assuredly had neither invented nor hurried. The politician, necessities of a situation that he had not sought, and always with consummate suppleness he confronted the easily roll him and his policy into mire and ruin. Now as whose inspirations he had no faith, whose success might not least from triumphant Mazzinians, his personal focs, in C

In August (1860) Garibaldi crossed from Sicily to the mainland and speedily made his triumphant entry into Maples. The young king Francis withdrew before him at the head of a small force of faithful adherents to Capua, afterwards to Gaeta. At the Volturno the Garibaldians, meeting a vigorous resistance, drove back a force of the royal troops enormously superior in numbers. On the height of this agitated tide, and just in time to forestall a fatal movement of Garibaldi upon Rome, the Sardinian a fatal movement of Garibaldi upon Rome, the Sardinian army had entered the territories of the pope (September 11).

Π

In the series of transactions that I have sketched, the sympathies of Mr. Gladstone never wavered. From the appearance of his Meapolitan letters in 1851, he lost no opportunity of calling attention to Italian affairs. In 1854 he brought before Lord Clarendon the miserable condition of Poerio, Settembrini, and the rest. He took great personal trouble in helping to raise and invest a fund for the Settem-

ΛI

BOOK V.

1860

The rejection of the bill affecting the paper duty by the Lords was followed by proceedings set out by Mr. Gladstone in one of his political memoranda, dated May 26, 1860:—

me his concurrence in Lord Palmerston's closing proposition. accordingly ended with practical acquiescence. And he stated to would endeavour to arrive at the same conclusion. His letter he did not agree in the grounds stated by Lord Palmerston, he question and gave reasons. Then he went on to say that though reply to this, stated that he took a much more serious view of the acquiesce, and no minister ought to resign. Lord John in his was right, that we could not help ourselves, that we should simply the Lords would not be a party vote, that as to the thing done it merston. Lord Palmerston's came in sum to this: that the vote of John Russell a letter which enclosed one to him from Lord Palthat the Paper Duties bill would be rejected, I received from Lord and the English nation. On Sunday, when it was well known respect to the great question now depending between the Lords constructed cabinet, yet I must put down a few words with which so many occur in these strange times and with our strangely Though I seldon have time to note the historial asages of

of our at once confining ourselves to this subject, we should take Lord John; who thought that as public affairs would not admit should be adopted. This was strongly backed in principle by though I earnestly desired that the mildest means of correction dwell. In this proceeding nothing would induce me to acquiesce, ot assilbeen asw ti hoidw noqu seenastancering gnitavarges sebised in fixing the revenue and charge of the country for the year; long declared exclusively its own, and to a divided, responsibility power over the House of Commons in its most vival function House of Lords amounted to the establishment of a revising my opinions, coming to the point that this proceeding of the garniture to the act of their abandonment. Upon this I stated and our determination to defend them if attacked, by way of in the House of Commons as to the value we set on our privileges, marked out. I think he proposed to use some meaningless words consider the case. Lord Palmerston started on the line he had Thereupon I wrote an immediate reply. We met in cabinet to

of it. . . We sympathise strongly, I believe, with the victims of misgovernment, but the English mind is not shocked in limine at the notion of people belonging to one race and language, yet politically incorporated or associated with another; and of shall be glad if it proves to be feasible, but the condition of it must be gradually matured by a course of improvement in the several states, and by the political education of the people; if it seemed be reached by the political education of the people; if it and certainly not by opinions which closely link Italian reconant certainly not by opinions which closely link Italian reconstruction with European disorganization and general war.

So far removed at this date was Mr. Gladstone from the glorified democracy of the Mazzinian propaganda. He told Cobden that when he returned from Corfu in the spring of 1859, he found in England not only a government with atrong Austrian leanings, but to his great disappointment not even the House of Commons so alive as he could have wished upon the Italian question. 'It was in my opinion the authority and zeal of Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell in this question, that kindled the country.'

question are limited by her powers, and these are greatly act is high. The duties of England in respect to the Italian but I think few will doubt that the moral character of the to pass a judgment upon his resignation as a political step; of Sardinia and of Count Cavour. It is hardly possible for me I appreciate all the difficulties of the position both of the King disgust rather than impart relief. But that day has come. the conclusion of a peace should in my own mind cause preliminaries of Villafranca. 'I little thought,' he wrote to Poerio (July 15, 1859),' to have lived to see the day when and he was as angry as his neighbours at the unexpected ripened both his opinions and the sentiment of the country, peninsula. The course of events after the peace speedily to effect some mitigation of the sore evils afflicting the Italian conviction that no plan of peace could be durable which failed bate (April 18, 1859) upon the situation, to express his firm war between France and Austria, Mr. Gladstone spoke in de-While Europe was anxiously watching the prospects of amid the jeers and scoffs of the so-called conservatives.' duty, 'to hear a radical read a long passage from Mr. Burke lived,' he said, speaking of the debate on the Lords and the paper he is very unwell, and I greatly fear killing himself. 17.—'I have a House of Commons, and not a government question. arw ti tally opposite sense? The answer may be that it was treasury bench, after the first lord of the treasury had spoken to have spoken this as chancellor of the exchequer, and from the Yet he was the true conservative at this moment. But ought he Loudly and tempestuously cheered by the radicals, and no one else. silently abetting 'a gigantic innovation on the constitution.' would support the proposal, and taunted the conservatives with language and spirit of the resolutions, if action were proposed he became the House of Commons, and that though he agreed to the demning them, and declaring that action and not resolutions of their conduct. Gladstone most earnestly and eloquently con-

*098T

٠٨

BOOK

The struggle still went on:—

July 20.—H. of C. Lost my Savings Bank Monies bill; my first defeat in a measure of finance in the H. of. C. This ought to be very good for me; and I earnestly wish to make it so.

Aug. 6.—H. of C. Spoke 1½ hour on the Paper duty; a favourable able House. Voted in 266-233. A most kind and indeed notable reception afterwards.

Aug. 7.—This was a day of congratulations from many kind M.P.'s.

The occasion of the notable reception was the moving of his resolutions reducing the customs duty on imported paper to the level of the excise duty. This proceeding was made necessary by the treaty, and was taken to be, as Mr. Chadstone intended that it should be, a clear indication of further determination to abolish customs duty and excise duty alike. The first resolution was carried by 33, and when he rose to move the second the cheering from the liberal benches kept him standing for four or five minutes—cheering intended to be heard the whole length of the corridor ing intended to be heard the whole length of the corridor that led to another place.

1 Bright wrote to Mr. Gladstone true course for Lord John, yourself, that he was inclined 'to think that the and Mr Gibson, and for any others to defy. especially if not well supported abroad, he cannot afford his own ultramontane party in France to deal with, whom, England when he takes a right course. (2) Because he has own fault or not, he cannot reckon upon strong support from culties in which he is placed, (1) because, whether by his in Italian matters especially to recollect the great diffithe French Emperor, but to interpret him candidly, and My own leaning, therefore, is not indeed to place reliance on immediately, besides that it could not in itself be trusted. powers would provoke a dangerous counter combination bination; but a close alliance between England and other mischief, and cannot provoke any dangerous counter comalliance between England and France cannot be used for letter to Lacaita a few months later (Sept. 16);—' A close pose which is radically unjust. He put the same view in a England and France never will unite in any European puralliance with France is the true basis of peace in Europe, for

As everybody soon saw, it was the relation of Louis Napoleon to the French ultramontanes that constituted the tremendous hazard of the Piedmontese invasion of the territories of the pope. This critical proceeding committed Cavour to a startling change, and henceforth he was constrained to advance to Italian unity. A storm of extreme violence broke upon him. Gortchakoff said that if geography had permitted, the Ozar would betake himself to arms in defence of the Bourbon king. Prussia talked of treviving the holy alliance in defence of the law of nations against the overweening ambition of Piedmont. The French ambassador was recalled from Turin. Still no active intervention followed.

One great power alone stood firm, and Lord John Russell wrote one of the most famous despatches in the history of our diplomacy (October 27, 1860). The governments of the pope and the king of the Two Sicilies, he said, provided so ill for the welfare of their people, that their subjects looked to their overthrow as a necessary preliminary to any improvement. Her Majesty's government were bound to admit that ment. Her Majesty's government were bound to admit that their overthians themselves are the best judges of their own the Italians themselves are the best judges of their own had been so constant and severe that his work in the House of Commons was refreshing by comparison. I never heard him speak so strongly of the timidity and vacillation of his comrades. The last victory, which alone preserved the government from dropping to pieces, was won in spite of them.

BOOK V. V.

4

Λ

In a contemporary memorandum (May 30, 1860) on the opinions of the cabinet at this date Mr. Hadatone sets out the principal trains of business with which he and his colleagues were called upon to deal. It is a lively picture of the vast and diverse interests of a minister disposed to take his cabinet duties seriously. It is, too, a curious chart of the currents and cross-currents of the time. Here are the seven heads as he sets them down:—

policy in general—leaning towards calm and peace, or brusqueness and war; (3.) Defences and expenditure—alarm and money charges and war; (3.) Defences and expenditure—alarm and money charges on the one side, modest and timid retrenchment with confidence in the one side, modest and timid retrenchment with confidence in the other of these groups of ideas and feelings respectively; (5) Reform—ultra-conservative on the one side, on the other, no fear of the working class and the belief that something real though limited, should be done towards their enfranchisement; (6) Church matters may perhaps be also mentioned, though there has been no collision in regard to them, whatever difference there may be—they have indeed held a very secondary place amidst the rude and constant shocks of the last twelve months; (7) Lastly, the coup constant shocks of the last twelve months; (7) Lastly, the coup

Chadstone adds, the only person from whom I have never to my recollection differed on a serious matter during to my recollection differed on a serious matter during this anxious twelvementh is Milner Gibson.' The reader will find elsewhere the enumeration of the various parts in this complex dramatic piece.¹ Some of the most falish members of the cabinet were also the most combative in foreign policy, the most martial in respect combative in foreign policy, the most martial in respect handed German soldiers, and young offenders shot by courtmartial at the drumhead; and in the Lombardo-Venetian provinces press offences were judged by martial law, with chains, shooting, and flogging for punishment.¹ Whatever may be thought of Lord John and his doctrine, only those who hold to the converse doctrine, that subjects may never rise against a king, nor ever under any circumstances seek succour from foreign power, will deny that the cruelties of Naples and the iniquities connected with the temporal authority of the clergy in the states of the church, constituted an irrefragable case for revolt.

1 See Appendix.

died,³ planetary nations out of their pre-appointed orbits. Cavour one of those disasters happened that seem to shake the adopt; tell him that he preaches to the converted.2 Then we have been practising the maxims that he exhorts us to are the most liberal of the continent; that for ten years that good friend of ours, he replied, that our trade laws the tomb. The letter was to be shown to Cavour, 'Tell mori gnigreme won noiten a evoda tnemanth edt ni enida tion of the economic and political ideals that seemed to written a long letter to d'Azeglio. It was an earnest exposistill outside. A few months before, Mr. Gladstone had assembled at Turin-Venice and Rome for a short season and on February 18 the first parliament of united Italy young Bourbon king became an exile for the rest of his life; last lowered at the stronghold of Gaeta (Feb. 14, 1861); the side (Nov. 7). The Bourbon flag after a long stand was at Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi rode into Naples side by neighbourhood of Rome itself, fell into the hands of the king. exception of the patrimony of St. Peter in the immediate ported annexation to Piedmont. The papal states, with the routed, and a popular vote in the Neapolitan kingdom suphad crossed the frontier (Sept. 1860), the papal forces had been Within a few weeks after the troops of Victor Emmanuel might Prince Albert call it incredible. All this only provoked him to more relentless energy. Well of office when the Palmerston government was formed.

Dec. 9, 1860. La Politique du Comte Camille de Carour de 1852 à 1861, p. 3 June 6, 1861. A General Review of the Different States of Italy; prepared for the Foreign Office by Sir Henry Bulwer, January 1853, 2 Cavour to Marquis d'Azeglio,

.0981

BOOK

cighteenth? won in the seventeenth and confirmed and enlarged in the should hold on sufference in the nineteenth century what it yet I for one am not willing that the House of Commons wise and will not do it. Assuming that they will be wise, not be covered by this precedent. It may be said they are sending down a tax imposed by themselves, which would any conceivable interference of the Lords hereafter, except the House of Commons in matter of supply. There is hardly the vital importance of maintaining the exclusive rights of fiscal consideration, he concluded, ' is nothing compared with never acquiesce in the pretensions of the other House. The purpose when once roused, made it certain that he would a broad declaration that, to any who knew his tenacity of authoritative action of the government. He wound up with with credit, except the united, determined, and even which he was 'certain that nothing could extricate them fiscal and the constitutional aspects of a situation from powers of the two Houses. He dealt fully alike with the elaborate memorandum on the paper duty and the taxing Mr. Gladstone read to the cabinet (June 30, 1860) an After the 'gigantic innovation' perpetrated by the Lords, patriotic resolution. He wrote down a short version of the The intervening months did not relax this valiant and

story in the last year of his life:—

sid from the shrewd ingenuity of Milner Gibson, who said: Why afforded by the budget. In this dilemma I received most valuable penny off the tax. The double plan strained the probable means not reasonably hope to carry paper duty repeal without taking a Unfortunately, the income tax was at so high a rate that we could would make it possible again to operate on the paper duties. certain that there would be a surplus for 1861-2 such as I thought and in the early part of the session of 1861 it appeared almost The hostilities in China reached a rather early termination, snd could have wished with Penelope that the whirlwind would of take me up, and carry me to the shore of the great stream of ...

Ocean. And the wish would in this point not have been extrava. ... gant: the whirlwind was there ready to hand. In and from the midst of it was born the budget of 1860.

beinre. between us is over, and that we shall have to pitch in as it was not so that I used him. I am afraid that the truce to withdraw it, at any rate for the time. This I can say, Disraeli made a popular motion to trip me up, but had Commons. . . It has been rather nice and close fighting. to eauoH edt ta noitnetnoo Hitz bna thgin gnol a mort hold.' July 21 or rather 22, one a.m.—Just come back was fitter for most other offices than for that I now It confirms me in the belief I have long had, that he making objection but Lewis, who preached low doctrine. through the cabinet, very kindly and well received, no one ' My budget,' he wrote to Mrs. Chadstone (July 16), 'is just esced to emit a ni rat os eruza time of peace. teature was a rise in the income tax from frepence to visional and temporary, and need not detain us. The only The financial arrangements of 1859 were avowedly pro-

The only important speech was one on Italy (August 8),2 of which Disraeli said that though they were always charmed by the speaker's eloquence, this was a burst of even unusual brilliance, and it gave pleasure in all quarters. 'Spoke for an ovetta [short hour], says the orator, 'on Italian affairs; my best offhand speech.' 'The fish dinner,' Mr. Gladstone writes, 'went off very well, and I think my proposing Lord Palmer-ston's health (without speech) was decidedly approved. I have had a warm message from Lord Lansdowne about my speech; and Lord P. told me that on Tuesday night as he went upstairs on getting home he heard Lady P. spouting as she read by candle-light; it turned out to be the same effusion.' Another incident briefly related to Mrs. Gladstone, brings us on to more serious ground:—'Hawarden, Sept. 12.—

² Odyssey, xx. 63. ference to settle the details of the and france. ² On a motion by Lord Elcho peace between Austria and France. against any participation in a con-

1981

ever comes with a crisis. 7. To-day's debate in the H. of L. was a expel exciting thought, but not the subtler nervous action which siding excitement. To-day is the same. Habit enables me to whole of my recollection. June 1.—Yesterday was a day of subduty], and voted in 296-281. One of the greatest nights in the one hour on omission of clause IV. [that repealing the paper tending to make this a vote of confidence. 30.—H. of C. Spoke Graham amended his speech, but said we must not use any words sustained me most handsomely in debate. Lord P. after hearing charge of a long pent-up excitement. May 13.—Lord J. R. again hours. The figures rather made my head ache. It was the disscoepted after fighting. I5.—H. of C., financial statement for three SOOK: Alderley almost the only kicker. The plan of one bill was great event for me.

House was effectually arrested. finance bill the power of the Lords to override the other wholly out of gear. By including all the taxes in a single given tax bill without throwing the financial machinery bills, thus placing it in the power of the Lords to reject a make the different taxes the subject of as many different be kept inviolable. Until now the practice had been to its own measure, manner, time, and matter, is a right to and impose taxes, and that the right to frame bills of supply year, that it possessed in its own hands the power to remit of the resolution of the House of Commons in the previous whole of them. This was the affirmation in practical shape of them, or try the impossible performance of rejecting the a single bill, so that the Lords must either accept the whole of 1861 was this inclusion of the various financial proposals in The abiding feature of constitutional interest in the budget of a poetic pen told their millions of readers how, after weeks forth in full panoply. Enthusiastic journalists with the gift his soul in patience until the hour struck, and then came excise. Neither friends nor foes daunted him. He possessed on tea and sugar, instead of releasing paper from its duty of his friends were sorry that he did not reduce the war duty made the boldest financial pilot shorten sail. Many even of free-trade canvas in the teeth of a tempest that might have In language of that time, he had carried every stitch of

be submitted to parliament. important to keep from the public eye until they were ready to revision of the tariff, the particulars of which it was of course sluding the conditions of the French treaty in a new and sweeping recommended by practical considerations. I contemplated inin contemplation. On our side, the method pursued was only own foreign minister (Walewski) the fact that such a measure was the Emperor or his government were desirous to conceal from their letters between Mr. Cobden and myself. I remember indeed that of the two countries, was carried through in a series of personal ordinary course have been exchanged between the foreign offices can be had for them.1... The correspondence which would in the makes them, and are only to be entertained when a compensation considerations, are in themselves injurious to the country that namely that the reductions of indirect taxation, permitted by fiscal was dangerously near to a practical assertion of a false principle, to the renewal of labour which was in itself so profiless, and which treaties, and was as far as possible removed from any disposition attempts under Sir Robert Peel's government to conclude such treaties in general. I had been an active party to the various to signify the smallest disposition to the promotion of tariff

At the end of 1859 the 'question of the treaty was brought into the cabinet, and there met with no general opposition, though some objection was taken by Lewis and Wood, based on the ground that they ought not to commit themselves by treaty engagements to a sacrifice of revenue, until they had before them the income and the charges of the year. Writing to his wife about some invitation to a country house, Mr. Gladstone says (Jan. 11, 1860):—

I cannot go without a clear sacrifice of public duty. For the measure is of immense importance and of no less nicety, and here amount of internal duties and to put on an equal tax on foreign articles of the same kind at the custom-house. It is true we bind ourselves for ten years not otherwise to raise such trade, or put on fresh ones; and this, I think, no true free trader will regret.—Cobden to Bright.

a syllable on our side of the treaty that is undertake that the treaty that is inconsistent with the soundest principles of free trade. We do not propose to reduce a duty which, on its merits, ought not to have been dealt with long ago. We give no concessions to France which do not apply to all other nations. We leave ourselves free to lay on any

CHAPTER III

BYLLLE FOR ECONOMY

(2981-0981)

THE session of 1860, with its complement in the principal part of 1861, was, I think, the most trying part of my whole political life.——Gladstone (1897).

In reading history, we are almost tempted to believe that the chief end of government in promoting internal quiet has been to accumulate greater resources for foreign hostilities.—Снамимс.

ALL this time the battle for thrifty husbandry went on, and the bark of the watch-dog at the exchequer sounded a hoarse refrain. 'We need not maunder in ante-chambers, as Mr. Disraeli put it,' to discover differences in the cabinet, when we have a patriotic prime minister appealing to the spirit of the country; and when at the same time we find his chancellor of the exchequer, whose duty it is to supply the ways and means by which those exertions are to be supported, proposing votes with innuendo, and recommending expenditure in a whispered invective.'

Severer than any battle in parliament is a long struggle inside a cabinet. Opponents contend at closer quarters, the weapons are shorter, it is easier to make mischief. Mr. Chadstone was the least quarrelsome of the human race; he was no wrestler intent only on being a winner in Olympic games; nor was he one of those who need an adversary to bring out all their strength. But in a cause that he had at heart he was untiring, unfaltering, and indomitable. Parallel with his contention about budget and treaty in 1860 was persistent contention for economy. The financial crisis was persistent contention for economy. The financial crisis went on with the fortifications crisis. The battle was insected on with the fortifications crisis. The battle was insected to many months in office before cessant. He had not been many months in office before difficult to find a word of apology. But it could acarcely be said of concern our interests, while there was not the shadow of a case of honour. The susceptibilities of England were, however, violently aroused. Even Lord Russell used imprudent language in parliament about looking for other panies. A French panic prevailed as strong as any of the other panics that have done so much discredit to this country. For this panic, the treaty of counter-irritant; and it aroused the sense of commercial interest to counter-irritant; and it aroused the sense of commercial interest to counter-irritant; and it aroused the sense of commercial interest to counter-irritant; and it aroused the sense of commercial interest to counter-irritant; and it aroused the sense of commercial interest to counter-irritant; and it aroused the sense of commercial interest to connect the war passion. It was and is my opinion, that the choice lay between the Cobden treaty and not the certainty, but the high probability, of a war with France. (Undated memo.)

BOOK

II

VOL. I. and organic years of emancipatory fiscal legislation; it ended alike. Mr. Gladstone called 1860 the last of the cardinal extended beyond France to the commodities of all countries wine and brandy. The English reductions and abolitions factured articles at her ports, and to reduce the duties on engaged immediately to abolish all duties upon all manubread of all industries, as Cobden called it. England production and export, iron the most important,—'the daily and remove prohibitions on a long list of articles of British masses of the population. France engaged to reduce duties ealamity of doing nothing for trade, and nothing for the the foundation of a plan that averted the discredit and made possible by the lapse of the annuities, and laid alterations of duty required for the French treaty were it will be a great discredit and a great calamity. Cobden, 'without anything done for trade and the masses, If the year, in such circumstances, is to pass, he said to the great gulf of expenditure there to be swallowed up. vehemently resolved that this amount should not pass into a charge of some two millions, and Mr. Gladstone was certain annuities payable to the public creditor removed Happily it found him at the exchequer. The expiry of had marked out this year for a notable epoch in finance. financial scheme of 1860. By his first budget Mr. Gladstone Out of the commercial treaty grew the whole of the great ally fed, we lose the consciousness. an inward flame of excitement of which, when it is habituideas which when familiar lose their horror, and they light own part, have in actually degetting war. They familiarise immense series of measures of preparation for war on our have no adequate idea of the predisposing power which an ment to deal with it? With emphasis, he insists that we spiracy, and in the deliberate and pointed refusal of parliamight have passed for a plausible excuse in the Orsini conable man we had was sent to India, and when he had what stir at the moment of the great Mutiny, when every avail-Why, if he were bent on a rupture, did the Emperor not was the value of all this contested and unsifted statement? ${

BOOK . V.

m said}$ to be disseminated broadcast among the troops ${
m ?}$. What see a single copy of the incendiary and anti-English pamphlets, for purposes of war before winter! Then why could we not ploughing and seed time, because they might be reclaimed extraordinary farmers to refuse the loan of horses for their back again for the approaching war with England. What from the government, because they would soon be wanted as that the Châlons farmers refused the loan of horses vasion was at our doors, from such contested allegations

This application of cool and reasoned common sense to actual probabilities seldom avails against imaginations excited by random possibilities; and he made little way. Lord Ralmerston advanced into the field, in high anxiety that the cabinet should promptly adopt Herbert's proposal. They soon came to a smart encounter, and Mr. Gladstone writes to most serious differences among us with respect to a loan for fortifications. . . My mind is made up, and to propose any loan for fortifications would be, on my part, with the views I entertain, a betrayal of my public duty. A vigorous views I entertain, a betrayal of my public duty. A vigorous correspondence between Mr. Gladstone and Herbert upon military charges followed, and the tension seemed likely to military charges followed, and the tension seemed likely to snap the cord.

If I may judge from the minutes of the members of the cabinet on the papers circulated, most of them stood the cabinet on the papers circulated, most of them stood

t For his letter to Mr. Gladstone, Dec. 15, 1859, see Ashley, ii. p. 375.

taxes, and by one or two ingenious expedients of collection and account, and the other two millions he made good out of the lapsed annuities. Tea and sugar he left as they were, and the income-tax he raised from ninepence to tempence. Severe economists, not quite mijustly called these small charges a blot on his escutcheon. Time soon wiped it off, for in fact they were a failure.

this we shall see as we proceed. the thought of the peers meddling with votes of money. All given to the paper duty by its foes-rose to exasperation at taxes upon knowledge -- for this unfavourable name was bill, many who had been entirely cool about taking off the a tax, threw it out. Then when the Lords had rejected the was not the same thing as to meddle with a bill putting on tion of the principle that to reject a repealing money bill starting-point for a stroke of party business, or for the asserwas wanted; and the Lords finding in all this a plausible demand for new expenditure; the yield from the paper duty from fifty-three to nine; troubles with China caused a mons the unjority in favour of abolishing the duty sank tional struggle between Lords and Commons. In the Comfiscal project became by and by associated with a constituexcitement than any other portion of the scheme. The the chief sumbling-block, and ultimately it raised more The removal of the excise duty upon paper proved to be

This was the broad outline of an operation that completed the great process of reducing articles liable to customs duties from 1052, as they stood in 1842 when Peel opened the attack upon them; from 466 as Mr. Chadstone found them in 1853; and from 419 as he found them now, down to 48, at which he now left them. Simplification had little further to go. 'Why did you not wait,' he was asked, 'till further to go. 'Why did you not wait,' he was asked, 'till the surplus came, which notwithstanding all drawbacks the surplus came, which notwithstanding all drawbacks proposal "hich should defrand him of a glory, in and by absolving him from a duty. . . . I am now sure that absolving him from a duty. . . . I am now sure that Lord Palmerston entertained this purpose when he formed the government; but had I been in the slightest degree aware of it, I should certainly, but very remetantly, have abstained from joining it, and helped, as I could, from another bench its Italian purposes. Still, I am far indeed another bench its Italian purposes. Still, I am far indeed from regretting to have joined it, which is quite another from in regretting to have joined it, which is quite another inneter.

In 1860 Mr. Chadstone removed the duties from 371 articles, reducing the mumber to 48, of which only 15 were of importance—spirits, sugar, tents, timber, chicory, figs, hops, rants, raisins, and rice.

1 Strictly speaking, in 1845 the figure had risen from 1052 to 1163 articles, for the first operation of tariff reform was to multiply the tumber in consequence of the transition from ad valorem to specific duties, and this increased the headings under which they were described.

binds me; the difficulty is to determine what the lesser ture beyond what were it in my power I would fix. . . . But I suppose that the duty of choosing the lesser evil ment, concurred in measures that provide for an expendimember of parliament and as a member of the governtoo favourable a description. I have consciously, as a replies (June 13), 'I am afraid that in one respect this is (June 11, 1860).. 'You say unconsciously, Mr. Gladstone which has no botter foundation than a gigantic delusion. says, you have administored to the support of a system personally to Mr. Gladstone himself: 'Unconsciously,' he and ordnance expenditure. In another letter he turned successive sessions on a select committee upon army, navy, detail what he was talking about, for he had sat for three whole policy. Cobden, as always, knew theroughly and in the friendship of England, from the first, the hinge of his French Emporor had not, as a matter of self-interest, made and above all, to make his colleagues consider whether the cantilo marine, was at least double the strength of Prance; navy, building and alloat, to say nothing of our vast merthe corresponding outlay by England; to show that our steam for a dozon years past on docks, fortifications, arsenals, with the alarmists on the facts; to compare the outlay by France Cobden plied Mr. Gladstone with exhortations to challenge Now labouring lard in Paris month after month at the tariff,

My story grows long, and it ends as such stories in our politics usually end. A compromise was arranged on the initiative of the Duke of Somerset, keeping clear, as Mr. Gladstone supposed, of the fortification scheme as a whole, modesty he said, 'I am a dwarf on the shoulders of a giant,' have done but for the French Revolution. With characteristic distresses me. Gladstone thinks he has done what Pitt would last night the principle of his grand budget.1 His hard dry cough exceedingly happy at the immense majority of 116 which affirmed Found them both Called on the Gladstones at breakfast time. Gladstone; ordered not to leave the house this week. Peb. 25. all that is material in his finance scheme. I'ch. 13.—Dined with minutes without suffering. Thinks that the House will accept Spoke for three hours and fifty more radiant with triunpli. success, and again at night at 10 o'clock in Downing Street still Feb. 10.-Saw Gladstone in the morning, radiant with expected better. But I am frightened at the proposed exertion of Friday. I again protested. I'ch. 9.—Saw Gladstone; he is . allows him. to-day; bent on speaking the day after to-morrow. Ferguson seheme of his finance measure. Neb. 8.—Gladstone drove out now treaty with France in the Belgian papers, it being part of the much better though still in bed. Annoyed at the publication of the Feb. 7.—With Gladstone a long time in the morning. Found him Chadstone in the evening. He is still in bed, but visibly better. (his doctor) said, he will meet Canning's fate. Feb. 6.-With looked very pale. He must not speak for ten days, or Forguson to see me, but I would only stay a minute by his bedside. cill Thursday. Was to have been to-morrow. Gladstone wished

1860. V. 1860.

Mr. Gladstone's own ontries are these:-

March 23.—A long day of 164 hours' work. in which I heartily thank God for having given me a share. in 282:56; a most prosperous ending to a great transaction March 9.—Spoke on various matters in the Treaty debate; voted was the most arduous operation I have ever had in parliament. great stock of egg and wine. Thank God! Home at II. This Feb. 10, '60.—Spoke 5-9 without great exhaustion; aided by a triumphs ever witnessed in the House of Commons. The body agreed that it was one of the most extraordinary Of the speech in which the budget was presented every-

t On Mr. Duncan's resolution and against re-imposing the incomeagainst adding to an existing deficitax at an unnecessarily high rate.
ency by diminishing ordinary revenue Moved Reb. 21.

73961

ROOK

able debate (14dy 21, 1859) had promised botter things. Directly debate (14dy 21, 1859) had promised botter things.—'There is no country,' he said, 'that can go on raising seventy in the country,' he said, 'that can go on raising seventy million in the of peace with impunity. England cannot, and if lengland cannot, no country can.' Bright followed with the meanrance that Coloden and he might now consider the accurace that Coloden and he might now consider the accurace that Coloden and he might now consider the next, agreeing with Bright; and even Palmerston cano next, agreeing with Bright; and even Palmerston himself was constrained to make a peace peace.

‡ $

him. spoke with real greatness of mind of the attacks made on Phillimore reports: ' found (lindstone in good spirits; he the year before. In the middle of the session (May 9) my life. The battle was as severe in 1861 as it had been but it was one of the meet useful or least useless years of them. For my own part I werer was so abused as in 1860; flection will, please (bud, enable us to distinguish between logic an "inseparable accident" of politics. Time and remuch must be just; and what is not, is what we call in and rebuke does not surprize nor discourage me. Doubtless James, in 1871 Mr. Chalstone says: -- The storm of criticism disappeared. In a letter to his close friend, Sir Walter appeared aloft at the right moment, and the clouds had zulloy bina roient) andi (1981-99, Pall pion roinles odi Eventually Mr. Chalatone was able to wite to Canhan from he the summer the strife upon expenditure was renewed. Phillimore, they hate (Radstone were than at the Carlton' him would have depressed a wealter man. 'As Brookely, says hours chank (ind for the strongth. The atmosphere around the May 1861 Me Chalacono noces, a day of over fourteen

The next year Lord Palmerston wrote to express his concern at something that he came upon in a railway journey. 'I read with much interest,' he wrote to his chancellor of the exchequer (April 29, 1862), 'your able and elequent speeches at Alanchester, but I wish to submit to elequent speeches at Alanchester, but I wish to submit to you some observations upon the functial part of the second speech,' He did not agree with Mr. Gladstone that the speech,' He did not agree with Mr.

thronged his ante-room. He was now, says Greville (Feb. 15), the great man of the day!' The reduction of duties on currants created lively excitement in Greece, and Mr. Gladstone was told that if he wore to appear there he could divide hencurs with Bacchus and Triptelemus, the latest benefactors of that neighbourhood.

surround his name. of ylashbere of doubt and unpopularity seemed suddenly to tories hate him. For reasons not easy to trace, a general conservatives and the radicals incline to him. The old Disraeli's hands. The whigs hate Gladstone. The moderate entire separation from the whole party and will strengthen Carlton, which I regret. It is a marked and significant act of enters: 'Murch 30—Aladstone has taken his name off the been whipper-in. On the last day of the month Phillimore don't know where he is leading us, said Hayter, who had obeyed and trembled and were frightened to death. We Gladstone, and confirmed the apprehension that the whigs a parliamentary friend who like everybody else talked of many enemies. Before the end of March Phillimore met commercial treaty and the finance speedily proved to have could but command a majority of nine? 1 Both the carry his budget, what would happen to a government that through; if Peel with a majority of ninety needed it all to that Gladstone would find it hard work to get his budget moment the great editor of the Times went about saying not be all sunshine and plain sailing. At a very early splendid eloquence and incomparable dexterity, it would their thought, soon perceived that in spite of admiration for Political onlookers with whom the wish was not alien to

The fortunes of the budget have been succinctly described

pl its suthor:—

They were chequered, and they were peculiar in this, that the first blow struck was delivered by one of the best among its friends. Lord John Russell, keenly alive to the discredit of any tampering as in former years with the question of the franchise, insisted on introducing his Reform bill on March 1, when the

1862.

what is worse, the spirit of expenditure.' 'You disclaim, political community of opinion with Bright and Cobden, and justly,' said Lord Palmerston,' but you cannot but be aware that owing to various accidental circumstances many people at home and abroad connect you unjustly with them, and this false impression is certainly not advantageous.'

'My dear Gladstone,' he wrote good-humouredly on another occasion,' You may not have seen how your name is taken in vain by people with whom I conceive you do not sympathise,—Yours sincerely,

Enclosed was a placard with many large capital letters, notes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the rest of the paranotes of exclamation, italics, and all the paramoters of exclamation is a paramoters.

TAX PAYERS! Read Mr. Cobden's new pamphlet, the 'Three Panics,' and judge for yourselves. How long will you suffer Yourselves to be Humbugged by PALMERSTONIANISM, and Robbed by the 'Services,' and others interested in a War Expenditure, even in times of Peace?... The Chancellor of The Exchequer Appears to you to help him. You have the power in your own hands if you will only exert it. Reform the House of Campons App Do 12 appearance of Campons of

House of Commons, AND DO IT THOROUGHLY THIS TIME.

Of the continuance of the struggle in 1862, a few items from the diary give an adequate picture:—

Jan. 30, 1862.—A heavy blow in the announcement of increased military estimates from Sir George Lewis gave me a disturbed evening. 31.—Worked on the formidable subject of the estimates, and made known to the cabinet my difficulties. Feb. 1.—Cabinet 5½-6. It went well; the tenth penny [on the income-tax] proved to be a strong physic; £750,000 of reductions ordered. 12.—Wrote mem. on possible reductions, etc., to dispense with incometax. The whole question, I think, is, can we be satisfied (I think we ought and will) with 21 millions for army and navy instead of 27 it March 1.—Cabinet 3¼-6¼, very stiff, on the Belgian negotiations I had to go to the ultima ratio. 31.—II. of C. The Iortifications got their first blow.

By midsummer public feeling veered a little:—'The tide

orr yourne sin ni

course of years there had grown up in the House of Commons a practice of finally disposing of the several parts of the budget each practice of finally disposing of the several parts of the budget each in confining itself to criticism on matters of finance, that the freedom of the House of Commons was in no degree impaired. But there was the opportunity of mischief; and round the carcaes the vultures now gathered in everyhelming force. It at ences became clear that the Lords would avail themselves of the once became clear that the Lords would avail themselves of the opportunity afforded them by the single presentation of financial bills, and would prolong, and virtually re-enact a tax, which the representatives of the propose of the presentatives of the prolong and repealed.

On May 5 the diary reports:—'Cabinet. Lord Palmersten spoke 4 hour against Paper Duties bill! I had to reply. Cabinet against him, except a few, Wood and Cardwell in particular. Three wild schemes of foreign alliance are afternt our old men (2) are unhappily our youngest.' Palmersten not only spoke against the bill, as he had a right in eabinet to do, but actually wrote to the Queen that he was bound in duty to say that if the Lords threw out the bill—the bill of his own cabinet—'they would perform a good public service.''

Phillimore's notes show that the intense strain was telling on his here's physical condition, though it only worked his resolution to a more undanated pitch:—

Majority on the paper duty last night, but ill with a cough. May 9.—Found Gladstone in good spirits in spite of the narrow majority on the paper duty last night, but ill with a cough. Malpole. Told me he, Henley, and those who went with them would have followed Gladstone if he had not joined this government, but added he was justified in doing so. May 18.—Gladstone stone is ill; vexed and indignant at the possible and probable conduct of the peers on Monday. Nothing will prevent him from denouncing them in the Commons, if they throw out the paper bill, as having violated in substance and practically the constitution. Meanwhile his unpopularity flows on.

.2981

BOOK

and looking only to achieved results, I should take the following heads: I. The Tariffs, 1842-60. 2. Oxford University Act. 3. Post Office Savings Banks. 4. Irish Church Disestablishment. 5. Irish Land Acts. 6. Franchise Act. Although this excludes the last of all the efforts, viz., the Lish Government bill. The third item in the list belongs to the period (1861) at which we have now arrived.

The points to be noted are three. I. The whole of my action

City by giving him a large and certain command of money. with a strong financial arm, and to secure his independence of the ance, which has been attained: to provide the minister of finance a revenue. 3. Behind all this I had an object of first-rate importcost money to the State. The Post Office Savings Banks bring in people with (a) safety, (b) cheapness, (c) convenience. The banks smelt of class. It was necessary to provide for the savings of the never got or could get within the doors of the masses, for they funds in trust, or each at a banker's ? This was vital. (2) They broke. (1) Their principle was left in doubt-were the general Banks were doubly defective, nay trebly, for they sometimes admit they have been more than realised. 2. The Trustee Savings I Jatal visions absoluted have been absolutely fatal. I object to me to get this bill passed sub silentio, a full statement of minority and a section of the very limited majority. It was an egraf a very derved with the utmost jealousy by a large The points to be noted are three. I. The whole of my action

A sequel to this salutary measure was a bill three years later with the apparently unheroic but really beneficent object of facilitating the acquisition of small annuities, without the risk of fraud or bankruptcy.\(^1\) An eyewitness tells how (March 7, 1864) 'Mr. Gladstone held the house for two hours enchained by his defence of a measure which avowedly will not benefit the class from which members are selected; which involves not only a "wilderness of figures." but calculations of a kind as intelligible to most men as equations to London cabdrivers; and which, though it might and would interest the nation, would never in the nature of things be made a hustings cry. The riveted attention of things be made a hustings cry. The riveted attention of things be made a hustings cry. The riveted attention of the House was in itself a triumph; the deep impression the

1 27 and 28 Vict., chap. 43.

His language in giving notice, on Thesday, of the committee make as little of the matter as he could. proposition to set ont with inquiries, and with the intention to Palmerston gave in, and adopted with but middiling grace the Somorset was silent, which I conceive meant inaction. inaction. Herbert advised resignation, opposed any other conrse. some step necessary. Grey argued mildly, inclined I think to for inquiry to end in a declaratory resolution. Villiers thought decided action. Argyll leaned the same way. Newcastle was in resigning if thonght fit. Lord John, Gibson, and I were for who thought nothing could be done, but were ready to join Chancellor, Wood, Granville (in substance), Lewis, and Cardwell, Palmerston keen and persevering. He was supported by the brol ; estirom oft no bomnitmos erw moisteoqqo ban guibeecorq to Practical, as well as other, objections were taken to this mode it up the first thing next session, and soud up a new bill.

the language in giving notice, on Thesday, of the committee went near the verge of saying, We mean nothing. An unsatisfactory impression was left on the Honse. Not a syllable was said in recognition of the gravity of the occasion. Lord John had unfortunately gene away to the foreign edite. I thought I should do mischief at that stage by appearing to catch at a part should do mischief at that stage by appearing to catch at a part declaration of Lord John. I suggested to him that he should get up, and Lord Palmerston, who had intended to keep the matter in his own hands, gave way. But Lord Palmerston was uneasy and said, 'You wen't pitch it into the Lords,' and other uneasy and said, 'You won't pitch it into the Lords,' and other matter at least we have turned the corner.

As we know, even the fighting party in the cabinet was forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting forced to content itself for the moment with three protesting resolutions. Lord Palmerston and his chancellor of the exchequer both spoke in parliament. 'The tone of the two remonstrances,' says Mr. Gladstone euphemistically, two remonstrances,' says Mr. Gladstone euphemistically, ould not be in exact accord; but by careful steering on my part, and I presume on his, all occasion of scandal was avoided.' Not altogether, perhaps. Phillimore says:—

July 6. A strange and memorable debate. Palmerston moving resolution condemnatory of the Lords, and yet speaking in defence

CHYLLEE IA

THE SPIRIT OF GLADSTOUING FINANCE

(9981-6981)

sive, injudicious, and unjust taxation.-LECKY. by the downfall or the perturbation of national eredit, or by excesbetoefin ei esemiqqui ummul ylenoiree bun ylebim woil; coftirone esi and well-being; how few political chunges are worth purchasing by system of finance holds among the vital elements of national stability Natious seldom realise till too late how prominent a place a sound

199.6981 ROOK

as when, for example, he introduced an account of the basis of fact was both sound and clear, and his digressions, arts of amplification and development to excess, yet the surely exposed. If he often carried the proper rhetorical ment of affairs where words out of relation to fact are most . he nowhere exerted greater influence than in that departthat he often over-argued and over-refined—they forgot that nobody denies that he was often declamatory and discursive, ephemeral critics disparaged him as mere rhotorician-and power as orator were suffused with life and colour. When its narrowest technicalities by his supple and resplendent concern of every sound self-governing community. Even * that belongs to it in the interest, curiosity, and imperious this or that proposal, he raised finance to the high place times verging on improvidence; apart from the merits of strenuous leader. He not only led with a boldness somegoverning forces of the public mind; in finance he was a followed, as it was his business and necessity to follow, the climate in which his projects throve. In other matters he the public opinion by which he worked, and warming the activity, Mr. Gladstone had the signal distinction of creating ly financo, the most important of all the many fields of his measures, which have been defended with an eloquence few of the exchequer have not brought hope, and to whom his husband and children, to whom the words of the chancellor living in a cottage who strives to make her home happy for labours and sweats for his daily bread, there is not a woman the course of this quarrel with the Lords, 'a man who came to seek a leader. There is not, Mr. Bright said, in democracy. Yet this made no difference when the time to anoissessogerg eat diviv brosses ai baslgad ai lla to represented with fidelity the constituency that was least bill for divorce, and on the bill against church rates; and he Russia, in opposing the panic on papal aggression, on the into the miscarriages of the Crimea, in pressing peace with He had taken the unpopular side in resisting the inquiry to make him more than ever the centre of popular hopes. along the paths of liberalism. The same proceeding helped ming and properling and state in propelling him time found out. Their rejection of the Paper Duties bill the exchequer was inextinguishable, as the Lords in good session, but the blaze in the bosom of the chancellor of In this rather tame fashion the battle ended for the half-dead, broken-down, and tempest-tossed Gladstone. amused the chief person concerned, is 'to give some life to The great result, as Greville says in a sentence that always administered consolation.'

At the end of the session Phillimore reports:—

Aug. 12.—Gladstone is physically weak, requires rest, air, and generous living. He discoursed without the smallest reserve upon political affairs, the feebleness of the government, mainly attributable to the absence of any effective head; Palmerston's weakness in the cabinet, and his low standard for all public conduct. He said in Peel's cabinet, a cabinet minister if he had a measure to bring forward consulted Peel and then the cabinet. Nobody bring forward consulting Palmerston first, but brought his measure to thought of consulting Palmerston first, but brought his measure at once to the cabinet. Gladstone said his work in the cabinet can equal and with a logic none can contest, have not who agreed with you, was to have great a sin against the representative resigned rather than continue a branch of our constitution.' government which could commit so

99-6981

BOOK

English chancellor: appeals to him as to the sound doctrine on sugar drawbacks; is much struck by his proposals on Scotch banks; says mournfully to him (April 28, 1863), in a sentence that is a whole chapter in the history of the empire:—'You are very fortunate in being able to give such relief to the taxpayers; if it had not been for the war in Mexico, I should perhaps have been able to do something of the same sort, and that would have been, especially in view of the elections, very favourable to the government of the Emperor.'

cellor of the exchequer, England was different. the soldier was the master. Happily for our famous chanwere very strong, popular power was weak; in most of them time, selfish material interests and their class representatives Alas, in France and in continental Europe generally at that order and economy, of which you were setting the example. to help me in maintaining our country in that system of he says, on the influence of your wise doctrines in finance, nected,' Fould had already deplored his loss. 'I counted,' to the departments with which we have respectively been conthemselves. Of this beneficent work a good share has fallen to grow great in common, and to give to others by giving to concert of nations for their conflicts, and of teaching them mission opened to them: the mission of substituting the to Fould (July 11):—'The statesmen of to-day have a new When Mr. Gladstone came to leave office in 1866, he said

It has often been said that he ignored the social question; did not even seem to know there was one. The truth is, that what marks him from other chancellors is exactly the aominating hold gained by the social question in all its depth and breadth upon his most susceptible imagination. Tariff reform, adjustment of burdens, invincible repugnance to waste or profusion, accurate keeping and continuous scrutiny of accounts, substitution of a few good taxes for many bad accounts, substitution of a few good taxes for many bad ones,—all these were not merely the love of a methodical and thrifty man for habits of business; they were directly sand thrifty man for habits of business; they were directly toiling mass, and sprang from an ardent concern in improving human well-being, and raising the moral ideals of mankind. In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-In his 'musings for the good of man,' Liberation of Inter-of defence, the most stationary in finance. In the matter of reform, some who were liberal as to the franchise were conservative as to redistribution. In matters ecclesisatical, those who like Mr. Gladstone were most liberal elsewhere, were (with sympathy from Argyll) 'most conservative and church-like.'

THE

On the paper duties there are, I think, only three members of the cabinet who have a strong feeling of the need of a remedy for the late aggression—Lord John Russell, Gibson, W. E. G.—and Lord John Russell leans so much upon Palmerston in regard to foreign affairs that he is weaker in other subjects when opposed to him, than might be desired. With us in feeling are, more or less, Newcastle, Argyll, Villiers. On the other side, and pretty decidedly—first and foremost, Lord Palmerston; after him, the decidedly—first and foremost, Lord Palmerston; after him, the decidedly—first and foremost, Lord Palmerston; after him, the decidedly—first and toremost, Lewis, Wood, Cardwell, Herbert. It is discussions. We are not Mr. Burke's famous mossic, but we are a instrument turns, the separate pieces readjust themselves, and all instrument turns, the separate pieces readjust themselves, and all come out in perfectly novel combinations. Such a cabinet ought not to be acephalous.

Before he had been a year and a half in office, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Graham (Nov. 27, '60):—'We live in antiveforming times. All improvements have to be urged in apploactic, almost in supplicatory tones. I sometimes reflect how much less liberal as to domestic policy in any true sense of the word, is this government than was Sir Robert Peel's; and how much the tone of ultra-toryism prevails among a large portion of the liberal party.' 'I speak a literal truth,' he wrote to Cobden,' when I say that in these literal truth,' he wrote to Cobden,' when I say that in these literal truth,' he wrote to Cobden,' who ought to have been breasting and stemming the tide have become captains breasting and stemming the tide have become captains general of the alarmists,' and he deploted Cobden's refusal a tesselated pavement without cement ... that it was indeed a very curious show, but utterly unsafe to touch and unsure to stand upon," — Speech on American Taxation.

or neares an administration so checkered and speckled, he put to-gether a piece of joinery so crossly indented and whimsically dovetailed, a cabinet so variously inlaid, such a piece of diversified mosaic, such management.

1829-698

BOOK

this view of the subject. Nor do I regard that liberation as yet having reached the point at which we might say, we will now cease to make remission of taxes a principal element and aim in finance. But we are in my judgment near it. And I am most anxious that the public should begin to take a closer and more practical view of the topics which you have done so much to bring into prominence.'

He was always thinking of the emancipation of comminerce, like Peel and Cobden. His general policy was simple. When great expenditure demanded large revenue, he raised his money by high income-tax, and high rates of duty on a few articles, neither absolute necessities of life nor raw materials of manufacture. He left the income-tax at fourpence. In 1866, he told the House that the new parliament then about to be elected might dispense with the tax ment then about to be elected might dispense with the tax raw materials of manufacture. He left the income-tax at fourpence. In 1866, he told the House that the new parliament then about to be elected might dispense with the tax. 'If,' he said,' parliament and the country preferred to retain the tax, then the rate of fourpence is the rate at which in we believe it may be most justly and wisely so retained.' While cordially embracing Cobden's policy of combining free trade with retrenchment, he could not withstand a carnal satisfaction at abundant revenue. Deploring expenditure with all his soul, he still rubs his hands in penditure with all his soul, he still rubs his hands in professional pride at the elasticity of the revenue under his

11

When it is asked, with no particular relevancy, what original contribution of the first order was made by Mr. Gladstone to the science of national finance, we may return the same answer as if it were asked of Walpole, Pitt, or Peel. It was for Adam Smith from his retreat upon the sea-beach of distant Kirkealdy to introduce new and fruitful ideas, though he too owed a debt to French economists. The greate occasions and contrive expedients for applying them. What an extraordinary man Pitt is, said Adam Smith, 'Me understands my ideas better than I understand them wayself.' Originality may lie as much in perception of oppormyself.' Originality may lie as much in perception of oppormyself.'

CHY

as to all matters of finance. Lords, for its misconduct, was deservedly extinguished, in effect, honourable support; and it became a standing rule. The House of To this Spencer Walpole gave financial proposals in one bill. and we won it. We likewise succeeded in the plan of uniting the parliament was hard, but was as nothing to the internal fighting; and was silent on the letter of Lord Palmerston. The battle in repression) and showed it to Granville, who warmly approved, -iles emos ditw) ylqer laistevertatan an esterv opposition and the paper makers would use every effort to destroy question in the House of Commons, where it was known that the budget, a distinct notice that he should not consider it a cabinet from Lord Palmerston, immediately after the adoption of the by a strange and painful incident. I received with astonishment plan, however, to my great delight, was adopted. It was followed appeared to me to lose his temper for the first and only time. The was the subject of a fierce discussion, in which Lord Palmerston gave valuable and telling aid. So it was adopted. The budget objection to it; and I well remember that the Duke of Newcastle deal misliked. I rather think the chancellor, Campbell, took strong bill]. It was not extensively resisted there, though quietly a good discussions in the cabinet on the constitutional proposal [the single financial measures of the year in a single bill. We had separate practice with respect to finance, which would combine all the wan a to notigobe edt-reithen either-the adoption of a new paper duties from October 10, 1861. With this was combined budget reducing the income tax by one penny, and repealing the for the year? I gladly adopted the proposition, and proposed a intended, say on the 10th of October, which will reduce the loss not fix the repeal of the paper duty at a later date than had been

Of the 'internal fighting' we have a glimpse in the

April 10, '61.—Saw Lord Palmerston and explained to him my plans, which did not meet his views. A laborious and anxious day. 11.—Cabinet. Explained my case 1-3. Chaos! 12.—Cabinet 1-3. Very stiff. We 'broke up' in our sense and all but in another. 13.—Cabinet 3\frac{3}{4}-6. My plan as now framed was accepted, Lord Palmerston yielding gracefully; Stanley of other hand, he had 'the Lancashire temperament.' the clearness, of mere statesmanlike prudence. On the deemed it from the coldness, if it sometimes overshadowed 'a certain refinement and sublety of religiousness that retarian results, but mixed with that attitude of mind he had Lit Robert Peel he never thought without an eye to utili-As was noted by contemporaries, like all the followers of after the useful befits not those of free and lofty soul. less in need of Aristotle's warning, that to be for ever hunting readers have by this time found out, there never was a man growing richer, the poor have become less poor.' Yet, as my consolation from the reflection that while the rich have been at the exchequer, he derived 'profound and inestimable in reality.' When he thought of the effect of his work and the best way of appearing to love them, is to love them Jeremy Bentham, the best way is to appear to love them, tian enthusiasm. 'If you would gain mankind,' said old sympathy was with Mr. Gladstone a living part of his Christhe rude breach in the circle of the hearth. This vigorous keeping warm the feel of family affection, in mitigating Think what a softening of domestic exile; what an aid in on a really immense amount of letter-writing absolutely free. yet the rich all the time, by the privilege of franking, carried was so high that correspondence was practically prohibited; daughters went forth from their homes; the cost of postage poor man suffered a generation ago. 'See-the sons and -I forget how it arose—of the iniquities under which the very old man and ill, how he gradually took fire at the notion remember, in a roving talk with him in 1891, when he was a multiplied access to fuller life and more felicity. I always gating growth of wealth, than of the social moralist surveying was less the exultation of the economist watching the intoxitherefore to more abundant employment at higher wages, stimulus given by fiscal freedom to extended trade, and 1859-66. Wants of the greatest number. His exultation in the ent of the community, and adapts its arrangements to the BOOK company thrives best which dives deepest down into the τ Το ζητείν πανταχού το χρήσιμον ήκιστα άρμόττει τοίς έλευθεροίς. 3.

CHAP.
II.
.Sc. .TA.

after all, a true representative man of the market of the that the man who can talk "shop" like a tenth Muse is, stone's rounded and shining eloquence without a conviction likings or antipathies, can sit under the spell of Mr. Glad-England; and no party in the House, whatever may be its union of the strength and culture of liberal and conservative anoticiled a si brotzO to earng bedailog edt ot beirram erida The audacious shrewdness of Lancanation of shopkeepers. diplomatic gallery such a transcendent mouthpiece of a country party feels a glow of pride in exhibiting to the less the House is honestly proud of him, and even the best abused and the best hated man in the House; nevertheanother onlooker, 'in his ministerial capacity, probably the disperse the shadows by a single stroke. 'He is,' says tions, he never glanced to right or left until he could pursued in the Valley of Shadows by unearthly imprecafinance; like the traveller in the Arabian fable who was see a gulf they beheld a golden monument of glorious race of sombre Volscians; and where the gazers dreaded to darkness rolled away; he had fluttered out of sight the whole moment the magician chose to draw aside the veil, the years of gloom and insolvency awaited us, suddenly, the Street would be proved to have beggared the exchequer, that of malign prophecy that the great trickster in Downing

In describing the result of the repeal of the paper duty a little after this, he used glowing words. 'Never was there or ameasure so conservative as that which called into vivid, energetic, permanent, and successful action the cheap press of this country.' It was also a common radical opinion of that hour that if the most numerous classes acquired the franchise as well as cheap newspapers, the reign of peace would thenceforth be unbroken. In a people of bold and martial temper such as are the people of our island, this proved to be a miscalculation. Meanwhile there is little doubt that Mr. Gladstone's share in thus fostering the growth of the cheap press was one of the secrets of his rapid rise in popularity.

world.

BOOK ment into a real control, and has borne the strain of nearly V.

Y.

1859-66.

He was more aline than any man at the evelocurer had an even more ardent financial reformer than himself: word or two from letters of 1859 to his brother Robertson, to the income-tax, makes it worth while to insert here a of deep practical moment. This last pregnant reference as we have the income-tax. There, or hard by, lie questions it will ever give place to the old spirit of economy, as long ing; I doubt if even by yours. I seriously doubt whether spirit of expenditure to be exorcised? Not by my preachment.' 'But how,' he wrote to Cobden (Jan. 5, 1864),' is the of those whose duty it is to submit the estimates to parliaspirit of the public departments, and perhaps even the spirit affects the spirit of the people, the spirit of parliament, the which, insensibly and unconsciously perhaps, but really, of expenditure, a desire, a tendency prevailing in the country, expenditure there grows up what may be termed a spirit I mean this, that together with the so-called increase of As he told the House of Commons in 1863 (April 16): ever been before, to the mischiefs of the spirit of expenditure. He was more alive than any man at the exchequer had Economy is the first and great article (economy such as I naderstand it) in my financial creed. The controversy between understand it) in my financial creed. The controversy between direct and indirect taxation holds a minor though important place. I have not the smallest doubt we should at this moment directed their chief attention, not to the question how much of expenditure and taxes we shall have, but to the question how it should be raised. . . I agree with you that it you had only direct taxes, you would have economical government. But in my direct taxes, you would have economical government. But in my opinion the indirect taxes will last as long as the monarchy; and recurring to, and of maintaining, income-tax has been a main source of that extravagance in government, which I date from source of that extravagance in government, which I date from source of that extravagance in government, which I date from source of that extravagance in government, which I date from some twenty-five years).

Bagehot, that economist who united such experience and sense with so much subtlety and humour, wrote to Mr.

II

CH

those deep differences came prominently forward in temperature, tradition, views of national policy, that continued to make themselves felt between himselfand Lord Palmerston so long as the government endured. Perhaps I should put it more widely, and say between himself and that vast body of excited opinion in the country, of which Lord Palmerston of excited opinion in the country, of which Lord Palmerston was the cheerful mouthpiece. The struggle soon began.

Sidney Herbert, then at the war office, after circulating a memorandum, wrote privately to Mr. Gladatone (Nov. 23, 1859), that he was convinced that a great calamity was impending in the shape of a war provoked by France. Officers who had visited that country told him that all thinking men for it, the army for it, and above all, the government for it. The general napired pamphlets were scattered broadcast. Everything was determined except time and occasion. The general expectation was for next summer. French tradesmen at St. Malo were sending in their bills to the English, thinking war coming. 'We have to do with a godless people who look on war as a game open to all without responsibility or sin; and there is a man at the head of them who combines sin; and there is a man at the head of them who combines sin; and there is a man at the head of them who combines sin; and there is a man at the head of them who combines sin; and there is a man at the head of them who combines sin; and there is a man at the head of them who combines the qualities of a gambler and a fatalist.'

England next? He ridicules the conclusion that the inthe inference that she must certainly be ready to invade warrant single-handed intervention, how does that support operation, still thought the Italian danger grave enough to nothing strange. If France, now unable to secure our cogoing on for four whole centuries, so that its renewal was and Austria for supremacy or influence in Italy had been by the historic reminder that a struggle between France He combats the inference of an English from an Italian war, the scare. This time it was no ordinary exchequer wrestle. with admirable force and fulness the sceptic's case against called his second barrel, in the shape of a letter, which states and paring there. On the following day he fired what he pungent interrogatories, caustic asides, hints for saving here criticising a swollen estimate, with controversial doubts, of the stamp usual from a chancellor of the exchequer Mr. Gladstone replied in two letters, one of them (Nov. 27)

state, of taking one patents for their offices, and paying the isso-es. incumbent on certain high officials, including secretaries of one.' Sir R. Bethell as attorney-general insisted on the duty BOOK from the nature of the case and without much blame to any

l rejoice to see that noither the heat, the stench, nor service in → Cladstone replics (1859): or John Brown reported as guilty of smuggling tobacco. daily deal with John Smith accused of irand as a distiller, chancellor of the exchequer, exactly as I should and do only of otorw of 'enostory themine ozent thin heb light 1. nosted to sign shared potential over thereon.

-: (no Yan II was old exouply as qual ton ob deid wast it is id -im salt olada bun moult attie of one one frotoole faun to grinages aren valv ni jaseg koalv Slaids od vrivijar I vodo gud ni presense vivils od that hoped much. The unbippy men may therefore yet cann va doida mori - redrord guirro na dria guilash llas anairerydearg and tedm moistestands to entour blim ocoils or bostoner soy som tad oil tall noitome ilemin dim on to besedine oil bin tomede colours. I spoke yesterday to Lord Palmerston on the painful rwobid esi Ila ni derod ebande standa torth in all est bid our supposed. The proof of absolute contuinacy is not yet complete, had I mad retroit charte ease etand ene ni tadt revevoil proposed—that of replaining her Majesty's exchagaer. I hope lle to tealtid out of betoveb estyrons done ose of guildonne teom ti si bun truogiy enoutheque roor neve shanr; and it is

Philod whi bred too benefied who ended rould but the at before a missist one sait of an Hill र कार एवं बच्चा हो। यह व nam og annere under deser værde å tork græn et storegte stæmlig frærd fræretimm real for the formal formal and the control of the first o of the graduation of the total of the and the contraction of the effects of of the effe hande wer bied gene biefe erter bereichte geneine beiter beiter beiter beiter beiter beiter beiter beiter beiter रक्ष कर्ष १९ नक्षण्या, अनुकृति कृति है। यो अनुसर १ नक्षणि कृषान ४ मेरे १ रहित इक्तुभक्ष्यदर्भ संपूष्ट का र्यव स्वृत्त का स्वयंक्त राम्पूर्व स्वयंभित्त है। स्वयंभित्रम स्वयं emonetral in Albara only in ideal or an in oil roll W reconsideration of such large general items of charge as devising plans of reduction, but he boldly urged the of the great departments of expenditure their duty of to pretend to take away from the ministers at the head too sound a master of the conditions of public business either always been, or had become unnecessary. He was retrenchment in quarters where the scale of outlay had to compensate for new and necessary expenditure by tained; and, most of all, with the absence of all attempt increase of charge was now ordinarily proposed and enterincrease of charge; with the slight grounds on which energy, pressing the cabinet with the enormous rate in the He wrote memorandum upon memorandum with untiring handling of the millitia, and the construction of fortifications. at red heat over the whole ground of military estimates, the The controversy between him and his colleagues still raged the further stage of making a strong stand-up fight for it. sort of general leaning towards Mr. Gladstone's view to Gibson nor Villiers, was ready to proceed onward from a with their chief, and not one of them, not even Milner

न्हें व्यवसा यो भीत्र विसंतु विसार स्थापनीय प्रतिक्षति जैनायतः सुध्यत्वनी नेसर व the new old constinct where their and instinction out a self.

Still the cabinet was not moved, and in Palmerston he found a will and purpose as tenacious as his own. 'The interview with Lord Palmerston came off to-day,' he writes to the Duke of Argyll (June 6, 1860). 'Nothing could be more kind and frank than his manner. The motter was first to warn me of the evils and hazards attending, for me, the operation of resigning. Secondly, to express his own strong sense of the obligation to persevere. Both of these I strong sense of the obligation to persevere. Both of these I told him I could fully understand. He said he had had two of the slave trade, the other to put England in a state of of the slave trade, the other to put England in a state of defence. In short, it appears that he now sees, as he considers, the opportunity of attaining a long cherished object; and it is not unnatural that he should repel any object; and it is not unnatural that he should repel any the military expenditure in the colonies, then standing at an annual burden of over two millions on the taxpayers of this country. He was keen from the lessons of experience, to expose the ever indestructible fallacy that mighty armato expose the ever indestructible fallacy that mighty arma-

'99-6931

BOOK

two or three most powerful that he ever made, and even to-day it may be read with the same sort of interest as we give to Turgot's famous disquisition on Foundations. It turns a rude searchlight upon illusions about charity that are all the more painful to dispel, because they often spring from pity and from sympathy, not the commonest of human elements. It affects the jurist, the economist, the moralist, the politician. The House was profoundly impressed by both the politician. The House was profoundly impressed by both the argument and the performance, but the clamour was too loud, all the idols of market-place and tribe were marched out in high parade, and the proposal at last was dropped.

was so stimulated by the liberating customs act, that it the export trade of 1860, in spite of a bad harvest, quarters in 1862. In Mr. Gladstone's own description later, from nine and a half in 1859 to twenty-one and three us in exchange for our own produce, the value had risen and colonial produce sent through us, and acquired by the treaty of commerce.1 If to this were added foreign in other words had about doubled under the operations of and three quarters to nearly nine millions and one quarter, of British goods sent to France had risen from four millions of wealth, as he called it, almost intoxicating. The value commercial legislation. The end of it all was a growth by taking in hand the completion of the great work of bas tyub to enoiszimer egrel zid yd beonedne need bed that they had been four years of tension, and this tension the effects of four years of his financial policy. He admitted Mr. Gladstone naturally took the opportunity of surveying ture by the noble figure of three millions and three quarters. Yet the chancellor had a revenue in excess of expendibad seasons spoiled the crops. There was distress in Ireland. the export trade to America by six millions sterling. Three half ruined Lancashire. The same cause had diminished American civil war by arresting the supply of cotton had was the record of a triumph that was complete. charitable endowments was rejected, the budget of 1863 Though the idea of putting a tax on the income of hinting plainly that the thing was 'a compromise to enable Mr. Bright made a weighty and masterly attack (Aug. 2), resolution.' It was now, however, too late to draw back,3 in his diary (July 24), at the terms of Lord Palmerston's had not been strictly kept. 'Much dismayed,' he wrote that he had good grounds of complaint, and that faith France. Mr. Gladstone was not present, but he felt strongly of stringent criticisms particularly fitted to offend and irritate which the compromise put aside—but defended it by a series to carry the whole scheme into effect—the very proposition not only declared that he held it to be absolutely necessary of two millions for fortifications (July 23), Lord Palmerston by the compromise, for in moving the resolution for a vote of mental and moral exhaustion.' The strain was not ended Ær. 5L. life, Mr. Gladstone told Graham, 'have I had such a sense III. and not pledging future years. ' Never at any time in my CHAP.

¹ For his later views on the French 1881, an extract from which is given treaty, see his speech at Leeds in Appendix.

Mr. Gladatone writes, 'contains pro-bably the only reply I shall ever make See Appendix, 'This account, The Gladstones then went to Cliveden The year before, a remarkwas a Palmerstonian parliament. whelm this country with taxes in time of peace.' But this out, of some of our valuable possessions,—you would overbility for the loss, in the event of war suddenly breaking naturally anxious to throw upon you the whole responsianxious for the complete security of every available point; Peel:—'If you adopt the opinion of military men, naturally and quoting with excellent effect a pregnant passage from sand, which this question has interjected into their midst, the government to avoid the rock, or get over the quick-

this to the Duke of Argyll, For an interesting letter on all Stafford House and Sydenham. There I saw, later, Argyll and S. Herbert, who seemed to bring good news. At night we went off to Cliveden. discussion might be free and went to 21. Cabinet 34.54. I left it that the diary Mr. Gladstone records: July course excited much remark, and does not in any way protect Glad-his spet h as he pleased. I doubt in order that Palmerston might make and he purposely did not return till late, twelve o'clock on Monday night, the policy of his absence.

Appendix. him there and said it was all right. Palace. The Duke of Argyll joined cabinet on Saturday, left them to deliberate, and went to the Crystal final opinion on the subject to the colleague. 2 'It appears that he wrote his unedifying specimen of loyalty to a about Mr. Gladstone are a curiously acquaintance with the subject. The passage is in vol. v. p. 148. Lord Palmerston's words to the Queen Palmerston's words stone. M. Gibson was also absent."
-Phillimore Diary, July 23. In his owing, I have no doubt, to defective to me without a shadow of foundation:

Prince Consort, which is most injurious Theodore Martin in his Life of the

to an account given or printed by Sir

BOOK

.99-668.

.bani to credit for laying the foundation of an effective sinking in office through the session. He is, however, entitled undoubtedly he would have carried it if he had remained was due to his desire to make sure of its stability, and the dead weight of debt. The complication of his scheme when simplified by his successors, did so much to reduce of a sinking fund, which, when amplified, and particularly enough. In the budget of 1866 he first started the scheme which, as I have said, some thought he had not been keen duties on timber. It contained another element as to of 1866, when he swept away the last of the old vexatious The final budget of this most remarkable series was that beneficent genius played the master part. bns oitegrene awo sid noitslaigel eaiw sidt nl the application of capital and the exercise of industry and in seeking every opportunity for abolishing restrictions upon period he considered to be the wise legislation of parliament, of what was most peculiar to England in the experience of this in the growth of industrial enterprise. But the special cause He was well aware of the share of new means of locomotion consequent saving of labour by the extension of machinery. diversified development of mechanical power, and the the effects of the enormous, constant, rapid and vice of narrow and untrained minds. He was quite alive ascribing complex results to single causes is the well-known without qualification due to budgets alone. To insist on guided parliament in affairs of money, was wholly and during the years in which he controlled the exchequer and suppose that the great outburst of material prosperity financier. He was far too comprehensive in his outlook to One word more may be added on Mr. Gladstone.as

Mr. Courtney contributes a good on Finance in Ward's Reign of Queen count of this measure to the chapter Victoria, i. pp. 345-7. account of this measure to the chapter in one of the finest hands of the time, Mr. Chadstone replied responsibility.1 To Palmerston's eight quarto pages, written to retrace its steps taken deliberately and with full sense of agitation to force the government of which he was a member, stone should by speeches in and out of parliament invite All this being so, he could not but regret that Mr. Cladwrong, and have Bright and Cobden and yourself been right?' [Napoleon III.] Have the parliament and the nation been active, wary, connsel-keeping, but ever-planning sovereign to humiliate us, and they had now at their head an able, say what they may, hate us and would make any sacrifice There was on the other side of the channel a people who, for a long time been blind and apathetic; then they awoke. Panic there had been none; governors and governed had of roproach, but as a proof of the nation's superior sagacity. expenditure, but if it were so, he regarded it not as matter nation had forced the cabinet and parliament into high among their battle cries. a due regard to altered eirenmetances, shall again take its place you so ably preside, when the word retrenchment, of course with a healthful day, both for the country and for the party over which indefinite promises of yest retrenchment, but I think it will be I think it a mean and guilty course to hold out vague and soldiemoges and of bearaged for ann I deside to be responsible. . . . to be unattainable in practice, and reductions of establishment and changes in taxation which I disapprove in principle, and believe also know or can grasp them, they seem to contemplate fundamental opinions with any precision; and secondly, because as far as I do Bright, or even Mr. Cobden; first, because I do not know their In all good humour, he said, I prefer not being classed with Alr.

OHV

683

expenditure, rejoined the chancellor of the exchequer, 'but tions, cried the prime minister. 'You are feeding not only forego rejoinder and even surrejoinder. 'No claptrap reducwhile Mr. Gladstone, for his part, was too much in earnest to knew his business, and had abundant faculty of application; A spirited correspondence followed, for Lord Palmerston

99-698

ROOK

The final budget of this most remarkable series was that of 1866, when he swept away the last of the old vexatious duties on timber. It contained another element as to which, as I have said, some thought he had not been keen enough. In the budget of 1866 he first started the scheme of a sinking fund, which, when amplified, and particularly when simplified by his successors, did so much to reduce the dead weight of debt. The complication of his scheme was due to his desire to make sure of its stability, and undoubtedly he would have carried it if he had remained in office through the session. He is, however, entitled in office through the session. He is, however, entitled to credit for laying the foundation of an effective sinking to credit for laying the foundation of an effective sinking fund.

benoficent genius played the master part. In this wise legislation his own onergetic and the application of capital and the exercise of industry and in seeking every opportunity for abolishing restrictions upon period he considered to be the wise legislation of parliament, of what was most peculiar to England in the experience of this in the growth of industrial enterprise. But the special cause He was well aware of the share of new means of locomotion consequent saving of labour by the extension of machinery. diversified development of mechanical power, and the to the effects of the enormous, constant, rapid and vice of narrow and untrained minds. He was quite alive ascribing complex results to single causes is the well-known without qualification due to budgets alone. To insist on guided parliament in affairs of money, was wholly and during the years in which he controlled the exchequer and suppose that the great outburst of material prosperity financier. He was far too comprehensive in his outlook to One word more may be added on Mr. Gladstone.as 2 Mr. Courtney contributes a good on Finance in Ward's Reign of Queen account of this measure to the chapter Victoria, i. pp. 345-7.

THY

CH

1

A candid and friendly observor has told us the situation:

'When I was private secretary to Lord Palmersten,' he says,

'and Mr. Gladstone was his chancellor of the exchequer, it was a constant source of sorrow to me, and a perpetual another, and how evidently each mistrusted the other, though perfectly cordial and most friendly in their mutual intercourse, . . If the proposal was adhered to, Mr. Glad stone gave way. This seemed to Lord Palmerston a case of gratuitous difficulties put in his way, and attempts to thwart

gratuitous difficulties put in his way, and attempts to thwart

without the courage to resist.'

without the courage to resist.'

petition? If we cry, like children, for the moon, like children what I propose to you may not de the exact demand of the our situation. Why should we resolve to do nothing because nature of our affairs, Burke says, and conform ourselves to extremely satisfactory performance. 'We must follow the ment little higher than he found it was no defeat, but an minister, that he should still have left the cost of governand extravagance, all sedulously fostered by a strong prime swelled to twenty-eight. After half a dozen years of panic total was twenty-four millions. In the middle years it had twenty-six millions; when he quitted office in 1866 the exchequer, the total under these two heads was nearly and then began to fall. In 1859, when he went to the and then began to fall; army expenditure rese until 1863, to the level of 1857. Maval expenditure rose until 1861, the lapse of the long annuities, to carry expenditure back managed, with the aid of the reduction of dobt charge after came, and his financial administration ended, he had Palmerston, he wen no inconsiderable success. When 1866 In closing this chaptor, let us note that in spite of Lord

III

we must cry on.2

Ruminating in the late evening of life over his legislative work, Mr. Gladstone wrote:—'Selecting the larger measures which both its federal and state elements will be recast. portends a fundamental change in the constitution, by complete territorial re-arrangement of the Union; it also service to humanity. different times have been, they rendered an immortal in that dark burden, and whatever their motives may at secession fought against slavery and all that was involved Therefore those who fought against decent, imperious. to Mr. Gladstone in 1864, 'is slavery in arms, revolting, ining of secession. 'The rebellion,' as Charles Sumner well said diffused knowledge, energetic progress. Such was, the meana great nation, founded on free industry, political equality, And this barbaric state was to set itself up on the border of censorship of the press and an army of watchmen and spies. ignorance and cruel bondage, that demanded a vigilant that held labour in contempt, that kept the labourer in munity whose whole structure was moulded on a system the purpose of erecting into an independent state a comprestige and political power. Secession was undertaken for tution of slave-holders as the sole depositaries of social probable revival of the accuraed African trade, the constithe consequent need for extension of slave territory, the sequences that flowed from slavery—its wasteful cultivation, That war arose from the economic, social, and political conficance of the American war was its relation to slavery. territorial partitions, dynastic preponderance. The signiconflict in our old world about boundaries, successions, realities beneath, we discussed it like some superficial but a social revolution. Without scrutiny of the cardinal political maxims to what was not merely a political contest, the American struggle is now clear. We applied ordinary error that lay at the root of our English misconception of of his countrymen, failed to take the true measure. the leading statesmen of the time, and like the majority Of this immense conflict Mr. Gladstone, like most of the masterly political study, The Slave understand the American civil war English reader with not too much time will find it well worked out in Uairnes, the reader who cares to truth, if ever there was one. Besides great theme is enormous, but an to revol ereania bas realist encrogiv Power, by J. E. Cairnes (1861), that I Of course the literature of this

 $^{^{1}}$ Mr. Evelyn Ashley in National Review, June 1898, pp. 536-40. 2 Plan for Economical Reform.

.1981

·III

CHAI

instead of merely reflecting the conclusions of the popular Altr. b. one. It was felt that here was a man who really could lead, received by the nation on the following day was a greater became law amid a loud chorus of approval Mr. Gladstone's band was firm, and in due time the bill line that it would be inoperative. But the case was good, the poor law, others again took the pessimist's favourite their proper business, others feared that it might undermine The insurance companies were vexed that they had neglected The measure encountered a pretty stiff opposition.

Thus he encouraged, stimulated, and facilitated private prodigality that they creep onwards with a noiseless and a is a characteristic of the mischiefs that arise from financial but a great political, and above all, a great moral evil legitimate wants of the country is not only a pecuniary waste, ing, 'that all excess in the public expenditure beyond the economy. He was deeply convinced, he said and kept saysafin which he laboured his fervid exhorations to national and personal thrift, at the same time and in the same spirit mischiefs seemed to threaten the very foundations of empire. whelming. He referred to the case of Austria, where these felt, until they have reached a magnitude absolutely overstealthy step; that they commonly remain unseen and un-believe is more than most Englishmen can at present say with truth. In both I see the elements of future power and good; in both I see also the elements of danger and mischief. To another correspondent:—'I have never to my knowledge expressed any sympathy with the Southern cause in any speech at Newcastle or elsewhere, nor have I passed any eulogium upon President Davis. In dealing whether with eulogium upon President Davis. In dealing whether with touch in any way the complicated question of praise and blame.'

. BOOK V. V.

At a very early stage the Duke of Argyll sent him some letter of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's, and Mr. Gladstone in acknow-pressing all possible respect for her character and talents, but thinks that she has lost intellectual integrity:—

solution of a great question of this kind, but to leave it open. the framers of the constitution not to lay down a rule for the deal of doubt, and I think it seems to have been the intention of be granted primt facie, but on examination it is subject to a good respect. . . . As to the authority and title of the North it must the first, deserve to be treated by us with great tenderness and se verance of an organized body. This last sentiment, as well as of national life, and the abhorrence of nature itself towards all (relatively to this subject matter) dest of all, the strong instinct accession it would not stop where it had begun; there is last and Mr. Motley described, that unless a firm front were shown against countries, and ever ready for a row; there is the fear which Ils ni as soiremA ni banot towns, towns and ni asenteinpan and monopoly, unwilling to surrender future booty; there is the noite of trings and a shart in and to algoog asitisfied and. great vehemence a small section, which she rather offensively calls is tumultuous. There is the anti-slavery motive impelling with the North which Mrs. Stowe finds sublime, but which in my eyes on the other hand it is very difficult to analyse that movement of slaye system without fear or risk of Northern interference. That the North; secondly and perhaps mainly, the maintenance of the ot etudint to wal edt mort elqoeq bas ebant ett to noitsredil edt It seems to me that the South has two objects in view: firstly changes in the English taste for wine, were found, and still CHAP.

[December] I am indifferent; in February, if I live as long, Last summer I should have been delighted to go out; now budget I begin to feel an itch to have the handling of it. to go out of office, but in the two or three that precede the year,' he told Sir Henry Taylor in 1864, 'I am always willing conviction and concern. Tor nine or ten months of the others had its mainspring in the depths and zeal of his own national spirit of his time. Such extraordinary power over performed. All this made a magnificent contribution to the themes and in the House where his dazzling wonders were whole nation became his audience, interested in him and his thousands eager to follow the public balance-sheet, and the turned from it as dry and repulsive, so Mr. Gladstone made Macaulay made thousands read history who before had humour, his lambent and spontaneous sarcasm. Just as to yangoud has asanthgil sid anisasa has sonsupole biyist sid dosage signis a ni aboom aid beirav ed doidw diw llida such was his duality of attitude and expression; such the Joshua's picture of Garrick between tragedy and comedy, interested without flagging. Another is reminded of Sir the arid desert, and yet keep them cheerful and lively and Gladstone was the only man who could lead his hearers over Wood was like a cart without springs on a heavy road; and able, but dry; Disraeli was clever but out of his element; Peel downwards, said that Peel's statements were ingenious One recorder who had listened to all the financiers from Ar. 60-57 remain, both relevant and extremely interesting.

Interest abroad was almost as much alive as the interest felt in England itself. We have already seen how keenly Cavour followed Mr. Gladstone's performances. His budget speeches were circulated by foreign ministers among deputies and editors. Fould, one of the best of Mapoleon's finance and editors, kept up a pretty steady correspondence with the

I shall, I have no doubt, be loath; but in April quite ready again. Such are my signs of the zodiac.' The eagerness of his own mind transmitted itself like an electric current through his audience.

..1981.

'Λ΄

BOOK

believe is more than most Englishmen can at present say vith truth. In both I see the elements of future power and good; in both I see also the elements of danger and mischief.' To another correspondent:—'I have never to my knowledge expressed any sympathy with the Southern cause in any speech at Newcastle or elsewhere, nor have I passed any eulogium upon President Davis. In dealing whether with culogium apon President Davis. In dealing whether with touch in any way the complicated question of praise and blame.'

At a very early stage the Duke of Argyll sent him some letter of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's, and Mr. Gladstone in acknowledging it from Penmaenmawr (Aug. 26, 1861) writes expressing all possible respect for her character and talents, but thinks that she has lost intellectual integrity:—

solution of a great question of this kind, but to leave it open. the framers of the constitution not to lay down a rule for the deal of doubt, and I think it seems to have been the intention of be granted primit fucie, but on examination is subject to a good respect. . . . As to the authority and title of the North it must the first, deserve to be treated by us with great tenderness and severance of an organized body. This last sentiment, as well as of national life, and the abhorrence of nature itself towards all (relatively to this subject matter) dest of all, the strong instinct and it most si ered in bad bad bi ered at or bluow it noiseeses Mr. Motley described, that unless a firm front were shown against countries, and ever ready for a row; there is the fear which Ila ni as series in bunot tevres et in the great towns, found in America as in all and monopoly, unvilling to surrender future booty; there is the the Christian people of the union; there is the spirit of protection. great vedemence a small section, which she rather offensively calls is tumultuous. There is the anti-slavery motive impelling with the North which Mrs. Stowe finds sublime, but which in my eyes to the other hand it is very difficult to analyse that movement of slave system without fear or risk of Northern interference. That the North; secondly and perhaps mainly, the maintenance of the the liberation of its trade and people from the law of tribute to It seems to me that the South has two objects in view: firstly use, to borrow his own larger name for free trade, figured his mind's eye as one of the promoting conditions of undant employment. 'If you want,' he said in a pregnant Art. 50-57.

de of industrial emancipation. peal of the Unvigation Act, as forming together the great otective duties, the simplifying of revenue laws, and the ke their place deside the abolition of prohibitious and These great measures may well free trade legislation. olition of all taxes on printed matter, in the catalogue r lettors, documents, patterns, and printed mattor, and the , rank, he said, the introduction of cheap postage em. ide as costly and difficult as the legislator could make of news, travelling, letters, transit of goods, were all ocked or narrowed by regulacion and taxation. Disseminamun conveyed and exchanged their respective products, tost of the avenues by which the mind, and also the hand t predecessors thought it must be for man's good to have adily removing restrictions. He recalled the days when other words, you should extend the area of trade by sarticles that give them the maximum of employment. refer consumed by them; you should rather operate on eximum of good, it is not enough to operate upon the position, to benefit the Indouring classes and to do the that heavy mortgage which, under the name of the that heavy mortgage which, under the name of the ational Debt, we have laid upon the industry and property if the nation. In 1866 he was keenly excited by Jevons's gument from the ultimate shrinkage of our coal supply, and he accepted the inference that we should vigorously pply ourselves by reduction of the debt to preparation of the arrival of the evil day. But, as he wrote to Jevons of the arrival of the evil the great work of the liberation of the arrival of the main effected, it would have been always in the main effected, it would have been stemature or even wrong to give too much, prominence to remature or even wrong to give too much, prominence to the was not unnatural that fault should be found with him

great factors, the Liberation of Intercourse, and the Improvement of Locomotion. Under the head of new locomotive forces he counts the Suez canal.

1 See his elaborate article in the lineteenth Century for February, and son Free Trade, Railways, and sirly to divide the credit of our aterial progress between its two suppose the American government would of itself be desirous to afford us reparation, and said that in any case we must have (1) the commissioners returned to British protection; and (2) an apology or expression of regret. The second of these despatches desired Lyons to come away within seven days if the demands are not complied with. I thought and urged that we should hear not sold with the Americans had to say before withdrawing Lyons, for I could not feel sure that we were at the bottom of the law of the case, or could judge here and now what form it would assume. But this view could judge here and now what form it would assume. But this view that not preasil.

.1881

BOOK

We may assume that Mr. Gladstone, in reporting these proceedings at Windsot, did not conceal his own arguments for moderation which had been overruled. On the following day the cabinet again met. 'Nov. 30 (Sat.). Left Windsor at II.25. Cabinet 3-5½. Lord Russell's draft softened and abridged.' That is to say the draft was brought nearet, though not near enough, to the temper urged upon the cabinet and represented at court-by Mr. Gladstone the day before.

in seven days. gaiwarbdiw juoda gaidion yas oi mid gaitourtzai toeffe ai Lord Russell wrote to Lord Lyons a private note (Dec. 1) brought his colleagues round to Mr. Gladstone's mind, for Washington. It seems, moreover, that a day's reflection had whence it was duly sent on (Dec. 1) to Lord Lyons at Queen's memorandum, sent it back to the foreign office, Prince, though dropping at least one irritating phrase in the the draft in the more temperate spirit recommended by the Palmerston thought them excellent, and after remodelling work the suggestions in a letter to the prime minister; how the drawing and simplifications; how the Queen returned the draft illness—found it somewhat meagre, and suggested modifica-Consort—then as it proved trapidly sinking down into his fatal was sent down the same night to Windsor; how the Prince pretty well known; how the draft initialled by Lord Russell The story of the first of these two critical despatches is tunity as in invention. Cobden discovered no new economic truths that I know of, but his perception of the bearings of abstract economic truths upon the actual and prospective direntmetances of his country and the world, made him the most original economic statesman of his day. The glory of the critical economic statesman of his day. The glory of and tenacity with which he opened new paths, and forced and tenacity with which he opened new paths, and forced the application of sound doctrine over long successions of countless obstacles.

1 See Nicolay and Hay, Abraham Life of the Prince Consort, v. p. 421. Lincoln, v. p. 28. Also Martin's 2 See Walpole's Russell, ii. p. 358.

convinced me that, as a rule, the state or individual or ence, he once said, 'which is long and wide, has profoundly financial vision and true social feeling. 'A financial experiall this and the like came from what was at once clear tive of the common enjoyment, it is well to remember that privileges for patents and copyrights for authors, restricif they are sometimes provoked by his rather harsh views on zeal for cheap wines and cheap books and low railway fares, widest area. If men sometimes smile at his extraordinary ing all the facilities of life, and diffusing them over the able to use wise and bold finance as the lever for enlarg-In the happier conditions of his time, Mr. Gladstone was of cool and sagacious judginent, while morally he stood low.' which way of judging he would come off second, though a man tion should be compared with the early years of Pitt, in to contend with like difficulties, and I think his administranation. Sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Gladstone wrote, ' had not of them desperate enough, for feeding the war-chest of the secondary instrument, an art for devising aliments, some of European war, and finance sank into the place of a treaty of 1786. But ill-fortune dragged him into the vortex duties, in reformed administration, and in the French atriking financial feats, especially in the consolidation of them, that built up the splendid edifice. Pitt performed fixed aims, and his steadfast and insistent zeal in pursuing device and expedient, it was his unswerving faith in certain it was not his power as orator, it was not his ingenuity in If we probe his fame as financier to the core and marrow, Prom a letter to his son Herbert, teresting remarks on Pitt's finance. March 10, 1876, containing some in-

OOK V. S62.

(Aug. 3) he writes to the Duke of Argyll:—'My opimion is that it is vain, and wholly unsustained by precedent, to say nothing shall be done until both parties are desirous of it; that, however, we ought to avoid sole action, or anything except acting in such a combination as would morally represent the weight of impartial Europe; that with this view we ought to communicate with France and Russia; to make ought to communicate with France and Russia; to make with them a friendly representation (if they are ready to do it) of the mischief and the hopelessness of prolonging the contest in which both sides have made extraordinary and contest in which both sides have made extraordinary and heroic efforts; but if they are not ready, then to wait for some opportunity when they may be disposed to move with us. The adhesion of other powers would be desirable if it does not encumber the movement.'

The next day Mr. Gladstone replied. He was glad to learn they would acknowledge the independence of the South. both should decline, then Lord Palmerston assumed that would follow, and negotiations on the basis of separation. If to both North and South. If both should accept, an armistice to approve such a course.' The proposal would be made cabinet. But if I am not mistaken, you would be inclined on actual step would be taken without the sanction of the the French government. 'Of course,' Lord Palmerston said, going privately to instruct the ambassador at Paris to sound made by England, France, and Russia, and that Russell was was tast approaching when an offer of mediation ought to be Gladstone that he himself and Lord Russell thought the time afford. A more important part of the letter was to inform Mr. the country that it was spending more money than it could exchequer be too sympathetic with the tax-payer, or to tell begging him on no account to let the chancellor of the announced, Lord Palmerston wrote (Sept. 24) to Mr. Gladstone, incidents a public dinner.' Seeing a visit to Newcastle visit to the Tyne, which of course entailed as one of its some of the Northern liberals devised for me a triumphant breaking me down. A blue sky was now above me, and [budget] difficulties, which in 1860 and 1861 went near to of autobiography, 'I had emerged from very grave financial 'In the year 1862, says Mr. Gladstone in a fragment in this direction. It converted the nominal control by parliaand Audit Act of 1866 is a monument of his zeal and power economy, which is itself a great revenue. The Exchequer old Latin saw, he endeavoured to give us a system of to tidewaiters and distributors of stamps. As Burke put the that dear unobtrusive but effective sway in Whitchall, down terial influence from chancellors and the permanent officers ing about the service of the state spread under his magisthat he consents to spend.' This tone of thinking and feelpublie. He is under a sacred obligation with regard to all exeloquer is the trusted and confidential steward of the the public purse. In my opinion, the chancellor of the consideration, or any consideration at all, in administering worth his salt who makes his own popularity either his first work. ' No chancellor of the exchequer,' he once said, 'is must be counted a conspicuous part of his very greatest strong and efficacious system of administrative unity that 4 maxims and principles of this sort, Mr. Gladstono built up a seato nothing is a triffe—through the first establishment conviction that in the working of the rast machinery of exactitude in time, and all the other aspects of official duty, Thrift of public money, resolute resistance to waste, rigid administrative principles of the utmost breadth and strength. conntry, enabled him to stamp on the public departments and his personal predominance in parliament and the greatest of his predecessors. His long reign at the treasury, greasury covered a longer poriod than was attained by the ministers for ten years. Thus his connection with the chancellor of the exchequer under three other prime in that office, soven years short of Pitt. But he was also minister for twelve-ten years short of Sir Robert Walpole and only four months chancellor. Alr. Gladstone was prime a financial case. Pool was only primo minister for five years, interest that he was able to excite by his manner of stating of another achievement, no less original than the peculiar This thought and feeling for the taxpayer was at the root Ar. is to be ashamed. It was vain to think of reading, writing, or much people everywhere. I ought to be thankful, still more ought I out, and indeed she is a great part of the whole business with the fifteen hours at Upleatham before midnight. C. again holding the town hall, then a public dinner, and we ended a day of over the table. At Middlesborough we had an address and reply in moment while I spoke at Sunderland, and I had to take hold of labour, however, is too much; giddiness came over me for a incessant flood of information respecting this curious place. The even warmer. Another progress and steamboat procession and Setland, the mayor, and others. Middlesborough was as warm or by rail to Middlesborough. At Darlington we were inet by Lord the naval men, and then came a large meeting in the hall. Thence the town and over the docks and harbour works. I had to address Here we had a similar reception and a progress through spectacle was really one for Turner, no one else. 9.—Off to SunderedT eviesb ysw yns ni ton ob I tadw em nogu tdguoid pomp I shall probably never again witness; circumstances have lasted six hours, and I had as many speeches as hours. Such a above and below with multitudes of people. The expedition steamers, amidst the roar of guns and the banks lined or dotted as we went down the river at the head of a fleet of some 25 benetdyied bas begaolorq saw doidw eness gaixirts teom a to tebim Gateshead at 12, and after an address and reply, embarked in the easy to fill with the voice, but quite practicable. S.—Reached long oration which was admirably borne. The hall is not very and enthusiastic dinner of near 500. I was obliged to make a photographer also laid hands on me. At six we went to a crowded old eastle, and Grey Street-I think our best modern street. The including especially the fine church and lantern, the gem of an At two went to Meweastle and saw the principal objects, Lancashire and America, for both these subjects are critical. . . Oct. 7, 1862.—Reflected further on what I should say about young but rising seaport, than to any other class of commercial men in the north of England. — Newcastle Daily Chronicle, Oct. 11, 1862.

C C

III

ISES.

I was most happy to lie down for porary journalist, 'if Middlesborough did not do honour to Mr. Gladstone, we don't know who should, for the French treaty has been a greater boon to the iron manufacturers of that reflecting on such a day.

CHY

never learned, This was a content that Mr. Gladstone "". stlireər yrotosleitis very rough business. You must be content with very un-Sir G. Lewis, but he always answered, "Government is a and heavy direct taxation so impairs morality that a large of the following and read of the following forms of the following the Chadstone in 1863:—'Indirect taxation so cramps trade which no administrative reformer will go far. ments he treated with the half scornful scopticism without that somebody would be dismissed. All such discouragebeneficial to the country at large has been met with a threat I began to deal with these subjects, every financial change cessor. During the last twenty years, he said in 1863, ' since Lord Palmerston that there is no necessity to appoint a sucdebt office is at death's door, and on the instant writes to sary appointments. He hears that a clerk at the national to watch for every opportunity of eutting down all unnecesspecial duty in his office not simply to abolish sinecures, but parings in the cause of the country.'1 He held it to be his not ready to save what are meant by eandle-ends and elieeseends and cheese-parings, but he is not worth his salt if he is matter. He is ridiculed, no doubt, for what is called candleof only two or three thousand pounds, he says that is no npholding economy in detail, when because it is a question mark of a chicken-hearted chancellor when he shrinks from should boldly uphold economy in detail; and it is the himself a hero. 'The chancellor of the exchequer,' he said, It was not only in the finance of millions that he showed departments into which abuse must always be creeping, the "contingencies" and minor charges of the different an official committee from various departments to go over 'My idea is that it would be quite worth while to appoint cases wanted buildings, and the libraries wanted librarians. bound, and the bound books wanted bookeases, and the booking despatches without description; for all these had to be sheets used for docketing only, and the same for more coverforeign office for a retrenchment in fly-leaves and thick folio He did not think it beneath his dignity to appeal to the

¹ Edinburgh, Nov. 29, 1879.

.2981

.ν

BOOK

temptation of courting popularity. The American minister dropped a hint about passports.

right in a speech at Hereford. The Southern states, he at Lord Palmerston's request as I have heard, put things topic.' A week after the deliverance at Newcarlle, Lewis, pared. However, we shall soon meet to discuss this very follow, and for that step I think the cabinet is not pre-Davis had made a nation. Recognition would seem to all speakert must be allowed, when you said that Jeff. to asy that I think you went beyond the latitude which very impertinent correspondent. Still, you must allow me your private secretary your very proper answer to your replied from Walmer (Oct. 20):—'I have forwarded to has got the boat and its crewinto a scrape. Lord Russell a minister from bearing too hardly on a colleague who share of that generosity of our public life that prevents perceive all the mischief and the peril, but had his full to the foreign secretary, who was far too acute not to Mr. Gladstone sent a copy of this enigmatical response according to the particular circumstances of the case,3 mays be separated by intervals of time longer or shorter connected together, are in themselves distinct, and which necessary for giving them effect, are matters which, though world, and to take or to be a party to taking any of the steps opinions upon questions of policy, to announce them to the to wrath, 'Mr. Gladstone desires me to remark that to form tary concluded, in phrases that justly provoked plain men chose to draw from his language. 'And generally,' his secreresponsibility for all the various inferences that people language Mr. Gladstone framed a form of reply, disclaiming To the numerous correspondents who complained of his said, had not de fucto established their independence and

Letters on England, pp. 146-78.

2 Adams wrote in his diary:—'Oct. 8. If Gladstone be any exponent at all of the views of the cabinet, then is my term likely to be very short. The animus, as it respects Mr. Davis and the recognition of the rebel cause, is very apparent. Oct. 9:—We are now passing through' the very crisis of our fate, I have had thoughts of seeking a conference with Lord Russell, to ask an explanation of Gladstone's position; a few days at least pass, and then perhaps sound matters incidentally.

Adams, pp. 286-7.

1 Oct. 18, 1862.

CH

that is to the nation, priceless. system and the spirit ongendered by it were to the taxpayer, an individual easo may often enough seem ludierous, yet the nounced such pranks as 'proffigate' and much else. Though We can hardly wonder that the heroical economist demail-boat would have brought him a very few hours later. of between seven and eight hundred pounds. The ordinary having arrived by a special steamor from Trieste at a cost in thus saving a few halfpence, an officer came into the room, in London. One day while the secretary was busily engaged use the same label in returning the bag to the colonial office address on the parchment label of the despatch bags and to the members of his mission, one was to serateh out the the small pieces of economy enjoined by Mr. Gladstone on to the ludierous. On this same expedition to Corfu, among expected tens, Sometimes, no doubt, this thrift descended I think it was in hundreds of pounds, where I should have

ΛĪ

was counted by good judges who heard it, to be among the This speech, with its fierce cogency and trenchant reasoning, 'Spoke from 5.10 to 8.20, with all my might, such as it was.' justice against their superficial and flimsy appearances. endeavouring, he says, to uphold the reality of truth and his 'deadly encounter with the so-called charities,' I was answering vehemence in him. He speaks in his diary of ever provoked, and the violence of the resistance roused an The opposition to him was as heated and as vigorous as he Into this case Mr. Gladstone threw himself with full force. purpose that constitutes a valid claim for such a boon? What is the quality of an endowment for a charitable Why should this burden be compulsorily laid upon him? by other people, to the government that protects them. ought in reason and equity to have been paid by them, as the general taxpayer? He has to make good the sum that their exemption but the equivalent of a gift to them from tax upon the returns from their endowments. What is was the proposal (1863) that charities should pay income-One of the few failures of this active and fruitful period that while the Union continued it never could exercise any dangerous pressure upon Canada to estrange it from the empire—our honour, as I thought, rather than our interest forbidding its surrender. But were the Union split, the North, no longer checked by the jealousies of slave-power, would seek a partial compensation for its loss in annexing, or trying to annex, British North America. Lord Palmerston desired the severance as a North America.

.2981

BOOK

diminution of a dangerous power, but prudently held his tongue.

to sbeak. properties, and thereby of knowing when to be silent and when subjects all round, in their extraneous as well as in their internal tained, and perhaps still exhibits, an incapacity of viewing illustrates vividly that incapacity which my mind so long reto perceive them justly exposed me to very severe blame. consequences of offence and alarm attached to it, that my failing only a mistake, but one of incredible grossness, and with such neutrality in the matter of the cruisers. My offence was indeed to awal and becreing strictly enforced the laws of we were already, so to speak, under indictment before the world neutrality; the case being further exaggerated by the fact that of a power allied in blood and language, and bound to loyal gross impropriety of such an utterance from a cabinet minister, facts was the very least part of my fault. I did not perceive the That my opinion was founded upon a false estimate of the

I am the more pained and grieved, because I have for the last five-and-twenty years received from the government and people of America tokens of goodwill which could not fail to arouse my undying gratitude. When we came to the arbitration at Geneva, Meantime I had prepared a lengthened statement to show from my abundant declarations on other occasions that there was and this statement to the arbitrators. I was desirous to present this statement to the arbitrators. Aly colleagues objected so largely to the proceeding that I desisted. In this I think they probably were wrong. I addressed my paper to the American probably were wrong. I addressed my paper to the American minister for the information of his government, and Mr. Secretary Fish gave me, so far as intention was concerned, a very handsome acquittal.

se at once from a hundred and thirty millions to a CHAP ndred and thirty-five. The next year it fell to a IV.

IN 105.67.

illion owing to the withdrawal, by reason of the American ar, of the material of our greatest manufacture. In 1866 rose to a hundred and eighty-eight millions. Then ider the head of income-tax, and comparing 1842 with oder the same area, and with the same limitations, over the same area, and with the same limitations, over the same area, and with the same limitations, over the same area, and with the same limitations,

April 16, 1863.—My statement lasted three hours, and this fit a good deal of compression. It wound up, I hope, a chapter finance and in my life. Thanks to God. 17.—The usual sense relaxation after an effort. I am oppressed too with a feeling deep unworthiness, inability to answer my vocation, and tho saire of rest. 18.—To Windsor, had an audience of the Queen; warm about Sir G. Lewis, and she warned me not to overwork.

Lewis had died five days before (April 13), and this is Mr.

e hundred and fifty-six millions to two hundred and renty-one. Other tests and figures need not detain us.

Indetence's entry:—
Indetence's entry:—
Indetence's entry:—
April 14.—Reached C. H. T. at 114, and was met by the ead e.vs of the death of Sir George Lewis. I am pained to think of y differences with him at one time on finance; however, he book benefit by them rather than otherwise. A most able, most are an anost genial man.

To Sir Gilbert Lewis, he wrote (April 18):—

Like several eminent public men of our time, he had many

Like several eminent public men of our time, he had many ualities for which the outer world did not perhaps, though it asy not have denied them, ever give him full positive credit.

or dorr months Atmostonin I ash transactions great and small; his thoroughly warm and nost forthcoming and genial disposition; his almost unconsciouscess of the vast stores of his mind, and of the great facility and astvellous precision with which he used them; and, if I may so ay, the noble and antique simplicity of character which he united with such knowledge of men and of affairs.

or example, his singular courtesy and careful attention to others

BOOK

.2581

the civilised world upon the conditions of the case. sentation with moral authority and force, of the opinion of combatants from England, France, and Russia—a reprea rejoinder to Lewis, arguing for representation to the two our part. A week later (Oct. 24), Mr. Gladstone circulated Russell's suggestion by cogent arguments against action on the war must one day end in Southern independence, met been best for the North, and while apparently believing that separation between North and South would in the end have (Oct. 17), while expressing an opinion that a peaceful weighing calmly the advantages of peace. Cornewall Lewis parties to agree to a suspension of arms for the purpose of Powers of Europe whether it was not their duty to ask both clusion that it had now become a question for the great and outlook in America, and ending in the emphatic contone all the adverse and confused aspects of the situation memorandum to the cabinet setting out in an argumentative and South kept American hands tied, and Napoleon well protest on behalf of Poland. The civil war between North same government had refused to intervene in a European intervention of Europe in the affairs of Mexico, just as the government of the American Union had scowled upon the tragedies in the house of Hapsburg. From the first the to his throne and to add another to the long scroll of of the Mexican adventure that was to give the first shock, objects of his own to serve. He was entangled in the coils renewed proposals of joint mediation. The Emperor had In November (1862) the French Emperor for the worse. that of the majority of his countrymen, it did not differ We may at least add that if, and where, it differed from the attitude taken by Mr. Gladstone in that mighty struggle. This pretty nearly concludes all that need be said upon tion. Britain (p. xix), where he says, in 1856, he sees no solution but separapreface to his Administration of Great fight for, except to gratify passion or pride? Letters, p. 395, etc. See also without having any intelligible aim or policy. The South fight for independence; but what do the North drifted, or rather plunged into war 19. The Morthern states have been conquer a seceding state' (Jan. 21, insurgent province, but you cannot heard of. You may conquer an conjugal rights that the world ever gular action for the restitution of about the war: 'It's is the most language of characteristic coolness 1 Lewis, throughout 1861, used

CHYLLEE A

VZIERICYZ GIAIT MYB

(2981-1981)

Then came the outbreak which had been so often foretold, so often menaced; and the ground recled under the nation during four years of agenry, until at last, after the smoke of the battlefield had cleared away, the horrid shape which had east its shadow over a whole continent had vanished, and was gone for ever.—Jour Bunnur.

unaffected; whereas the American civil war threatens a two great governing powers of Franco—remain substantially the Tuileries. The administrative body and the army—the Paris, in order to determine who shall be the occupant of a French revolution has become a fight in the streets of With respect to the internal consequences of these changes, retains the form impressed upon it by the treaty of Vienna,2 and Europe still, in spite of uninor changes, substantially and Nice) they have not altered the boundaries of France; but (with the exception of the recent annexation of Savoy important events, both to France and to the rest of Europe; restoration of a Bonaparte to the imperial throne—were all 1848; the re-establishment of a republic, and the subsequent the Bourbons in 1830; the expulsion of Louis Philippo in Napoleon in 1815. The expulsion of the elder branch of lo Ilish evilinies out estile blow licitive that in berruese that the war in America is the greatest event that has fairly asserted, says the particularly competent writer of it, family of civilised nations in both hemispheres. It may be the momentons struggle that at this time broke upon the Air. 62. , bodrasab ylavissarqmi bun ylutt utod sangaalloa sid to asu SIR CORMEWALL LEWIS in a monorandum printed for the CHAP.

On this sentence in his copy of pencils in the margin as was his rway, the memorandum Mr. (that stone his favourite Italian corrective, ma.)

1863.

BOOK

exchequer, and Mr. Bright, who made perhaps the most the 'vague and loose' arguments of the chancellor of the sighted part throughout), Lord Robert Cecil, who attacked night were Mr. Forster (who played a brave and clearit was almost unanimous. The other chief speakers that he would not qualify it further than to say that at any rate cries of 'No' greeted this declaration about unanimity, but of the American union by force was unattainable. opinion of this country was unanimous that the restoration incidents of war. He insisted once more that the public possessions in North America. He dwelt upon the horrid their territorial grandeur by seeking union with the British Southern states. The North would endeavour to re-establish to be divided into a cluster of Northern and a cluster of relations in North America, than if the said union were Northern interests, was more favourable to our colonial politics to turn on the relative strength of the slavery and the American union which caused the whole of American and in duty and honour with Canada, the balanced state of thought that, involved as England was both in interest American union should be torn in pieces. He had always thought it a matter of high British interest that the old with destruction. He had never agreed with those who visions of the great future of their country, now threatened feeling of sympathy with those in the North who saw exalted impossible for any Englishman not to have a very strong current of feeling must arise in the mind. Then again, it is South was so connected with slavery that a strong counterforces of a stronger. On the other hand, the cause of the on the part of a weaker body against the overpowering powerful and the noblest speech of his life.

severance of the union, and the apparent loss of strongth and antural reluctance of Xorthern Americans to acquiesco in the wholly distinct and a great deal too much confounded); tho the rightfulness of their conduct in seceding (two matters of view. The competency of the Southern states to secodo; Your frightful conflict may be regarded from many points from the North.' To Cyrus Bield he wrote (Nov. 27, 1862):question whether they can justifiably be put down by war tion whether the Southern ideas of slavery are right, and the my eyes be broader than the distinction between the queswholly with the opponents of it. . . Xo distinction can in black in slavery, I think that principle detestable, and I am white man, and therewith founds on it his right to hold the the South, viz. that which asserts the superiority of the versy on the principle announced by the vice-president of to the Duchess of Sutherland (May 29, 1861) is a contro-As far as the confrorersy between North and South, he wrote the attempt to restore the Union by force would and must fail. At a very early period Mr. Chadstone formed the opinion that 201 CEZERAL IDEAS ON THE AMERICAN WAR sorry the South has my sympathics. But the South has he says:—'A friendly correspondent writes to say he is In a letter to the Duchess of Sutherland (Nov. 7, 1862), of the old union this very day. should end, I would choose for its ending by the restorntion alone, and had the power of choosing in what way the war of the old union, and if I were to look at those interests interests of England were all on the side of the maintenance maintain that, in my opinion, the separate and special the last of thom, that I for one have never hesitated to ample matter for reflection, but I will only state as regards interests;—all these are texts of which any one affords again, for an Englishman, its bearing with respect to British real interests and on the moral character of the North; glory to their country; the bearing of the separation on the

the Seaboard Slave States (1856)-an of the revolution. interesting a picture of the South on the eve of its cutastrophe, as Arthur Young's picture of France on the eve neys and Explorations in the Cotton Kingdom (1861), and A Journey in should turn to F. L. Olmsted's Jour-I wish them both cordially well, which I has them also. not my sympathies, except in the sense in which the North

BOOK V.

Herbert died; the former the most esteemed and valued of all his counsellors; the latter, so prematurely cut off, that beautiful and sunny spirit, as he called him, perhaps the beat beloved of all his friends. 'Called on Gladstone,' says breakfast alone; very glad to see me. His eyes filled with his departed friend. The effect upon him has been very striking, increased no doubt by recent political differences of opinion.' 'It is difficult to speak of Herbert,' Mr. Gladstone said later,' because with that singular harmony and singular variety of gifts—every gift of person, every gift of character with which it pleased Providence to every gift of character with which it pleased Providence to less him—he was one of whom we may well recite words

'A sweeter and a lovelier gentleman, Framed in the prodigality of nature, The spacious world cannot again afford.'

that the great poet of this country has applied to a prince of our early history, cut off by death earlier than his countrymen would have desired:

The void thus left was never filled. Of Graham he wrote to the Duchess of Sutherland:—

Oct. 26.—This most sad and unexpected news from Netherby rises up between me and your letter. I have lost a friend whom I seem to appreciate the more because the world appreciated him so inadequately; his intellectual force could not be denied, but I have never known a person who had such signal virtues that were so little understood. The remainder of my political eareer be it what it may (and I trust not over long) will be passed in the House of Commons without one old friend who is both political and personal. This is the gradual withdrawal of the props pream for what is to follow. Let me not, however, seem to complain, for never, I believe, was any one blessed so entirely complain, for never, I believe, was any one blessed so entirely beyond his deserts in the especial and capital article of friendships.

Not many months later (June, 1862) he had to write to Mr. Gordon, 'We are all sorely smitten by Canning's death,'

1 Richard III. 1. sc. ii. At Salisbury, Sept. 7, 1866.

CHA

And if so, I think they were wise; for such a question could only arise for any practical purpose at a time when the foundations of the great social deep are broken up, and when the forces brought into unrestrained play are by far too gigantic to be controlled by paper conventions.

So much for his view of the case in its general aspect,

II

two nights he was at court. Southern envoys out of the English mail-ship.' The next in his pocket from the evening papers of the capture of the more, 'Gladstones dined here. Gladstone, with the account this critical hour are interesting. On Nov. 27, says Philliof exultation in America. Alr. Chadstone's movements at broke out on both sides of the Atlantic; of anger in England, England or France. Violent explosions of public feeling least likely to effect any change in the policy of either for the presence of the tivo commissioners was not in the against Great Britain; and nothing was to be gained by it, United States hitherto had been the strictest champion direct violation of those rights of neutrals of which the afterwards landed and thrown into prison. This act was in and carried them off to his own ship, whence they were saries from the Southern confederacy on their way to Europe, Trent (Nov. 8, 1861), a British mail-boat, seized two emis-The commander of an American man-of-war boarded the possible that Great Britain might be forced to take a part. At one dangerous moment in the conflict it seemed

Nov. 28.—Off at 6.30 to Windsor. The Queen and Prince spoke much of the American news.

Nov. 29 (Friday).—Came up to town for the cabinet on American news. Returned to Windsor for dinner, and reported to Queen and Prince.

Of this important cabinet, Mr. Gladstone wrote an account to the Duke of Argyll, then absent from London:—

Dec. 3, '61.—The cabinet determined on Friday to ask reparation, and on Saturday they agreed to two despatches to Lord Lyons of which the one recited the facts, stated we could not but what the Queen suffers.' Mr. Gladstone replies:most tender wife, may in a faint manner picture to herself

circumstances of the district.1 solemnity of its relation to the severe and, alas! darkening to feel both your Majesty's too conspicuous affliction, and the deep emotion by the whole of a very large assembly, who appeared that all the words to which your Alajesty refers were received with It may not be impertinent in him to assure your Majesty

Majesty's subjects beheld it. your Alajesty's great sorrow in no other way than as all your of exaggeration, and likewise to speak only as one who had seen he was especially desirous to avoid using even a phrase or a word direction which his subject gave him towards very sacred ground, In presuming to touch upon that relation, and in following the

ho letter now in his hands. by the interview to which he was admitted at Windsor, and by in vaiu labour to convey the impression made upon his mind and indeed, even were it becoming to make the attempt, he would In speaking thus he knew that he must fall short of the truth;

trad of and one worres fo words soothe, but nothing can lessen or alleviate the weight the other day, which did her aching heart good. Chadstone in her name for the kind letter he wrote to her 1862):-- The Queen wishes Princess Alice to thank Alr. the writer sought. From Balmoral came a note (May 6, in letters of mourning sympathy, and the effect was what More follows in the vein and on the topics that are usual beyond a scanty fragment, which I will here transcribe:thoughts about the Prince Consort, but did not proceed Many years later he sat down to place on record his son erw doidn ronnem a ni ceanlido bina i callita or lestalor ecw ands guideanoe beenforq delida ,bire ban bib od the revo ecentri of reduction that never intermitted, partly to an inexerable watchsidad ban yeluenda of ylereq oub guoneeneb eid ai enemerom ban and conscience. There was, I think, a want of freedom, nature, mand, or attract me through any medium but that of judgment My praise will be impartial: for he did not fascinate, or com-

tanuncy northogashireancel and, t

SOOK

7885

Ær. 22

CHVL

And if so, I think they were wise; for such a question could only arise for any practical purpose at a time when the foundations of the great social deep are broken up, and when the forces brought into unrestrained play are by far too gigantic to be controlled by paper conventions.

So much for his view of the case in its general aspect.

II

two nights he was at court. Southern envoys out of the English mail-ship.' The next in his pocket from the evening papers of the capture of the more, 'Gladstones dined here. Gladstone, with the account this critical hour are interesting. On Nov. 27, says Philliof exultation in America. Alr. Gladstone's movements at broke out on both sides of the Atlantic; of anger in England, Violent explosions of public feeling England or France. least likely to effect any change in the policy of either for the presence of the tivo commissioners was not in the against Great Britain; and nothing was to be gained by it, United States hitherto had been the strictest champion direct violation of those rights of neutrals of which the afterwards landed and thrown into prison. This act was in and carried them off to his own ship, whence they were saries from the Southern confederacy on their way to Europe, Trent (Nov. 8, 1861), a British mail-boat, soized two emis-The commander of an American man-of-war boarded the possible that Great Britain might be forced to take a part. At one dangerous moment in the conflict it seemed

Nov. 28.—Off at 6.30 to Windsor. The Queen and Prince spoke much of the American news.

Nov. 29 (Friday).—Came up to town for the cabinet on American news. Returned to Windsor for dinner, and reported to Queen and Prince.

Of this important cabinet, Mr. Gladstone wrote an account to the Duke of Argyll, then absent from London:—

Dec. 3, '61.—The cabinet determined on Friday to ask reparation, and on Saturday they agreed to two despatches to Lord Lyons of which the one recited the facts, stated we could not but take them all as they come. He made a curious entry in bis diary upon his birthday at the end of 1860:—' Dec. 29.

OK

Began my fifty-second year. I cannot believe it. I feel within me the rebellious unspoken word, I will not be old.

The horizon enlarges, the sky shifts, around me. It is an age of shocks; a discipline so strong, so manifold, so rapid and whirling that only when it is at an end, if then, can I hope to comprehend it.' Yet nearly all the most conspicuous scenes still lay before him.

October 18, 1860.—I did not get to the play last night from finding The Woman in White so very interesting. It has no dull parts, and is far better sustained than Adam Bede, though I do not know if it rises quite as high. The character drawing is . excellent.

Downing Street, Dec. 15.—The chancellor says (keep this from view) that Prince Albert said to him at Windsor: 'We Germans have no boundaries; our only boundary is the Quadrilateral,' i.e. fortress in the heart of Italy. This, I fear, must be true, and, if so, is sad enough, because he evidently spoke his mind out unsuspiciously.

Dec. 18.—I actually went last night five mortal miles to Hoxton to see 'Eily O'Connor,' the Colleen Bayn in another shape! It was not without interest, though very inferior, and imitated in some cases with a ludicrous closeness. The theatre is a poor working man's theatre. I paid Is, for a very aristocratic place. To-night I am going with Phillimore to the Westminster play, a Latin one, which I am atraid is rather long.

Harrow. We shall not be in till four; all safe; and immense care evidently taken on account of the frost, though I do not feel it much in the air. I have had other matters to keep me warm. Among the letters given me this morning at Hawarden was one from Lord John, in which he quietly informs me that since the cabinet separated he has agreed to guarantee a loan, and for Morocco! This I mean to resist, and have managed to write a letter in the carriage to tell him so. What will come of it, I letter in the carriage to tell him so. What will come of it, I do not know. It is a very serious affair. I am afraid he has

into unrestrained play are by far too gigantic to be controlled by arise for any practical purpose at a time when the foundations of And if so, I think they were wise; for such a question could only OI paper conventions.

So much for his view of the case in its general aspect.

Nov. 28.—Off at 6.30 to Windsor. The Queen and Prince spoke two nights he was at court. Southern envoys out of the English mail-ship.' The next in his pocket from the evening papers of the capture of the more, 'Gladstones dined here. Gladstone, with the account this critical hour are interesting. On Nov. 27, says Philliof exultation in America. Mr. Gladstone's movements at broke out on both sides of the Atlantic; of anger in England, Violent explosions of public feeling England or France. least likely to effect any change in the policy of either for the presence of the tivo commissioners was not in the against Great Britain; and nothing was to be gained by it, United States hitherto had been the strictest champion direct violation of those rights of neutrals of which the afterwards landed and thrown into prison. This act was in and carried them off to his own ship, whence they were saries from the Southern confederacy on their way to Europe, Trent (Nov. 8, 1861), a British mail-boat, seized two emis-The commander of an American man-of-war boarded the possible that Great Britain might be forced to take a part. At one dangerous moment in the conflict it seemed much of the American news.

and Prince. news. Returned to Windsor for dinner, and reported to Queen Nov. 29 (Friday).—Came up to town for the cabinet on American to the Duke of Argyll, then absent from London: Of this important cabinet, Mr. Gladstone wrote an account of which the one recited the facts, stated we could not but tion, and on Saturday they agreed to two despatches to Lord Lyons Dec. 3, '61.—The cabinet determined on Friday to ask reparasay I fear, it is written by Morthcote. on the merits of the income tax is true. I suspect, I might The article in the Quarterly is clever; and what it says, moreover, I lanimon yleary as it is that anothe that som that ton conversation. He told me yesterday of his reduction, but did it is that Herbert has no nerve to speak out even in a private been raised in the cabinet for economy. What a misfortune single occasion since this government was formed has his voice Cardwell! I think went farther than either. Never on any OK in the navy, Palmerston criticised, Lord John protested, and beyond all doubt. conservative party. Such is the public opinion of Worcestershire the ground from under his feet'-with a growl about the But now I do not see what else he can do; he has cut away man, Third, 'Then he always wraps himself in such mystery. tax.' Second worthy, 'Gladstone seems to be a totally incompetent suppose we shall have to pay twopence or threepence more income-I part a dialogue, of which I gathered so much. First worthy, 'I Feb. 5.—Yesterday, in the carriage from Kidderminster, I heard that we were all here or hereabouts once more. makes me very sick of London and its wrathful politics, and wish all round me so busy with her work so beneficent and beautiful, altogether being down here in the fresh air, and seeing nature Hawarden, May 24.—The house looks cleanliness itself, and and wearier nerves and brain. say that a party there would be a relaxation for my weary bones, it seems an evening for riding to Holly House, nor can I honestly July 20.—The political storm has blown over, but I do not think seemed to wish it should not be. Bishop of London's jurisdiction acknowledged here?' of execution. My neighbour in church whispered to me, 'Is the service is most devout, but I am far from liking wholly the mode not wish to be an habitual attendant there. The intention of the Richards preached an excellent sermon. But I certainly should London is empty, as they say, it was absolutely crammed. Aug. 4.—I have been at All Saints this morning. Though till Monday. Lewis's last dying speech, 'Well, we will see what can be done.'

19

Oat 22.-Tell Harry [his son] he is right, Latin is difficult, and 1862.

BOOK

Bowden, Wills., Feb. 19.—The funeral is over [the wife of his brother]. Mothing could be better ordered in point of taste and feeling. It was one of the most touching, I think the most touching, I think the most touching ing, scene I ever witnessed, when the six daughters weeping profusely knelt around the grave, and amidst their sobs and tears just faltered out the petitions of the Lord's Prayer in the service. John, sensible of his duty of supporting others, went through it all with great fortitude. On the whole, I must say through it all with great fortitude. On the whole, I must say I can wish no more for any family, than that when the stroke of bereavement comes, they meet it as it has been met here.

Nov. 18.—I have sat an hour with Lord Lyndhurst, He is much older than when I saw him last, but still has pith and life in him, as well as that astonishing freshness of mind which gives him a charm in its way quite unrivalled. He was very kind, and what is more, he showed, I think, a seriousness of tone which has been is more, he showed, I think, a seriousness of tone which has been

Inst night I saw 'Lord Dundreary.' I think it—the part and the player, not the play—quite admirable. It is a thoroughly refined piece of acting, such as we hardly ever see in England; and it combines with refinement intense fun. My face became with laughing like what Falstaff says he will make Prince Henry's with laughing like what Falstaff says he will make Prince Henry's face, 'like a wet cloak ill laid up' 1 (Phillimore).

Windsor Castle, Dec. 10.—Here I am with six candles blazing!

of which I shall put out a larger proportion when no longer afraid of which I shall put out a larger proportion when no longer afraid of a visit from the great people about the passages. I got your blicker this morning, but I am amazed at your thinking I have the pluck to ask the Princess of Wales! or the Queen!!! about photographs promised or not promised.

In came the Dean; after that, a summons to the Queen, with whom I have been an hour. She is well in health and in spirits, and when she speaks of the Prince does it with a free, natural, and healthy tone, that is most pleasing. I am to see the Prince of Wales after dinner. I now therefore make sure of leaving to-morrow. The Queen asked kindly about you, and I saw little missed before.

Princess Beatrice.

ATT.

CH

Gladstone went to Newcastle. had the two heads of the government advanced, when Mr. So far, then, the Southern states as an independent state.'2 that in case of failure, we ought ourselves to recognise of the independence of the Confederates. I agree further, the United States government, with a view to the recognition with you that the time is come for offering mediation to Palmerston three days earlier, saying explicitly, I agree On September 17 Russell had replied to a letter from dignity and disinterestedness of the proffered mediation,1 cotton-towns of Lancashire, such as would prejudice the The second was the risk of violent impatience in the arms and the extension of the area of Southern feeling. The first was the rapid progress of the Southern desired that the proceedings should especially he what the prime minister had told him, and for two reasons

The people of the Tyne gave him the reception of a king, guna thundered, a great procession of steamers followed him to the mouth of the river, ships flew their gayest bunting, the mouth of the river, ships flew their gayest bunting, the banks were thronged with hosts of the black-handed works, glass factories, the furnaces, the coal-staiths, chemical works, glass factories, shipyards, eager to catch a glimpse of the great man; and all this not because he had tripled the exports to France, but because a sure instinct had revealed an accent in his eloquence that spoke of feeling for the common people.³

England.' 'Indeed,' says a contemment names so dear to the people of public conduct made law and governday by their upright and enlightened as to the French treaty, and of the distinguished men who have in our the labour of others; of Mr. Cobden share of honour that is really due to have been appropriating no small I seriety that I can now perceive I But I must say with unfeigned to mistake the ground on which they prace taken a part in them would be of personal obligation to those who treat these occurrences as matter dent for his reception, Mr. Glad-stone writes (Oct. 20, 1862):-- To in thanking a Mewcastle correspon-

In the summer of 1862 he took an active part in schemes for finding employment at Hawarden for Lancashire operatives thrown out of work by the cotton-famine. One of the winding-paths leading through some of the most beautiful spots of the park at Hawarden was made at this time by factory workers from Lancashire employed by Mr. Gladstone for purposes of relief.

2 Walpole's Life of Russell, ii.

p. 361.

In a fingle composed for the occasion, the refrain is—

' Honour give to sterling worth, Genius better is than dirth, So dere's success to Gladstone,

A. BOOK

1863.

Prince, with the beautiful inscription. been up to the pyramid put on a hill-top as a memorial to the We have had a good day, and have is drawing near, so good-bye. and will not allow that it is all owing to an accident. But dinner this. She likes Lord Palmerston's better; thinks he looks very old, ment in foreign affairs, indeed I have already had clear proof of impossible to help seeing that she mistrusts Lord Russell's judgwhen more have died off, be a matter of difficulty to her. will form itself into a habit, but I am afraid it may hereafter, Prince had never known. Evidently this clinging to things old she said it cost her much to see the Emperor of Austria, whom the [not] known them before, and their mode of living. As an instance, it was the greatest effort and pain to her to see any one who had them of what had been, but with her it was exactly the opposite; seeing those whom they had known well before, and who reminded Sept. 27.—I do not think Sunday is the best of days here. I in vain inquired with care about episcopal services; there did not seem to be one within fifteen miles, if indeed so near. We had something between family prayer and a service in the dining-room at ten; it lasted about forty minutes. Dr. Caird gave a short discourse, good in material, though over florid in style for my taste. The rest of the day I have had to myself. The Prince and Princess of Hesse I think went to the parish church. You are better off at Penmaenmawr. . . . I saw the two princes last night. They were playing billiards. The Prince of Wales asked par ticularly, as always, about you and Willy.

Sept. 28.—I must be brief as I have been out riding with Sir G. and Miss Phipps to Alt-na-Guisach (the Queen's cottage), and came in late. Be assured all is very comfortable and restful here. I think too that I feel the air very invigorating, my room is pleasant and cheerful on the ground floor, with a turret dressing-room. . . I am pretty much master of my time. To-day I have heard nothing of the Queen. Last evening I was summoned to dine, as was Lady Churchill. It was extremely interesting. We were but seven in all, and anything more beautifully domestic than the Queen and her family it was impossible to conceive. The five were her Majesty, Prince and Princess Louis, Prince Altred, and were her her Majesty, Prince and Princess Louis, Prince Altred, and Princess Helena. Princess Louis (whom the Queen in speaking fifteen minutes at Mr. Vaughan's in Middlesborough. II.—Off at 8 A.M. to take the rail at Guisbro'. At Middlesborough many friends had gathered at the station to give us a parting cheer. We came on to York, went at once to the mansion-house, and then visited the minster. At two came the 'luncheon,' and I had to address another kind of audience.

TH.

CH

Unhappily, the slave must still go in the triumphal car to remind us of the fallibilities of men, and here the conqueror made a grave mistake. At the banquet in the town hall of Newcastle (Oct. 7), with which all these joyous proceedings had begun, Mr. Gladstone let fall a sentence about the American war of which he was destined never to hear the last:—'We know quite well that the people of the Northern states have not yet drunk of the cup—they are still trying to hold it far from their lips—which all the rest of the world see they nevertheless must drink of. We may have our own opinions about slavery; we may be for or against the South; but there is no doubt that be for or against the South; but there is no doubt that he for or against the South; and other leaders of the South have made have made what is more than either, they have made a have made what is more than either, they have made a nation.

fears that Gladstone at Newcastle had yielded to the and the sympathy for the South to a torrent, and says he country, compares the sympathy for the North to a dam Blanc, then in exile here, describing the feeling of the article of their own creed and commandments. Louis twitted with the lapse of their favourite from a central to become worse than ever. Cobden and Bright were the supply of the precious material for a moment threatened Their trade. Orders for cotton were countermanded, and bedrutsib radtruf flits that thaistream bas duob to acitizog dence of the South. The cotton men were thrown into a that the government were about to recognise the indepenfound. All the world took so pointed an utterance to mean attach to his words.' The sensation was immediate and probesides his own meaning, the meaning which others will his own, that 'a man who speaks in public ought to know, Here the speaker was forgetful of a wholesome saying of 1863.

Oct. 3.—It happened oddly yesterday I was sent for while

BOOK

believe, this evening. past three. I am very sorry this happened. I am to see her, I made me think there would be no more, so I went out at a quarter out. I had had a message from the Queen in the morning which

There was no chaplain here to-day, and so no dining-room service; Captain W. got a drag to Castleton this morning, being a Roman. to an episcopal service. Perhaps encouraged by my example, believe this is about the first expedition ever made from Balmoral sermon was extremely good; but the priest had a few antics. I tro) and had luncheon there. I had Thomas with me. The drag back to Birkhall (24 miles which they all loyally walk to and one half or so. I gave Mrs. Knollys and one daughter a lift in my to the Holy Communion. The Knollys family and people were tive though very small, and no one left the room when we came room for girls! and with a congregation under twenty, most attentavour of this Sunday. It was celebrated in the Free Kirk school-Oct. 4.—The service at Ballater has made a great difference in present in due form. The household life is really very agreeable and she is then to attend and receive an address, with Sir G. Grey A statue of the Prince is about to be set up at Aberdeen, The Queen was yery cheerful, and seemed for the time Princess Alice declares her baby is pretty, and says she shall show what paper, etc., and great laudation of Lady Lyttelton's letters. style in his letters to the Queen, the proper mode of writing, on pugnose), handwritings, Lord Palmerston's to wit, Mr. Disraeli's -the little boy on coming yesterday called them all stumpinase, I think), the Prussian children (the Queen says the baby is not pretty Princess Alice acted a high priest, with great success—in 'Athalie,' since sent me to look at), the children's play at Windsor (when of the Prince's speeches, and his preface (which the Queen has (and there I could not speak out all my mind), Guizot's translation Shakespeare, Scott, the use of the German language in England before, and everything quite as pleasing. The Queen talked as well she might, so they were not there. The same royalties as Bruce—seven, again, in all. The Crown Princess had a headache, I dined with the Queen again last night; also Lady Augusta which for many I fear means no service at all.

CHY

were not entitled to recognition on any accepted principles of public law.

It is superfluous for any of us at this day to pass judgment. Mr. Chadstone has left on record in a fragmentary note of late date his own estimate of an error that was in truth serious enough, and that has since been most of all exaggerated by those sections of society and opinion who at the time most eagerly and freely shared the very same delusion.

American Union. My view was distinctly opposite. I thought who on the ground of British interests desired a division of the the struggle was virtually at an end. I was not one of those twas an act of friendliness to all America to recognise that the declaration. I really, though most strangely, believed that but even if it had been otherwise, I was not the person to make will not be popular. Not only was this a misjudgment of the case, has to offer sound recommendations with a knowledge that they a spirit of that friendship which, in so many contingencies of life, this kind, founded on the necessity of the case, were required by supposed that the time had come when respectful suggestions of ance of further bloodshed and greater calamity. were beginning to advise that it should give way, for the avoiddespaired of its success. The friends of the Morth in England at their zenith. Many who wished well to the Northern cause South or hostility to the North. The fortunes of the South were than his own, was not due to any feeling of partizanship for the to be made by a minister of the crown with no authority other plished fact. Strange to say, this declaration, most unwarrantable establishment of a Southern or secession state was an accomis to say, that the division of the American Republic by the American struggle that Jefferson Davis had made a nation, that dinner at Mewcastle-upon-Tyne, I declared in the heat of the autumn of that year, and in a speech delivered after a public in the year 1862, when I had outlived half a century. In the able of them all, especially since it was committed so late as the most singular and palpable, I may add the least excusment already more than once mentioned, an undoubted error, I have yet to record, he writes (July 1896) in the frag-

BOOK No.

.6381

Now, I thought, can I in reply call the Queen's attention to these significant words, a noble sermon? I saked Lady Augusta (of course I mean the German words) and she would not venture

it. Had I a viva voce chance, I would try.

Oct. 7.—The Queen's talk last night (only think, she wants one's head. on the whole, this may be detter than having it hang over voted a great success. Well, there is a cabinet fixed for Tuesday; and snow in the night) as anything could be, and the whole is Samaritan, kept me company. The day was as lovely (after frost it, and had to come very slow, but Lord C. Fitzroy, like a good to come down, covered with snow and very slippery; I was put to the precipices, but I managed a little. We had a very steep side Caithness. I could not do all that the others did in looking down need, to set out for it again. We saw towards the north as far as all, and am not in the least tired, but quite ready, if there were and then went up, some of us on ponies, some riding. I walked it words to describe his pleasure. Our party drove to Loch Muich, good. He says there is nothing it was not worth, and he has no with a party from here, and his raptures are such as would do you to go, but the Queen would not let her. Thomas also went up glorious. We went five gentlemen, at least men. E. H. was keen seven hours in the open air, going up Lochnagar. The day was not rather over-great? I have been out to-day for a real good mean him in the sulke, not you. Your exploit was great; was it Oct. 6.—1 am sorry you quitted Penmaenmawr in the sulks—I to read the French Jesuit—don't know this) was about Guizot's comparison of the Prince and King William, about Macaulay, America and the ironclade, where she was very national and high-spirited; and Schleswig-Holstein, in which she is intensely interested, because the Prince thought it a great case of justice on the side rather opposite to that of Lord Palmerston and the government policy. She spoke about this with intense earnestness, and ment policy. She spoke about this with intense earnestness, and said she considered it a legacy from him.

Princess Alice's baby lives above me, and I believe never cries. I never hear it. We have been out riding to Birkhall to-day, and I had much talk with Lady Churchill about the Queen. She (Lady C.) feels and speaks most properly about her. I told Lady

And strange to say, post hoc though perhaps not propler hoc, the United States have been that country of the world in which the marks of public honour have been paid me, and in which my name has been the most popular, the only parallels being Italy, Greece, and the Balkan Peninsula.

Among the many calumnies poured upon him in this connection was the charge that he had been a subscriber to the Confederate Loan. 'The statement,' he wrote to a correspondent (Oct. 17, 1865), 'is not only untrue, but it is so entirely void of the slightest shadow of support in any entirely void of the slightest shadow of support in any ascribe it to mere error, and am painfully perplexed as to the motives which could have prompted so mischievous a forgery.'

ΛI

said, Yes.'1 to understand that policy as not now to be changed. He any I li mid besta I Hesti elttes ot elggurts sitt evael the government was to adhere to a strict neutrality, and to Lord Palmerston. . . His lordship said that the policy of willing to disclaim that. He had written to that effect to ascribed to him by the public. Mr. Gladstone was himself so far as he understood them (his meaning) was not that Still he could not disavow the sentiments of Mr. Gladstone; regretted by Lord Palmerston and the other cabinet officers. Mr. Gladstone, in fact admitted that his act had been embraced the allusion, and whilst endeavouring to excuse packing my carpet bag and trunks. His lordship at once public to a late speech, I should have begun to think of I had trusted, he said, 'to the construction given by the matters he came to the real object of the interview. Adams any Lord Russell. Having mentioned some minor at passports. Ten days after Mr. Gladstone's speech Mr. As I have already said, the American minister had hinted

If this relation be accurate, then the foreign secretary did not construe strict neutrality as excluding what diplomatists call good offices. On October 13, Lord Russell circulated a

1 Rhodes, iv. p. 340. Also Life of C. F. Adams, p. 287.

1864. V: BOOK

I lectured her a little for driving after dark in such a country, for any other minister (some one there certainly ought to be). cabinet on Tuesday, but all I could get was that I might arrange would be a very bad thing to have G. Grey away from such a kept wonderfully, and you must keep it. I hinted that it dear Mr. Gladstone, that was quite wrong.' The secret is writing to Lord Palmerston about her accident, and said, But, Then about politics, which will keep. She rowed me for which is near, but that the reward is there, though distant. . . . proportion, that no one could wonder at her feeling the present, her burden was altogether peculiar, but the honour was in way, that duty would sustain her (this she quite recognised), that her life as likely to be short. I told her that she would not give not like to have died in that way. She went on to speak of another thing which she said to Lady Churchill, that she should wishing the accident had ended it. This is hardly qualified by and directions, and she could not alter them.

Hawarden, Dec. 29.—I am well past half a century. My life has not been inactive. But of what kind has been its activity? Inwardly I feel it to be open to this general observation: it seems to have been and to be a series of efforts to be and to do what is beyond my natural force. This of itself is not condemnation, though it is a spectacle effectually humbling when I see that I have not according to Schiller's figure enlarged with the circle in which I live and move. [Diary.]

but she said all her habits were formed on the Prince's wishes

AT

Jan. 2, 1864.—The cabinet was on matters of great importance connected with Denmark, and has decided rightly to seek the co-operation of France and other powers before talking about the use, in any event, of force. ¹ Lord Palmerston has gout sharply in the hand. The Queen wrote a letter, which I think did her great credit. Her love of truth and wish to do right preyent all prejudices from effectually warping her.

The Queen talked much about the Danish question, and is very desirous of a more staid and quiet foreign policy. For the first department, though the distress tells upon me. smoother; and they look pretty well, I think, as regards my sof matters generally in the eabinet, I have never seen it proposal a feeble and half-hearted support. As to the state that the war should cease. Palmerston gave to Russell's in the matter. It will be clear that we concur with them, positive refusal, or at any rate that they may themselves act it is very possible. But I hopo they may not take it as a French will make our answer about America public; at least the matter very open for the future.-Nov. 13. I think the the answer is put upon grounds and in terms which leave out his battle. However, though we decline for the moment, rather turned tail. He gave way without resolutely fighting United States affair has ended and not well. Lord Russell Lords Palmorston and Russell are right.—Nov. 12. The America. But I will send you definite intelligence. Both an afraid we shall do little or nothing in the business of have had our eabinet to-day and meet again to-morrow. stone writes home in these important days.—' Nov. 11. We declined. Mr. Glad-The London eabinet was divided. and Russia to join him in a project of mediation. Russia ment for his future purposes. So now he pressed England strong or weak from the struggle, would be a useful instruthe Southern confederates, who, whether they should energe restlessly about for any combination that promised aid to the Union would overthrow his designs in Moxico. He east knew that the success of the North and the consolidation of

1 See Walpole's Life of Russell, ii. p. 402.

The only speech, I believe, delivered by Mr. Gladstone upon the war in parliament, while resisting the motion for the recognition of the confederacy, was curiously balanced.² As to the South, he said, not a few must sympathise with a resist-to the South, as said, not a few must sympathise with a resist-to the South, and are said, not a few must sympathise with a resist-to the South, and are offered in the history of the world ance as heroic as ever was offered in the history of the world.

.(1981 ,72 and the disruption —at Leith, Jun. 11, 1862, at Memehester, April 24, 11, 1862, at Meweastle, Oct. 7, 1862, and 1862, at Meweastle, Oct. 7, 1862, and one in parliament when a member spoke of the bursting of the American bubble, he says, 'I commented on the bubble, he says, 'I commented on the sayressions with a reproof as sharp as I could venture to make it' (May as I could venture to make it' (May

nis opinion , on the subject of the war

There is a story, not very accurate, I should suppose, about Mr. Disraeli's concurrence in the Empleror's view, told from Slidell's despatches in an article by O. F. Aldus, in North American Review, October 1879.

2 June 30, 1863. Hansard, vol. 171, p. 1800. On four other occasions Mr. Gladstone gave public utterance to very freely and confidentially, about the Prince of Wales; also, about Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston, and about Granville and Clarendon, the latter perhaps to an effect that will a little surprise you. Also the Dean of Windsor. It was a kind of farewell audience.

.₽981

'TA

BOOK

CHAPTER VI

DEVLH OF FRIENDS-DAYS AT BALMORAL

(†987-7981)

Itaque verz amicitiz difficillime reperiuntur in iis qui in honoribus reque publica versantur.—Cioero.

True friendships are hard to find among men who busy themselves about politics and office.

WITHIN a few months of one another, three of Mr. Gladstone's style can ever be. are the lifeblood of style, and of greater things than mere nature, and truly inspiring in those noble moralities that admirable in diction, rich in experience of life and human among our literary portraits. It is penetrating in analysis, from his more formal manner, and may claim high place where also his feelings were deeply moved, is very different his beautiful letter in a similar vein about Hope-Scott,3 quickly as you like.2 His character of Lord Aberdeen, like you take trouble to write well, in time you can write as that the way to write well is not to write quickly, but if one secret was that he forgot the famous word of Quintilian, his literary performances, he mostly chose to deal. Perhaps Partly, these defects were due to the subjects with which, in strenuous disputant, he was apt to be diffuse and abstract. reproduction.1 As a writer, though an alert and most stone to the son of his veteran chief is long, but it deserves died at the end of 1860. The letter written by Mr. Gladclosest friends and allies were lost to him. Lord Aberdeen

Then, in the autumn of 1861, both Graham and Sidney

' See Appendix. ' x. iii. 10. YOL. I.

² Memoirs of J. R. Hope-Scott, ii. pp. 284-293.

CHT

1864. V. BOOK

that of French institutions, or on his dealings with them. I believe him to be firmly attached to the English alliance, and I think his course towards us has been, on almost every occasion, marked by a friendliness perhaps greater and more conspicuous than we have always deserved at his hands. It is most painful to me to witness his conduct with regard to Italy. . . . He conferred upon her in 1859 an immense, an inestimable boon. He marred this boon in a way which to me seemed little worthy of France by the paltry but unkind appropriation of Nice in particular. But in the matter of Rome he inflicts upon Italy a fearful injury. And I do not know by what law of ethics any one is entitled to plead the having conferred an unexpected boon, as giving a right to the having conferred an unexpected boon, as giving a right to inflict a gross and enduring wrong.¹

ing with popular feeling and the claims of national justice. Great Britain in Europe, and who were capable of sympathisliberals who cared for the influence and the good name of Mr. Gladstone's hold upon all of the rising generation of that on the Irish church in the spring of 1865, it secured hearers. Along with his speech on Reform in 1864, and this stamped a decisive impression on the minds of his conquering nation over a subject and conquered race; -- all Modens; of the attitude of Austria as a command and of the stupid and execrable lawlessness of the Duke of tion of law and justice was handed over to Austrian soldiery; of the pope in the Romagna, where the common administraperjury was the tradition of its kings; of the government atoned for his tardiness, and his exposure of Naples, where assent and approval from Italian yearnings.' He amply the House, 'that for a long time, I, like many, withheld my speech on Italian affairs.2 'I am ashamed to say,' he told It was in 1862 that Mr. Gladstone made his greatest

11

The Italian sentiment of England reached its climax in the reception accorded to Garibaldi by the metropolis in atone's of March 1863 on the Roman 2 April 11, 1862. That of March Question is republished in Min- 2 April 11, 1862. That of March ghetti's posthumous volume, La 7, 1861, is also worth turning over.

whose fame, he said, would 'bear the serutinizing judg- CHA ment of posterity, under whose keen eye so many illusions are doomed to fade away.''

In the December of 1861 died the Prince Consort. His last communication to Mr. Gladstone was a letter (Nov. 19) proposing to recommend him as an elder brother of the Trinity House in place of Graham. Of Mr. Gladstone's first interview with the Queen after her bereavement, Dean Wellesley wrote to him that she was greatly touched by his evidence of sympathy. 'She saw how much you felt for her, and the mind of a person in such deep affliction is keenly sensitive and observant. Of all her ministers, she seemed to me to think that you had most entered into her sorrows, and she dwelt especially upon the manner in which you had parted from her.' To the Duchess of Suthermand Mr. Gladstone writes:—

March 20, 1862.—I find I must go out at four exactly. In any case I do not like to trust to chance your knowing or not knowing what befell me yesterday. Your advice was excellent. I was really bewildered, but that all vanished when the Queen came in and kept my hand a moment. All was beautiful, simple, noble, touching to the very last degree. It was a meeting, for me, to be remembered. I need only report the first (after a quarter the personal part of the conversation. The first (after a quarter of an hour upon affairs) was (putting down her head and strugging) 'the nation has been very good to me in my time of sorrow'; and the last, 'I earnestly pray it may be long before you are parted from one another.'?

In the spring he took occasion at Manchester to pronounce a fine panegyric on the Prince,³ for which the Queen thanked him in a letter of passionate desolation, too sacred in the anguish of its emotion to be printed here. 'Every source of interest or pleasure,' she concludes, 'causes now the acutest pain. Mrs. Gladstone, who, the Queen knows, is a seutest pain.

andience of the Queen . . . I had the and in the gratification of hearing, through Lady A. Bruce, that it was agreeable to H.M.—(Diary.)

3 Eleanings, i.

I His school friend, and later, governor-general of India.

I March 19.—Reading, conversation and survey in the house filled the morning at Cliveden, At four we went to Windsor... I had an

BOOK

.£981

". sredto gaivorteeb to seenisud edt noisselorg portion of mankind should be set aside to have for their of pain and horror, that it should be necessary that one tions. I never went to one. It struck me then as a matter could get sight of one of these military parades and exhibiused to run here and there all over the town to see if they everything attractive to schoolboys. All my schoolfellows military display, with bands and flags that were beyond large garrison always in the town, constant parades and French Revolution. Genoa was a great military post-a at school in Genoa. It was towards the close of the great a story in these words :-- "When I was a boy," he said, "I was by one another. 'I remember,' said Mr. Gladstone, 'he told and they met elsewhere. At a dinner at Panizzi's, they sat striking and very fine.' Garibaldi dined with Mr. Gladstone, ness, yet with perfect consciousness of his position; very perron; he advanced with perfect simplicity and natural-John Russell, and all the leaders were awaiting him on the I shall never forget an occasion at Chiswick; Palmerston, able simplicity with self-consciousness and self-possession.

Saviour.' To another correspondent on this point Mr. ruo bob ni ditet tuodiiw gnidt elekrasim a elil taidt him the fact that the statesman he cares for most would away with him some few words that would bring home to ments with him, but I would give much that he should take should be "superstitious." You are not likely to have argumore men disbelieve, the more they think it well that women much else. I know that woman's words are useless: the dislike it, and that he has also in leaving Rome left very read in Italy. He said "Perche?" and showed that he did not 'I talked to Garibaldi with regret that Renan was so much lady wrote to Mr. Gladstone of a conversation with him. Another side of Garibaldi was less congenial. A great exceptional. No Mazzinian leanings of his were known. I read kind. His insurrection we knew and lamented, and treated as things for Italy, for liberty well-understood, and even for mansimple, disinterested, and heroic character, who had achieved great The honour paid him was I think his due as a most singularly be got. 1 we ought much to deplore. No assent, even qualified, was to worse influences within her pale ever the better was a thing and that whatever indicated or increased the predominance of the doing, absolute or relative, of that great Christian communion, encourage, that we all had an interest in the woll being and well system. I contended, with a freedom which he always souned to glad of it, as it would tend to expose and explode the whole somewhere about the time when it came forth. He said he was papal decree imposing the belief in the immaculate conception, I well remember a conversation with him at Windsor respecting the church of Rome must, I think, have been illiberal. At any rate, out prejudices, and this particularly in religion. His views of the have to set down against him. I do not think he was a man withqualities. Perhaps I had better first disburden myself of what I had no claims upon him for the particular exhibition of each withstanding, invariably modest, frank, and kind, even to one who

Gladstone wrote:

The death of the Prince Consort was a groator porsonal calamity to Mr. Gladstone than he could thon foresoc. Perhaps the disadvantage was almost as roal as the donth of the consort of King George 11, to Sir Robert Walpole. Much as they might differ in political and religious opinion, yet in seriousness, conscience, and Inhorious temperament, the Prince and he were in exact accord, and it is impossible to doubt that if the Prince had survived at the Queen's right hand, certain jars might have been avoided that made right hand, certain jars might have been avoided that made many difficulties for the minister in later times.

H

I may as well here gather into a chapter some short pieces, mainly from letters to Mrs. Gladstone during the period covered by this fifth book. The most interesting of them, perhaps, are the little pictures of his life as minister in attendance at Balmoral; but there are, besides, two or three hints of a simplicity in his faculty of enjoyment in regions outside of graver things, that may shock critics of more complex or fastidious judgment. Readers will benevolently to complex or fastidious judgment. Readers will benevolently pp. 23-130.

V. BOOK

⁺₹98T

been to me, and reports that Mrs. —, a well-known and following circumstance has occurred. Clarence Paget has further declaration. But since I received your note the some occasion may offer there for obtaining from him a Garibaldi at Cliveden this evening, and it is possible that Mr. Gladstone writes to Lord Clarendon:--'I am to see own suspicions into his mind, for two days later (April 23) radical friends, however, seem to have instilled some of their line of preference, and therefore he would go to none. places that invited him, it was impossible for him to draw a rate he firmly declared that if he could not go to all the advice not to allow himself to be killed by kindness. At any general was taken to show excellent sense by accepting would do something to impair a unique historical event.1 The tion all over England of the national reception in London the whole world, and that even apart from health the repetieffect that the hero's life and health were objects of value to to Garibaldi. This Mr. Gladstone accordingly did, to the friends there present begged him to express his own opinion stand the exhaustion of a progress on such a scale; and the doctors declared that the general's strength would never towns and that the list was growing longer every day; the Garibaldi had accepted invitations to thirty provincial had carried him to Stafford House; there he found that tions with a personal incident, that the Duke of Sutherland Commons, seldom reluctant to lighten its graver delibera-Mr. Gladstone was forced to explain to the House of the court, had induced the hero to take his hurried leave. Emperor, or to please the whigs, or out of complaisance to chancellor of the exchequer who out of deference to the mind. A rider was now added to the tale, that it was the sarily be injurious. Still the fog hung heavy on the public remain a throng of admirers until midnight must necesperson of these habits to dine at half past eight and to home he went to bed at eight and rose at five, and to a was going away earlier than had been expected, because at Palmerston in the other House explained that Garibaldi for the feeling of which the reception was a sign. Lord

1 Hansard, April 19, 1864, pp. 1277, 1290. April 21, p. 1423.

AET.

committed himself egregionsly. I am very bad now; but what CHA shall I do at sixty-eight?

about the Danish question.

Jun. 19.—Indeed, this is a strange world. Yesterday it seemed Lord J. Russell might go out, or more likely I might, or even the cabinet might go to pieces. To-day he writes to me that he supposes he must find a way out of his proposal! So that is

Jan. 23.—You seem to have taken great pains about stable affairs, and I am quite satisfied. The truth indeed, alas, is, I am not fit at this critical time to give any thought to such matters. The embarrassment of our vast public expenditure, together with the ill effects of the bad harvest, are so thick upon me, together with the arrangements for next year and the preparation of with the arrangements for next year and the preparation of bealthy and delightful part of my work.

Jun. 24.—I expect Argyll to share my mutton to-night, and we shall, I dare say, have a comfortable talk. Last night I saw Herbert. I think he looks much better. He did not open the subject of estimates, nor did I, before her, but I told him what I am sorry to say is true, that the prospects of revenue grow much worse. Up to a certain point, I must certainly make a stand, worse. Up to a certain point, I must certainly make a stand, panic-stricken about France; so that we may come together.

Jan. 25.—I write from the cabinet. I am in the midst of a deadly struggle about the estimates; the only comfort this year is, that I think the conflict will be more with a simplicity and absence of egotism, which one could not but remark in his graceful character, the nature of his complaint. You will quickly guess. As to cabinets, Lord John says we had better meet frequently, and it will be on Tuesday if I am able to come down next week, but this is full of uncertainty. I hear that the Prince is wild but this is full of uncertainty. I hear that the Prince is wild

Jan. 26.—Another cabinet on Monday. It is just possible they may relax after that day. I have had two long days of hard fighting. By dint of what, after all, might be called threat of resignation, I have got the navy estimates a little down, and I resignation, I have got the navy estimates a little down, and I am now in the battle about the army. About the reduction can afford to agree with Mr. Gladstone when he said of Garibaldi—'His name is indeed illustrious, it remains inseparably connected with the not less illustrious name of the great Cavour, and these two names are again associated with the name of Victor Emmanuel. These three together form for Italians a tricolour as brilliant, as ever fresh, and I hope as enduring for many and many generations, as the national flag that now waves over united Italy.'

†981

BOOK

 Π

Prussia will be very glad to imitate.' So the world speedily I am setting an example that probably in no long time, ment. I console myself by thinking that on this occasion severely the conduct of the King of Italy and his govern-'I am sorry, he said, 'that the cabinet of Berlin judges so of extraordinary foresight to the representative of Prussia. powers against his invasion of the Marches, he used words Cavour was deprecating angry protests from the European man was the author of a singular prediction. In 1861 when of hammered iron, strode into the field. The Italian statesfiercer purpose, more implacable designs, and with a hand as 1863. Cavour had gone. Bismarck with sterner genius, history lends its magic to the new chapter that opened in mouths of the Elbe. None of the fascination of old-world and Po and Adriatic sea, to the shores of the Baltic and the heavily away from the Danube and the Bosphorus, from Tiber The tide of vast events in this momentous period now rolled

The torch of nationality reached material for a flame long smouldering in two duchies of the remote north, that had been incorporated in Denmark by solemn European engagements in 1852, but were inhabited by a population, one of them wholly and the other mainly, not Scandinavian but German. Thus the same question of race, history, language, sentiment, that had worked in Italy, Poland, the Balkan states, rose up in this miniature case. The circumstances that brought that case into such fatal prominence do not tonger, the back of the same fatal prominence do not that brought that case into such fatal prominence do not that brought that case into such fatal prominence do not concern us here. The alleged wrongs of her brothren in it is in great part because it is difficult that it is useful. Suppose he wanted to make himself a good jumper; how would he do it? By trying first, indeed, what was easy, but after that always what was difficult enough to make him exert himself to the uttermost. If he kept to the easy jumps, he would never improve. But the jumps that are at first difficult by and bye become easy. So the Latin lessons, which he now finds difficult, he will find easy when once his mind has been improved and strengthened by those very lessons. See if he understands this.

1 Le Conte de Carour: par Charles de Mazade (1877), p. 389.

Dec. 29.—The strangest feeling of all in me is a rebellion (I know not what else to call it) against growing old.

Oliveden, Maidenhead, Jan. 14, 1862.—I have written to John [his brother], and if he is in town I shall go up and see him to-morrow. Meantime I have mentioned Locock, as recommended by you. I fear the dark cloud is slowly gathering over him [his wife's illness], as we have seen it lately gather over so many and then break. I am amazed at the mercy of God towards us, and towards me in particular. I think of all the children, and of their towards me in particular. It seems as if it could not last; but this is all in God's hand.

Here are the Argylls, Lady Blantyre and a heap of young. We have been busy reading translations of Homer this morning, including some of mine, which are approved. Tennyson has written most noble lines on the Prince. Lord Palmerston is reported well,

Jan. 18.—I lifted Hayward last night back from dinner. He is full of the doctrine that Lord Palmerston is not to last another year. Johnny is then to succeed, and I to lead (as he says by the universal admission of the whigs) in the H. of C. It is rather hard before the death thus to divide the inheritance. But that we may not be too vain, it is attended with this further announcement, that when that event occurs, the government is shortly to break down.

Cabinet Room, Feb. 1.—The cabinet has gone well. It is rather amusing. 'I am driving the screw; Lewis yields point by point, I think in substance the question is ruled in my favour. Thank God for the prospect of peace; but it will not positively be settled a compromising declaration of quite sufficient emphasis. they would have to contend.' This did indeed sound like the result that 'it would not be Denmark alone with which

¹ On the estimates for 1862-63.

England for the breach of her engagement to give support in the waged against Denmark, there was much indignation felt against eventually disposed of by the war which Prussia and Austria usage, were, I believe, large and constant. When the question was whom his communications, agreeably to policy and to established he spoke in concert with the foreign secretary, Earl Russell, with any kind on the subject. I have no means of knowing whether serves, nothing had happened to render likely any declaration of knowledge of his cabinet, in which indeed, so far as my memory spoken entirely of his own motion and without the authority or any condition or reservation. Strange as it may appear, he had from England. Lord Palmerston does not seem to have added generally and not unaturally interpreted as a promise of support It seems, says Mr. Gladstone,² that this statement was

As the year advanced (1863) and the prospect of war came there was no one to raise a voice in our favour.

case of war, to the small power so egregiously in need of it.

tenburg should be peacefully settled on juridical grounds; and We were jointly to insist that the claim of the Duke of Augusdid, and we framed a communication to her to the following effect. We knew that France took the same view of the question as we failed, if I remember right, in inducing the cabinet to go farther. measure, in which Lord Palmerston acquiesced, when he had pacific correspondence. And we agreed upon a very important powers who, as we thought, were scheming piracy under cover of to war. We were, however, indignant at the conduct of the German og ot su bnid ot retainim emirq edt to eltit edt væv yns ni esingoeer not all have missed learning it. However we did not as a body happened as myself I do not know, but unquestionably we could Whether my colleagues generally were as little aware of what had I believe attracted no great amount of attention in England. declaration, which, owing to the exhausted period of the session, believe that at the time I was not even aware of Lord Palmerston's nearer, the subject was very properly brought before the cabinet. I

300K

.₽881

CHAI. 5

III

Aug. 31, 1863.—Walked 244 miles. Found it rather too much for my stiffening limbs. My day of long stretches is, I think, gone by.

Balmoral, Sept. 26.—This place is on the whole very beautiful come off! This story the Queen told me in good spirits. nothing would induce her to wash his clothes as the black would certainly have fallen down but for the Queen's presence. one, cried out in amazement on seeing him, and said she would of the kind and cannot conceive it. A woman, and an intelligent sensation on the Deeside, where the people never saw anything black boy here who was given to her, and he produces a great and said it was thirty-one years ago. Princess Alice has got a when she was Princess, and at last she seemed to remember it, been there, at least driving through from Laton (was it not so ?) at Hawarden, and where it was. I told her I thought she had cessively hot. She asked where I had been, and about our living had been better in Germany than anywhere, though it was exshe had received benefit from the air here) that she thought she govern her sympathies and affections. She said (when I hoped sentiments being in that, as in other matters, a barometer to an immense interest in Germany, her recollections of the Prince's America and Germany; also some Lancashire distress. She feels this aloud or give it to others). As to politics, she talked most of well upon many matters public and other—(Do not go on reading if it a good opportunity occurs. She talked very pleasantly and dull. I doubt your doctrine about your message, but I will give hold circle is smaller here than at Windsor, and so less formal and it appears, some are invited to dine with the Queen. from Windsor. All meals and rooms are separate, but sometimes, mode of life here, so far as I see, it does not differ for visitors conversation or audience to-day, but as regards the form and good many hours out, and looks well, but older. I had a long ranges of heather still almost in full bloom. The Queen spends a charms, with its black-green fir and grey rock, and its boundless and satisfactory; and Decside at large has lost for me none of its

She said that some people after heavy bereavement disliked

.$98.

OOK

looking up said in a neutral voice, 'I think the cabinet

May 7, '64.—Cabinet. The war 'party' as it might be called—Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, Lord Stanley of Alderley, and the chancellor (Lord Westbury). All went well. June 11.—Cabinet. Very stiff on the Danish question, but went well. June 24.—Cabinet. A grave issue well discussed. June 25.—Cabinet. We divided, and came to a tolerable, not the best, conclusion.

It seems almost incredible that a cabinet of rational men could have debated for ten minutes the question of going to war with Prussia and Austria, when they knew that twenty thousand men were the largest force that we could have put into the field when war began, though moderate additions out hazardous denudation of India, where the memories of the mutiny were still fresh. The Emperor of the French in fact had good reason for fearing that he would be left in the lurch again, as he thought that he had been left before in his attempts for Poland. Your intervention, he said to fine his attempts for Poland. Your intervention, he said to forty millions on land, and we will not intervente unless you engage to send troops.\(^1\) The dismemberment of Denmark engage to send troops.\(^1\) The dismemberment of the war has thought an odious feat, but the localisation of the war

A high parliamentary debate followed (July 4) on a motion made by Mr. Disraeli, ' to express to Her Majesty our great regret that while the course pursued by the government had failed to maintain their avowed policy of upholding the independence and integrity of Denmark, it has lowered the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace.' Cobden taunted both front benches pretty impartially with the equivocal and most dishonourable position into which their policy had brought the country, by encouraging a their policy had brought the country, by encouraging a small power to fight two great ones and then straightway leaving her to get out as best she might. The government of still calls Princess Alice) asked about you all. I had the pleasure of hearing the good report of Lucy altogether confirmed from her lips and the Queen's. The Queen thinks her like her dear others the talked about many things and persons; among others the Lyttelton family, and asked about the boys seriatim, but pulled me up at once ryhen, in a fit of momentary oblivion, I said the New Zealander was the third. She spoke of the chancellor and of Roundell Palmer; I had a good opportunity of speaking him up, and found she had his book of hymns. She spoke rery freely about the chancellor; and I heard from her that the attorney-general resigns on the score of health—of course Palmer succeeds. Prince Alfred is going to Edinburgh to study; he is a succeeds. Prince Alfred is going to Edinburgh to study; he is a succeeds.

1 See Ollivier's Empire Libéral, 2 July 4, 1864. vii, 71; De la Gorce, iv. 512.

46 .TA

CHAP.

Sept. 29.—I have just come in at 6½ from a fine hill walk of over three hours, quite ready for another were there light and opportunity.

account of the ball, which naturally recalled so much. ing to Mrs. Bruce, who dined with her) very low last night, on his authority and yours are at variance. The Queen was (accord-Jenner, should take place in March or early in April. She does not ride or fatigue herself. The event, according to Dr. -is taking great care, and the Prince very strict about it also: household party. The Princess did not dance—asked about you I replied (it was dark) thinking they were General Grey and a passed me on the way home and offered me a lift, to which thought beautifully. They were immensely amused at having activity after deer-stalking, and very well; Prince Alfred I the best fun I ever witnessed. The princes danced with great gillies' ball. There was a dance called the perpetual jig, nearly maenmawr. Last night we went down to Abergeldie to the address, but as you say three nights I suppose it should be Penpicked Lord P.'s pocket. Nor do you distinctly tell me, where to up about 3300. You forgot to tell me for what pious object you resemblance to Snowdon rather striking. It is 3800 feet; we went there was mist; and mist there was, with rain to boot. I find the The Queen sent me a message not to go up Lochnagar (top) if of Lochnagar with Dr. Bekker, as fresh as a lark! Very wet. Sept. 30.—I am come in from a nineteen mile walk to the Lake which she was ready to recede.2 Well might Mr. Gladstone mort engagements into no engagements from ing out in the name of England no hopes which she did She would at least have been entitled to the credit of holdnoble compared to that which she occupies at this moment. believe this country would occupy a position proud and had been foreign secretary, instead of Lord Russell, I fully and said, in following Cobden in the debate, 'If Mr. Cobden to the chief place in the councils of the nation, went further, party, as mordant as Disraeli, and destined like him to rise and Austria themselves. Another speaker of the same tusion, inconsistency, and contrariety marked Russia, France, their diplomacy.1 It is true, however, that just the same conregard to the same powers and a total want of system in an inconsistency of conduct, a contrariety of courses with France, there had been exhibited by ministers a confusion, of this era that, whether we looked to Russia, to Greece, to that Mr. Disraeli was not wrong when he said of the policy polities as often an affair of second-best, will probably judge of that same and tempered school that is content to take of an important European engagement?' Still history, even gether the powers of Europe for fulfilment and maintenance

A. BOOK

7981

July 8.—This debate ought to be an epoch in foreign policy. We have all much to learn. Lord Palmerston's speech was unequivocally weak in the mental and the bodily sense. I think it was to-day that the Prince of Wales rode with Granville and me; he showed a little Danism.

1 Feb. 4, 1864.

enter in his diary:

2 Lord Robert Cecil, July 4, 1864.

.kg .TM

when one comes to know them. One way and another they have a great deal in them.

which I have hastily translated the most important part. It is sent me, through Lady A. Bruce, the book, with a passage of things Schiller's and Coleridge's Wallenstein. Mext morning she Queen talked about German on Saturday at dinner, among other 'fast' for the periodical sacrament on Sunday. I told you the that I should be kept, but this could not be, as Saturday is a to Edinburgh. There was fear that it might be on Saturday, and Aberdeen and Trinity College at night, and on Saturday evening I have telegraphed for my uniform. there officially. I go on to the statue of the Prince, and to receive an address. I am to be Friday to do her first public act, to attend at the 'inauguration' of I have only time to tell you two things. First, the Queen is on kind, and offered me deer-stalking; we drank tea and ate scones. everything here look quite pale in comparison. Трей меке кеки The beauty there even surpassed my high expectations, and made Oct. 5.—I have been riding to Invercauld House and up above it.

'Too well I know the treasure I have lost from off my life the bloom is swept away;
It lies before me cold and colourless;
For he, that stood beside me like my youth,
He charmed reality into a dream,
And over all the common face of things
And in the fire of his affection
And in the fire of his affection

Yes to mine own amazement, tow'red aloft,
Win what I may henceforth, the Beautiful Is gone, and gone without return.'

easy to conceive how it answers to her feelings.

You will say this was an opening. In reading another part of the book I found lines which I have turned as follows, no better —: erədto ədt nsdt bar 104 '

hor nothing other than a noble aim
Up from its depths can stir humanity;
The narrow circle narrows, too, the mind,
And man grows greater as his ends are great.²

Prologue to Wallenstein, stanza 5.

Death of Wallenstein, Act. v., Sc. 3. In Coleridge, v. I. Death of Wallenstein, Act. v., Sc. 3. In Coleridge, v. I. Denn nur der grosse Gegenstand vermag Den tiefen Grund der Menschheit aufzuregen, Im engen Kreis verengert sich der Sinn, Es wächst der Mensch mit seinen grössern Zwecken.

reessantly forming and re-forming themselves into shifting ne observer of those days,—the political molecules were idding of Lord Shaftesbury. To borrow a figure from a ibuted mitres and crown benefices at the ultra-evangelical ke John Russell, or a Callio like Lord Palmerston, who dissented his confederacy with an erastian and a latitudinarian urchmen doubtless knew him for their own, yet even they nough repelled by its ecclesiastical apparel. he nonconformists were attracted by his personal piety, ade and a prosperity that advanced by leaps and bounds. chancellor whose budgets were associated with expanding d the merchants of the midlands and the north adored affic of their tables. On the other hand, the manufacturers hat disturbance this intrepid genius might bring into the ise at the exchequer, and the money-changers did not know gain the City was not easy at the flash of activity and enteralldren of the Holy Father who came from Ireland. r the deliverance of Italy lost him the friendship of those a unflagging zeal for the deliverance of Italy. Only, zeal out the Confederates, and the whigs were delighted with eir wiser leader, were delighted by his friendly words sliked by the tories. But then the tories, apart from nd confident finance was doubted by the whigs, and te life and death struggle across the Atlantic. His bold ey were chilled to the core by his neutrality or worse upon dent adherents when he preached economy and peace, but ang radicals from the West Riding of Yorkshire were his d parties around him. The Manchester men and the ow the nucleus of an organized party, then resolved again a loose and distant satellites.

The great families still held ostensibly the predominance the liberal party which they had earned by their stout ad persistent fidelity to parliamentary reform. Their days the leadership, however, were drawing towards an end, though fleadership, however, were drawing towards an end, though ggregates, now attracted, now repelled by his central force;

f leadership, however, were drawing towards an end, though ne process has not been rapid. They produced some good dministrators, but nobody with the gifts of freshness and olitical genius. The three originating statesmen of that tax, after all, were Cobden, Gladstone, Disraeli, none of them

d TA

ΊΛ

The people are, one and all, very easy to get on with, and little surprised that Mrs. Bruce should say I have a good name s has sure I should understandin. . . . I am very glad and a This she feels a kind of sin. She said, however, to Lady Augusta the Queen thinks she was too cheerful on the night I last dined. her and through General Grey it has come round to me that feel I had been so impudent. Only think of this: both through at dinner in her manner to the Queen, and I told her it made me I had been a great coward, and she too. She was very submissive Augusta last night, à propos to the lines I wanted to mention, that such weary hours. them. But she says she feels the hours from her drive to dinner should give up these drives after dark; it is impossible to guarantee ponement. I have been up to the place to-day. . . The Queen wise, but much inconvenience will be caused by so late a postai sidt duob ton ob I bas ,qu nevig si ti gaineve sidt won ing the duties of the ceremonial in Aberdeen to-morrow. she would not. She was very confident, however, about perform-Jenner wished her to go to bed, but she said it was of no use, and sprained a thumb. When she got in, I think near ten o'clock, Dr. out of the carriage, and received a contusion on the temple and The Queen was shot They were undermost, and not at all hurt. hours. Princesses Louis of Hesse and Helena were with her. after dark, on her way back from an expedition of seven or eight carriage, a sociable, very low and safe, was overturned last night Oct. 8.—The Queen has had a most providential escape.

Windsor, I suppose, stiffens them a little.

rusty old stick of twenty or twenty-five years' standing. three Prussian children, and the two elder ones played with my very like both the Queen and her mother. Then I went to see the also sitting-room, to-day. She is of sweet temper, decidedly pretty, Little Princess Victoria paid me a visit in my bedroom, which is axid the one purpose of her life was gone, and she could not help timid, yet I could [not] manage it at all to my satisfaction. me, and though I spoke abruptly enough, and did not find myself which might have led on to anything, but want of time hustled to the Queen until the last moment. She did give me opportunities Holyrood, Oct. II. -On Friday morning, as I expected, I talked parliamentary reform of 1867. tide of liberal and popular sentiment that ended in the and gave a sweeping impulse to that steady but resistless able habit of making American institutions English bugbears, result of the salvation of the Union; it reversed the fashionment of the American civil war, he only shared in a general the race of mankind sprang into existence." In this judgin an equal time and among an equal number of men since of that will, such as probably have never been displayed a power and develop an amount of energy in the execution States, enabled the governors thus freely chosen to marshal force and expression to the national millim the United after the event how, in his own language, the wide participation of the people in the choice of their governors, by giving affect his judgment on the issues of the war, he discerned the influence of the American war. Though too late to and so impressionable as Mr. Gladstone was, should escape to understand it. It was impossible that a man so vigilant a great popular leader the very statesman who had failed popular feeling, and by a strange paradox in creating as own shores, was still more directly potent alike in quickening side in England. Another convulsion, far away from our Italian revolution of 1860 gave new vitality to the popular and deepened and the speed of its currents accelerated.

800K Ital

The lesson from the active resolution of America was confirmed by the passive fortitude of Lancashire. 'What are the qualities,' Mr. Gladstone asked in 1864, 'that fit a man for the exercise of a privilege such as the franchise? Self-command, self-control, respect for order, patience under suffering, confidence in the law, regard for superiors; and when, I should like to ask, were all these great qualities exhibited in a manner more signal, even more illustrious, than in the conduct of the general body of the operatives of Lancashire under the profound affliction of the winter of Lancashire under the profound affliction of the winter of 1862?' So on two sides the liberal channel was widened of 1862?'

Besides large common influences like these, Mr. Gladstone's special activities as a reformer brought him into contact with the conditions of life and feeling among the workmen,

1 Speech at Liverpool, April 6, 1866.

time I think she takes a just eredit to herself for having influenced $\frac{VI}{VI}$. beneficially the course of policy and of affairs in the late con-

Balmoral, Sept. 28.—I thought the Queen's state of health and spirits last night very satisfactory. She looks botter, more like what she used to look, and the spirits were very even; with the little references to the Prince just as usual. Whenever she quotes an opinion of the Prince, she looks upon the question as completely shut up by it, for herself and all the world. Prince Alfred is going to Germany for nine weeks—to study at Bonn, and to be more or less at Coburg. The Queen asked for you, of course. She has not said a syllable about public affairs to me since I came, but talked pleasantly of all manner of things

Sept. 29.—The Queen sent to offer a day's deer-stalking, but I am loth to trust my long eyesight.

Oct. 2.—At dinner last night there was a great deal of conversation, and to-day I have been near an hour with the Aueration, and to-day I have been near an hour with the as gracious as goodsing as gracious as possible. I can hardly tell you all the things talked about—Prince Humbert, Garibaldi, Lady Lyttelton, the establishment and future plans, Prince of Wales's visit to Dentagely boys, Lucy, smoking, dress, fashion, Prince Alfred, his establishment and future plans, Prince of Wales's visit to Dentack Indies, elubs, Clarendon's journey, the Prince Consort on dress and fashion, Prince of Wales on ditto, Sir R. Peel, F. Peel, Mrs. Stonor, the rest of that family, misreading foreign names and words, repute of English people abroad, happy absence of foreign words, repute of English people abroad, happy absence of foreign office disputes and quarrels.

Oct. 3.—I am just in from a sixteen mile walk, quite fresh, and pleased with myself! for having in my old age walked a measured mile in twelve minutes by the side of this beautiful and

Oct. 7.—I have just come in from a delightful twenty-five miles ride with General Grey and another companion. I had another long interview with the Queen to-day. She talked most, and result of the salvation of the Union; it reversed the fashionment of the American civil war, he only shared in a general -gbuj sidt al ".sonstsixe otni garaqs baistana to eser edt eans and time and among an equal number of men since of that will, such as probably have never been displayed a power and develop an amount of energy in the execution States, enabled the governors thus freely chosen to marshal force and expression to the national will in the United tion of the people in the choice of their governors, by giving after the event how, in his own language, the wide participaaffect his judgment on the issues of the war, he discerned the influence of the American war. Though too late to and so impressionable as Mr. Gladstone was, should escape to understand it. It was impossible that a man so vigilant a great popular leader the very statesman who had failed popular feeling, and by a strange paradox in creating as own shores, was still more directly potent alike in quickening side in England. Another convulsion, far away from our Italian revolution of 1860 gave new vitality to the popular

the lesson from the active resolution of America was confirmed by the passive fortitude of Lancashire. 'What are the qualities,' Mr. Gladstone asked in 1864, 'that fit a man for the exercise of a privilege such as the franchise? Self-command, self-control, respect for order, patience under when, I should like to ask, were all these great qualities exhibited in a manner more signal, even more illustrious, than in the conduct of the general body of the operatives of Lancashire under the profound affliction of the winter of 1862?' So on two sides the liberal channel was widened and deepened and the speed of its currents accelerated.

able habit of making American institutions English bugbears, and gave a sweeping impulse to that steady but resistless

Besides large common influences like these, Mr. Gladstone's special activities as a reformer brought him into contact with the conditions of life and feeling among the workmen,

1 Speech at Liverpool, April 6, 1866.

BOOK Italia

.

CHYLLEE AII

CYBIBYPDI—DEATIVBE

(1981)

There are in Europe two great questions: the question called social and the question of nationalities. . . . The map of Europe has to and the question of nationalities and the profound conviction that this movement of nationalities has attained in Italy, in Hungary, in Vienna, in a great part of Germany, and in some of the Slavonian populations, a degree of importance that must at no distant period produce decisive results. . . The first war-ery that arises will earry with it a whole zone of Europe.—Maxizi, 1852.

VII.

CHVL

As events marched forward, the French occupation of where, than large continuing deficits.' freedom has no greater enemy in the Triple Crown or else-'I am sure,' he wrote to Lacaita in April 1863, 'that Italian early Mr. Gladstone began to be uneasy about Italian finance. as Cavour's master-hand was likely to have traced. Very the work of construction went forward, but not on such lines sunk into the marrow and the bone.' The cause was won, and an Italian king would be much; but that the doctrine has got the constitutional lesson by rote—though even this for Lacaita—' Your letter proves that the king has not merely really beyond all praise.' And a few days later, again to frmness, and forethought reaching far into the future, are from day to day. Their self-command, moderation, patience, Gladstone wrote to Lacaita at the end of 1862, increases 'My confidence in the Italian parliament and people, Mr.

My course about the Emperor has been a very simple one. It is not for me to pass gratuitous opinions upon his character or

Rome became an ever greater scandal in Mr. Gladstone's eyes. He writes to Panizzi (October 28, 1862):—

parliamentary reform of 1867. tide of liberal and popular sentiment that ended in the and gave a sweeping impulse to that steady but resistless able habit of making American institutions English bugbears, result of the salvation of the Union; it reversed the fashionment of the American civil war, he only shared in a general -gbuj sidt al ". soastsixe otni garaqs baistaan to eser edt in an equal time and among an equal number of men since of that will, such as probably have never been displayed a power and develop an amount of energy in the execution States, enabled the governors thus freely chosen to marshal force and expression to the national will in the United tion of the people in the choice of their governors, by giving after the event how, in his own language, the wide participaaffect his judgment on the issues of the war, he discerned the influence of the American war. Though too late to and so impressionable as Mr. Gladstone was, should escape to understand it. It was impossible that a man so vigilant a great popular leader the very statesman who had failed popular feeling, and by a strange paradox in creating as own shores, was still more directly potent alike in quickening side in England. Another convulsion, far away from our Italian revolution of 1860 gave new vitality to the popular and deepened and the speed of its currents accelerated. of 1862?' So on two sides the liberal channel was widened of Lancashire under the profound affliction of the winter than in the conduct of the general body of the operatives exhibited in a manner more signal, even more illustrious, when, I should like to ask, were all these great qualities suffering, confidence in the law, regard for superiors; and Self-command, self-control, respect for order, patience under a man for the exercise of a privilege such as the franchise? confirmed by the passive fortitude of Lancashire. 'What are the qualities,' Mr. Gladstone asked in 1864, 'that fit The lesson from the active resolution of America was with the conditions of life and feeling among the workmen, special activities as a reformer brought him into contact Besides large common influences like these, Mr. Gladstone's

1 Speech at Liverpool, April 6, 1866.

00K

198₹

VII.

not a dream. common brotherhood; a liberal Europe was then a force and idealists; democracy was conscious of common interests and in one of its generous moments. In those days there were bore the sword for human freedom. The western world was hearts of most was the thought of him as the soldier who aight of the aworn foe of Giant Pope; but what fired the picturesque figure as of a horo of antique mould; many by Some were drawn by his daring as a fighter, and by the but of a foreigner and the deliverer of a foreign people. not of some loved prince or triumphant eaptain of our own, enthusiasm. And this more than regal entry was the arrival amid tumultuous waves of passionate curiosity, delight, roof with eager gazers. For five hours Caribaldi passed on blocking roadways, filling windows, lining every parapet and palaces of the capital, amid rast continuous multitudes, Vauxhall to Stafford House, the noblest of the private of which they had been told, drove from the railway at associated in the popular mind with so many thrilling stories moving. The hero in the red shirt and blue-grey cleak long seldom beheld a spectacle more extraordinary or more populace took the thing into their own hands. London has 26), 'but you will lead, and we shall follow suit.' The with him, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Palmerston (March April 1864. 'I do not know what persons in office are to do

He who then saw Garibaldi for the first time, Mr. Gladstone said nearly twenty years after, 'can many of us never forget the marvellous effect produced upon all minds by the simple nobility of his demeanour, by his manners and his acts. . . Besides his splendid integrity, and his wide and universal sympathies, besides that seductive simplicity of manner which never departed from him, and that inborn and native grace which seemed to attend all his actions, I would almost select from every other quality this, which was in apparent contrast but real harmony in Garibaldi—the union of the most profound and tender humanity with his fiery valour.' He once described the Italian chief to me as 'one of the finest combinations of profound and unalter-'one of the fiest at Stafford House. June 2, 1883.

BOOK of reform for the thirteen years, since Locke King's motion

.₽681

previously made against sudden, or violent, or excessive, or such a proposition, I do not recede from the protest I have pale of the constitution. Of course, in griving utterance to of political danger, is morally entitled to come within the no seentifun lunos req to noiture bisnoe emos y d betatica que noiture se emos y de betatica de proposition de la constant de and I venture to say that every man who is not presumably marked a crisis. I call upon the adversary to show cause, stagnant or floundering hour of parliamentary opinion, should prevail? Then came the sentence that, in that right that the present system of almost entire exclusion manifested towards law, parliament, and government, was it working class? In face of such dispositions as the workmen of the mutritz reqqu edt tue tuts bar zeretele elbbim edt to How could you defend a system that let in the lower stratum fittieth of the working mem in possession of the franchise? encies composed of working men, and with less than onething of a scandal, with less than one-tenth of the constitua scandal. Then, was not the state of the actual case some-1851 down to the abortive Reform bill of 1860 would be and to set aside all the solemn and formal declarations from in 1851 upset a government, had been most unsatisfactory, intoxicating change.

He concluded in words that covered much ground, though when closely scrutinised they left large loopholes. 'It is armies and fleets and fortifications; it is well, too, that all these should rest upon and be sustained, as they ought to be, by a sound system of finance, and out of a revenue not wasted by a careless parliament or by a profligate administration. But that which is better and more weighty still is that hearts should be bound together by a reasonable extension, at fitting times and among selected portions of the people, of every benefit and every privilege that can be justly conferred every benefit and every privilege that can be justly conferred every benefit and every privilege that can be justly conferred every benefit and every privilege that can be justly conferred every benefit and every privilege that can be justly conferred every benefit and every privilege that can be justly conferred.

The thunderbolt of a sentence about every man's moral title to a vote startled the House with an amazement, half delight and half consternation, that broke forth in loud volleys of cheering and counter-cheering. It was to little the speech at the luncheon with aurprise and concern. As to his attenuated belief, I view it with the deepest sorrow and concern. I need not repeat an opinion, always painful to me to prondunce, as to the principal causes to which it is referable, and as to the chief seat of the responsibility for it. As to his Goddess Reason, I understand by it simply an adoption of what are called on the continent the principles of the French Revolution. These we neither want nor warmly reliah in England, but they are different from its excesses, and the words will bear an innocent and even in from its excesses, and the words will bear an innocent and even in some respects a beneficial meaning.

IΔ

The diary records:

April 12.—To Chiswick and met Garibaldi. We were quite satisfied with him. He did me much more than justice. 14.—Went by a desperate push to see Garibaldi welcomed at the opera. It was good, but not like the people. 17.—At Stafford House the was good, but not like the provincial tour. 20.—In the evening he agreed to give up the provincial tour. 20.—In the evening the great entertainment to Garibaldi came off. Before the door at night say a thousand people all in the best of humour, the hall and stairfull before dinner. A hostile demonstration invaded us at ten, but we ejected them. I settled about to-morrow with Garibaldi, the Duke of Sutherland, Lord Palmerston, and Lord Shaftesbury. My nerves would not let me—hardened as I am—sleep till after five.

2 Speech not discoverable by me. recently had an audience) had even expressed his admiration told the House of Lords that the Emperor (of whom he had to France. Lord Clarendon promptly denied the fable. He government that the reception of Garibaldi was distasteful of the French had taken umbrage, and signified to the something blacker still. A story spread that the Emperor the country against his will. This suspicion next grew into self with the radicals, and that he was being hustled out of aristocrats were in a panic lest he should compromise him-They now insisted that the whig the guest of a duke. had always been rather bitter to them that he should be instantly in the minds of his more democratic friends. It that Garibaldi was at once departing. Dark suspicions rose Suddenly one morning the country was surprised to learn

BOOK In 1864.

In the morning Lord Palmerston had written him a pre monitory note, not to commit himself or the government t any particular figure of borough franchise; that a six poun franchise had gone to the bottom; that if they should eve have to bring in a reform bill, they ought to be free fror fresh pledges; that the workmen would swamp the classe above them; that their influx would discourage the classe above from voting at all; and that the workmen were under the control of trade unions directed by a small number of agitators. All this was the good conservative common forn agitators.

Lord Pulmerston to Mr Audstone.

of the time. The speech itself, when the prime ministe came to see it, proved no sedative.

May 12, 1864.—I have read your speech, and I must frankly say, with much regret; as there is little in it that I can agree with and much trom which I differ. You lay down broadly the doctine of universal suffrage which I can never accept. I entirely deny that every sane and not disqualified man has a moral right to a vote. I use that expression instead of 'the pale of the constitution,' because I hold that all who enjoy the security and civi rights which the constitution provides are within its pale. What rights which the constitution provides are within its pale. What and under just laws, and they who propose a change ought to show that the present organization does not accomplish those objects...

You did not pronounce an opinion in favour of a specified franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming a franchise; but is there any essential difference between naming and any the content and any that is there are each time.

franchise; but is there and naming the additional numbers which a six pound franchise and naming the additional numbers which a six pound franchise was calculated to admit? I am not going to perform the duty which Whiteside assigned to me of answering your speech, but, if you will not take it amiss, I would say, that it was more like the sort of speech with which Bright would have introduced the Reform bill which he would like to propose, than the sort of speech which might have been expected from the treasury bench in the present state of things. Your speech may win Lancashire for you, though that is doubtful, but I fear it will win Lancashire for you, though that is doubtful, but I fear it will tend to lose England for you.

TH.

IIA

entitled to set himself above the laws of his country, and in national service, yet neither he nor any other citizen was ever created,—enterprising, humane, disinterested, eminent that though he thought Garibaldi one of the choicest natures When all was over, an Italian statesman wrote to Panizzi faith.' So Garibaldi forthwith sailed away from our shores.2 that it would be sad if the Italian people should lose its tion with Garibaldi. The utmost I could get from him was still held to his purpose. April 24.—Cliveden. Conversapeople."." After three or four days at Cliveden the general Aberdeen, who used to say, "I have a habit of believing depths of diplomatic reserve, instead of acting like Lord his mind plainly out to me, but wrapped himself in the this be so, that this simple and heroic man could not speak and are very anxious that he should go. What a pity, if the prolongation of his stay in England very embarrassing, own painful impression the English government do consider baldi himself has made known to her that according to his also a friend of Garibaldi's, has acquainted him that Garize olous but anti-Mazzinian liberal in Italian matters, who is that though he thought Garibaldi one of the choicest natures ever created,—enterprising, humane, disinterested, eminent in national service, yet neither he nor any other citizen was thitled to set himself above the laws of his country, and to the throne and by secretaries of state, was a thing to be ditterly deplored by every sensible man.³ Still history Lord Clarendon to Mr. Gladstone, and General Garibaldi is as notorious and clarendon to Mr. Gladstone, and General Garibaldi is as notorious of think that he ought in a letter clare in the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter clare in the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter clare in the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter clare in the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter clare in the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the cause of little most solemn manner and you think that he ought in a letter of the cause of the most solemn manner and the country that he ought of the cause of the most solemn manner and the country that he was a country that he was a character and the cou

clare in the most solemn manner and on the word of a gentleman, my firm on the word of a gentleman, my firm belief that we were all of us animated by the same ardent desire (without reference to anything and anybody but the General himself) to urge that and that only, which was indispensand that only, which was indispensand to bis personal welfare. It was, I assert, the General's own and unsuggested decision to give up the provincial journey altogether.

3 Ragan's Panizzi, ii. p. 252. The supervincial journey altogether.

3 Ragan's Panizzi, ii. p. 252. The sume view was reported to be taken same view was reported to be taken same view was reported to be taken a Ragan's Panizzi, ii, p. 252. The same yiew was reported to be taken at the English Court, and a story got abroad that the Queen had said that to the first time she felt half ashamed of being the head of a nation capable of such follies. Mérimée, Lettres d Panizzi, ii, p. 25. On the other hand, the diary has this entry:—Oct. I, the diary has this entry:—Oct. I, 1864. Dined with H.M. She spoke good-humouredly of Garibaldi.

Lord Clarendon to Mr. Gladstone, April 23, '64, asking him: 'Do not April 23, '64, asking him: 'Do not you think that he ought in a letter to same personal friends to state frankly the reasons which have included him to go? He slone can put a stop to all these mischievous reports.

• • . He ought to say that no government, English or foreign, has to do with his departure, and that he goes solely because the state of his health does not permit him to tulfil his engagements.

radical point of view by Sir James radical point of view by Sir James Stansfeld in Review of Reviews, June 1895, p. 512. Another account by Mr. Seely, M.P. was furnished to the Times (April 21, 1864). Lord Shaftesbury, who was a staunch Garribaldian, presumably on high protestant grounds, also wrote to the frestant grounds, also wrote to the Times (April 24):—'The solid, persevening and hearty attachment of severing and hearty attachment of tions,

BOOK about the bad effect of your speech, but I can assure you that I hear from many quarters the unfavourable impression it has produced even upon many of the liberal party, and

To others, Mr. Gladstone wrote in less formal style, for instance to an eminent nonconformist minister: 'May 14 I have unvarily, it seems, set the Thames on fire. But I have great hopes that the Thames will, on reflection perceive that he had no business or title to catch the flame, and will revert to his ordinary temperature accordingly. And to his brother Robertson, he writes from Brighton, three days later:—

upon all persons who value the maintenance of our institu-

Many thanks for all you say respecting my speech on the franchise bill. I have been astounded to find it the cause or occasion of such a row. It would have been quite as intelligible to me had people said, 'Under the exceptions of personal unfitness and political danger you exclude or may exclude almost everybody, and you reduce your declaration to a shadow.'

In the diary he says:—'May II.—Spoke on the franchise bill. Some sensation. It appears to me that it was due less to me, than to the change in the hearers and in the public mind from the professions at least if not the principles of 1859. Much against Lord Palmerston's wish, the speech friends, like Phillimore found obscure and not well written. An address, significant of the general feeling in the unenfranchised classes, was presented to him from the workmen of York a month after his speech in parliament. They of Peel; his budget of 1860; his conspicuous and honourable of Peel; his budget of 1860; his conspicuous and honourable share in abolishing the taxes on knowledge. 'We have share in abolishing the taxes on knowledge. 'We have the down-trodden and oppressed of every clime. You have advanced the cause of freedom in foreign lands by the power and courage with which you have assailed and exposed the misdeeds and cruelties of continental tyrants. To the provident operative you have by your Post Office

6₹L

CHAN VII.

biography of the Palmerston administration. to the province of history. Yet it has a place in any political this so resistlessly led up—here is a narrative that belongs what unexpected victories, territorial change, dynastic ruin, what a train of amazing conflicts in western Europe, to of her long hegemony, and Hanover incorporated; and to to do; how at Sadowa (July 3, 1866) Austria was driven out Piedmont of the south had foretold that she would be glad the Piedmont of the north, doing what Cavour in his would unite two great seas; how all this ended in Prussia, give her a deep-water port, and the head of a channel that Prussia audaciously possessed herself of territory that would tions the diplomacy of Europe found itself paralysed; how ruthlessly crushed; by what infinite and complex machinaof Austria and Prussia, and how the small power was broke out between the small power and the two great powers dis own designs to antional aggrandisement. skill with which he now used his domestic enemies to further and one of the most striking of all Bismarck's feats was the vehemently on the national side against the Danish claim; then a power in Germany and Bismarck's bitter foes, were subjects and their neighbours of the race. Even the liberals, government in face of the Scandinavian sentiment of its resisted if they would. Just as powerless was the Danish in central Germany, that the German courts could hardly have Schleswig-Holstein unchained such a tempest of excitement

In such an era of general confusion, the English cabinet found no powerful or noble part to play. Still they went far—almost too far to recede—towards embarking in a continental war on behalf of Denmark, that would have been full of mischief to herself, of little profit to her client, and could hardly have ended otherwise than in widespread disaster. Here is one of the very few instances in which the public opinion of the country at the eleventh hour reined back a warlike minister. Lord Palmerston told the House of Commons in the summer of 1863 that, if any violent attempt were made to overthrow the rights of Denmark or to interfere with its independence and integrity, he was to interfere with its independence and integrity, he was convinced that those who made the attempt would find in social ties that ought to mark the relations between master

F981 and workman. BOOK

of truth, of justice, of order, and of good government. forswear the interest she must naturally feel in the cause It is impossible that England, in my opinion, ever should England the affairs of foreign nations can ever be indifferent. and pre-eminence. It is impossible that to a country like of peace, and to England forty years of diplomatic authority the principles that, after all, had given to Europe forty years exploded protective system. On foreign policy he enforced productions of England the mischiefs and obstructions of an the more if the colonies set up against the industry and should bear charges that in equity belonged to them, and all it was just as little reasonable that the mother country subservient to those of the mother country had passed away, own way, and if the old dream of making their interests its burdens. In other words, the colonies should pay their can separate the blessings and benefits of freedom from is no grosser mistake in politics than to suppose you and at the same time to impress upon them that there afford them the shelter and protection of the empire, as far as may be from interference with their affairs, to given them practical freedom. It was our duty to abstain is at issue? As for our fellow subjects abroad, we had and justice and constitutional freedom wherever that cause to set, in the sympathy it must feel with the cause of right its moral influence abroad, in the example it is called upon charged with the same responsibility in the exercise of or forty-five separate states. Again, what other nation was selves. We were responsible for the welfare of forty governed distant millions many times outnumbering ourbefore lay on the shoulders or the minds of men. We had undertaken responsibilities of empire such as never to the arduous duty of government and legislation. England in England is a sense of the inequality of his best exertions becoming long, the one standing pain to the political man ground. He told them how, after an experience now days later at Manchester, he advanced to high imperial The same night at a banquet in Liverpool, and two to announce to Prussia and Austria that if they proceeded to prosecute it by the use of force against Dennark, we would jointly aresist them with all our might.

This communication was accordingly made to Louis Rapoleon. He declined the proposal. He said that the question was one of immense importance to us, who had such vast interests involved, and that the plan was reasonable from our point of view; but that the matter was one of small moment for France, whom accordingly we could not ask to join in it. The explanation of this answer, so foolish in its terms, and so pregnant with pique of Louis Rapoleon at a reply we had then recently given to a proposal of his for an European conference or congress. We all thought that his plan was wholly needless and would in all likelihood lead to mischief. So we declined it in perfect good faith and without implying by our refusal any difference of policy in the particular matter.

1 See Walpole's Russell, ii. pp. 402- Vienna. See Ashley's Palmerston, ii. 34. 424.
2 For the revision of the Tready of his head down while the talk proceeded, and then at last minister, as I have heard from one who was present, held pendent opinions in their own administration. The prime of Pitt and Peel, with the number of able men with indetrasted the convenient cyphers that filled the cabinets the timidity of their colleagues, and half-mournfully conwas strongly against them. They bemonned to one another single-handed. Little support came to them. The Queen Lord Russell were for war, even though it would be war would vote against it. The cabinet met. Palmerston and whips that if war against Germany were proposed, they supporters of government in parliament boldly told the party run decisively for non-intervention. Some of the steadiest clear that public opinion in the great English centres would minister to announce the decision of the cabinet, it became and Denmark. The week before the time arrived for the or should not take part in the war detween Germany country was fixed upon this question whother England should Throughout the session of 1864 the attention of the says Bishop Wilberforce (Dec. 7), 'is certainly gaining power, You hear now almost every one say he must be the future premier, and such sayings tend greatly to accomplish themselves.'

church theory, and meditated no political action to bring as this: they hoped for the ultimate recognition of the free Their general attitude was described by Mr. Newman Hall and man, R. W. Dale, so well known as Dale of Birmingham. Henry Reynolds, and that most admirable friend, citizen, such men as Binney, Allon, Edward White, Baldwin Brown, nonconformist clergy at the house of Mr. Newman Hallapparent. Then in 1864 and on later occasions he met leading says Phillimore. The peril there was becoming daily more accordingly. It will most rudely shake his Oxford seat, there was a wrong to be set right, and he voted and spoke candid and impartial men,' he had convinced himself that unparliamentary means of friendly conversation among solution of the difficulty might be found by the somewhat committee appointed in the rather quixotic hope that a about the burial of dissenters. Having served on a select measure (April 15, 1863) for remedying an old grievance division. He had alarmed his friends by his action on a ment turned ecclesiastical differences into lines of social a healing union where the existence of a church establishnarrow, softening what was hard and bitter, and promoting work upon the dissenters thémselves, of enlarging what was power; perhaps, too, no small share in the more abiding relations had no sinall share in the extension of his public were destined to grow closer as years went on. self drawing to relations with the protestant dissenters, that It was about this time that Mr. Gladstone first found himselves.'

it about; they looked for it to come as the result of influence within the church of England, not of efforts from without. 'Many dissenters,' one of them told him (Nov. 20, 1864), 'would enter the church whatever their theory about establishment, if such slight modifications were made as would allow them to do so conscientiously—holding the essentials of the faith far more soundly than many within essentials of the faith far more soundly than many within

BOOK says

⁺₱981

July 3.-- I was happy enough, nided by force of habit, to drive Would you be ready to follow him?' beforehand—'We shall want a great gun to follow Disraeli. disputation. Lord Palmerston had written to Mr. Gladstone ennulation of powerful rivals lends dramatic elements to when Disraeli sat down and Gladstone rose. The personal actual danger hovered over the ministry, revived afresh The excitement of an audionce, aware all the time that often hard, and the orator was long and over-elaborate. demands much selection from voluminous blue-books is easy, but to propound an easy case when its exposition policy of incessant intervention. Arr. Disraeli's ease was a revolution had been at last wronght in the mischievous result, because in Cobdon's words they were convinced that oighteon. The Manchester men agreed to help in the neans unmorited on the special issue, by a unitarity of was decisive, and ministers escaped a condemnation by no most difficult to achieve. The appeal was irrelevant, but it triumphs—the very triumphs that he had bimself made was only saved by Palmerston's appeal to its financial

July 3.—I was happy enough, nided by force of habit, to drive bodily out of my head for the whole day everything Dano-German. But not out of my nerves. I delivered during the night a speech in parliament on the Roman question.

July 4.—H. of C. Replied to Disraeli. It took an hour and thirty-five minutes. I threw overboard all my heavy armament and fought light.

Nobody who is not historian or biographer is likely to read this speech of Mr. Gladstone's to-day, but we may believe contemporary witnesses who record that the orator's weight of fact, his force of argument, his sarcastic play of personal impulse and motive, his bold and energetic refutation of hostile criticism, his defiant statement of the ministerial hostile criticism, his defiant statement of the ministerial though his string of special pleas did not amount to a justification, 'they almost reached the height of an excuse,' and they crushed the debate. The basis was the familiar and they crushed the debate. The steps taken by the refrain upon Mr. Gladstone's lips,—'The steps taken by the refrain upon Mr. Gladstone's lips,—'The steps taken by the government, what were they but endeavours to bind to-

воок

15981

A man's mind seldom moves forward towards light and freedom on a single line, and in Mr. Gladstone's case the same impulses that made him tolerant of formal differences as to church government led slowly to a still wider liberality in respect of far deeper differences. Readers may remember the shock with which in his youth he found that one person or another was a unitarian. To Mr. Darbishire, a member of the unitarian body who was for many years his friend, he wrote about some address of James Martineau's friend, he wrote about some address of James Martineau's (Doc. 21, 1862):—

positions as unhistorical and untrue. will not be surprised that I regard some of Mr. Martineau's prothem not for something better, but something worse. Hence you hold it, and I think that when we leave them we shall leave Christian religion is made a reality even for many who do not old creeds have been, and are to be, the channel by which the interval that must be called a gulf. Aly conviction is that the share, I fear I am separated from him in the order of ideas by an society, and in which Mr. Martineau himself seems so amply to tountain of all the gifts and graces that are largely strewn over rather believing the Person whom it sets forth, to be the real I am to the old Christian dogma, and believing it as I do, or I should greatly like to make his acquaintance. But attached as respect for the writer, and moreover, with a great deal of sympathy. works that I have taken for his, with greatadmiration, with warm From time to time I have read works of Mr. Martineau's, or

And to the same gentleman a year or two later (Jan. 2,

I am sorry to say I have not yet been able to read Mr. Martineau's sermon, which I mean to do with care. I am, as you know, one altogether attached to dogma, which I believe to be the skeleton that carries the flesh, the blood, the life of the blossed thing we will the Christian religion. But I do not believe that Cod's tender mercies are restricted to a small portion of the final Lamily. I date not be responsible for Dr. Newman, not muman family. I date not be responsible for Dr. Newman, nor momental family. I date not be responsible for Dr. Newman, nor meanly the thank mey but I hope he does not so believe, and this would be thank mey but I hope he does not so believe, and this

CHYPTER VIII

VDAVZCE IZ BOBLIC BOSILIOZ VZD OTHERWISE

($9ST)

The best form of government is that which doth actuate and dispose every part and member of a state to the common good. It, instead of concord and interchange of support, one part seeks to uphold an old form of government, and the other part introduce a new, they will miserably consume one and other. Histories are full of the taleless, equally true that time must needs bring about some alterations. Therefore have those commonwealths been alterations. Therefore have those commonwealths been are the most durable and perpetual which have often formed and recomposed themselves according to their first institution and recomposed themselves according to their first institution and ordinance.—Prx.

A RAPID and extraordinary change began to take place in Mit. Gladstone's position after the year 1863. With this, was associated an internal development of his political ideas and an expansion of social feeling, still more remarkable and interesting. As we have seen, he reckoned that a little earlier than this he had reached his lowest point in public parliament. He had now been more than thirty years in colour and different connections from the other two. It was not until he had seen half a century of life in the House of and more than quarter of a century of life in the House of Commons, that it was at all certain whether he would be conservative or liberal, to what species of either genus he would attach himself, or what species of either genus he would sive transmutations be evolved some variety wholly new.

I have already given his picture of the Palmerston cabinet as a kaleidoscope, and the same simile would be no bad account of his own relation to the political groups

CHYLLEE IX

DEFEAT AT OXFORD—DEATH OF LORD PALMERSTOW—

(981)

In public life a man of elevated mind does not make his own self tell upon others simply and entirely. He must act with other men; he cannot select his objects, or pursue them by means unadulterated by the methods and practices of minds less elevated than his own. He can only do what he feels to be second-best. He labours at, a venture, prosecuting measures so large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures so large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures so large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures so large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their venture, prosecuting measures as large or so complicated that their ventures are large or so complicated their ventures.

THE faithful steward is a chartered bore alike of the mimic and the working stage; the rake and spendthrift carries all before him. Nobody knew better than Mr. Gladstone that of all the parts in public life, the teasing and economising drudge is the most thankless. The public only half apprehends, or refuses to apprehend at all; his spending colleagues naturally fight; colleagues who do not spend, have other naturally fight; colleagues who do not spend, have other stone's invincible tenacity as guardian of the national stone's invincible tenacity as guardian of the national accounts the more genuinely heroic. In a long letter from accounts the more genuinely heroic, In a long letter from to be the closing battle of the six years' war. To Mrs. Gladstone he worke:—

I have fired off to-day my letter to Lord Palmerston about expenditure. For a long time, though I did not let myself worry by needlessly thinking about it, I have had it lying on me like a nightmare. I mean it to be moderate (I shall have the copy when we meet to show you), but unless he concurs it may lead to consequences between this time and February. What is really consequences between this time and February. What is really painful is to believe that he will not agree unless through appre-

1865. V. BOOK

224

born in the purple of the directing class. A Yorkshire of member, destined to a position of prominence, entered the House in 1861, and after he had been there a couple of years he wrote to his wife, that 'the want of the liberal party of a new man was great, and felt to be great; the old whig leaders were worn out; there were no new whigs; Obden and Bright were impracticable and un-English, and Cobden and Bright were impracticable and un-English, and there were hardly any hopeful radicals. There was a great there were hardly any hopeful radicals.

It is easy to see some at any rate of the influences that John Pym, Patrick Henry were demagogues. in the same high sense in which Pericles, Demosthenes, heart and a powerful brain. All this made him a demagogue popular audiences, because it was the expression of a glowing had generous hopes for mankind; his oratory seized vast were wide; he was always amply founded in facts; he keenly alive to the moving forces of the hour; his horizons signal honour. Then his point of view was lofty; he was pressed or driven to do them, Mr. Gladstone deserves that require or admit of improvement, instead of waiting to be characteristic feature has been to seek out things that ment is incarnate, and in whose career as a minister the said Alill, about this time, 'in whom the spirit of improvewonderful combination. 'If ever there was a statesman,' instincts of the labouring mass. Alr. Chadstone offered that glowing sympathies, alike with the needs and the elemental for practical improvements in government to broad and approaching, unless he clearly united fervour and capacity No man could guide the new advance, now so evidently This parliamentary situation was the least part of it. rize of power and influence to be aimed at.' 1 were bringing Mr. Gladstone decisively into harmony with the movement of liberal opinions, now gradually spreading over Great Britain. The resurrection of Italy could only be vindicated on principles of liberty and the right of a nation to choose its own rulers. The peers and the ten-pound householders who held power in England were no Bourbon tyrants; but just as in 1830 the overthrow of the Bourbon line in France was followed by the Reform bill here, so the line in France was followed by the Reform bill here, so the even for that short time out of my custody, but I do not like to keep you in the dark. I suppose the matter may now stand over as far as debate is concerned until next month, or even till the middle of January I fear you will not have much time for reading or writing to-morrow before you start for Chatsworth.

1865. V. BOOK

3/

This sort of controversy keeps the nerves too highly strung. I am more afraid of running away than of holding my ground. But I do not quite forget how plentifully I am blessed and sustained, and how mercifully spared other and sorer trials.

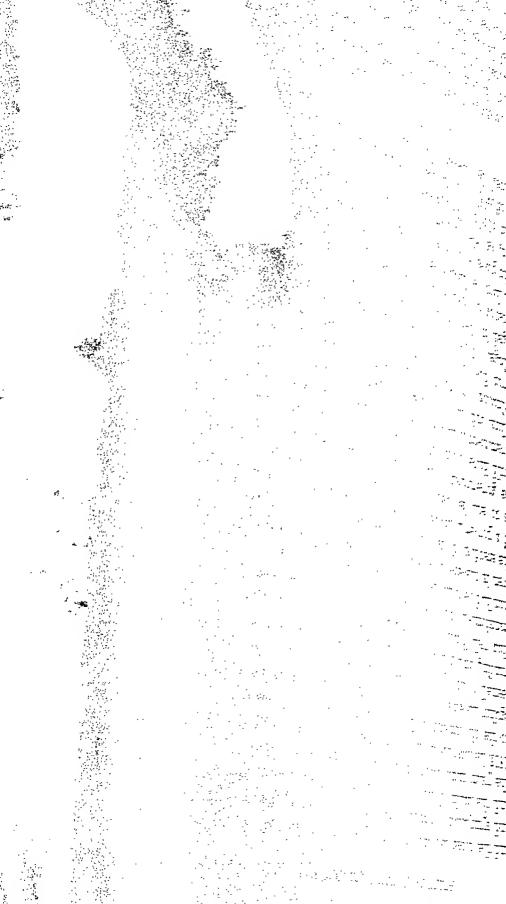

To-morrow comes the supper of the St. Martin's Volunteers; and after that I hope to close my lips until February. The scene last night 1 was very different from that of Monday; but very remarkable, and even more enthusiastic. I was the only layman among five hundred lawyers; and it made me, wickedly, think of my position when locked alone in the Naples gaol.

Jan. 19, 1865.—The cabinet has been to-day almost as rough as any of the roughest times. In regard to the navy estimates, I have had no effective or broad support; platoon-firing more or less in my sense from Argyll and Gibson, four or five were silent, the rest hostile. Probably they will appoint a committee of cabinet, and we may work through, but on the other hand we may not. My opinion is manifestly in a minority; but there is an unwillingness to have a row. I am not well able to write about other things—these batterings are sore work, but I must go through. C. Paget and Childers hold their ground.

Jan. 28.—The morning went fast but wretchedly. Seldom, thank God, have I a day to which I could apply this epithet. Last night I could have done almost anything to shut out the thought of the coming battle. This is very weak, but it is the effects of the constant recurrence of these things. Estimates always settled at the dagger's point.—(Diary).

Osborne, Jan. 31.—I hope you got my note last night. The weather here is mild, and I sit with open window while writing. The Queen and Princess both ask about you abundantly. I have been most pertinacious about seeing the baby prince. I tried to make the request twice to the Princess, but I think she did not understand my words. Determined not to be beat, I applied to understand my words.

The dinner in honour of M. Berryer.

the morrow.

BOOK pro V. of 1865.

production of schemes of change: but still comes back the refraint of my song: 'I am not loyal to it as an Establishment.' I could not renew the votes and speeches of thirty years back. A quarter of a century of not only fair but exceptionally fair trial has wholl dispelled hopes to which they had relation; and I am bound to say I look upon its present form of existence as no more favour able to religion, in any sense of the word, than it is to civil justic and to the contentment and loyalty of Ireland.

view of the practical politics of the day, or at any rate, of acute observer who knew him well, evidently took a different time when they could not be seriously approached. deprecated the responsibility of raising great questions at a Meanwhile, as spokesman for the government, Mr. Gladstone was out of all bearing on the practical politics of the day. careful to explain in public correspondence that the question of the Irish church was decisive. At the same time he was finite number of times and remain silent. His indictment member for Oxford, allow the subject to be debated an indestone, replying, felt that ' he could not as a minister, and as was the sound doctrine of cabinet government. Mr. Gladsarily and prematurely forced upon the public? All this this case would not differences in a government be unneceselse to state in what respect his own opinion differed? In bench, would not the colleague have either to acquiesce, or happened not to be accepted by a colleague on the same in the divisions of the body? And again, if his opinions required to act as a member of the government taking par opinions, or abstain from acting on those opinions, when an individual, and leave himself free to act upon differen he belonged, as to be able to express decided opinions a bench so to sever himself from the body corporate to which for a member of a government speaking from the treasury distinction that he reckoned impracticable. Was it possible and not as a member of the government, and this was Aladstone was about to set forth his views as an individual wrote a short admonitory note. He had heard that Mi Lord Palmerston got wind of the forthcoming speech, and in no logal to the table years in the fall of Mapoleon in and sympathetic temper draw him towards their politics and the ranks of their party. Looking back, he said, upon and the closer he came to them, the more did his humane c

Manning wrote to Mr. Gladstone two days

The outcome of this stream of new perceptions and new explained the absence of agitation. want of faith in parliament, or indifference to a vote, that of our minds.' This convinced him that it was not either action, we tried to spend our evenings in the improvement might place confidence in parliament; instead of political corn laws we have given up political agitation; we felt we classes as to suffrage, they said, 'Since the abolition of the alleged indifference and apparent inaction of the working suffrage. When he replied with something about the it was due to the disactisfaction with parliament as to inclination towards it on the part of the working classes, to him, and said, 'If there had been any suspicion or dis-Government Annuities bill a deputation of workmen came would have been inconceivable. In connection with the the government. A generation before, such confidence to shand edt ar shart riedt ealq ot medt eldane ot ea or as trades union asked him to modify his rules so the erection of the post office savings banks. A deputation even in the executive government. In 1863 he was busy in man had become one of confidence in the law, in parliament, transformed; the fixed traditional sentiment of the working that well justified antagonism. To-day the scene was standing antagonism to the law, and it resulted in severities seemed to set up the doctrine that the masses must be in against the excesses of the French revolution. This reaction to the old currents of English history, but were a reaction 1815, he saw the reign of ideas that did not at all belong feeling in his mind was a declaration that suddenly electrified the political world. A Yorkshire liberal one afternoon (May 11, 1864) brought in a bill for lowering the franchise, and Mr. Gladstone spoke for the government. He dwelt upon the facts, historic and political The parliamentary history

.6981

BOOK

Clumber, Oct. 26.—It is a time and a place to feel, if one could beel. He died in the room where we have been sitting before and after dinner—where, thirty-two years ago, a stripling, I came over from Mewark in fear and trembling to see the duke, his father where a stiff horseshoe semi-circle then sat round the fire in even ings; where that rigour melted away in Lady Lincoln's time where she and her mother sang so beautifully at the pianoforted in the same place where it now stands. The house is full of local in the same place where it now stands.

ΛI

At Oxford the tories this time had secured an excellent Russell absolutely to stand for London in the place of Lord John to bear their flag. In the same month of 1861 he had declined his Oxford supporters, and was honourably constrained again and the fellows of Trinity. But he felt his deep obligation to a life-battle, like the old famous college war between Bentley the series. He saw, as he said, that they meant to make it himself whether he should not escape the prolongation of four contested elections in fourteen years at Oxford, he asked and blood shrank from perpetual strife, he thought, and after and others show how strongly he inclined to comply. Flesh seemed to make success certain. His letters to Dr. Pusey signed by nearly 8000 of the electors—a number that a requisition begging his assent to nomination there, division of Lancashire, and, in July 1861, he received contemplation to give a third member to the southern ing or abandoning the seat for the university. It was in before, Mr. Gladstone had considered the question of retain-On July 6 (1865) parliament was dissolved. Four years candidate in Mr. Gathorne Hardy, a man of sterling character, a bold and capable debater, a good man of business, one of the best of Lord Derby's lieutenants. The election was hard fought, like most of the four that had gone before it. The educated residents were for the chancellor of the exchequer, as they had always been, and he had both liberals and high churchmen on his side. One feature was novel, the power of churchmen on his side. One feature was novel, the power of sending votes by post. Mr. Gladstone had not been active sending votes by post.

unfriendly. said. A brisk correspondence followed, neither heated nor note of inquiry to Mr. Gladstone, asking what he had really the desperate tidings. On the very instant he sent down a body must have hurried to Cambridge House and told him and though at the moment he was disabled by gout, someexisting administration was still a marvel of physical vigour, tration.' This was true, but in the meantime the head of the the head of the party that will succeed the present adminismuch, and Mr. Gladstone, in saying it, has placed himself at first rank, said one newspaper, 'who has dared to say as party. There is not a statesman in England of the very of domestic revolution, but the long lost flag of the liberal raised aloft was not what the tories denounced as the standard tories were furious. They declared that the banner he had of Tom Paine. The radicals were as jubilant as whigs and rights. Mr. Disraeli told him that he had revived the doctrine constructing vast universal propositions about man's moral abstract, and in that kingdom of shadows discovering or surveying mankind in the abstract and suffrage in the ing and levelling democracy. They charged him with encouraging, minister of the crown though he was, a sweepvanity, of preaching the divine right of multitudes, and of accused of ministering aliments to popular turbulence and the press a tremendous storm broke. Mr Gladstone was the oracular deliverance would not upset the government. In stand on end. Speculations began to hum and buzz whether Gladstone had said something that would make his hair liberal party. Two whigs ran off to tell Phillimore that place, a very great gain to the health and vigour of the conservative support to the government, and, in the second that one effect of the speech would be, in the first place, loss of important liberal speaker, with equal promptitude, pointed out stead of his 'intractable chancellor of the exchequer.' An the absence of the prime minister, and the substitution in his cipitate new eras. A conservative speaker instantly deplored gather up wandering forces of time and occasion, and prequalifications. One of the fated words had been spoken that purpose that the orator in the next breath interposed his

at the Amphitheatre, if possible more enthusiastic than that a

.6881

to address them.

the progress of social philanthropy. I find the prevalence ment of industry. I find the growth of enterprise. I find here around me different phenomena. I find the developthe contrast. 'I come into South Lancashite, and find he had clung to the university seat, but rapidly passed to pool, he again dwelt on the desperate fondness with which Oxford that had east him out. The same evening at Liver-Then he opened a high magnanimous exordium about the did the people of the country when it reached them. quickly realised the whole strength of the phrase, and so and I am come among you "unmuzzled,", The audience LAt last, my friends, he began, 'I am come among you the militant free-traders, he used a memorable phrase In the fine hall that stands upon the site made historic by Manchester.

church bells rung, the people came down with a band and I had second place. The volunteers in the park cheered loudly, the In the evening the figures of the close came in and gave me the Egerton at I P.M., and Turner gaining on me. . . . Off to Chester. deing well and increasingly at the head I was struggling with figures of both parties were wrong, ours the worst. Instead of apparently triumphant, but about midday it appeared that the enthusiasm. We then followed the polls as the returns came in, known, and I through him, and we had a scene of great popular July 20.—Robertson and I went in early and polled. He was that is still in store for her.

between the past of our glorious history and the future men of England, it is to establish and maintain harmony be one duty more than another incumbent upon the public of toleration. I find an ardent desire for freedom. If there demonstrations. The first return at nine o'clock-but you will no doubt by the rejection. I have just been polling amid fervid her better than ever. There is great enthusiasm here, stimulated tion to be angry, even were there cause. I only feel that I love I am by far too sorry about Oxford to feel the slightest tempta-

To the Duchess of Sutherland.

. Mr. Aludstone to Lord Pulmerston.

been construed by you in such a sense. A nm at a loss to conceive what report of my speech can have never exhorted the working man to agitate for the franchise, and character or rather extent as was proposed in 1860. . . . I have declared (for example) that the admission I desire is of the same the interpretation is amply given in the speech, where I have extreme. It requires, I admit, to be construed; but I contend that this proposition. It seems to me neither strange, nor new, nor franchise, who can be admitted to it with safety. . . . I hold by taken generally, that all persons ought to be admitted to the speech, you can ascribe this opinion to me. My declaration was, to vote.' But I am at a loss to know how, as you have read my denial 'that every sane and bot displainfied man has a moral right causes. In this spirit I will endeavour to write. I agree in your associated, removes, as I believe, many more difficulties than it between all men, and especially between those who are politically ill anything that proceeds from you; and, moreover, frankness II Caritton House Terrace, May 13, 1864.—It is not easy to take desire to see exercised in favour of extension of the franchise. . . . political intentions can exercise upon the public mind, I heartily to noisestory tuohiw tratement and statement without profession of its own mind and a reasonable probability of carrying it. But to eybelwond llut ent thiw tqeexe qu ti east nisza reve lliw tnem have no desire to press the question forward. I hope no governplayed within these recent years, in regard to the franchise. much more seriously suffer, from the part which as a party it has supports your government has suffered, and is suffering, and will the House of Commons upon that bill. I think the party which drawal of the bill in 1860, and in favour of taking the opinion of the cabinet I argued as strongly as I could against the withleast as far as I can see) an early bearing upon practice. and I should regret it much more it is were likely to have (at difference between us, I do not deny that difference. I regret it, Having said this much to bring down to its true limits the

On the following day Lord Palmerston wrote to him, 'I have yourself heard a great deal

.8å81. .vligiously. This crisis is for you politically what a certain date was for me BOOK

Mr. Gladstone replied:-

been given me. Lancashire, and swim there for my life, which as you will see, has dtuol to alooqliidw edt otni egnulq ot bad I eaoger to taemom the moment a stunned man; the more so because without a But I am for those of sorrow, leavened perhaps with pride. am overwhelmed with kindness. My feelings towards her are I that it merely alludes to. From Oxford and her children I letter, and I should have been very glad if it had contained Hawarden, July 21.—I thank you very much for your kind that great quality. however, I do accept—it is very valuable—I am sadly lacking in those whom they now rebuke. Your caution about self-control, who in a period of excitement would far outstrip, under pressure, the very people (I do not mean or think that you are one of them) everything which moves and lives is called extreme, and that by a cold or lukewarm period, and such is this in public affairs, This indeed speaks for my intention only. myself a disciple of Butler: the greatest of all enemies to my extremes, is one which I believe you approve. I profess The greatest or second greatest of what people call I do not think I can admit the justice of the caution against no difference in the figure. another, and that throwing off the academic cap and gown makes unequivocally clear that I am here as the same man, and not I had to speak of Oxford, and I have endeavoured to make it At both Liverpool and Manchester, he writes to Dr. Jacobson, Vixi, et quem dederat cursum fortuna peregi.

mis incomparable Ode, and I fervently address her with itnever repay, there comes back to me that line of Wordsworth in And when I think of dear old Oxford, whose services to me I can

1 Aen. iv. 653. I have lived my life, my fated course have run. from writing a line to assure you it is not my fault, but my To Sir Stafford Northcote, July 21.—Is cannot withhold myself , Forbode not any severing of our loves.

Mr. Aludstone to Lord Pulmerston.

Having said this much to bring down to its true limits the been construed by you in such a sense. A am at a loss to conceive what report of my speech can have never exhorted the working man to agitate for the franchise, and evant I 0081 ni bezoqorq asw as tnestre rather or ratheren emas ent to si eriseb I noissimbs ent that (figures rot) beralee the interpretation is amply given in the speech, where I have extreme. It requires, I admit, to be construed; but I contend that this proposition. It seems to me neither strange, nor new, nor franchise, who can be admitted to it with safety. . . . I hold by taken generally, that all persons ought to be admitted to the speech, you can ascribe this opinion to me. My declaration was, to vote.' But I am at a loss to know how, as you have read my denial 'that every sane and not disqualified man has a moral right causes. In this spirit I will endeavour to write. I agree in your associated, removes, as I believe, many more difficulties than it between all men, and especially between those who are politically ill anything that proceeds from you; and, moreover, frankness 11 Carlton House Perrace, May 13, 1864.—It is not easy to take

On the following day Lord Palmerston wrote to him, 'I have no doubt that you have yourself heard a great deal bearing with my waywardness, and manifesting, in the day of need, your confidence and attachment.

.665.

800K

asy especially—because I am certain that the fact of my hold such a higher level, and, secondly—perhaps I might of my total ignorance of my capacity, bodily or mental, to which would hardly apply, but on the double ground, first, official life, and this not on grounds of Christian self-denial take any step whatever to raise myself to a higher level in of a different opinion. It is my fixed determination never to position, jointly with my faculties, as I have, you would be $\operatorname{Inly} 25$) that if you had the same means of estimating my claimed the post of prime minister. 'I think,' was the reply bishop urged Mr. Gladstone to imitate Canning when he may stand in its proper darkness.' In the same letter the replied, 'has little bearing on present affairs or prospects, and The oracular sentence, Mr. Gladstone transmigration. The bishop naturally hinted some curiosity as to the third

Gladstone' served as the liberal credo, and 'I distrust Mr. Throughout the struggle, the phrase 'I believe in Mr. partly as a deserter, partly as a disciple of Manchester. an alarm, a menace, and a prediction.' They hated him monarchs dreaded Mazzini-'a man whose name is at once dreading him, ever since his suffrage speech, as continental Sinai towards the promised land, tories were described as mori gaino abed had bad bed sekanid betareney long as much remained for him to do. While liberals thus tions, interests, opinions; because he thought nothing done so because he could sympathise with men of all classes, occupaa national necessity; because he was bold, earnest, impulsive; in him, a capacity for action, and a belief that moving on was have the promise of the future in him, to have a living fire as matters of national importance, because he was felt to at Oxford, and his election in Lancashire, were regarded Truly was it said of Mr. Gladstone that his rejection seeking it would seal my doom in taking it.' 1

est and most friendly sense; but that the man is gone out, ϕ_{po0} oos, and has left nothing but the priest. No shirt collar ever took such a quantity of starch.

Life of Wilberforce, iii. pp. 161-164.
The transcriber has omitted from Mr.
Cladstone's second letter a sentence about Archbishop Manning's letter—
'To me it seemed meant in the kind-

Savings Bank bill given security for his small savings, and Cyour Government Annuities bill of this session is a measure which will stimulate the people to greater thrift and forethought. These acts, together with your speeches on the last named, and on the Borough Franchise bill, make up a life that commands our lasting gratitude. Such was the new popular estimate of him. In framing his reply to this address Mr. Gladstone did his best to discourage the repetition of like performances from other places; he submitted the draft to Lord Palmerston, and followed his advice in omitting certain portions of it. It was reduced to the conventional type of such acknowledgment.

TTT

In the autumn of 1864 Mr. Gladstone made a series of speeches in his native county, which again showed the sincerity and the simplicity of his solicitude for the masses of his countrymen. The sentiment is common. Mr. Disraeli and the Young Englanders had tried to inscribe it upon a party banner twenty years before. But Mr. Gladstone had given proof that he knew how to embody sentiment in acts of parliament, and he associated it with the broadest ideas of citizenship and policy. These speeches were not a manifesto or a programme; they were a survey of the principles of the statesmanchip that befitted the period.

At Bolton (Oct. II) he discoursed to sudiences of the working class upon the progress of thirty years, with such freshness of spirit as awoke energetic hopes of the progress for the thirty years that were to follow. The next day he opened a park with words from the heart about the modern sense of the beauties of nature. The Greeks, he said, however much beauty they might have discerned in nature, had no sympathy with the delight in detached natural objects a tree, or a stream, or a hill—which was so often part of the common life of the poorest Englishman. Even a century or less ago, communion with nature, would have sounded an affected and unnatural phrase. Now it was a sensible part of the life of the working classes. Then came moralising, of the life of the working classes. Then came moralising, of the life of the working classes. Then came moralising, of the life of the working classes. Then came moralising, of the life of the working classes. Then came moralising, of the life of the working classes. Then came moralising, at that date less trite than it has since become, about the

.698I

BOOK

the first step should be. cast the changes which will follow; but it is easy to see what be ringing of it, and the world will echo England. I cannot forefliw his great event-to-morrow all England will mind to face, far less to anticipate, fresh contingencies. the burden thereof, and there is no surplus stock of energy in the was plain that this would come; but sufficient unto the day is you will deeply feel this loss; as for myself I am stunned. It all he had said and done for Italy, all so bound you to him that heart, your long and close friendship with him, and your sense of more sincerely mourn Lord Palmerston than you. Your warm most towering antlers in all the forest. We man in England will day together. The first, very naturally full of plans, the second To Mrs. Aladstone, Oct. 20.—I received two letters from you to-

And we hear nothing of the Queen's moving; she is getting instead of leaving it to kick its heels in Downing Street for a day. telegraphed to me to go up, or sent a letter hither by a messenger heard from the Queen, he would (so I reason) either have from Lord Russell had come to Downing Street. Now had he fear she has done neither. Willy telegraphs to me that a letter come to London. 2. She should have sent for Lord Rusgell. I trouble. I think two things are clear. I. The Queen should have shakes me down to the foundation, by the reason of coming anticipation (even) of Lord Palmerston's death. This great event written when those plans had been blown into the air by the

into a groove, out of which some one ought to draw her.

I ought to go, and shall do so accordingly to-day. able to me. Though he does not summon me to London, I think means to ask George Grey to lead, which would be very acceptwe come to estimates for the year. I hope from his letter that he struck a stroke for economy which will diminish difficulty when as a principal member of the administration.' I think that I have as first lord, wishes me to co-operate in the capacity I now fill say he has been commissioned to carry on the present government this morning. Lord Russell, pleased with my letter, writes to Oct. 21.—As far as political matters are concerned, I am happier

Oct. 22.—I came up last night and very glad I am of it. I that this is again more vexation and uncertainty for you.

The final word was an admonition against, political lethargy. For the first time, I think, he put into the forefront the tormenting question that was to haunt him to the end. They could not look at Ireland, he told them, and say that the state of feeling there was for the honour and the advantage of the united kingdom.

Oct. 14, '64.—So ended in peace an exhausting, flattering, I hope not intoxicating circuit. God knows I have not courted them. I pray I may turn them to account for good. It is, however, impossible not to love the people from whom such manifestations come, as meet me in every quarter. . . . Somewhat haunted by dreams of halls, and lines of people, and great assemblies.

tion when the parting is accomplished.' 'Gladstone, I think,' reluctance to part company with them, become an aggravalanoiterti teomla bas emertxe ym mort gaiob bettimo ro similar circumstances, and the very things that I have done no fault to find with them for that. It is the common lot in those who complain of it. As to their misliking me, I have change of system since the corn law and the Six Acts, than and is answering; that none have profited more by this by force, fraud, or good will; that the latter has been tried got to govern millions of hard hands; that it must be done beings of a different order. Please to recollect that we have used to say, speaking of his peer colleagues, that they were odium that his new line of policy was raising. Mr. Hadstone Lyttelton, his brother-in-law, informed him of the alarm and their first great hero was an orator of such a school. Lord modern British democracy that the man whom they made This was singularly true, and what an eulogy it was for our expressed, as if they were meant for the House of Commons. sermons of a high order, as skilfully composed, as accurately sympathies. His speeches, men said, were in fact lay stand his arguments, and feel his appeal to their moral high compliment of assuming that they could both underhardly meant to praise him, that he paid his hearers the It was observed of this Lancashire tour, by critics who firm these engagements? freedom. I am anxious to know whether I may now finally conuniversity business, and at Glasgow on the lat, to receive the week; at Edinburgh on the 2nd and 3rd in connection with the tran entire particular engagements of a public nature next I \dots It weighs very seriously on my mind, and I beg you to consider it. Commons cares, represented by heads in the House of Lords. Commons, and nearly all the offices about which the House of with the strain and stress of administration in the House of is what I venture to call the lop-sided condition of the government, which I named to you in the way of my accepting your proposal, public revenue under its several heads. . . . The third difficulty ments in Scotland, and write to-day to say so. Saturday, for a good fortnight. I can therefore keep my engage-Lord Russell agrees that cabinets should be postponed after To Mrs. Aladstone, Oct. 23.—I think I see my way a little now.

.6981 BOOK

Lord Palmerston is to be buried in the Abbey on Friday;

all the important offices in the Lords. Lords he may get on. The greatest difficulty is having almost to-morrow. His physical strength is low, but I suppose in the ... Lord Russell offers me the lead—I must probably settle it Ashley to-day. They give a good account of Lady Palmerston. the family are pleased. I saw W. Cowper as well as Evelyn between the two Houses. what, can be done to improve the structure of the government as must come to that. The main question is whether anything, and him. I have not yet accepted the lead formally, but I suppose it before Friday. Sir R. Peel will probably have a peerage offered divers proposals on foot, but I think little will be finally settled to yourself, and return in their bundle forthwith. I send you a batch of eight letters, which please keep carefully the 9th. You will therefore see my programme as it now stands. Nov. 14th, but I must be here for the Lord Mayor's dinner on Oct. 24.—Lord Russell now proposes to adjourn the cabinets till but we shall try to rein it in. There seems to be very little venom position virtually fixed. I am afraid of Lord Russell's rapidity, Oct. 25.—Nothing more has yet been done. I consider my

the established church. Another regretted, after one of these gatherings, that they never got to the core of the subject, and that there run through the prayer-book from beginning to end ideas that are not accepted by numbers who subscribe, and which cannot all be admitted by any one.

The kind of intercourse that you have kindly permitted with -: (8781 , čl lirdA) etsb tneserq able point, in a letter to him some fourteen years after our was indeed remarkable. Dr. Allon expressed it, with admirdeepened by meditations long, strenuous, and systematic, tradition, strengthened by high political responsibility, and generous mind, enriched by historic knowledge and Intercourse of the nonconformist leaders with this powerful tion stone of one of their chapels. The broad result of such even sounded him on one occasion about laying the foundapathies and charities of their common profession, They differences about church government, the more vital symthat it was possible for all good men to hold, amid their pendents, and Spurgeon, the baptist, on the broad ground and political leader by men like Dale and Allon, the inde-Dr. Pusey and his school, he was gradually welcomed as ally leaven of modern criticism. Always the devoted friend of left, who sought reunion on the basis of puritanism with a tradition either of the Orthodox church or the Latin, and the looked towards the formularies, system, discipline, and onistic schools of religious comprehension—the right, who other, so now he was the common hope of the two antag. hope of ultra-elericals on one hand and ultra-liberals on the position. Just as at Oxford he had in 1847 been the common All this once more brought Mr. Gladstone into a curious nonconformists, has helped more consciously to identify them with nonconformists, has helped more consciously to identify them with movements of national life, and to diminish the stern feeling of almost defiant witness-bearing that was strong a generation or two ago. It is something gained if ecclesiastical and political differences can be debated within a common circle of social confidence and identity. . . Their confidence in you has made them amenable to your lead in respect of methods and movements needing the guidance of political insight and experience.

'9981 .Ψ BOOK

offence to powerful bodies, who can make their resentment But it is his attacks on classes that have given persons. Palmerston replied; 'a public man is right in attacking speeches. It is not personalities that we complained of, Bright, how he had avoided personalities in his recent lo exoqa məbdoO, e381 ni tənidas zid niol ot nəbdoO bətivni When Palmerston government and the bill together.' with respect to the franchise, his name would sink the that in the present critical state of feeling on your own side he is permanently proscribed, I am under the impression of such undoubted integrity. Without feeling, however, that thing odious in fighting shy of a man, so powerful in talent, of a studious moderation about reform. And there is someremark about Bright, he has for many years held language (Dec. 11) Mr. Gladstone writes—'With reference to your have been said about Mr. Bright, for in a note to Lord Russell haps in no case competent to judge it. 1 Something seems to did not know his book on foreign exchanges, and were perasked what he had done to merit promotion so striking, ment three years, was the subject of remark. People who The inclusion of Mr. Goschen, who had only been in parliadeclaration against any lowering of the borough franchise.

new capacity. If mistrust of self be a qualification, God down to choose the Speaker, and I had to throw off in my almost a surprise. 'At two' he says (Feb. 1, 1866), 'we went Mr. Gladstone's first few weeks as leader of the House were years in parliament, and having written to tell Mr. Gladstone so, the

I found that Murray had been five Peninsula.' On returning to London, (1828); he had been with him in the swered, 'to Sir George Murray? Wellington put him into his cabinet man;, What do you say, he an-wise out again after the shortest recorded spell of cabinet life.) 'I don't believe any such thing, said Mr. Gladstone. 'Well, who is your Mr. Gladstone.

parliamentary life. (They were likecabinet after the shortest spell of three men who had been put into idle triviality that Mr. Pitt, Mr. Goschen, and a third person, were the

1 Once at Hawarden I dropped the card—'Then try Lord Henry Petty.' Here, as far as I make out, he was next day I received a summary post-the same opportunity for previous proved narrow enough. Argyll was put there is '52-3, but there is not grounds that seemed broad, Knatchbull, but that was on political could not help himself. vious official training. Lord Derby into the cabinet without a preminister (Jan. 6, 1866) 'to put men right.

'It is very unusual, I think,'
Mr. Gladstone wrote to the prime training in the case of peers."

² Life of Cobden, ii. p. 232.

the more because I have lately been reading Dr. Manning's of letter to Dr. Pusey; and, though Dr. Manning is far more exage. gerated in his religion than Dr. Mewman, and seems to me almost to caricature it, yet I think even he has by no means that limited view of the mercies of God.

I have no mental difficulty in reconciling a belief in the Church, and what may be called the high Christian doctrine, with that comforting persuasion that those who do not receive the greatest blessings (and each man must believe his religion to be greatest, are notwithstanding the partakers, each in his measure, of other gifts, and will be treated according to their use of them. I admit there are schools of Christians who think otherwise. I was myself brought up to think otherwise, and to believe that salvation depended absolutely upon the reception of a particular and a very narrow creed. But long, long have I cast those weeds behind me. Unbelief may in given conditions be a moral offence; and only as such, only like other disobedience, and on like principles, can it be punishable.

those weeds behind me.' say, as Mr. Gladstone here said, 'Long, long, have I cast Marked is the day for a man when he can truly it means the charity that is greater than even faith and against mechanic forms, official conventions, social force; means frank respect for freedom of indwelling conscience vesture of many colours, and speaks in strange tongues; it ledgment that she dwells in diverse mansions, and wears reverence for all the possibilities of Truth; it means acknowthe hearts of a minority as of a majority. Tolerance means conscience. It is a lesson often needed quite as much in far more than the abandonment of civil usurpations over tolerance. Here we are on the foundations. Tolerance is this 'comforting persuasion,' this last word of benignity and to tnemnists ent noitizars last ent as brager lliw erom youth to the 'high Christian doctrine' of his after life. Still history is the change from the 'very narrow creed' of his To not a few the decisive change in Mr. Gladstone's mental productive productions of the

CHAPTER X

MATTERS ECCLESIASTICAL

(8981-4981)

ώ γης δχημα κάπί γης έχων έδραν, Βοτις ποτ' εί σύ, δυστόπαστος είδέν δατις ποτ' εξ αύ, δυατόπαστος είδέναι, Σεύς, εζτ' άνάγκη φύσεος είτε νούς βροτών, βαίνων κελεύθου κατά δίκην τα θνήτ' άγεις.

Eve., Troades, 884.

O thou, upholder of the earth, who upon earth hast an abiding place, whosoever thou art, inscrutable, thou Zeus, whether thou be necessity of nature, or intelligence of mortal men, on thee I call; for, treading a noiseless path, in righteoneness dost thou direct all human things.

power and striving is the note of a statesman fit for modern of the supreme importance of the line between temporal governors have by now found out. Yet to have a vivid sense a free church in a free state, as most countries and their to alumoi s'ruova Garplying Cavour's formula of church, with his sovereign principle of freedom. Many are whether temporal order in the state or spiritual order in the and tentatively. In both alike he strove to unite order, institution. In church and state alike he moved cautiously on that too he set its value, but the living spirit within the for and sought after most, was not their mechanism, though of corporate life; but what he thought of most and cared and state alike he prized institutions and the great organs In church temper in respect of them was much the same. slackened.. Wide as the two spheres stood apart, his of interest in affairs of the church never for an instant and strain in affairs of state, Mr. Gladstone's intensity THE reader will have surmised that amidst all the press

864-68. V. BOOK

hension, his own leanings and desires being in favour of a large and not a moderate expenditure. . .

Figures, details, points, were varied, but the issue was in essence the same, and the end was much the same. Lord Palmerston took his stand on the demands of public opinion. He insisted (Oct. 19) that anybody who looked carefully at the signs of the times must see that there were at present two strong feelings in the national mind—the one a disinclination to organic changes in our representative system, the other a steady determination that the country should be placed and kept in an efficient condition of defence. He pointed to the dead indifference of the workmen themselves to their own enfranchisement as evidence of the one, and to the volunteer movement as evidence of the one, and to the volunteer movement as evidence of the one, and to the volunteer movement as evidence of the other.

Mr. Gladstone rejoined that it was Lord Palmerston's personal popularity, and not the conviction or desire of the nation, that kept up estimates. Palmerston retorted that this was to mistake cause and effect. 'If I have in any degree been fortunate enough to have obtained some share of the goodwill and confidence of my fellow-countrymen, it has been because I have rightly understood the feelings and opinion of the nation. . . You may depend upon it that any degree of popularity that is worth having can be obtained only by such means, and of that popularity I sincerely wish you the most ample share. The strain was severe:—

Oct. I, 1864.—I still feel much mental lassitude, and not only shrink from public business, but from hard books. It is uphill work. Oct. 21.—A pamphlet letter from Lord Palmerston about defence holds out a dark prospect. Oct. 22.—Wrote, late in the day my reply to Lord Palmerston in a rather decisive tone, for I teel conscious of right and of necessity.

To Mrs. Gladstone.

Nov. 9,—After more than a fortnight's delay, I received yesterday evening the enclosed very unfavourable letter from Lord Palmerston. I send with it the draft of my reply. Please to return them to-morrow by Willy—for they ought not to be modern liberty tend to favour and almost require, but we soothe claim, we not only do an act which the understood principles of cipline to that end. By judiciously waiving an undoubted legal we stimulate every kind of interference with her belief and disto demand that she should be adapted to their use in return, and worship of the church, we practically invest them with a title faith for gold. . . . In demanding the money of dissenters for the .89-4981 into a time when the great danger of the church is the sale of her doned with a view to the same end. . . . Now we have lived its rulers. and order, which seems to belong particularly to our country and emit wen ent thiw terq ent gnilionoper to eseniend that to traq ei tl laboured to any purpose at all it has been in great part for this. into use as a ground of action. I am convinced that if I have though is the principle of the principle I have described to my lot to take a share larger than that of many around me, higher and deeper than the region of mere opinion. It has fallen to be free. What I have now been dwelling upon is a matter rence will be a lively pleasure to me. But above all I wish you opinions in politics as a model for your own. Your free concurour religion. . . . I am in no way anxious that you should take my the dearest interests not only of my public life, but as I believe of it quietly but firmly rooted in your mind. It is connected with and religious interest when they arise. I am very anxious to see first importance for dealing with the mixed questions of temporal prematurely of anything established; but it supplies a rule of the one not requiring precipitate or violent action, or the disturbance cation, broader far than the mere question of church rates. It is in any sense to care for her. This is a principle of broad appliunhappily large portion of the community who have almost ceased sternal privileges grate upon the feelings and interests of that re deal tenderly and gently with all the points at which her for her to discharge her high office as stewardess of divine truth, eldizzog ti znizam to eqod ylno edt tadt besnivnos ma I . . . case and claim of the church to be respected as a religious body. ruffled minds and tempers, and what is more, we strengthen the

BOOK

been done towards securing the action of the church as a He then goes on to cite as cases where something had the Prince, who acceded with glee, but I don't know what will come of it. He talked with good sense has night about Greece, Lonian Islands, and Canada; and I was his partner at whist. We dinner, but only for a quarter of an hour or so. She talked about Aspan and Lord Palmerston, but there was not time to get into swing, and nothing said of nearer matters.

The sort of success that awaited his stremuous endeavour has been already indicated.

Π

to be one of the two or three greatest legislative acts of less. It was the first tolerably definite warning of what was Phillimore—and this too meant disestablishment and nothing view, Mr. Gladstone wrote a short but pregnant letter to known to mean disestablishment and nothing less. In that judged by its verbal contents only. Dillwyn's motion was more indisputable, but a parliamentary resolution is not to be It is hard to imagine two propositions on the merits satisfactory, and called for the early attention of the governpresent position of the Irish church establishment was unfrom a radical below the gangway, to the effect that the advisers resolved that he should speak on a certain motion his constituency would undoubtedly be adverse. His question of the Irish church. The thing was delicate, for and March he worked with Phillimore and others upon the what was to be an important journey. All through February In the spring Mr. Gladstone made the first advance upon

To Robert Phillimore.

Feb. 13, 1865.—I would treat the Irish church, as a religious body, with the same respect and consideration as the church of England, and would apply to it the same liberal policy as regards its freedom of action. But I am not loyal to it as an establishment. It exists, and is virtually almost unchallenged as to its existence in that capacity; it may long (I cannot quite say long existence in that capacity; it may long (I cannot quite say long may it) outlive me; I will never be a party, knowingly, to what I may call frivolous acts of disturbance, nor to the premature

¹ Above, p. 686.

---: ทอไรณะเกลฐาง องไรออ์ที่อ

I do not gather from the papers that he watched it with the ROOK

1204-04

ho goes on to the gains that might be expected from their generous exaltation of the zeal and devotion of the clergy, secting out his view of the real need of the time. After a from a letter addressed by him to the bishop (Jan. I, 1854) own to oggestig a finite of hydone si ii otoll. Loildug obant spendence on the question of convocation has already been regarded her as plunged. Some of Mr. Gladstone's correchurch from the autreby in which one branch of her sons mover in proceedings that, as was hoped, were to resene the istice, long one of the most intimate of his friends, was chief judgment, was ever a cherished object. Bishop Wilberorganization of the church, especially after the Gorham characters only to notituitistic to haviver some shotshall) functions that had been suspended since 1717. To Mr. oriend, was permitted in 1852 to resume the active derude edt to gerele odt to enemalitag to Admessa eneiena zealous interest of some of his friends. Convocation, the

中的特别的政治的政治的政治的政治政治,并通过政治的政治 रक्ष है जनसम्बर्ध संबद्ध देशस्य १०००मामान्त्र हरा क्रम्यका गई हिमान जीवधर हिमानो हो। १ दिस्का tade jacabil cano bina propost passas Mo guiterlinear elider bur. in Ninna Placele exam and life pilgery well be exmembers, and gondan to an included a set gaileaiste ban guide regue not gelenande elitabilana tone, Alaskao patemitiyal ati e fesbivong gafesi and andt pad edi. It and facted out tenoused on we contemplated and conceed the bester? areas on hed northing and acids extrage to be every filese sizes and il fanbao or bereefour god militin baira to noitee may mit Id bortequit to becomerg of tolled in using such little ancimum smon univirial a mi nothebooka plikuj or praecesan el leifed mi gian amod global od to sense meneming bue excredible edt gå bonimotab of bluow orine olyim ce enoid oup done di noque egand tail He bue onitioob and of als. Hitle bue graubai abaalgad to man adgia out mand only abairym out gnoun nwoudan an bestal where he maintained, and she would not be as she now is, either every-bluow thy in the cow is, that the good light would everywould put forth a strength, not indeed equal to it, but at least to Pirat as to her pastoral work, her warfare against sin, she after the speech was made and begged to be allowed to see of him:—'I read your speech on the Irish church, which set in musing and forecasting. It was a real grapple with the inestion,'

III

Not many days after this speech Cobdon died. To his brother, Robertson, Mr. Gladstone wroto:—

April 5.—What a sad, sad loss is this death of Cobden. I feel in ministure the truth of what Bright well said yesterday—ever since I really came to know him, I have held him in high esteem and regard as well as admiration; but till he died I did not know how high it was. I do not know that I have ever seen in public life a character more truly simple, noble, and unselfish. His death will make an echo through the world, which in its entireness he has served so well.

April 7.—To Mr. Cobden's funeral at W. Lavington. Afterwards to his home, which I was anxions to know. Also I saw Mrs. Cobden. The day was lovely, the scenery most beautiful and soothing, the whole sad and impressive. Bright broke down at the grave. Cobden's name is great; it will be greater. (Diary.) A few months before this Mr. Gladstone had lost a friend more intimate. The death of the Duke of Newcastle, he says more intimate. The death of the Duke of Newcastle, he says more intimate. The death of the Duke of Newcastle, he says (Oct. 19, 1864), 'severs the very last of those contemporaries who were also my political friends. How it speaks to me "Be doing, and be done.",

To Mirs. Gladstone.

oct. 19.—Dr. Kingsley sent me a telegram to inform me of the sad event at Clumber; but it only arrived two hours before the papers, though the death happened last night. So that brave heart has at last ceased to beat. Certainly in him more than in any one I have known, was exhibited the character of our life as a dispensation of pain. This must ever be a mystery, for we cannot see the working-out of the purposes of God. Yet in his case I have always thought some glimpse of them seemed to be permitted. It is well to be permitted also to believe that he is now at rest for ever, and that the cloud is at length removed from his destiny.

BOOK

89-7981

had taken part in one of the two cases, he wrote:effectually unloose. To Bishop Hamilton of Salisbury, who and the principles assumed [in the judgment] would not theological obligations, which the mode of argument used to bind the understanding and conscience of man with any egangnal namud to rewoq edt ni zi ti eveiled ton ob I plete indifference between the Christian faith and the denial order to establish, as far as the court can establish it, a comhas but to be consistently and cautiously followed up, in London (April 26, 1864), 'that the spirit of this judgment 'It appears to me,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to the Bishop of the new critical, rationalistic, liberal, or latitudinarian school. that neither should those two powerful sections drive out the judgment in the case of Essays and Reviews determined nor the high anglican school should drive out the other, so that memorable case determined that neither the evangelical the Gorham judgment fourteen years before, and just as costs.' This carried further, or completed, the principle of epigram of the day as 'dismissing eternal punishment with delivered the decision in a tone described in the irreverent the court below (1864), and Lord Chancellor Westbury upon appeal was advised to reverse a hostile judgment in future punishment of the wicked. The Queen in council of the Bible, the other for impugning the eternity of the into the courts, one for easting doubt upon the inspiration immoral rationalistic conspiracy. Two of them were haled the faith they outwardly professed-seven authors of an sinister design. They were styled 'the Septem contra Christum'—six ministers of religion combining to assail in their character as illustrations of a system, or I should rather to pass. It seems to me that these judgments are most important know all the stages of the experience through which she has yet favourable or adverse to her true work and destination, unless we this or that wind of heaven, we cannot tell what it is, or whether she is making for. This or that deflection from her course, from The ship is at sea far from the shore she left, far from the shore transition state through which the Christian faith is passing. Feb. 8, 1864.—This new and grave occurrence appertains to a in the House against this change, but only bestowed upon of it a parting malediction. It strengthened the clerical vote, and as sympathy with discertablishment was thrust prominently forward against Mr. Chadstone, the new privilege cost him his seat. From the first day things looked ill, and when on the last day (July 18) the battle ended, he was one hundred and eighty votes behind Mr. Hardy.

July 16, '65.—Always in straits the Bible in church supplies my needs. To-day it was in the 1st lesson, Jer. i. 19, 'And they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee, for I am with thee, saith the Lord, to deliver thee.'

July 17.—Again came consolation to me in the Psalms—86:16; it did the same for me April 17, 1853. At night arrived the telegram announcing my defeat at Oxford as virtually accomplished. A dear dream is dispelled. God's will be done.

His valedictory address was both graceful and sincore:—
'After an arduous connection of eighteen years, I bid you respectfully farewell. My earnest purpose to serve you, my many faults and shortcomings, the incidents of the political relation between the university and myself, established in finally dissolved, I leave to the judgment of the future. It is one imperative duty, and one alone, which induces me to trouble you with these few parting words—the duty of expressing my profound and lasting gratitude for indulgence as generous, and for support as warm and enthusiastic in itself, and as honourable from the character and distinctions of those who have given it, as has in my belief ever been accorded by any constituency to any representative.'

He was no sooner assured of his repulse at Oxford, than

He was no sooner assured of his repulse at Oxford, than he started for the Lancashire constituency, where a nomination had been reserved for him.

July 18.—Went off at eleven . . . to the Free Trade Hall which was said to have 6000 people. They were in unbounded enthusiasm. I spoke for 14 hr., and when the meeting conenthaled went off to Liverpool. . . . Another meeting of 5000 cluded went off to Liverpool. . . .

1 Heathcote, 3236; Hardy, 1904; Gladstone, 1724.

.86.£881

interest dropped. the Vestiges of Greater in Undoubtedly uch to do, he though, with its popularity, g swiftly into oblivide. The mask of the ter a sudden and brief yet brilliant existence n told hin that he had bro, ught to life again an earnest, powerful, and original contribution. would have the consolation and the praises of having furthat to the process of its removal the author of the book examining disparagement' is only a passing distemper, and the old belief of man with a precipitate, shallow, and unthe orthodox by the hope that 'the present tendency to treat from the credentials of the messenger. Then he reassured we have a right to weigh the nature of the message, apart was built, and therefore as being shallow and uncritical, that book as resting on no evidence of the foundations on which it more hopeful construction.2 He told those who despised the assailants Mr. Gladstone interposed with a friendlier and and an intolerable offence.' Between these two sets of shadow over the whole civilized world, is a rank eyesore of actual Christianity, still casting its majestic light and eyes of those to whom the chequered but yet imposing fabric On the other hand, it constituted 'a grave offence in the treating of Christianity from the orthodox point of view. It used language that could not be consistently employed in ence of mankind. The book violently displeased both sides. condescension, but on the loyal allegiance and humble obedi-Deity, has formidable claims not merely on the intellectual ever it may be,' as was said by an old pagan poet of the there is something or other called the Gospel, which whatdescribed it, to bring home to the reader the impression that published in 1865. It was an attempt, so Mr. Gladstone pestowed upon the remarkable volume entitled Ecce Homo, (1844), had attracted anything like the amount of notice ne, been able to sead much at book intensely par ful. In have emulov ni betr nisga betnirq 'Aegr'. ,1868, and re;

[₹]\.1₽

BOOK

know all when this reaches you—is as follows. . . This of course says little as to the final issue. Ten o'clock. My majority is so far increases, the others diminish. But it is hard running. Eleven. My majority increases, the others diminish. Egerton is second. One of our men third. Twelve thousand four hundred have polled. My seat looks well.

I interrupt here to say you would have been pleased had you heard Willy, at a moment's notice, on Tuesday night, address five thousand people no one of whom had ever seen him; he was (forgive me) so modest, so manly, so ready, so judicious.

Since writing thus far everything has been overset in a chaos of conflicting reports. They will all be cleared up for you before this comes. I hope I am not in a fool's paradise. All I yet know is an apparently hard fight between Egerton and me for the head of the poll, but my seat tolerably secure. I have had such letters!

When the votes were counted Mr. Gladstone was third upon the poll, and so secured the seat, with two tory colleagues above him.

The spirit in which Mr. Gladstone took a defeat that was no mere electioneering accident, but the landmark of a great severance in his extraordinary career, is shown in his replies to multitudes of correspondents. On the side of his tenacious and affectionate attachment to Oxford, the wound was deep. On the other side, emancipation from fetters and from contests that he regarded as ungenerous, was a profound relief. But the relief touched him less than the sorrow.

Manning wrote:—

Hew men have been watching you more than I have in these last days; and I do not know that I could wish you any other result. But you have entered upon a new and larger field as Sir R. Peel did, to whose history yours has many points of likeness. You say truly that Oxford has failed to enlarge itself to the progress of the country. I hope this will make jeself to the progress of the facts of our age and state—and I believe it will. Only, as I said some months ago, I am anxious about you, lest you should entangle yourself with extremes.

¹ Egerton, 9171; Turner, 8806; Thompson (L.), 7703; Heywood (L.), Aladstone, 8786; Legh (C.), 8476; 7653.

*89-798

BOOK

should have been free and disengaged enough to turn with large and eager interest to such themes as these. This was indeed the freedom of judgment with which, in the most moving lines of the poem that he loved above all others, Virgil bidding farewell to Dante makes him crowned and witred master of himself—Perch' io te sopra te corono e i.ointim

ΛI

may follow from the exercise of judicial powers by synods he says to Miss Burdett Coutts, 'a great uneasiness at what able, indeed a wonderful spectacle.' I quite feel with you, them, I must own that they present a cheering, a remarka connection with the West Indies), to feel an interest in forty years back, when I first began (from my father's having 'Remembering what the churches in the colonies were some These perplexities did not dismay Mr. Gladstone. Romilly, master of the rolls, gave judgment in favour of of the fund, and therefore, of course, no bishop of such a see, say there is no see of Matal in the sense of the founders to Miss Burdett Coutts, 'founding ourselves on the judgment, since his wrongful deprivation. 'We,' said Mr. Gladstone Natal, and to pay him his salary, which they had withheld for the purpose of securing the income of the Bishop of calling upon them to set aside a sum of ten thousand pounds stone and the other trustees of the colonial bishoprics fund, J866 Bishop Colenso brought an action against Mr. Gladjurisdiction.2 This triumph of heresy was a heavy blow. In church in the colony, nor any ecclesiastical court with lawful were null and void, for in law there was no established and that the proceedings of the Bishop of Cape Town appealed to the Queen in council; and the Queen in council at Cape Town pronounced sentence of deprivation; Colenso criticisms upon the canonical Scriptures. His metropolitan Colenso, Bishop of Matal, published certain destructive Other strong gusts swept the high latitudes, when Dr.

Family and Personal, ii. pp. 481-7. ns- See also Anson's Law and Custom of ials the Constitution, ii. p. 407.

Purgatorio, xxvii. 126-42.

2 A concise account of this transaction is in Lord Selborne's Memorials misfortune, that you are not my successor at Oxford. My desire or impulse has for a good while, not unnaturally, been to escape from the Oxford seat; not because I grudged the anxieties of it, but because I found the load, added to other loads, too great. Could I have seen my way to this proceeding, had the advice or had the conduct of my friends warranted it, you being anticipated. I mean no disrespect to Mr. Hardy; but it being anticipated. I mean no disrespect to Mr. Hardy; but it different from the name that should have stood there, and that would have stood there, but for your personal feelings.

very painful. . . I have been instructed, perhaps been hardened, very painful. . . . I have been instructed, perhaps been hardened, very painful. . . . I have been instructed, perhaps been hardened, by a very wide experience in separation. No man has been blessed more out of proportion to his desorts than I have in friends: in achaption, in Xpyorophika; I but when with regard to those of old standing who were nearest to me, I ask where are they, I seem to see around me a little waste, that has been made by polities, by religion, and by death. All these modes of soverance are sharp. But the first of them is the least so, when the happy conviction remains that the fulfilment of duty, such as conscience points to it, is the object on both sides. And I have suffered so sorely by the far sharper partings in death, and in religion after a fashion which practically almost comes to death, that there is something of relief in turning to the lighter visitation. It is, however, a visitation still.

To the Bishop of Oxford, July 21.—. Do not join with others in praising me, because I am not angry, only sorry, and that deeply. For my revenge—which I do not desire, but would baffle if I could—all lies in that little word 'future' in my address, which I wrote with a consciousness that it is deeply charged with meaning, and that that which shall come will come. There have been two great deaths or transmigrations of spirit in my political existence. One very slow, the breaking of ties with my original party. The other, very short and sharp, of ties with my original party. The other, very short and sharp, the breaking of the tie with Oxford. There will probably be a third, and no more. . . . Again, my dear Bishop, I thank you for third, and no more. . . . Again, my dear Bishop, I thank you for

IX MALAYHO

SHANKIPP HYPARIOR

$. . }

TESTATORY - SELECTED CONT. Execute States 经收帐 美物 有一种种类 的现在分词美国的 确定的 龍 的复数面的 使无人致死 하나는데를 내가 한닭이에 그는 수와서 없다는 모수는 지나는 것은 많이 돈이 모모나를 갖고한 시고구한다. 그 나를 모드물은 g ratel fritzent aus major makk en of stjor at in en en enaturate prof uit indelt matel

かかはな かもか はいんは情報 grate from the base of the minimum of the contract of the cont manys as min to assert givera on a strain of the same if in the health think. Does not enough look out of the window. Thom too honest. He does not enough think of what other men thought him too obstinate and, it such a thing to possible, of all the harred of him.' Three years later Aberdeen still rise to the head in such a government as ours, even in spite servative measure passed in my recollection. . . . He must the aristocracy for his succession duty, the most truly conmuch the first man in the House of Commons; detested by sense of the word bibood; of the greatest power; very १८०५विम् व्यामा, १८५८ व्यापया मध्य १० वृत्तर माध्यस्य) वर्मार व्याप्त oils sno-ll. "Inoinique to constabile rot comewolla on others . मध्य प्रमार १७०० वर्ष १५ वर्ष १८० १८ ११ वर्ष प्रवास १९०६ १ वर्ष प्रमाण वर्ष हो है । real estable of trois ones to gaineser transch ze equiteq that mid beaution and and make that bails off. Istochab ending annot not envitedifically record once had proteball such that an oracite Hill qualify that applies to expecution ment be entired differ the course to the destine in their had undered but no droth essentiatived and or regreat क्षांग्य व्यान ब्ह्वांद्र भव कि भगका उत्तात्रक ए ह्यू क्यूब्वा देशक्यल उठ उत्पृत्य modelenguis des luists entre veerst est princelles ell uit distrement langi, a dealergia on la Ladibarian el Afenedede renn el - tories upon all manner of change.1 Gladstone, as the condensed commination service of the three extracts from his letters:many possibilities, and his action upon it is set out in two or duties as Newcastle trustec. For him the event opened news found Mr. Gladstone at Clumber, in performance of his On October 18, the prime minister died at Brocket. The

Mount

be in some degree a new commencement. ment now to be formed cannot be wholly a continuation, it must pledged probably to no one, certainly not to me. But any governyou will be sent for. Your hands will be entirely free-you are perience, services, and renown, do not leave reason for doubt that it will be. Your former place as her minister, your powers, ex-Queen must take the first step, but I cannot feel uncertain what the sense of having communicated as to what should follow. The decease. None of us, I suppose, were prepared for this event, in a'snotsaming Lord to aven milling appropriate of Lord Palmerston's To Lord Russell. Clumber, Oct. 18, 1865.—I have received to-

I trust, after what I have said above, hardly be hurtful. venient to you at a juncture when time is precious, while it can, perhaps a little unusual, of saying so, because it may be conbanner, in the exact capacity I now fill, and I adopt the step, a half years, I am quite willing to take my chance under your politics, after having known your course in cabinet for eight and greatly appertains to my department. On the general field of think is the moment to say thus much in subject matter which favourable circumstances which we appear to enjoy. naval establishments and in the charges for them, under the credit to the principle of progressive reduction in our military and the other hand, I am bound by conviction even more than by more gently and less fretfully. I am most willing to retire. On feel that other men would have either escaped, or have conducted I am sore with conflicts about the public expenditure, which I

1 See Saturday Review, July 29; First line of Manzoni's ode on the Spectator, June 24, etc.
2 Ei fu! siccome immobile, etc. To Mr Panizzi, Oct 18.—Ei fu l'2 Death has indeed laid low the

g D

.8981

BOOK

1868), 'is a character, for want of judgment, and every addition to that is an impediment.' And indeed it is true in politics that it often takes more time to get rid of a spurious character, than to acquire the real one. According to a letter from Lord Granville to Mr. Gladstone (Feb. 11,

Lowe described as perfectly unjust and unfounded the criticisms which had been made of your leadership. You had always been courteous and conciliatory with the whole House and with individual members, including himself. He had seen Palmerston do and say more offensive things every week, than you have during the whole session.

Still people went on anying that he had yet to gain the same hold over his party in parliament that he had over the party in the nation; he had studied every branch of government except the House of Commons; he confounded the functions of leader with those of dictator; he took counsel with one or two individuals instead of conferring with the party; he proclaimed as edicts what he ought to have submitted as proposals; he lacked 'the little civilities and hypocrisies' of political society. Such was the common cant of the moment. He had at least one friend who dealt faithfully with him:—

T. D. Acland to Mr. Gladstone.

Jan. 24, 1868.—Now I am going to take a great liberty with you. I can hardly help myself. I have heard a lot of grumbling lately about you, and have several times asked myself whether it would be tank to teaze you by repeating it. Well, what is pressed on me is, that at the present time when every one is full are longing for cohesion, there is an impression that you are absorbed in questions about Homer and Greek words, about Ecce pulse of followers. One man personally complained that when you sought his opinion, you spent the whole interview in impressing sought his opinion, you spent the whole interview in impressing your own view on him, and hardly heard anything he might have to say. It is with a painful feeling and (were it not for your to say. It is with a painful feeling and (were it not for your found that Lord Palmerston's funeral was almost to be private, not because the family wished it, but because nothing had been proposed to them. I at once sent — down to Richmond and Pembroke Lodge with a letter, and the result is that Evelyn Ashley has been written to by Lord Russell and authorised to telegraph now very late, and all the preparations must have been made at Romsey. But in such a matter especially, better late than never.

You will have been amused to see that on Friday the Times actually put me up for prime minister, and yesterday knocked me down again! There is a rumour that it was the old story, Delane out of town. I was surprised at the first article, not at the second. All, I am sorry to say, seem to take for granted that I am to lead the House of Commons. But this is not so simple a matter. First, it must be offered to Sir George Grey. If he reluses, then secondly, I do not think I can get on without reluses, then secondly, I do not think I can get on without actually put me up for prime minister, and yesterday knocked me down again! There is a rumour that it was the old story, Delane out of town. I was surprised at the first article, not at the second. All, I am sorry to say, seem to take for granted that I am to lead the House of Commons. But this is not so simple a matter. First, it must be offered to Sir George Grey. If he refuses, then secondly, I do not think I can get on without a different arrangement of treasury and chancellor of exchequer business, which will not be easy. But the worst of exforduct business, which will not be easy. But the worst of all is the distribution of offices as between the two Houses. It has long been felt that the House of Commons was too weak and the long been felt that the House of Commons was too weak and the sud now the premiership is to be carried over, unavoidably. No such thing has ever been known as an administration with the first lord, foreign secretary, secretary for war, and the first lord first lord, foreign secretary, secretary for war, and the first lord of the admiralty, in the House of Lords. This is really a stiff of the admiralty, in the House of Lords. This is really a stiff of the admiralty, in the House of Lords. This is really a stiff of the admiralty, in the House of Lords.

To Lord Russell. Carlton House Terrace, Oct. 23.—You having thought fit to propose that I should lead the House of Commons, I shought fit to propose that I should lead the House of Crey, who was in constructive possession of that office, and under whom I should have served with perfect satisfaction, could not be induced to accept the duty. Of this your letter seemed to contain sufficient proof. Next, I felt it to be necessary that some arrangement should be made for relieving me of a considerable and singularly disabling class of business, consisting of the cases of real or supposed grievance, at all times arising in connection with the collection of the ance, at all times arising in connection with the collection of the work is the chief refreshment to my mind. It is true that litera-BOOK trust entirely to your indulgence. rather combative. It would have been much less so but that I overpowering subject . . . The aspect of this letter is, I think, alone would be enough. The last is in my mind the imperious and and Ireland each in many branches will compete; any of these us so much business that I fear a jumble. Reform, Education, seeking them must of necessity be limited. . . . We have before open to all members of parliament who seek me, while my in endeavouring to follow other and better men, is to be thoroughly sesnisud ym that si bootstaan ban besoqque eynyl ennt I thaw , personal matters which you name, I will do the best I can. But cannot yield; nor can I say more than that, with regard to the This conviction I to the immense detriment of the country. infinity of detail, is what now principally dwarfs our public men, with the belief that grinding down the mental powers by an plague of quantity, and are not as deeply impressed as I am Perhaps my critics have not been troubled as I have with this not be increased without its quality being yet further deteriorated. impressed with the belief that the quantity of my public work canburgh in 1865. But I am sincerely, though it may be erroneously, literary work, if I except the preparation of an address for Edinnine last vacations this one only has in part been given to any reading up and preparing materials for the session. And of my doubtedly it may be said that the vacation should be given to knowingly allow it to cause neglect of public business. Unture is very attractive and indeed seductive to me, but I do not

¹ First lord, Earl Russell; foreign for war, Earl de Grey; first lord of secretary, Lord Clarendon; secretary the admiralty, Duke of Somerset.

.ę681

'a great centré of intellect and criticism,' where he would be and earnestly wishes him to belong to the Athenaum club, the tea-room and have afternoon chats with his adherents; temptations.' He still insists that a leader should drop into great power for one who has such a copia verborum, with its faithful exactness in conveying the result agreed on, truly a such clear apprehension of the points in council, and such Grey I am thinking of) to have the great quality of leadership: are held by some of the best men (that dear, noble George complaints, Acland says: -- On the other hand I know you In a second letter, after mentioning again some of these in the atmosphere. I wish Sir G. Grey were here. The Queen's keeping so long at Balmoral is a sad mistake.

He received, as was inevitable, plenty of letters from admirers regretting that he had not gone up higher. His answer was, of course, uniform. 'It was,' he told them,' my own impartial and firm opinion that Lord Russell was the proper person to succeed Lord Palmerston. However flattered I may be, therefore, to hear of an opinion such as you report and express, I have felt it my duty to cooperate to the best of my power in such arrangements as might enable the government to be carried on by the present ministers, with Lord Russell at their head.'

caution, and at Glasgon de van murine and exultant. The point or raise to and exultant premier was made at Glasgon, and a shem saw reminer ance as leader of the House of Secretarians or baffle the triumph of the energy indiscretion, no colleague was compagning and indiscretion. and should the leader himself offer at should the only powerful auxiliary on whom is seen affection England.1 It was pointed out that Romers and 1. Lingland attempt to lead the Commons and prove artempt some trembling to see what will come a smildment smoz knowledge of men and speaks rashly. Are I are in an in a speak sashly. sometimes and statistic bas district sometimes Dean Church; 'he is very great and very noble. In is is is is loved as much as, or more than, he is loved is is is is The heart of all Israel is towards him, wrote his good edit. 'great misgivings as to Gladstone's tact and jurismit, Another correspondent, of special experience, confessed to will not perceive the difference between leading and driving. lead of the House; but you will see, with all his talents, he right on the score of health, to give him [Gladstone] the Grey, one important friend wrote (Oct. 30)--. I think you are On the other hand, doubts were abundant. To Sir George

The changes in sources and The changes in some sample so wo. I have a source so we will be so we wil ecclesiastical system into something like order; he, perhaps, alone He of all men alive could most easily reduce our anarchical insurance offices, and state annuity funds for the very poor. social anomalies, as he showed by creating state banks, state does not nesitate to apply the full power of the state to ameliorate alarmed at risking the treasury as his reductions have proved; suffrage, as he indicated ni his betated specell; he is not courage to propose and maintain them. He is not afraid of the Mr. Gladstone has more than the idea, he has plans, and the under it. Most ministers have that idea in their heads, but constitution and the condition of the millions who have to live affairs, to a steady determination to improve, if possible, both the speeches pairity in the internation of a new activity in all internal sid IIA gnorte erom bas etindeb erom rat si srisfia lanretai called 'a spirited foreign policy,' . . The expectation as to disposition of the public mind: a weariness of the line of action speeches, and it indicates a very noteworthy change in the false, but it exists; it is justified in part by Mr. Gladstone's recent form of action. . . That impression may be true or it may be Europe unless he intended his protests to be followed by some from very haughtiness of temperanient protest in the face of interfere with the project for cutting an Eider Canal, would not of Turkish evay were a moral law, would not trouble himself to Gladstone, for example, certainly would not support the Turk as reference to the mode in which it has acted heretofore. act as its interests or duties or dignity may require, without in the great chain of English traditions, and enable the nation to temporary policy of abstention which is needed to make a breach not develop themselves as they can. He is sure to initiate that the Turk or obey him, to everybody whether they shall or shall not, to the Christians of Servia whether they shall rebel against concerned to dictate to Germany whether she shall be united or the continental system, interested in petty matters of boundary, the notion that we are a continental people, bound to maintain spandon those traditional ideas to which we have adhered so long: fact altogether independent of her action. But he is sure to too zealous for economy, too certain of the status of England as a Mr. Gladstone, say his admirers, may be too much afraid of war, in the Abbey's delicate and difficult duty' (Feb. 22). 'It He found the speech for a monument to Lord Palmerston an the House of Commons. adirable manner in which he has commenced his leadership fication at the accounts she hears from all sides of the conclude without expressing to Mr. Gladstone her graticame from Windsor. On Feb. 19:-- The Queen cannot that account.' Meanwhile, words of friendly encouragement some of his colleagues, seem to like him none the better on temper, prosperity and success, but his rank and file and observer, 'Gladstone has led the House with great good were few who understood him. So far, said a conservative said, admired and respected him, some loved him, but there deference. Some onlookers still doubted. Everybody, they mild and conciliatory, they found him even tiresome in his knows I have it.' All opened excellently. Not only was he

He found the speech for a monument to Lord Palmerston in the Abbey's delicate and difficult duty' (Feb. 22). 'It would have worn me down beforehand had I not been able to exclude it from my thoughts till the last, and then I could grace and truth. He commemorated Palmerston's share in the extension of freedom in Europe, and especially in Italy. Where, he said, Palmerston's name might claim a place on a level with her most distinguished patriots. Nor had his inferest ever failed in the rescue of the 'unhappy African race, whose history is for the most part written only in blood and tenst. He applanded his genial temper, his incomparable tast and ingenuity, his pluck in debate, his incomparable stand-up fight, his inclination to avoid whatever tended to exasperate, his incapacity of sustained anger.

Life of Sir Charles Murray, p. 300.

I saked if he did not think sometimes his temper carried between a great cart horse, and the highest bred most sensitive horse you can imagine, and then, under lashing of a whip, think of the difference between them." After a stay with Mr. Gladstone in a country house, Jowett, the master of Balliol, said of him, 'It is the first time that any one of such great simplicity has been in so exalted a station.'

In one of his Lancashire speeches, Mr. Gladstone described in interesting language how he stood:—

to advance in the work of improving the laws, and to labour swerved nor wavered, but have striven to the best of my ability interests of the country, from that time onward I have never direct, immediate, and responsible contact with the commercial Peel thought fit to place me in a position that brought me into I may presume to say that since the year 1841, when Sir Robert result has been brought about, by liberal legislation. Therefore, of the country-honesty compels me to admit that this happy that the people value the country and the laws and institutions are in the best and broadest sense conservative—that is to say, told, as we are now truly told, that all the feelings of the country what is generally known as liberal legislation. And if we are observed the effect that has been produced upon the country by refused to acknowledge and accept the signs of the times. in a policy of trust, and folly in a policy of mistrust. I have not brought with it its lessons. I have learnt that there is wisdom or frequented the streets of Liverpool. But experience has I was when, as a boy, I wandered among the sandhills of Seaforth, if possible, more attached to the institutions of my country than conservative objects and desires with which I entered life. I am, I have never swerved from what I conceive to be those truly earnestly and fearlessly for the advantage of the people.2

Five-and-twenty years later, when his course was almost run, and the achievements of the long laborious day were

I have been a learner all my life, and I am a learner still; but

1 Life of Jowett, i. 406.

710

.8881

BOOK

times. 'The whole of my public life,' he wrote to the Bishop of Oxford in 1863, 'with respect to matters ecclesiastical, for the last twenty years and more, has been a continuing effort, though a very weak one, to extricate the church in some degree from entangled relations without shock or violence.'

The general temper of his churchmanship on its political side during these years is admirably described in a letter to his eldest son, and some extracts from it furnish a key to his most characteristic frame of mind, in attempting to guide the movements of his time:—

To W. H. Gladstons.

general maxim which is applicable to political questions. form the groundwork of a conclusion, but only in illustration of a with the dissenting bodies. . . . I say all this, however, not to toiltnoo gnittori ni ren seonly ti erenw seen lla ni bedeiloda etar political, for the church of England to have the law of church . . . I believe it would be a wise concession, upon grounds merely (and who really think) themselves 'friends of the church' to make. than two hundred years, it has been the fashion of men who call erom rot doing missession to bair oft and statisfied for more bar estreme pressure; and extreme pressure; and return. The kind of concession which is really mischievous is way off; for then concession begets gratitude, and often brings a de this kind is approaching, to anticipate it while it is yet a good will be wrested from us. And it is very wise, when a necessity sary in politics to make surrenders of what, if not surrendered, destruction. . . . Mow, in the first place, it is sometimes neceslead to concession; and that the end of the series would be its privileges and possessions of the church; that concession would very natural one, that it was matter of duty to defend all the April 16, 1865.—You appeared to speak with the supposition, a

But next, this surely is a political question. Were we asked to surrender an article of the creed in order to save the rest, or to consent to the abolition of the episcopal order, these things touch the faith of Christians and the life of the church, and cannot in any measure become the subject of compromise. But the external possessions of the church were given it for the more effectual promotion of its work, and may be lessened or abanteflectual promotion of its work, and may be lessened or aban-

CHAPTER XII

LETTERS

(8981—6981)

THERE is no saying shocks me so much as that which I hear very often; that a man does not know how to pass his time. 'Twould have been but ill spoken by Methusalem, in the nine hundred sixtyninth year of his life; so far it is from us, who have not time enough to attain to the utmost perfection of any part of any science, to have cause to complain that we are forced to be idle for want of work,—Cowley.

As I said in our opening pages, Mr. Gladstone's letters are mostly concerned with points of business.

They were not

with him a medium for conveying the slighter incidents, fugitive moods, fleeting thoughts, of life. Perhaps of these fugitive moods he may have had too few. To me, says Crassus in Cicero, the man hardly seems to be free, who does not sometimes do nothing.\(^1\) In table-talk he could be as disengaged, as marked in ease and charm, as any one; he was as willing as any one to accept topics as they came, which is the first of all conditions for good conversation. When alone in his temple of peace it was not his practice to take alone in the same sauntering and devious humour. With him the pen was no instrument of diversion. His correspondence has an object, and a letter with an object is not of a piece with the effusions of Madame de Sévigné, Cowper, of a piece with the effusions of Madame de Sévigné, Cowper, surface, people will read as long as they read anything. We have to remember a very intelligible fact mentioned religious body, Canada, where clergy and people now appointed their own bishop; a recent judgment of the privy council leading to widespread emancipation of the to convocation; the revival of convocation; the licence to convocation to alter the thirty-sixth canon; the bestowal of self-government on Oxford. 'In these measures, he says, of self-government on Oxford. 'In these measures, he says, the rigid rule of others in regard to the temporal prerogatives, real or supposed, of the church, I should at once have lost all power to promote them.'

Scott, FitzGerald, and other men and women whose letters of genial satire and casual play and hints of depth below the

1859-688

BOOK

'As to disruption,' he wrote in these days, 'that is the old cry by means of which in all times the temporal interests of the English church have been upheld in preference to the spiritual. The church have been upheld in preference to the two, to part with her faith than with her funds. It is the two, to part with her faith than with her funds. It is the old question, which is the greater, the gold or the altar that sanctifies the gold. Had this question been more boldly asked and more truly answered in other times, we should not have been where we now are. And by continually looking to the gold and not the altar, the dangers of the fluture will be not diminished but increased.' ¹

In 1866 Mr. Gladstone for the first time voted for the abolition of church rates. Later in the session he introduced his own plan, not in his capacity as minister, but with the approval of the Russell cabinet. After this cabinet had gone out, Mr. Gladstone in 1868 introduced a bill, abolishing all legal proceedings for the recovery of church rates, except in cases of rates already made, or where money had been borrowed on the security of the rates. But it permitted voluntary assessments to be made, and all agreements to make such payments on the faith of which any expense was incurred, remained enforcible in the same manner as contracts of a like character. Mr. Gladstone's bill became law in the course of the summer, and a struggle that had been long and bitter ended.

In another movement in the region of ecclesiastical machinery, from which much was hoped, though little is believed to have come, Mr. Gladstone was concerned, though

CHYPTER XII

TELLEES

(8987--6981)

TRERE is no saying shocks me so much as that which I hear very often; that a man does not know how to pass his time. Twould have been but ill spoken by Mothusalem, in the nine hundred sixtyninth year of his life; so far it is from us, who have not time enough to attain to the utmost perfection of any part of any science, to have cause to complain that we are forced to be idle for want of work.—Covery.

of a piece with the effusions of Madame de Sévigné, Cowper, respondence has an object, and a letter with an object is not With him the pen was no instrument of diversion. His corup his pen in the same sauntering and devious humour. alone in his temple of peace it was not his practice to take is the first of all conditions for good conversation. When was as willing as any one to accept topics as they came, which, as disengaged, as marked in ease and charm, as any one; he does not sometimes do nothing. In table-talk he could be Orassus in Cicero, the man hardly seems to be free, who fugitive moods he may have had too few. To me, says fugitive moods, fleeting thoughts, of life. Perhaps of these with him a medium for conveying the slighter incidents, mostly concerned with points of business. They were not As I said in our opening pages, Mr. Gladstone's letters are surface, people will read as long as they read anything.

We have to remember a very intelligible fact mentioned

Scott, FitzGerald, and other men and women whose letters of genial satire and casual play and hints of depth below the.

t Quid igitur? quando ages nego- ages? Tum illud addidi, mihi enim tium publicum? quando amicorum? liber esse non videtur qui non ali-quando tanique niñi. quando mihil agit.'—Cic., Orat. ii.42.

.88-6381

BOOK

will deny that the councils which we acknowledge as lawful representatives of the universal church, were great and to all appear-ance necessary providential instruments in the establishment of A the Ohristian faith?

name alone. whole bulk of our community, who now have its name and its character of membership in those millions upon millions, the their full duty, but also, and yet more, towards raising the real not only towards enabling the bishops and clergy to discharge precious knowledge that a beginning has been made—a beginning cure of such evils, when we die we can leave to our children the rapid conclusions. . . . It will be much in our day if, towards the as well as in this letter, I am utterly against, all premature, all satisfy the needs of the church of England. But in my own mind sion of the voice of the laity either can be had, or if it could would government that does not distinctly and fully provide for the exprespresent use is unsatisfactory and even scandalous, no form of church except by saying that, in which I think you concur, that while the of all our evils. I will not touch the question of convocation the church, and suffer, and even by suffering promote, the growth constitution of the convocation, resist every attempt at organizing others, more numerous and stronger, in their fear of the exclusive others say, it would separate the church from the state. And as to the old be in derogation of the rights of the clergy; or as But, say some, we cannot admit the laity into convocation,

II

In 1860 a volume appeared containing seven 'essays and reviews' by seven different writers, six of them clergymen of the church of England. The topics were miscellaneous, the treatment of them, with one exception, was neither learned nor weighty, the tone was not absolutely uniform, but it was as a whole mildly rationalistic, and the negations, such as they were, exhibited none of the ferceness or aggression that had marked the old controversies about Hampden, or Tract Ninety, or Ward's Ideal. A storm broke upon the seven writers, that they little intended to provoke. To the apparent partnership among them was severely imputed a pattison's Tendencies of Religious Thought in England, 1688-1750.

Reprinted in his Essays, vol. ii.

Reprinted in his Essays, vol. ii.

.89-6281

BOOK

mind. I hope early steps will be taken to do honour to his pure and noble memory.

To the relatives of a valued official in his financial department he writes in commemorative sentences that testify to his warm appreciation of zeal in public duty:—

The civil service of the crown has beyond all question lost in Mr. Arbuthnot one of the highest ornaments it ever possessed. His devotion to his duties, his identification at every point of his own feelings with the public interests, will, I trust, not die with him, but will stimulate others, and especially the inheritors of his name, to follow his bright example. . . . Nor is it with a thought of anything but thankfulness on his account, that I contemplate the close of his labours; but it will be long indeed before we cease to miss his great experience, his varied powers, his indetatigable energy, and that high-minded loyal tone which he carried into all the parts of business.

In another letter, by the way, he says (1866):—'I am far from thinking very highly of our rank as a nation of administrators, but perhaps if we could be judged by the post office alone, we might claim the very first place in this respect.' In time even this 'most wonderful establishment' was to give him trouble enough.

Among the letters in which Mr. Gladstone exhibits the easier and less strenuous side, and that have the indefinable attraction of intimacy, pleasantness, and the light hand, are those written in the ten years between 1858 and 1868 to the Duchess of Sutherland. She was the close and lifelong friend of the Queen. She is, said the Queen to Stockmar, 'so anxious to do good, so liberal-minded, so superior to prejudice, and so eager to learn, and to improve herself and others.' The centre of a brilliant and powerful social circle, she was an ardent sympathiser with Italy, with Poland, with the Abolitionists and the North, and with humane causes at home. She was accomplished, a lover of books meritorious in the shough too often slight in work—in short, with emotions and sentiments sometimes a little in advance of definite ideas, and sentiments sometimes a little in advance of definite ideas, and sentiments sometimes a little in advance of definite ideas, yet a high representative of the virtue, purity, simplicity, and events in the midst of which we stand, which seem to govern us, covents in the midst of which we stand, which seem to govern us, but which are in reality governed by a hand above. It may be that this rude shock to the mere scripturism which has too much prevailed, is intended to be the instrument of restoring a greater harmony of belief, and of the agencies for maintaining belief. But be that as it may, the valiant soldier who has fought manfully should be, and I hope will be, of good cheer.

Martin's Prince Consort, ii. p. 245 n.

In the same connection he wrote to Sir W. Farquhar, a friend from earliest days:—

inclinations. only felt when the sense favoured is the one opposed to our own ar whether our objection to non-natural senses is general, or is not desire) of Mr. Ward's non-natural sense; and the real question series would, I fear, result in the final triumph (in a sense he did The judgments of the present tribunal continued in a selves under judicial glosses in opposition to the plain meaning of of men who may naturally enough be tempted to shelter themteaching, and unfavourable also to the moral tone and truthfulness, judgments has been and is likely to be hostile to that definite the Christian faith, and the general tendency and effect of the lay interests are at stake in the definite teaching and profession of depended on. But, on the other hand, I feel that the most vital clergy would have to be abandoned, and moral means alone penal proceedings for the maintenance of divine truth among the it seemed to me we had lived into a time when, speaking generally, of York at Penmaenmawr, when he was Bishop of Gloucester, that the present state of things. I remember telling the Archbishop instances to institute the coercive proceedings which have led to for the world; further, I believe it has been a mistake in various for that Christian faith which is not for England or France but local though in its sphere legitimate authority, of new doctrines precautions against the establishment, especially of an insular and exaltation of clerical power, and I agree in the necessity of taking Jan. 31, 1865.—I have never been much disposed to a great-

No theological book, wrote Mr. Gladstone in 1866, that has appeared since the Vestiges of Creation twenty years before poem of modern times. a poet though an unwrought one, declares Guinevere the finest to be taken for sense or ravings. Frank Doyle, who is essentially passages about war; which one can hardly tell whether he means beauties, but against them one sets the strange and nearly frantic stand, and is hardly worth understanding. It has many peculiar Tennyson. I find Maud takes a good deal of trouble to underlandscape jewellery. diffused and almost endless beauty of detail. It is a kind of the solitary grandeur of the Snowdon group, and for the widely but I am sure you would think it well worth knowing both for know if you are acquainted with the Welsh coast and interior; between Italy, health, hill and sea all taken together. I do not Hawarden, Oct. 3.—We are exceedingly happy at Penmaenmawr, does not mean to play into Mazzini's hands. papers give good hope that Caribaldi has been misrepresented and for the present we must look with suspicion and aversion. To-day's the best supposition. But Warsaw is surely the point at which be double faced even when he is not double minded; and this is But what a calamity for a man to think, or find himself forced to who again was fresh from Italy, and sanguine about the Emperor. I have a very interesting letter from Lacaita, fresh from Panizzi, The Herberts send us an excellent account of Lord Aberdeen.

1829-681 Among other things, I wanted help from you through speech about BOOK

098I

quite as wide of fact as the interpretations. expansion, go great lengths in my favour, and I read some eulogies Some of the penny press, which has now acquired an enormous both ways, though more, perhaps, of the one than the other. Thanks for your condolences about the Times. I have had it of a moderate number of centuries everybody has some hundred arithmetic of those questions is very curious: at the distance as forwards, and it seems hardly fair to pick the results. The But the truth is that time plays strange tricks backwards as well descent in some book that he has published on royal descents. has been so kind as to discover the honours of my mother's Oct. 19.—I think Mr. or Sir something Burke (how ungrateful!)

thousand ancestors, subject, however, to deduction.

Renan's.' What revolted him was not the exhibition of the Anman nature of the central figure, but of a human nature of the central figure, but of a human nature admiring or patronising tone was loathsome. 'What you have on Ecce Homo I can hardly divine, except by way of contrast.' Dr. Newman thought that here was a case where that.' Dr. Newman thought that here was a case where there were more valuable for their own sake, than as a tecommendation or defence of the book:—

hypothesis? the wise economy which you assert, or whether it is only an it is a fact that the sacred writers recognise, however indirectly, explanations of the kind. Still, the question remains—whether This is an objection not peculiar to it, but to all controversial expedient after the event for accounting for a startonly objection which I see can be made to it is, that it is a clever eagerly to what you have still to say in illustration of it. This seems to me a very great view, and I look forward and the fourth gospels does in fact fulfil this reasonable anticipaprobabilities to history, the order of succession of the synoptical by the exhibition of the true idea. Mext, passing from antecedent and thus to supplant both the Judaic and the heathen misconception the world, was to form the human mould into which it 'might drop,' the first step necessary for bringing in the idea of an Emmanuel into them a true notion, the one being political, the other even immoral, Gentile had his own notion of an heroic humanity, and neither of your main proposition seems to be, that whereas both Jew and Jan. 9, 1868.—I hope I have followed you correctly, says Newman:

As to the specific principles and particular opinions in Mr. Gladatone's criticism of what we now see to have been a not very effective or deeply influential book, we may think as we will. But the temper of his review, the breadth of its outlook on Christian thought, tradition, and society, show no mean elements in the composition of his greatness. So, too, does the bare fact that under the pressure of office sand all the cares of a party leader in a crisis, his mind and all the cares of a party leader in a crisis, his mind you. I.

BOOK

like these; for though it does not treat professedly of sorrow, Thomas à Kempis a golden book for all times, but most for times my recollection you shall hear of it again.1 I always think erewens ti bad ever known—I will try to find it, and it answers tent forming and beautiful expression of a natural grief that be to him) which when I read it years ago seemed to me the brother (remember he was a monk and so what a brother might brings to my mind a letter of St. Bernard on the death of his 1859-68. peace, ripeness above all in character. . . A part of your letter it; a death in ripeness of years, ripeness of love and honour and Meath which has come softly to your door and gone softly from

~981

. . . ewords to mall exhibition of the Man of Sorrows. . . .

but we have none, and I can only render it by a rude conversion quality they so eminently possess; the Latins have a word for it, April 4.—I am grateful to you and to your thoughts for the into 'sequacious,' or thoughts given to following.

tunity of putting its opinion to the test. that this is what I cannot endure; I shall be glad of an opporparative peace, at least in the outer sphere. The world believes times cannot be, but this year it promises me the boon of coma reception as they actually met with. Quiet my office in these My labours of yesterday [budget speech] had no title to so kind how faithfully they speak of Him in their atrength, their majesty, no weariness. They come straight from their Maker's hand, and These are continual preachers, and so mild that they can bring noble self, in such forms of mountain, wood, breeze, and water! Scotland. Such contact with Nature's own very undisguised and within. I cannot but hope she will have much refreshment in believe are right when they flow from and conform to what is That principle like others has its place, and its applications I In her, I am even glad to hear of the little bit of symbolism. value even when they are not so decidedly words of consolation. All words from you about the Queen are full of weight and ngures has a suffocating effect upon the drain until they are well As for mysolf I am a discharged vessel to-day. A load of merely ecclesiastical, especially if small, remote, and unchecked by an active public opinion. But in the American episcopal church it has been found practicable in a great degree to abviate any dangers from such a source.' Ten years after this, in one of the most remarkable articles he ever wrote, speaking of the protestant evangelical section of the adherents of the Ohristian system, he says that 'no portion of this entire group seems to be endowed with greater vigour than this in the United States and the British colonies, which has grown up in new soil, and far from the possibly chilling shadow of national establishments of religion.' 1

2 Soo Morizon's Life of St. Bernard (Ed. 1868), ii. ch. v.

'The Courses of Religious Thought' in Gleanings, iii. p. 115.

BOOK

'89-698T

is not perfect confidence and peace. and uncommon goodness, and for him I have not a thought that my public life in particular, implied. He was a man of high spirit been separated in the relative sense in which our marriages and intimate friends antil we married, and since then we have only the brother next above me; we were not brothers only but very and too much. Only I must answer your question. sharp, and as yet I am hardly reconciled to it. . . But enough this double sense he has offered up his life. The grief is very advice and an operation when he should have been in his bed. In uneasy that made him suffer in silence, and travel to Bath for

March 1.—Even you could not, I am persuaded, do otherwise

she can desire, all reformation that can be good for her. The for that church, on her own ground, as for our own, all health that from the formal documents of the church of Rome, and who wish comparison with most men, of the absolute differences in our belief nothing whatever to do; although I am one who thinks lightly, in evad ot deiv trag nwo ym rot I tonega anoisinreg eidt dtiW of thousands who as yet suspect neither the process nor the cause. fear undermining the very principle of faith in thousands and tens communion, that have destroyed the faith of many, and that are I nwo ruo nithiw alabasas bas etaidesim ett to noitroqorq egral called converts, and to those who have made them, we owe a very of truth, is grievous enough, but it is not all, for to those who are The social misery that has been caused, not for truth, but for loss question. But I speak of its effects, and they are most deplorable. do not presume to touch, nor feel in any way called upon to Influences of the age. I do not mean as to its motives, for these I in this country I take to be one of the worst of the religious organization. But the proselytising agency of the Roman church all with ancient churches of the greatest extent and the firmest separated, so far as it extends, and it extends very far; most of rejoice to think in community of faith among bodies externally act as one under the influence of violent anti-Roman feeling. I what I meant by it and what I did not mean. I did not mean to the Roman community at some place in England. Let me say opinion I gave about helping a bazaar for the sisters of charity of than think me rather a savage on Wednesday evening, for the will he lead?' saked the bishop.¹ 'Oh! it is impossible to say! Time must show, and new combinations.' By 1863 Cardwell confidently anticipated that Mr. Gladstone must become prime minister, and Bishop Wilberforce finds all coming to the conclusion that he must be the next real chief.²

keep long.'5 to ruin, he is an inmate too costly for any party to afford to abnetni ed nam edt ot eonirg nuetaae emoz yd nevig taadqele most dangerous to that side to which he belongs. Like the in our century, in spite of his abilities and experience, as one spite of his eloquence unsurpassed in our day, perhaps of his voice or the torrent of his declamation' regarded him what earlier cool observers 'out of hearing of the modulation and are equally compact in purpose and action.' 4 Somein or out of parliament; whereas they are all well provided of the country is against them, the country has no leaders nonce they have a great advantage; for, though the majority which Gladstone is the disciple and the organ. And for the nascitur ordo) for the triumph of the Manchester school, of Shaftesbury, 'that the time has arrived (nous sæclorum wild, 3 'The long and short of our present position is, said any lliw and has eredweste mid bats and the will run Palmerston's latest utterances, 'keep him in Oxford and he vative policy.' 'He is a dangerous man, was one of Lord pressure, except the pressure of a constitutional and conser-Oxford for ecclesizatical adviser. He will succumb to every supporters, a hot tractarian for chancellor, and the Bishop of bring with him the Manchester school for colleagues and all would soon be adrift. 'His successor, Gladstone, will pag, and esoolan : soleC to basis ent aground aevirb geg great and irrevocable changes. Palmerston was simply the ruefully reflected in 1864 that people must make ready for ecclesiastical were as cardinal as they were to Mr. Gladstone, • On the other side Lord Shaftesbury, to whom things

One great weight that Gladstone has to carry in the political race, wrote his friend Frederick Rogers (Dec. 13,

1 Life of Bishop Wilbersore, ii. p. 412.
2 Ibid., iii. pp. 92, 101.
3 Ibid., iii. pp. 92, 101.
4 Ibid., iii. pp. 92, 101.
5 Life of Lord Shaftesbury, iii. pp. p. 567.
171, 188.

*89-698T

BOOK

by the 5.5 train, to which I feel a kind of grateful attachment for with Mr. Fechter.—Yours affectionately. glad to have a hope of you next week. All our people are charmed othe advantage and pleasure it has so often procured me. We are otherwise. as a means of correction. I have not heard you say that you do about slavery. I hope it is not very wide. I stop short of war esnerathe rue to spoke no Y . . . You spoke of our difference . . . Many thanks for the carnations you sent by my wife; they under the circumstances you describe, I should lean as you do. greatly mistrust compulsion in the management of children, and little to offer. She dwells much upon employing herself. . . . I was heartrending woe; such as makes one ashamed of having so tI . sivve. Last That I misse need evad I . . . uoy Enises to stir without free and full permission) I do not abandon the hope time has been sharp. But (while above all I trust you will not You are not easily arrested in your movements, and I fear the July 29.—I am greatly concerned to hear of your suffering.

won so largely, and seems to have come very reluctantly to the think, pleased with the good opinions which the young princes have Thursday and I had some conversation about America. He is, I not good but bad.' The Duc d'Aumale breakfasted with us on Kingsley's to his friend Mr. ----, 'My dear friend, your verses are first book of the Iliud, I have often remembered those words of Lodge to meet Tennyson. Since I gave him my translation of the be at Hawarden. On Wednesday I am to have luncheon at Argyll to the hope you give. . . . Soon after this reaches you I hope to are free and I look forward to seeing you on Wednesday according plunges towards the death of the session; but after to-morrow we its arrangements at all times, is singularly so in its last kicks and Vichy alone. The House of Commons, rude and unmannerly in hardly ever goes wrong. She is not easy about your going to partly from a habitual gift and partly from experience, and she in her as a doctor. She has a kind of divining power springing sounds rather intrusive, pray put it down to my intense confidence to lecture you about not taking enough care of yourself. It this yesterday, for I hope a little that she may have been bold enough 11 Carlton House Terrace (no date).—I am glad my wife saw you $\cdot(n)$ ddiw speech with their leader. But this is a small matter compared sat in the tea-room, and men were gratified by getting private so little easy contact with the small fry, as when Palmerston round you and known to be so; (b) and besides that there is men; that the strong men and the vising men are not gathered your entourage is too confined, and too much of second-rate forgive me if I go too far, I am simply a funnel) a feeling that your name and Ecce Homo. . . . 2. (a) The other point is (pray critical time, and that it riles them to see the walls placarded with slight recreation, about aught but the nation's welfare at this sion if you are supposed to be interested, except for an occasional a husband claims a wife's devotion; and it gives a bad impresthe people don't understand it; they consider you their own, as own mind and heart it may be to dig into the old springs, still for literature, and however strengthening and refreshing to your itself into two main points:-I. Whatever your own tastes may be all this grumbling. As far as I can make out, the feeling resolves as to how you would take it that I consented to be the funnel of generous and truly modest nature it would be) with some anxiety

Mr. Gladstone to T. D. Acland.

Ecce Homo, I answer that it was my Sunday's work, and change of me. If I am told I should go to Sheffield instead of writing on what little energy of brain, and time for using it, may remain to business, and I must myself be the judge how best to husband satisfaction. I have been for near thirty-six years at public Roebuck on his own ground. I am afraid I can offer them little whether I ought to have undertaken a mission to Sheffield to meet direction of my own conduct on such a question as the question and abnard ym to two each of who take out of my hands the instead the matter with which I was overflowing. Nor do I well instance in which, professing to seek a man's opinion, I poured forth attend to my business, while the complaint is illustrated by an you represent under the first head, and who complain that I do not thankless office. It is new to me to have critics such as those whom grateful to you for undertaking what in the main must always be a Hawarden, Jan. 30, '68.—Be assured I cannot feel otherwise than 300K V. 1859-68.

798I

Jan. 4.—Often as I have been struck by the Queen's extraordinary integrity of mind—I know of no better expression—I never felt it more than on hearing and reading a letter of here on Saturday (at the cabinet) about the Danish question. Her determination in this case as in others, not inwardly to 'sell the truth' (this is Robert Pollok) overbears all prepossessions and longings, strong as they are, on the German side, and enables her spontanestrong as they are, on the German side, and enables her spontaneously to hold the balance, it seems to me, tolerably even.

Jan. 14.—I am glad you were, not scandalised about my laxity as to the 'public house.' But I expected from you this liberality. I really had no choice. How can I who drink good wine and litter beer every day of my life, in a comfortable room and among friends, coolly stand up and advise hardworking fellow-creatures to take 'the pledge'? However, I have been reading Maguire's Life of Father Mathew, with a most glowing admiration for the Father. Every one knew him to be good, but I had no idea of the extent and height of his goodness, and his boundless power and thirst not for giving only but for loving.

June 27.—Just at this time when the press and mass of ordinary business ought to be lessening, the foreign crisis you see comes upon us, and drowns us deeper than ever. I fully believe that England will not go to war, and I am sure she ought not. Are you not a little alarmed at Argyll on this matter. Of the fate of the government I cannot speak with much confidence or with much anxious desire; but on the whole I rather think, and rather hope, we shall come through.

Three marriages almost in as many weeks among your own immediate kin! I look for a dinner at Woolner's with Tennyson to day: a sei occhi. Last night Manning spent three hours with me; the conversation must wait. He is sorely anti-Garibaldian. How beautiful is the ending of Newman's Apologia, part vii.

Oct. 23.—Singularly happy in my old and early political friend-ships, I am now stripped of every one of them. It has indeed been my good lot to acquire friendships in later life, which I could not have hoped for; but at this moment I seem to see the spirits of the dead gathered thick around me, 'all along the narrow service. sure to meet colleagues and the principal men in the public O

other than his own: and it would be idle to transcribe the pith of it in words contemporary account was traced by an excellent observer, the popular expectations thereby signified, an admirable secret of the rapidity with which his star was rising, and of artful genialities of the tea-room pure superfluity. Of the gained upon the general public out of doors, made the power in affairs, the tremendous hold that he had now His sheer intellectual strength, his experience and his back, ready for work on every anvil in that resounding the House always knew that he had a sledge-hammer behind might be playful, courteous, reserved, gracious, silent, but than by the standing impression of power. Mr. Gladstone like all assemblies, is even less affected by immediate displays But it was work of supererogation. The House of Commons, All this was good advice enough, and most loyally intended.

break up the torpor which has fallen upon internal affairs. system of foreign policy; and, with no misgivings, that he will misgivings, that he can offer them a new and more satisfactory hopelessness of speedy realisation. They believe, with certain of which they are deeply conscious, even while they express their important changes. They think that he will realise two longings to expect, should he lead the House of Commons, two very and out of season, seem, however they may put their aspirations, who are applauding the chancellor of the exchequer, in season leaves on his own advice an impression of indecision. . . Those oratory, and perceives alternatives with a clearness which often requently puzzles his sudience even while they are cheering his man of his political standing, has a cautiousness of speech which to lay down any systematised course of action than almost any This is the more remarkable because Mr. Gladstone has done less pursued by whigs, or the policy attributed to Lord Palmerston. itself, and something widely different from either the policy expression of a whole system of thought, to mean something for Mr. Gladstone's policy is coming to be used as the concrete

1 Mr. M. Townsend in the Spectator.

BOOK V. 1859:68.

Sopt. 12.—I am working off my post as well as I can with the bands playing and flags fluttering outside. By and by I am bands playing and flags fluttering outside. By and by I am going to carve rounds of beef for some part of four hundred diners. The ladies are only allowed fea. Our weather anxieties are great, but all is going well. The new telegram and announcement that you will come on Friday is very welcome. Indeed, I did not know what to say, except that I most sincerely wish them all good and all happiness. The rest must keep till wish them all good and all happiness. The rest must keep till Friday. The characters you describe are quite, I think, on the right ground. It was the great glory of the Greeks that they had right ground. It was the great glory of the Greeks that they had pinched ones which are sometimes found even among Christians. Lord Palmerston's abandoning his trip to Bristol is rather a serious affair. There is more in it, I fear, than gout:

is an extraordinary desolation. Palmerston. This, in the political world, and to me especially, Campbell, Lord Macaulay, Mr. Ellice, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord J. Graham, Lord Canning, Lord Elgin, Sir G. Lewis, Lord They are: -Lord Dalhousie, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Herbert, Sir the last five years, during which three only have been made. in my mind, all earried off by the rude hand of death in combination. Twelve cabinet ministers I have already reckoned lights upon the subject either new in themselves or new in their thought of the nation through the press it commonly throws and more slightly anything that was not. And by stirring the certain tendency to view more warmly what was before admired, Palmerston's character by yours. Death of itself produces a Inveraray and compare and correct my impressions of Lord ts resqqs of neat themom sidt ts tevos erom bluode I gnidton Oct. 24.—If you were well enough, and I had wings, there is

I hope you are at least creeping on. It was so kind of you to think about my little neuralgic affairs; thank God, I have had no more.

998I

Hawarden, Jan. 4.—We have been pleased with some partial accounts of improvement, and I can the better speak my wish to you for a happy new year. Next Wednesday I hope to inquire

A letter from Francis Mewman to Mr. Chadstone is a good illustration of the almost passionate going our of men's then to the gives connected the sound of the Onth a practical reason for addressing you arose out of . . .

I did not date to intride on you sentiments which are happily shared by so many thousands of warm and simple hearts; sentiments of warm admiration, deep sympathy, fervent hope, longing expectation of lasting national blessing from your certain elevation to high responsibility. The rude, monstrous, shameful and shameless attacks which you have endured, do but endean and shameless attacks which you have endured, do but endean elevate and purity public life, and we shall all bless you, dear sir, elevate and purity public life, and we shall all bless you, dear sir, as a regenerator of Eugland. Keep the hearts of the people.

They will never enry you and never foreake you.

stanza in the third canto of Childe Ilurold:stand him that he met such aduse, and then he quoted the because people were not good enough themselves to underhear a word said against Mr. Chadstone. He said it was just Bright in Scotland sometime after this. ton bluow oll' accomplished woman with many public interests met Alr. about his impulses; but it is a perilous quality too.2 desiden ei dedw de guirge old ei duemidnee de niev guerde much less in the House than they do out of doors. A and for undeniable defects and failings. But they love him never was a man more deeply hated both for his good points deep popular sympathies, his untinching conrage), and there sid , esoussonno sid-noistrations. ovrossob doidy soisilisup There never was a man so genuinely admired for the said of Mr. Gladstong at the moment of accession to power, culture, sound and just sense, and unstained purity of spirit, To ompo tent shig used out correspond in him opinion of in botini Church, afterwards the dean of St. Paul's, a man who

"He who ascends to mountain-tops, shall find The lottiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow; He who surpasses or subdues mankind, Must look down on the hate of those below."

'89-698T

BOOK

Holker Hall, Sept. 22.—We find this place very charming. It explains at once the secret of the great affection they all have for it. It has a singular combination of advantages—sea, hill, home ground, and views, access, and the house such an excellent living house; all the parts, too, in such good keeping and proportion. We much admire your steps. The inhabitants would be quite enough to make any place pleasant. We have just been at that noble old church of Cartmel. These churches are really the best champions of the men who built them.

home at Liverpool, where it seemed pretty comfortable. seventy-six. I have been to see my china exhibited in its new danger, though she is better. Her age seems to be at the least to two si ilearsed. Each that Mrs. Disraeli is out of exchequer is deplorably poor. Poor Disraeli has been sorely cut his friends, I think, are disposed to regret it. I am told the on an educational debate, and has given notice of resolutions; all has had some partial failure of eyesight. Lord R. is determined last night. He seemed very well but more deaf. Lady Russell tionable, which at present I do not expect. I saw Lord Russell for the expense of this unhappy war should prove to be very excepunless the proposals of the government as to the mode of providing to the hope of escaping to the country at the end of next week, word of sympathy. . . . Our prospects are uncertain; but I cling been enjoying a visit to you after your severe illness without one Nov. 23.—I cannot let the moment pass at which I would have Bloomsbury Square, Jan. 3.—I promised to write to you in case I found matters either, bad or good. I lament to say they are bad. He [Panizzi] is weaker, more feverish (pulse to-day at 122 about noon), and very restless. The best will be a severe struggle is not given over. I said, I shall come to-morrow. He said, You will not find me alive. I replied that was wrong. I believe there is no danger to-morrow, but what next week may do is another matter. He is warm and affectionate as ever, and very tender. He is from and resigned, not stoically, but with trust in God. I He is firm and resigned, not stoically, but with trust in God. I am very sad at the thought of losing this very true, trusty, hearty am very sad at the thought of losing this very true, trusty, hearty ancient, provided that reverence is deserved. There are those unreasoned change and a protound reverence for everything perfectly practicable to work in conjunction with a dislike to to his means and opportunities. That is a basis on which I find it ✓ I value for myself, I value for every luman being in proportion since I was young. I am a lover of liberty; and that liberty which liboralism is this. It is the lesson which I have been learning ever able to the promotion of tory interests. But the basis of my They make changes with great rapidity, provided they are suittheir purpose have much less reverence for antiquity than I have. a man a liberal. I find, however, that the tories when it suits be said, however, that this does not go very far towards making great deeds of our fathers in England and in Scotland. It may better. I have a great yeverence for antiquity. I rejoice in the something good, or something which is good into something like a change when it is needful to alter something bad into politician. I do not like changes for their own sake, I only may not be thought to furnish good materials for a liberal I do wish to learn upon just principles. I have some ideas that I have been a learner all my life, a learner I must continue to be. ¹ Norwich, May 16, 1890.

898I

who have deen so happy that they have deen born with a creed that they can usefully maintain to the last. For my own part, as

CHAPTER XIII

REFORM

(9981)

L'aristocratie, la démocratie ne sont pas de vaines doctrines livrées à nos disputes; co sont des puissances, qu'on n'abat point, qu'on n'élève point par la louange ou par l'injure; avant que nous parlions d'elles, elles sont ou ne sont pas.—Roxen-Colland.

Aristoeracy, demoeracy, are not vain doctrines for us to dispute about; they are powers; you neither exalt them nor depress them by praise or by blame; before we talk of them, they exist or they do not exist.

Palmerston, and he reported the drift of it to Sir George Grey. The Speaker had been in Scotland, and found no strong feeling for reform or any other extensive change, while there was a general decline of interest in the ballot:—

MR. DENISON, the Speaker, had a conversation with Mr.

'998T

BOOK

and does not want great changes of any kind? I was, on the the financial policy, and wants to maintain these and their authors, is satisfied with the foreign policy, and the home policy, and Suppose that the country pass a strong measure of reform? support Lord Palmerston's government. But was that in order to the party agreed now ? The point it was agreed upon was to the whole party was for the bill, the course was clear. would expect action. At the time of the first Reform bill, when I answered, 'No doubt a majority of 80, agreed on any point, a majority of 80 on the liberal side, they will expect some action. before us, of the embarrassment of the reform question. I think it is declining in favour.' He spoke of the difficulties is no strong feeling for reform among them. And as to the ballot, Gladstone said, 'Certainly, as far as my constituents go, there by him to Lord Brougham, who had asked him to undertake some public address (April 25, 1860):—

You have given me credit for your own activity and power of work: an estimate far beyond the truth. I am one of those who work very hard while they are at it, and are then left in much exhaustion. I have been for four months overdone, and though my general health, thank God, is good, yet my brain warns me so distinctly that it must not be too much pressed, as to leave me in prudence no centee to take except that which I have reductantly indicated.

We might be tempted to call good letter-writing one of the ittle handieraft of an idle man; but then two of the work the little handieraft of an idle man; but then two of the most occupied personages that ever lived. Of ever lived. Of course, sentences emerge in Mr. Gladstone's letters that are the fruits of his experience, well worthy of a note, as when he says to Dr. Pusey:—'I doubt from your letter whether you are aware of the virulence and intensity with which in your letter of vesterday I can readily believe, but I assure you it does not alter in the slightest degree the grounds on which my last letter was written.'

He thanks Bulwer Lytten for a volume of his republished which my last letter was written.'

This I grant is not always easy for a conscientious man, for This I grant is not always easy for a conscientious man, for example when he has almost re-written. But I need not remind you how much the public, if I may judge from one of its number, would desire it when it can be done. For in the case of those whom it has learned to honour and admire, there is a biography of the mind that is thus signified, and that is matter of deep interest.

On external incidents, he never fails in a graceful, apt, or feeling word. When the author of The Christian Year dies (1866), he says:—'Mr. Liddon sent me very early information of Mr. Keble's death. The church of England has lost in him a poet, a scholar, a philosopher, and a saint. I must add that he always appeared to me, since I had the I must add that he always appeared to me, since I had the honour and pleasure of knowing him, a person of most liberal fighting questions absorb a legislature. Reform, however, was the fighting question, and · proposed to apply half-a-million a year towards its annihiladebt. The debt was eight hundred millions, and it was now the nibbling of a mouse at the mountain of the national negotiated; and that homage should be paid to virtue by that a series of commercial treaties had been successfully raw material vanished with the repeal of the duty on timber; accounts showed a surplus of £1,350,000; that the last tax on It was naturally quite enough for parliament that the ministration so memorable in the history of national finance. need the budget, the eighth of the series that made this adcoercion bill since the union. This need not detain us, nor statesmen to govern Ireland, in the shape of the twentieth familiar demonstration of the miserable failure of English The proceedings of the new government began with a counties. We may smile at the thought that some of the of 1866 was seven pounds for boroughs, and fourteen for for boroughs, and ten pounds for counties. The proposal ston government proposed a six pound occupation franchise do, it opened no door for the workmen. In 1860 the Palmerextending downwards; but whatever else his plan might to various classes who mainly had them already, without lateral extension and vertical extension, and offered votes In 1859 Mr. Disraeli invented a quackish phrase about vital difference was the figure of the borough franchise. deciding issue. The only point on which there was a number of partial encounters, but hardly a great and he likened to fighting in a wood, where there may be any bill was limited. The other question of redistributing seats the real question at stake, and to that branch of reform the and arguments of moderation and safety. Franchise was so constituted as the one before him, to use the language skeletons of reform bills'; and it was his cue in a House the limbo of abortive creations was peopled with the course of this famous contest. He did not forget that less impassioned than some of his later performances in the bill (March 12) in a speech that, though striking enough, was The chancellor of the exchequer introduced the Reform

1866, V. BOOK

by him to Lord Brougham, who had asked him to undertake some public address (April 25, 1860):—

You have given me credit for your own activity and power of work: an estimate far beyond the truth. I am one of these who work very hard while they are at it, and are then left in much expension. I have been for four mouths overdone, and though my general health, thank God, is good, yet my brain warns me so distinctly that it must not be too much pressed, as to leave me in prudence no course to take except that which I have reluctantly indicated.

We might be tempted to call good letter-writing one of the little handicraft of an idle man'; but then two of the most perfect masters of the art were Cicero and Voltaire, two of the most occupied personages that ever lived. Of course, sentences emerge in Mr. Gladstone's letters that are the fruits of his experience, well worthy of a note, as when he says to Dr. Pusey:—'I doubt from your letter whether you are aware of the virulence and intensity with which the poison of suspicion acts in public life. All that you say in your letter of yesterday I can readily believe, but I assure you it does not alter in the slightest degree the grounds on which my last letter was written.'

He thanks Bulwer Lytton for a volume of his republished poems, but chides him for not indicating dates:—

This I grant is not always easy for a conscientious man, for example when he has almost re-written. But I need not remind you how much the public, if I may judge from one of its number, would desire it when it can be done. For in the case of those whom it has learned to honour and admire, there is a biography of the mind that is thus signified, and that is matter of deep of the mind that is thus signified, and that is matter of deep interest.

On external incidents, he never fails in a graceful, apt, or feeling word. When the author of The Christian Year dies (1866), he says:—'Mr. Liddon sent me very early information of Mr. Keble's death. The church of England has lost in him a poet, a scholar, a philosopher, and a saint. I must add that he always appeared to me, since I had the I mount and pleasure of knowing him, a person of most liberal honour and pleasure of knowing him, a person of most liberal had passed the Rubicon, broken the bridges, burned their declaring that the government would not flinch, that they the enthusiasm of his audience to the utmost pitch by panied by some of his colleagues, Mr. Gladstone roused louder. At a great meeting in Liverpool (April 6), accombill had passed its second reading. The mutterings only grow he would disclose the whole plan as soon as the franchise would be treated as a vote of want of confidence, but that Mr. Gladstone told the House that Lord Chosvenor's motion mittee on franchise. The expert's counsels were followed. simple production of the seats bill before taking the com-Grosvenor and Stanley and the other two sections, by the could best be kept right by means of a stiff line against baleful influence of Bright. The first of the three sections when they eams to deal with seats, they would be under the deal with the seats at all; and finally, those who felt sure that next, those who doubted whether ministers really intended to opposed to reform, were averse to a change of government; who might possibly be kept in order; first, those who, although cabinet, that there were three classes of disaffected liberals, look was clouded. Alr. Brand, the skilfal whip, informed the sorved equally well as a test of conflicting forces. The outleader, seconded the motion. Any other form would have intentions upon sents. Lord Stanley, the son of the tory the franchise, until they were in possession of the ministerial announced a motion that they would not proceed with

BOOK V. 1866.

The leader himself rose in warmth of advocacy as the struggle went on. The advocates of privilege used language about the workers, that in his generous and sympathetic mind fanned the spark into a flame. Lowe asked an unhappy question, that long stood out as a beacon mark in the controversy—whether 'if you wanted venality, ignorance, drunkenness—if you wanted impulsive, unreflecting, violent people—where do you look for them? Do you go to the top or to the bottom? Harsh judgments like this of the conditions of life and feeling in the mass of the nation—conditions of life and feeling in the mass of the nation—though Lowe was personally one of the kindest of men—made Mr. Gladstone stand all the more ardently by the made Mr. Gladstone stand all the more ardently by the boats. Still the malcontents were not cowed.

Thames, Dunrobin on the Dornoch Firth. Green Park, Trentham, Cliveden, and Chiswick on the duchess's various princely homes-Stafford House in the standing."'1 The Gladstones were constant visitors at the has the happiness of the peace which passeth all underknowledge and the wish for it; one must not forget that he evening. Nobody makes me feel more the happiness of knowledge all day long, and singing admirably in the he was quite delightful, pouring out such floods of agreeable Somersetshire, the following: --- The Gladstones were there; when on a visit to her sister, Lady Taunton, at Quantock, in from her written to me in 1863, after meeting Mr. Gladstone appear sufficiently well to receive him. I find in a letter much to receive others, sho would always make an effort to always an intenso pleasure, and oven when suffering too made happier by this friendship. His visits to her were was boundless, and the last years of her life were certainly Her admiration for Gladstone, says the son of the duehess, Duke of Argyll, who had married a daughter of the house. Eishop Wilberforce too was often of the company, and the self was one of her idols, and Mr. Gladstone was another. sympathetic spirit of the Tennysonian epoch. Tennyson him-

A little sheaf of pieces from Mr. Gladstone's letters to her may serve to show him as he was, in the midst of his labours in the Palmerston government—how little his native kindliness of heart and power of sympathy had been chilled or parched either by hard and ceaseless toil, or by the trying atmosphere of public strife.

698I

Aug. 30.—I am much concerned to lose at the last moment the pleasure of coming to see you at Trentham—but my wife, who was not quite well when I came away but hoped a day's rest would make her so, writes through Agnes to say she hopes I shall get back to-day. The gratification promised me must, therefore, I fear, stand over. I will write from Hawarden, and I now send this by a messenger lest (as you might be sure I should not fail through carelessness) you should think anything very bad had happened.

VOL. I.

'998I '

BOOK

One personal passage deserves a effulgent from the sea. trom helmet and shield, like the star of summer rising Athene, with flame streaming from head and shoulders, biographic place:—

received me, as Dido received the shipwrecked Aneasnothing to offer you but faithful and honourable service. You to make use of the legal phraseology, in forma purperis. I had the slow and resistless forces of conviction. I came among you, associated, driven from them, I admit, by no arbitrary act, but by I mody div sent mort teast one not grome ames I possesses. the opposite of Earl Russell's. . . I have none of the claims he My position, Sir, in regard to the liberal party, is in all points

metaese, egentem littore, egentem

Excepi,

complete the sentence in regard to meand I only trust you may not hereafter at any time have to

'its regni demens in parte locavi,' between us has assumed such a form that you can never be my even say with some measure of confidence. And the relation You received me with kindness, indulgence, generosity, and I may debtors, but that I must for ever be in your debt.

an easy, but to a certain and to a not far distant victory. of the united people of the three kingdoms, perhaps not to the eye of Heaven, and it will be borne by the firm hands droop over our sinking heads, yet it soon again will float in carry in this fight, though perhaps at some moment it may marshalled on our side; and the banner which we now disturb—those great social forces are against you; they are tumult of our debates does not for a moment impede or ett doidw bas tytesism bas tagim riedt ai zbrswao evom gesture, 'time is on our side. The great social forces which fight against the future, he exclaimed with a thrilling The closing sentences became memorable:—'You cannot

Here the speaker's trope was a sounding battle-cry, by situations. The same is the truth of the power of the A drama, as good critics tell us, is made not by words but

I Aen. iv. 373: 'The exile on my shore I sheltered and, fool as I was, shared with him my realm.'

Now I.— . . There is one proposition which the experience of life burns into my soul; it is this, that man should beware of letting his religion spoil his morality. In a thousand ways, some great some small, but all subtle, we are daily tempted to that great sin. To speak of such a thing seems dishonouring to God; but it is not religion as it comes from Him, it is religion with the strange and ovil mixtures which it gathers from abiding in us. This frightful evil scems to rage in the Yought political spirit, the virtues and the vices of a close organization being much associated with one another. That same influence which keeps the mother from her child teaches Monta-limbert to glorify the corruption, cruelty and baseness which in lembert to glorify the corruption, cruelty and baseness which in the government of the papal states put the gospel itself to shame.

1991

11 Carllon II. Terrace, March 5.—I dare scarcely reply to your letter, for although the scene at Trentham [the death of the Duke of Sutherland] is much upon my mind, it is, amidst this crowd and pressure of business, an image reflected in ruffled waters, while it is also eminently one that ought to be kept true. A sacred sorrow scems to be profuned by bringing it within the touch of worldly cares. Still I am able, I hope not unnaturally, to speak of the pleasure which your letter has given me, for I could not wish it other than it is.

I am not one of those who think that after a stroke like this, it is our duty to try and make it seem less than it is. It is great for all, for you it is immense, for there has now been first loosened and then removed, the central stay of such a continuation of domestic love as I should not greatly exaggerate in calling without rival or example; and if its stay centred in him, so did its fire in you. I only wish and heartily pray that your sorrow may be a great and strong more than sharp, for then only the flereeness of beath is felt when it leaves painful and rankling thoughts of the departed, or when it breaks the kindly process of nature and teverses the order in which she would have us quit the place of reverses the order in which she would have us quit the place of our pilgrimage, by ravishing away those whose life is but just opened or is yet unfulfilled. But you are now yearning over a opened or is yet unfulfilled. But you are now yearning over a

manæuvres,

made all the more confident by the success of its present substantially identical, to meet the same invidious opposition, the case be altered? They would have to introduce a plan he said, to introduce an amended plan next year. How would and proposals of the aspect of dishonour.' They were told, Chadstone says to Lord Russell (June 4), 'divest such ideas the bill and yet keeping the ministers. 'I cannot,' Mr. air was thick with ideas and schemes for getting rid of alters our position with reference to fresh defeats.' The strength and authority of the government. This defeat extremely discouraging, and it much reduces the usual by a majority of 10; the numbers were 248 to 238. This is au series beirres deety has been carried against us faced proposal further to load the bill by an instruction to the House, on May 28, ' has occurred to-night. A most barestruggle,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to the prime minister from vexation. The worst incident in the history of our reform Meanwhile, for the leader of the House vexation followed and the inconstant and variable voting on this bill. come to a crisis—none so much as the insidious proceedings, Many circumstances show that it was time things should government of this country since that of Lord Liverpool. overlived its seven years: a larger term than the life of any note to a friend, he observed :—'The government has now just inappropriate,' Mr Gladstone says. The next morning, in a hats, and other manifestations which I think novel and of the adversary there was shouting, violent flourishing of sensation was almost beyond precedent. With the cheering found no fewer than 44 of their professed supporters. 304, and in this majority of 11 against government were chise, ministers were beaten. The numbers were 315 against estimated rental for the basis of the new seven-pound franraised by Lord Dunkellin, of rateable value as against gross At length an end came. On June 18, on a question

It had been decided in the cabinet a couple of days before this defeat, that an adverse vote on the narrow issue technically raised by Lord Dunkellin was not in itself to be treated in debate as a vital question, for the rating value could drilled and have taken-their places. Then they are as digestible as other food of that region; still it is better when they are off, and it is always a step towards liberty.

 Λ . BOOK W

'998T

I must at some time try to explain a little more my reference to Thomas it Kempis. I have given that book to men of uncultivated minds, who were also presbyterians, but all relish it. I do not believe it is possible for any one to read that book earnestly from its beginning, and think of popish, or non-popish, or of anything but the man whom it presents and brings to us.

Alay 8.—Unfortunately I can give you no light on the question of time. I, a hear chained to a stake, cannot tell when the principal run will be made at me, and as I can only seratch once I must vant if possible till then. The only person who could giv you des reassignements suffisants is Disraeli. Tennyson's note is charming. I return it, and with it a touching note from Princess charming. I return it, and with it a touching note from Princess charming. I return it, and with it a touching note from Princess charming. I return it, and with it a touching note from Princess charming.

EOSI

Jan. 23.—I am so sorry to be unable to come to you, owing to an engagement to-night at the admiralty. I am ashamed of being utterly destitute of news—full of figures and all manner of dulnesses. . . . I went, however, to the Drury Lane pantomine last night, and laughed beyond measure; also enjoyed looking from a pight, and laughed beyond measure; also enjoyed looking from a third row, unseen myself, at your brother and the Blantyre party.

Bowden Park, Chippenham, Feb. 7.—I feel as if your generons and overflowing sympathies made it truly mikind to draw yon further into the sorrows of this darkened house. My brother [John] closed his long and arduous battle in peace this morning at six ofelock; and if the knowledge that he had the love of all who knew him, together with the assurance that he is at rest in God, tion is no common one. Eight children, seven of them daughters, of whom only one is married and most are young, with one little boy of seven, lost their mother last February, and now see their father taken. He dies on his marriage day, we are to bury him on the first anniversary of his wife's death. Altogether it is piteous beyond belief. It was affectionate anxiety in her illness that undermined his health; it was reluctance to make his children that undermined his health; it was reluctance to make his children

.888I drawal. To dissolve would have been a daring act, an appeal from a the readiest and simplest expedient, namely, immediate with-BOOK

Lord Russell tendered their resignation to the Queen, then household suffrage. within the tory party, which undoubtedly accelerated the arrival of engirtni bna anoitqeseb auoirue to seires tant rot roob eth beneqo in all likelihood have resulted in victory. By our retirement we Or again, a re-trial of the question, with a eall of the House, would have evoked a response similar, though not equal, to that of 1831. even probable, that such an appeal, unhesitatingly made, would shuffling parliament to an unawakened people. Yet it is possible, thieves"]. In great contingencies something must be risked: forty traitors [elsewhere in the same letter called the "forty with a party poisoned and enfeebled by the baseness of the far worse than a defeat, namely to carry on your government not believe in your being beaten. Besides there is something much feeling your appeals could speedily arouse. . . I do great principle and a great cause. Last Easter showed how for the force of a moral contest through the country for a a new parliament. Mr. Brand, he says, ' makes no allowance Mr. Gladstone (June 24) in strong terms in favour of having Bright—not then a member of the government—wrote to were to try either a fresh parliament or a fresh ministry. first he thought ill of the new plan. The true alternatives was on the morrow of the defeat for resignation, and from the general vote of confidence. Mr. Gladstone, as we have seen, entertained the plan of going on, if the House would pass a cabinet reopened their own discussion, and for a day or two by soft words. In compliance with the Queen's request, the bodies on all such occasions struggle to dissolve hard facts -yaud gaingem-ilew doidw yd istilities by which well-meaning busy-In London three or four days were passed in discussing the settled unless all sides were prepared to make concessions. matter of detail; the question was one that could never be was apathetic about reform; the defeat had only touched a The state of Europe, she said, was dangerous; the country tion with the greatest concern, and asked them to reconsider. far away at Balmoral. The Queen received the communica-objeet, however, of what I have said is not to make an argument, of but only to show that it I spoke strongly, I was not also speaking inglity on such a subject.

April 20.—I am afraid I shall not see you before Wednesday—when you are to do us so great a kinduess—but I must write a line to tell you how exceedingly delighted we both are with all we have seen at Windsor. The charm of the princess, so visible at a distance, increases with the increase of nearness; the Queen's tone is delightful. All seems good, delighted, and happy in the family. As regards the Queen's physical strength, it must be satisfactory. As regards the Queen's physical strength, it must be satisfactory. What is more fatiguing than interviews? I has night, however, I saw her at half-past seven, after a long centse of them during the saw her at half-past seven, after a long centse of them during the day. She was quite fresh.

Allay 10.—I can answer you with a very good conscience. The affair of Friday night [his speech on Italy] was on my part entirely drawn forth by the speech of Distrali and the wish of Lord Palmerston. It is D.'s practice, in contravention of the nsage of the Honse, which allows the minister to wind up, to lie by until Lord Palmerston has spoken, and then fire in upon him. So on this occasion I was a willing instrument; but my wife, who was within ten minutes' drive, knew nothing.

We dined at Marlborough House hat night. The charm certainly does not wear off with renewed opportunity. Charendon, who saw her for the first time, fully felt it. Do you know, I believe they are actually disposed to dine with us some day. Do you think you can then be tempted? We asked the Bishop of Brechin to meet you on Thursday. Another bishop has volunteered: the Bishop of Montreal, who is just going off to America. You will not be frightened. Both are rather notable men. The other guests engaged are Cobden, Thackeray, and Mr. Evarts, the other guests engaged are Cobden, Thackeray, and Mr. Evarts, the new U.S. coadjutor to Adams.

July 10.—I knew too well the meaning of your non-appearance, and because I knew it, was sorry for your indisposition as well as for your absence. We had the De Greys, Granville, Sir C. Eastlake, Fechter 1 and others, with the Comte de Paris, who is as simple as ever, but greatly developed and come on. He talked much of America. I hope we may come to-morrow, not later than much of America. I hope we may come to-morrow, not later than in those days,

1866. V. BOOK

But thinking it desirable, I afterwards revived the question, and Lord Russell's proposed amendment. Lord Russell waived this. The Queen offered to write what she had said about do, noisisog oht otni sono as sanid do state a dous ni ytteinim won 2.) on the state of the continent I (and the difficulty of the signing a (I.) on the fact that the decision was on a matter of detail; Queen had founded her hesitation to accept the resignation wished in any case to state, and H.M. approved, that the have an opportunity of voting upon the substance. Lord Russell of detail, and that it was just to the H. of C. that it should had observed that the issue taken was on a point apparently one willing it should be said, with the approval of the cabinet, that she of its being carried. If the proposal were made she was quite assent and concurrence of the cabinet; (2.) The reasonable chance sidered advisable, subject to two conditions: (1.) The general Such a proposal she conproposal further to amend the clause. She had previously seen Lord Russell, and spoke of his ovas impressed with this, and said there was certainly great force itself and parliamentary government were discredited. The Queen

I said to Lord Russell, 'It is singular that the same members of the cabinet (generally speaking) who were prematurely eager for resignation after the division on Lord Grosvenor's motion, are now again eager to accept almost anything in the way of a resolution as sufficient to warrant our continuing in office.' He replied, 'Yes, but I am afraid at the root of both proceedings there is a great amount of antipathy to our Reform bill. They were anxious to resign when resignation would have been injurious to anxious to resign when resignation because resign, and now they are anxious to avoid resignation because resign to may ill be beneficial to it.' Lord Russell showed me a letter he had written to Clarendon justifying me for my unwillingness to accept Mr. Grawferd's motion of confidence. He also said that it the Queen should desire the revival of his plan for a further vote, if the Queen should desire the revival of his plan for a further vote, if the Queen should desire the revival of his plan for a further vote, if the thought it ought to be proposed.

H.M. said she thought it would be better, and went to do it.

On returning, Mr. Gladstone enters in the diary, 'we went to consult Brand and then to the cabinet, when resignation was finally decided on, and a telegram was sent to 1 Prussia had declared war on Austria, June 18.

only to see Lady Herbert. the vacant footfall echoes on the stair. My wife is waiting here conclusion that the war is hopeless. bna enog era nerblide ruO time cease its drive altogether, instead of merely lowering it. and hence it is that one wishes that the wheel would for a little that I get, but treasury business is the most odious that I know, escape me is ungrateful. I ought to be thankful for the remission but more like, yours. However, the murmur which I thus let away, if the words of my other letters were, I will not say like, earg are strategion which requires to be felt before it can pass as post is concerned, and well would it be with me, even in the misplaced. There is no holiday of mine to leave unbroken so far it with interest. . . . Indeed your scruples about writing were indolent as to any exertion beyond reading, but I look forward to journey to Balmoral will not be for some five weeks. I am dreadfully vM noinagmoo boog viev a vely good companion, . . . My success, but he bestows immense labour before closing. He is a to accept it. He has worked very quickly and I think with much my wife accepted his offer, at least by her authority caused me too. He took it into his head to wish to make a bust of me, and process of accompanying them. We have got Mr. Woolner here and October. When any one goes there I always feel a mental a good account of the Queen. They go to Italy for September sister. He was charming, she only stayed a moment. He gave Hawarden, Aug. 21. -We had br Stanley here with his troublesome. Harry is rather oppressed, I think, with the responfellows on their way through town. I hope they were not Penmaenmann, Sept. 20.—It was so kind of you to see our little spod neves to base the head of seven boys?

gliding days recall to mind the busy outer world from which we cold for the season, which draws onwards, however, and the huge compressing forces. Our weather has been and continues tions which the rocks have undergone from igneous action and in columns to the sea, the other for the extraordinary contorvery remarkable, one part for masses of sheer precipices descend-Stack Lighthouse with its grand and savage rocks. They are We went yesterday to visit the Stanleys, and saw the South are so well defended.

.998I

BOOK

tale had been invented. In July, declining an invitation to speak at a demonstration in Hyde Park Mr. Gladstone said he believed the resignation of the government to be a fresh and important step towards final success. 'In the hour of defeat I have the presentiment of victory.'

An interesting glimpse of Mr. Gladstone in the height of these distractions is given in a passage from the diaries of Mr. Adams, still the American minister:—1

After an hour thus spent we rose, and on a question proposed by slong with the ephemeral literature abroad as well as at home. the duties of legislation and official labour, can find time to keep Chadstone, so deeply plunged in the current of politics, and in manner of Hugo. It is a cause of wonder to me how a man like could say 'Yes,' and could contrast it favourably with the artificial The have little acquaintance with the light current literature, I if I had read the Conscrit of Erckmann-Chatrian. Luckily for me, with French. In the latter connection Mr. Gladstone asked me this day, and contrasted with German, which has little of good, and prose as illustrated from the time of Milton and Bacon down to from politics, the House of Commons, and Mr. Mill, to English of his customary indifference to take his share. Thus we passed in keeping it up; whilst the Duke of Argyll was stimulated out a high tone. Lord Houghton, if put to it, is not without aptness with a great command of literary resources, which at once gives it the most extraordinary facility of conversation on almost any topic, which made all the difference in the world. His characteristic is tables, thus dividing the company; but Mr. Aladstone took ours, I did not know. I forgot Lord Dufferin. We sat at two round Cavendish with his wife, and one of his uncles, and several whom Duchess of Argyll, Lord Lyttelton, Lord Houghton, Lord Frederick decision, for the company was very pleasant. The Duke and was invited.... I decided to go. I found no cause to regret the breakfast this morning, at the same time that Colonel Holmes,2 ball Mrs. Gladstone asked me as from her husband, to come to Thursday, Ith June 1866.—The other evening at the Queen's chusetts, and in 1902 appointed a judge of the United States Supreme Court.

2 Son, p. 368. Son of Oliver Wendell Holmes, 2 Son of Oliver Wendell Holmes, afterwards chief justice of Massa-

valley,' the valley of life, over and into which the sun of a better, C of a yet better life, shines narrowly. I do not think our political annals record such a removal of a generation of statesmen before its time as we have witnessed in the last four years. I could say a great deal about Newcastle. He was a high and strong character, very true, very noble, and, I think, intelligible, which (as you know) I think rare in politicians. My relations with him will be kept up in one sense by having to act, and I fear act much, as his executor and trustee, with De Tabley, an excellent colleague, who discharged the same duty for the Duke of Hamilton and for Canning.

Dec. 28.—I cannot give you a full account of Lord Derby's translation [of the Iliad], but there is no doubt in my mind that it is a very notable production. He always had in a high degree the inhorn faculty of a scholar, with this he has an enviable power of expression, and an immense command of the English tongue; add the quality of dash which appears in his version quite as much as in his speeches. Undoubtedly if he urought his execution as Tennyson does, results might have been attained beyond the actual ones; but, while I will not venture to speak of the precision of the version, various passages in the parts I have read are of very high excellence. Try to find out what Tennyson thinks very high excellence. Try to find out what Tennyson thinks of it.

998I

Aug. 8.—My reading has been little, but even without your question I was going to mention that I had caught at the name of 'L'Ami Fritz,' seeing it was by the author of the Conscrit, and had read it. I can recommend it too, though the subject does not at first sight look ravishing: it tells how a middle-aged middle-class German bachelor comes to marry the daughter of his own farm bailiff. Some parts are full of grace; there is a tax-gatherer's spliff. Some parts are full of grace; there is a tax-gatherer's apeech on the duty of paying taxes, which came home to my heart. Though it a little reminds' me of a sermon which I heard preached in an aisle of the Duomo of Milan to the boys of a Sunday school absolute necessity of paying tithes! The golden breadths of absolute necessity of paying tithes! The golden breadths of harvest are now a most lively joy to me. But we have had great official troubles in the death of Mr. Arbuthnot, a pillor of the treasury, and a really notable man, to the healing powers of nature. . . If we cannot arrive in I am concerned, I now leave the wound of the liberal party all that I can usefully say, perhaps more than all. So far as shire. I think that I have said already in one way or other, ing some public celebration or other, especially in Lanca-from that of Maples in 1850, when the whole royal governelse of the kind. The case of Rome in 1866 is very different than that I should meddle with the prisons, or anything 'Nothing can be more unlikely,' he wrote to Acton (Sept. II), St. Angelo. But this was no immediate concern of his. there in 1849 were still in their barracks at the Castle of sional and unstable, and the French troops who had gone The political situation was notoriously provikingdom by the transfer of Venetia. Rome still remained of Sadowa was the further consolidation of the Italian astonishing triumph four years hence. One of the results triumph of Prussia over Austria, foreshadowing a more Seven Weeks' War, the battle of Sadowa (July 3), and the look on the continent of Europe. This was the year of the good reason against a change of ministers the dangerous outproceeded direct to Rome. The Queen had given as one They left England in the last week of September, and gestions, and solicitations.' escape the incessant persecution of correspondence, sugsays Phillimore, 'was really a measure of self-defence, to session I mean, with advantage.' The journey to Italy, might at any time disappear, after the opening of the tion. If we can, then certainly the existing government our line ought to be great patience and quietude in opposito the mode of handling the question of the franchise, then sufficient strength at a definite understanding with respect archbishop took pains to warn his friends at Rome to very strict sense of the word. We now know that the others. I consider myself bound to good conduct in a bas illenotaA lanibash diw noitssiaummos ai em tuq ot having sought and received his cue from Rome. He is tinues, and my impression is that he speaks to me after I have seen Archbishop Manning repeatedly, he conment was nothing but one gross and flagrant illegality.

> .9981 BOOK

We have the cattle plague in full force here, and it has even touched my small group of tenants. To some of them it is a question of life and death; and my brother-in-law, who is by nature one of the most munificent persons I ever knew, is sorely straitened in mind at not being able to do all he would like for lies people. But do not let this sound like complaint from me. Few have such cause for ceaseless and unbounded thankfulness. An Irish youth cut off at twenty-four. By the by, Wortley's children have admirable acting powers, which they showed in charades very cleverly got up by his wife as stage manager. Grosvenor seconds the Speaker, and F. Cavendish moves the address. We have had divers thrushes singing here, a great treat at this season. I like them better than hothouse strawberries.

July 7.—I cannot feel unmixedly glad for yourself that you are returning to Chiswick. For us it will be a great gain. . . Distraeli and I were affectionate at the Mansion House last night. Poor fellow, he has been much tried about his wife's health. The King of the Belgians pleases me, and strikes me more as to his personal qualities on each successive visit. God bless you, my dear duchess and precious friend, affectionately yours.

198T

Hawarden, April 29.—We both hope to have the pleasure of dining at Chiswick on Wednesday. We assume that the hour will be 7.30 as usual. I shall be so glad to see Argyll, and to tell him the little I can about the literary department of the Guardian. I write from the 'Temple of Peace.' It is a sore wrench to go away. But I am thankful to have had such a quiet Easter. The false rumour about Paris has had a most beneficial effect, and has spared me a multitude of demands. The birds are delightful here. What must they be at Cliveden.—Ever affectionately yours.

Armstrong's blank verse [The Prisoner of Mount Saint Michael] not otherwise than good in its ordinary fabric, affords by its occasional excellence a strong presumption that, had he lived, he would have attained to a lived, he would have attained to a consummate mastery of it,'

Henry J. Edmund John Armstrong (1841-65). Republished in 1877. Sir Henry Taylor, Edinburgh Review, July 1878, says of this poet:—'Of all the arts poetic, that which was least understood between the Elizabethan age atood between the Elizabethan age and the second quarter of this century was the art of writing blank verse.

.998

OOK

Its space is amazing, and at particular points it seems to vie with or exceed St. Peter's. But there can be no real comparison in magnificence, and St. Peter's is the more churchlike of the two. The exterior of St. Paul's [beyond the walls] is very mean indeed, and is in glaring contrast with the gorgeousness within.

Rome, Oct. 30.—.. I observe reserve in conversation, except with such persons as cardinals. To two of them who wished me to speak freely I have spoken without any restraint about the great question immediately pending here. And next to them my most free and open conversation has been with the pope, but of course I did not go further than he led me, and on the affairs of Italy this was nearly all the way. I have seen him twice, once in an audience quath, occhi, and once with my wife and daughters, Lady A. Stanley accompanying us. Nothing can be more pleasant than the impression made by his demeanour and language. He looks well and sion made by his demeanour and language. He looks well and

Gibson, and there has come up a singularly interesting portrait fainting. A German, Löwenthal, has done a very good picture of works seen as yet I am most pleased with Tenerani's Psyche another, probably next week, in the catacombs. Among modern finished yet, offers a new world to view, and we expect to see Palace of the Caesars since the French scani, not by any means The pictures have also secured valuable additions. The choose two pieces I should perhaps take the Demosthenes and the ful in its superiority to all others. I think if I were allowed to enriched since I was here. The sculpture gallery is really wonderabout our work of seeing Rome. The Vatican has been much We go quietly much trouble, and we have the Stanleys here. is another which we do not. We are boarded too, which saves are much too small. Besides three rooms which we occupy there nately is cut off from bad management, and the Frattina rooms and secondly a rude plan of the rooms. Half a bedroom unfortufirst a sketch of our general position, nearly opposite the Europa, the Argylls, in the hope that they might take one of the floors) You ask about our 'apartment,' and I send you (partly to inform strong, but seems to have a slight touch of deafness.

(Diary).

reference to the papal coinages.-

in French, rather miscellancous.

.Inau en enoionig envr

1 Oct. 22.—Saw the pope. Oct. 28. with othe pope. Lady Augusta Stanley accompanied us. We had a conversation show the loss it was to Mr. Gladstone:-

could be of any use.

friend. I must go to-morrow, though of course I should stay if I

But I feel, strange as it might sound, ten years the older for her advancing years, my absorbed and divided mind, I cannot tell. have had such bounty for me and should have so freshened my Why this noble and tender spirit should that ever man had. have lost in her from view the warmest and dearest friend, surely, announced the death of the Downger Duchess of Sutherland. I Oct. 28.—The post brought a black-bordered letter which

This year the end came, and a few lines from his diary

Panizzi recovered and lived for eleven years. See Life, ii. p. 299. worthier than I.

more until that day. None will fill her place for me, nor for many death. May the rest and light and peace of God be with her ever

CHAPTER XIV

THE STRUGGLE FOR HOUSEHOLD SUFFRAGE

(L98I)

First of all we had a general intimation and promise that something would be done; then a series of resolutions, which strutted a brief hour upon the stage and then disappeared; then there was a bill, which we were told, on the authority of a cabinet minister, was framed in ten minutes, and which was withdrawn in very little more than ten minutes; and lastly, there was a bill which—undergoing the strangest transformations in its course through parliament—did, I will not say, become the law of the land, but was altered into something like that which became the law of the land, —Gladente.

FROM Rome Mr. Gladstone kept a watchful eye for the approaching political performances at Westminster. He had written to Mr. Brand a month after his arrival:—

51 P. di Spagna, Oct. 30, '66.—The Clarendons are to be here this evening to stay for a fortnight or three weeks. Dean and Lady A. Stanley are in the house with us. I doubt if there are any other English parties in Rome.

The reform movement is by degrees complicating the question. It is separating Bright from us, and in one sense thus clearing our way. But then it may become too strong for us; or at least too strong to be stayed with our bill of last year. I do not envy Lord Derby and his friends their reflections this autumn on the course they have pursued. Meanwhile I wish that our press, as far as we may be said to have one, would write on this text: that a bill from them, to be accepted by the people, must be larger, and not smaller, than would have been, or even would be, accepted from us. For confidence, or credit, stands in politics in lieu of ready money. It, indeed, your enemy is stronger than you are, you must take what he gives you. But in this case whole, pleased with the tone of Gladstone's conversation. It was calm, and for soothing difficulties, not for making them.

1867. V.

I'should add that Gladstone spoke with great kindness about yourself, and about your management of the House of Commons, and said that it would be his wish that you should lead it.'

last man to try to hold him back. now close upon seventy-four—and Mr. Gladstone was the Russell knew that he had little time to spare-he was next session would find them on firm ground. But Lord country would let ministers see where they were, and the read a good Reform bill a first time; then in the recess the party together by bills on which everybody was agreed; to declared that the right course would be first to weld the reconstructed and places found for new men. Others susceptibilities would be soothed, if the government were of unsurpassed perplexity. Some thought that formidable through an anti-reform parliament thus produced a situation dubious or adverse. The necessity of passing a Reform bill committed, and yet of their adherents the majority was hostility before their constituents. All the leaders were were quite as hostile, though not quite as willing to avow onw bətzixə ozla zlandil zaizəlorq to əzairt əldarəbizacə utterly opposed to an extension of the franchise, and a in the new parliament, the tory party was known to be forward with proposals of their own. On the other hand, on all who withstood the tory attempt at a settlement, to come mith the tories2—always took to impose a decisive obligation who, as the reader will recollect, had on that occasion voted forces, had successfully resisted. This move Mr. Gladstonea measure which old whigs and new radicals, uniting their 1858. In 1859 Lord Derby's government had introduced Bright also reduced his policy to the clauses of a bill in and Lord John Russell had brought forward three. throne. Each political party had brought a plan forward, ments since 1849, and mentioned in six speeches from the Reform bills had been considered by five govern-The antecedents of the memorable crisis of 1866-7 were

² See above p. 625.

1 Grey Papers, Oct. 22, 1865.

BOOK

1981

I should suppose, without precedent or parallel, as, on the other the House of Commons eventually proceeded was a measure, proposed and carried by those now in power. The bill on which and carried, as to make sure that, whatever it was, it should be seemed to be not so much to consider what ought to be proposed rapidity. The governing idea of the man who directed the party government to the House of Commons with an unexampled It would be idle to discuss the successive plans submitted by the surely keep down any enlargement of the franchise to its minimum. kindly on the tory government as the power which would most many of them disposed to tamper with the question, and to look to place themselves in declared opposition to the liberal mass, but to reform. There was the bulk of the Adullamite body, unable noitizoqqo sid to dignerts bas seenelgais edt ai medt gaoms enols was Lowe, so great among the Adullamites of 1866, but almost high in character, but absolutely insignificant in numbers. There ment, supported by Sir W. Heathcote and Beresford Hope, was adhered to our idea of an extension, considerable but not violent, separate ourselves from Bright on such a point. minds involving county as well as town), and we could not fairly no ni syswls) sgamus blodsehold sumrage ani bevlovni tadt as not approve. We did not wish to make at once so wide a change small as a measure of enfranchisement. Of such a measure we could was to be found. And the aggregate result would be ludicrously of local law would determine on which side of the line any town ment, some none at all, and no principle but the accidental state second an imposture. Some towns would have large enfranchisecompounding, would be in the first place a lottery, and in the professedly for household suffrage, but taking no notice of paid them without distinction in their rent, showed that a bill majority of the householders made no disbursement of rates, but (2) The existing state of our legislation, under which a large duced into the boroughs, it ought to be a real household suffrage. this: (1) We felt that if liousehold suffrage were to be introof parliamentary success. Our position, on the other hand, was of a government in a decided minority, an extraordinary stroke hand it was, for the purpose of the hour, and as the work

.basimorq il ils gnimrotraq bas

most brilliant debates over heard in the House of Commons now turned upon the mighty puzzle whether the qualification of a borough voter should be occupancy of a ten, a seven, or a six pound house;—nay, whether the ruin or salvation of the state might not lie on the ranor-edge of distinction between rating and rental. Ministers were taunted with having brought in Mr. Bright's bill. Mr. Bright replied that he could not find in it a single point that he had recommended. He was never in favour of a six pound franchise; he believed in a household franchise; but if a seven pound franchise was offered, beggars could not be choosers, and seven pounds he would take. In a fragmentary note of later years Mr. Gladstone, among other things, describes one glittering protagonist of the hour:—

glittering protagonist of the hour:—
glittering protagonist of the hour:—

common ruck of official barons. to those heights trodden by so ferv, ought not to be lost in the power of mind, as it seemed to me that a man who had once soared former elevation, which, though short-lived, was due to genuine came, I pressed his viscountey on the sovereign as a tribute to his that, when all had been reconciled and the time for his peerage for the moment, of personal supremacy, and this to such an extent dishonesty of purpose or arribre-pensee. But his position was one, been surpassed. Nor was there any warrant for imputing to him had such a command of the House as had never in my recollection were his speeches that, during this year, and this year only, he really supplied the whole brains of the opposition. So effective modest Reform bill of 1866 with an implacable hostility, and which did not recognise its finality and sanctity. He pursued our as to be thrown into a temper of general hostility to a government opponent, so superstitiously enamoured of the ten pound franchise combination of discretion and loyalty. Lowe was an outspoken sentative man of popular ideas, behaved with an admirable and by Granville and others of the cabinet. Bright, the reprehe was strongly supported by me as his leader in the Commons, Lord Russell adhered with great tenacity to his ideas, in which

The first trial of strength arose upon a device of one of the greatest of the territorial whigs, seconded by a much more eminent man in the ranks of territorial tories. Lord Grosvenor

.7381 BOOK

It would be idle to discuss the successive plans submitted by the surely keep down any enlargement of the franchise to its minimum. kindly on the tory government as the power which would most many of them disposed to tamper with the question, and to look to place themselves in declared opposition to the liberal mass, but to reform. There was the bulk of the Adullamite body, unable alone among them in the singleness and strength of his opposition was Lowe, so great among the Adullamites of 1866, but almost . high in character, but absolutely insignificant in numbers. ment, supported by Sir W. Heathcote and Beresford Hope, was snd performing all it promised. adhered to our idea of an extension, considerable but not violent, separate ourselves from Bright on such a point. minds involving county as well as town), and we could not fairly no oni sysvils) egarifius blodesuod eniuneg a ni beviovni tadt ea not approve. We did not wish to make at once so wide a change small as a measure of enfranchisement. Of such a measure we could was to be found. And the aggregate result would be ludicrously of local law would determine on which side of the line any town ment, some none at all, and no principle but the accidental state second an imposture, Some towns would have large enfranchisecompounding, would be in the first place a lottery, and in the professedly for household suffrage, but taking no notice of paid them without distinction in their rent, showed that a bill majority of the householders made no disbursement of rates, but (2) The existing state of our legislation, under which a large duced into the boroughs, it ought to be a real household suffrage. (I) We felt that if household suffrage were to be introof parliamentary success. Our position, on the other hand, was of a government in a decided minority, an extraordinary stroke hand it was, for the purpose of the hour, and as the work I should suppose, without precedent or parallel, as, on the other the House of Commons eventually proceeded was a measure, proposed and carried by those now in power. The bill on which and carried, as to make sure that, whatever it was, it should be seemed to be not so much to consider what ought to be proposed rapidity. The governing idea of the man who directed the party government to the House of Commons arith an unexampled

¹ Huns., Mar. 23, 1866, p. 873. ² Lord Robert Cecil had on the death of his elder brother in 1865 become Lord Cranborne. he were the Greek hero sent forth to combat by Pallas transfigure the orator before the vision of the House, as if responsibility of command, the joy of battle, all seemed to The party danger, the political theme, the new but I seemed to be sustained and borne onwards I knew not following Disraeli. It was a toil much beyond my strength, his performances. 'Spoke,' he says, 'from one to past three, to teatesry eaty gnoms sanks, ranks sucort the greatest of found his retort terrible here. His speech on the second and anybody less imperturbable than Disraeli would have Aberdeen once said, 'Gladstone is terrible on the rebound,'3 speech at the Oxford Union five-and-thirty years before. As unvisdom he taunted Mr. Gladstone with his stripling's another, did not put forth all his power. In a moment of tented to watch his adversaries draw their swords on one glittering, energetic, direct, and swift. Mr. Disraeli, coninstincts, and roused all the forces of reform. Lowe was stone, brought the dead horse to life, stirred the combative dead horse. The parliamentary struggle, led by Mr. Glada gairgeoft and retter on as marter than flogging a is a generous quality in it. Mr. Bright once talked of him at times into exaggeration or incaution; but there invective. His impulsiveness, said critical observers, ' betrays all the topics of popular enthusiasm and parliamentary from steady practical argument in the ministerial key, to by a seven pound rental. Speedily Mr. Gladstone passed why kinship in flesh and blood should be strictly limited Cranborne 2 as sentimental rant, and inquiries soon followed good conduct.' This was instantly denounced by Lord blood, who have been lauded to the skies for their fellow-subjects, our fellow-Ohristians, our own flesh and But the persons to whom their remarks apply are our were ascertaining the numbers of an invading army. gentlemen, he said, deal with these statistics, as if they through the discussion inside parliament and out. Some electoral statistics, he let fall a phrase that reverberated objects of such sweeping reproach. In a discussion upon support Hodgkinson's motion. But so it was, and the proposition was adopted without disturbance, as it it had been an affair of trivial importance.

³ Above p. 613.

.738I

BOOK

How it came about I partially learned at a later date. A cabinet was held after the fact, which Sir John Lambert, the great statistician of the day, was summoned to attend. The cabinet had had no idea that the Hodgkinson amendment was to be accepted; the acceptance was the sole act of Mr. Disraeli; and when it had been done the ministers assembled in order to learn from Sir John Lambert what was the probable addition that it would make to the constituency.

in the cities and boroughs of England. So came about the establishment of an effective household suffrage made, as Bright said, the best speech ever delivered against it. humour or comfort the Lords a little, while he detected it, and of a body of liberals who approved it, and which he accepted to Mr. Distraeli was strong enough to secure by means of the votes the bill returned to us, except the minority [representation], which rectify it largely; but these rectifications were all rejected when cation of the bill by the House of Lords. And the Lords did business of theirs. I imagine that they still relied upon rectifitainly no business of ours to complain, and they made it no that Mr. Bright had sought to impose upon them. It was certheir leader had given them a bill virtually far larger than any notice that that limitation had been thrown overboard, and that imposed by personal payment of the rates, found at a moment's brought to accept household suffrage on the faith of the limitation man, this proceeding can be surpassed. The tories, having been I do not suppose that in the whole history of the 'mystery-

III

The process effecting this wide extension of political power to immense classes hitherto without it, was in every respect extraordinary. The great reform was carried by a parliament elected to support Lord Palmerston, and Lord Palmerston detested reform. It was carried by a government in a decided minority. It was carried by a minister and by a leader of opposition, neither of whom was at the time in the full confidence of his party. Finally, it was time in the full confidence of his party. Finally, it was

was only being played with, and they both insisted on going Lord Russell, that this time nobody should say reform men in it stood firm. Mr. Gladstone was as resolute as of its own, hesitated for an hour or two, but the two chief The cabinet, which was not without an imitation cave leader of the House and the leader of the opposition. the horrid Demogorgon. Two men knew much better-the Mr. Lowe believed for the moment that he had really slain triumph followed the announcement of the numbers, and ment voted against their leaders. A scene of delirious of five. Some thirty of the professed supporters of governand ministers were saved—but only by the desperate figure eight nights of debate (April 27) Lord Grosvenor was beaten, was distressed, and every one who was discontented.' After the Cave of Adullam, 'to which every one was invited who and resentments of the men of what Mr. Bright called fervour nor force of argument prevailed against the fears the hour neither man nor cause prospered. Neither not a phrase; it disclosed both a cause and a man. For A CAUSE AND A MAN 688 be resisted. pineteen shillings and sixpence, even that change should the ten pound qualification no lower than nine pounds tion and the cave men, that were it proposed to reduce firm, and formal understanding between the regular opposiwhole operation was conducted upon the basis of a solemn, Such was the temper in which ministers were met. And the he was not in earnest, and did not really care for the bill. offence.' The only effect of this was to spread the tale that with studious care to avoid every word that could give Introducing the bill, says Mr. Gladstone, I struggled to scorn as unhappy men without minds of their own. the views of the House, Mr. Disraeli held up ministers it was called bullying; if he expressed a desire to consult way, he was taunted with cringing; if he stood his ground, the bill was taken in good faith. If Mr. Gladstone gave conservatives admitted, not one of the divisions against not yet struck. As an honourable leader among the Palmerstonian parliament, and the Gladstonian hour had on with the bill. The chances were bad, for this was a that very little reform will be carried, and want to discredit Aladstone. 3. A large body who care for nothing except to avoid a dissolution.' There is a fresh intrigue, he adds,

.7381

BOOK

'every twelve hours.'

The trenchant and sardonic mind of the leader of the revolt that had destroyed the bill of 1866, soon found food for bitter rumination. On the eve of the session Lowe admitted that he had very little hope of a successful end to his efforts, and made dismal protests that the reign of reason was over. In other words, he had found out that the men whom he had placed in power, were going to fing him overboard in what he called this miserable auction between two parties, at which the country was put up for sale, and then knocked down to those who could produce sale, and then knocked down to those who could produce the readiest and swiftest measure for its destruction.

accomplished observer told his constituents that one saw we should get a pair as invincible as the Diescuri. or Bishop Thirlwall with him and then bisect the compound, be! It we could roll up Thompson [master of Trinity] he reflects, a present of phlegm from the gods would saw signs of irritated nerve. 'What an invaluable gift,' at dinner about this time (March 25), thought that he was often difficult to bear. A friend, meeting Mr. Cladstone heard of last year. We can hardly wonder that the strain ables me to understand what was very inexplicable in all I new Lord Halifax; ' but the state of things this year encomplete. 'I have never seen anything like it, says the the old leaders. Insubordination and disorganization were bill would have a better chance with the tories than with Russell and Mr. Chadstone back again; they thought a way and even radicals below, were averse to bringing Lord party of the Tea-Room. Many, both whigs above the ganga new group of dissidents, named from their habitat the government. The place of the empty cave was taken by Alr. Gladstone, but the great majority going with the Lowe and the ablest of its old denizens now voting with The liberal cave of the previous year was broken up,

2 Sir Charles Wood had been created Viscount Halifax on his resignation of the Ludia Oilice in 1866.

promptly acquiescing in advice to throw down the reins. later years, he blamed himself and his colleagues for too When he looked back upon this particular transaction in short of absolute compulsion. To yield was not his temper: life, I think, did Mr. Gladstone ever incline to surrender, to have thought them decisive. At hardly any crisis in his Such were the arguments, though Mr. Gladstone seems not who might thus be driven permanently to the other side. whigs and liberals who had deserted them on reform, and to bring out men of more extreme views to fight the break the party, decause at an election they would have their election only a few months before. It would, moreover, their own friends, who had been put to great expense at take a part in it. The proceeding would be unpopular with impolicy of dissolution that he could not bring himself to whip, told the prime minister that he felt so strongly on the They might appeal to the country. But Mr. Brand, the expert burning boats, most thought no course open but resignation. and after what had been said about crossing Rubicons and number of the disaffected, all this seemed to extinguish hope, vious attempta to get rid of the thing, and the increasing the whole range of the bill. Taken together with the preconfined to a narrow question raised technically, covered by the government. The debate, however, instead of being \sim easily have been adjusted to the figure of rental proposed

I incline to believe that we too readily accepted our defeat by an infinitesimal majority, as a ground for resignation. There were at least four courses open to us: first, resignation; secondly, discolution; thirdly, to deny the finality of the judgment and reverse the hostile vote on report; fourthly, to take shelter under a general vote of confidence which Mr. Crawford, M.P. for the City of London, was prepared to move. Of these, the last was the worst, as disparaging to political character. Lord Russell, secretly conscious, I suppose, that he had arrived at the last stage of his political existence, and desirous that it should not be forcibly abbreviated, inclined to adopt it. Granville and I were so decidedly set against it that we allowed ourselves, I think, to be absorbed in its defeat, and set up against it what was undoubtedly absorbed in its defeat, and set up against it what was undoubtedly

'L98T

BOOK

The bill was read a second time without a division (March firm, and whose view was no doubt the opposite of Lowe's, two days before, whom he found 'sensible, moderate, and second reading.1 He had a long conversation with Mr. Bright edt taiser ton bluoda yeat that they ahould not risisit the he addressed them for nearly an hour, concurring not overover.' A meeting of 278 liberals was held at his house, and ment belwod' egaffur blodesuod to allat yd ban ilearzid slain likewise if he had taken Lowe's advice, for, as he says, slain; and Mr. Gladstone would in a political sense have been ordinary session:-us to realise the state of the case during this extraqled lanuoj s'eromillid tredoR ris ni zeirtne wei A considerable a party? Query -Ought he on account of the defection of 20 to leave so both parties; 289 voted with Gladstone. What will he do! last night; great triumph of Disraeli; a surprise, I believe, to leader fully responded to by him. 13.—Defeat of the opposition that, if deserted, he will abdicate and leave them to find another and especially of his old cabinet. The expression of my wish mingled with due sense of the loyalty of the greater number, His disgust and deep mortification at the defection of his party, 12,—In the middle of the day saw Gladstone and Mrs. Gladstone. Russell and his brother cannot bear Gladstone as their leader. the Coppice with Ld. Richard Cavendish. He tells me Hastings H. of C. Ruszells. Disraeli's insolent triumph. 10.—Returned to Tea-room schism of liberal members, including the themnies of the second diadetone's attack on government the landlord. The next day the diary records: -April 12on the householder whether he paid the rate direct or through of rates as an essential qualification, and to confer the franchise stone moved an amendment to remove the personal payment The occasion just mentioned marked a climax. Mr. Glad-

But when a meeting was tollowers. .(6-89 .qq have overcome the reluctance of his called to take counsel on the situation it became apparent that this could not be done? (Memorials, Part II. is would have been ready to oppose Disraeli's bill as a whole, if he could , Gladstone, says Lord Selborne,

You will have a great party well compacted together, and a great future. Mr. Brand's figures should be forgotten for the moment. . . You must not forget the concluding passage of your great speech on the second reading of the bill. Read it again to nerve you to your great duty.' The Duke of Argyll was strong in the same sense. He saw no chance of 'conducting opposition with decent sincerity or possible success, except in a parliament in which we know who are our friends and who are our enemies on this question.' In the end resignation carried the day:—

the end resignation carried the day:—

June 25.—Cabinet 2½.4½... The final position appeared to be this, as to alternatives before the cabinet.

1. Dissolution, only approved by stority are desurances as to future reform—desired by seven, one more acquiescing reluctantly, six opposing. W. E. G. unable to act on it. 3. Lord Russell's proposal to rehabilitate the clause—disapproved by seven, approved by six, two ready to acquiesce. 4. Resignation, generally accepted, hardly any strongly dissenting. I have had a great ally accepted, hardly any strongly dissenting. I have had a great weight on me in these last days, and am glad the matter draws near its close.

This decision greeted the Queen on her arrival at Windsor on the morning of June 26. Both the prime minister and the chancellor of the exchequer had audiences the same day. Off at 11.30 to Windsor with Lord Russell, much conversation with him. Single and joint audiences with the Queen, who showed every quality required by her stations and the time. We had warm receptions at both stations.' Mr. Gladtime. We had marm receptions at both stations.' Mr. Gladtime.' We had marm receptions at both stations.' Mr. Gladtime.' The interview is as follows:—

Windsor Castle, June 26.—H.M. expressed her regret that this this crisis could not be averted; stated she had wished that this question could have been postponed altogether to another year; or that upon finding the strength and tenacity of the opposition to the measure, it could have been withdrawn. I reminded H.M. that she had early expressed to me her hope that if we resumed the subject of the reform of parliament, we should prosecute it to its completion. Also, I said that in my opinion, from all the miscompletion. Also, I said that in my opinion, from all the miscompletion, and leaders of parties, nor parties alone, and leaders of parties, nor parties alone, and leaders of parties, nor parties alone, but parliament

Windsor. At six I went down and made my explanation for the government. I kept to facts without epithets, but I thought as I went on that some of the words were scorching. A crowd and great enthusiasm in Palace Yard on departure. Lovd Derby was sent for, accepted the royal commission, and finding Mr. Love and the Adullamites not available, and finding Mr. Love and the Adullamites not available, lines, with Mr. Disraeli as its foremost man.

July 6.—Went to Windsor to take my leave. H.M. short but kind. H. of C. on return, took my place on the opposition bench, the first time for fifteen years.¹ . . . Finished in Downing Street. Left my keys behind me. Somehow it makes a void. July 19.—H. of C. Made a little dying speech on reform. Sept. 14.—Woburn. Morning sederunt with Lord Russell and Brand on reform and other matters. We agreed neither to egg on the government nor the reverse.

tradict the story, but not in the columns where the offensive characteristic tenacity he thought it worth while to concompared to Wilkes and Lord George Gordon. ovation from persons of the lowest class. Mr. Gladstone was to have known better, as the ladies of his family courting an The incident was described by newspapers that ought and for the public convenience, she appeared, and all passed or two on the balcony. In compliance with their request would speedily disperse if she would appear for a moment officers sent up word to Mrs. Gladstone that the multitude and liberty. The head of the house was away. Police to Carlton House Terrace, shouting for Gladstone sion of one popular assemblage the crowd thronged June working classes that he really cared for them. On the occahe was the first official statesman who had convinced the Gladstone for their hero, for, as a good observer remarked, they would not brook the refusal of it. They chose Mr. nothmen might set on the franchise for its own sake, and it speedily became evident that whatever value the Turbulent scenes had already occurred in the metropolis,

¹ Mr. Gladstone had sat on the ment in Feb. 1852. See ioutnote, front opposition bench from 1847 p. 631. to the defeat of the Russell govern-

with evila.

annals, and that struck at the very root of that mutual political betrayal that had no parallel in our parliamentary Reform bill should have been purchased at the cost of a political adventurer; regretted, above all things, that the Merciless storms of this kind Mr. Disraeli bore imperconfidence which is the very soul of our party government, mischief devised and regulated by the raging demagogue mediocrities, incapable of anything but mischief, and that of these you will have a horde of selfish and obscure manship, no eloquence, no learning, no genius. Instead seven pound franchise would be a parliament of no statesthis Mr. Disraeli himself had prophesied that the end of a currency, he poured easy ridicule. Yet only a year before the national debt and adopting an inconvertible paper that ever were heard, about the new voters repudiating of the year. On Mr. Lowe's 'most doleful vaticinations maintained, though adapted, of course, to the requirements was in harmony with the general policy they had always opinions. He had not changed his own opinions; the bill else could show that the tory party had changed their public affairs.' He doubted whether Mr. Bright or anybody influenced by a total want of principle in the conduct of somebody else is looked upon as a fool, or as being mainly Everybody who does not agree with -the discussions. turbably. He complained of the intolerant character of promise for the country, though of a promise not unmixed and conduct of the House of Commons, but yet one of eventful year: a deplorable one, I think, for the character Dr. Pusey: -- We have been passing through a strange and Mr. Gladstone summed the matter up in a sentence to of the hour.

.7381

BOOK

Colonel Holmes respecting a group of figures in china which stood in a corner, Mr. Gladstone launched forth into a disquisition on that topic, which he delights in, and illustrated his idea of the art by showing us several specimens of different kinds. One a grotesque but speaking figure in Capo di Monte, another a group of combatants, two of whom were lying dead with all the aspect of strained muscle stiffening; and lastly, a very classical and elegant set of Wedgwood ware, certainly finer than I ever saw elegant set of Wedgwood ware, certainly finer than I ever saw before. This is the pleasantest and most profitable form of English society.

orator was doubtless depicting political ideals of his own. results. In these words so justly applied to Cobden, the without fully weighing and estimating its moral aspects and mind incapable of entertaining the discussion of a question acter of Cobden abundantly supplied. Mr. Cobden's was a and all other such elements were to be found in the charthat so often forms the bane of public life—these elements and estimating them favourably, an absence of the suspicion justice, a singleness of aim, a habit of judging men fairly than it is at the present moment. An intense love of vated by both political parties twenty or thirty years ago more in vogue, far more honoured and esteemed and cultiand propagated in this country—a temper and spirit far and a spirit that ought to be maintained, encouraged, in respect to questions of public economy was a temper a moral principle. The temper and spirit of Mr. Cobden economy was with Cobden, he said, 'nothing less than rather than the practical results of Cobden's work. 'Public As might have been foretold, he emphasised the moral in honour of Cobden, who had died the year before. stone presided over the annual dinner of the club founded Towards the close of the session (July 21) Mr. Glad-

H

In the autumn Mr. Gladstone determined on going abroad with his wife and daughters. 'One among my reasons for going,' he told Mr. Brand, 'is that I think I am better out of the way of politics during the recess. In England I should find it most difficult to avoid for five minutes attend-the present Lord Grey. onwards, and within the sense not only of Lord Macaulay, but of sense of all the leading men with whom I acted, from Peel's death ideas came, and I have spoken according as I believe to be the At last the time for speaking, and therefore for formulating my to fortify or alter or invalidate it by the teachings of experience. mind as there was no cause to precipitate it into life, and waited nooth grant in that year. But I held this embryo opinion in my me to make such a serious affair of my own case about the Mayance in principle was gone. That was the main reason which led radicals. Ever since Maynooth, in 1845, I have seen that resistcastle and Sidney Herbert twenty years ago; and they were not institutions to strengthen the structure above. a measure which promises by reasonably videning the basis of our confidence of the people in governments and parliaments, and also otherwise I feel myself to be upholding principles essential to the ject to be played with or traded on. In thinking and acting just where it placed me; but many seem to think that it is a subthis, that ever since the Aberdeen Reform bill, I have remained sented there by other concessions equally large. The truth is did not appear in the Aberdeen Reform bill of 1852, was repreof which Lord Derby had been put out in 1859, and which, if it the cabinet I had supported in 1860, on the credit and promise That is to eay, of the very franchise which as a member of varmly in favour of the £6 franchise or something equivalent to facio title, but upon the fact that it was a speech decisively and taken to my speech really turned not upon the doctrine of prima With respect to the franchise, my belief is that the objection and the claims of tea were declared to be paramount to those of finance of the country from the hands of the House of Commons; radical one; the House of Lords was encouraged to rescue the the measure which they had approved had become in my hands a House of Commons to take before. Upon this it was found that the same course which the Derby government had assisted the and 1861 the cabinet considered the respective claims, and took and this at a time when the tea duty was at 17d. per lb. In 1860 led by the Derby government, chose to commit itself unanimously, To the repeal of the paper duty the House of Commons, when show their visitor all the kindness possible. 'Gladstone,' he wrote, 'does not come as an enemy, and may be made friendly, or he might become on his return most dangerous.' The liberals would be very jealous of him on the subject of the temporal power of the pope. Meanwhile Gladstone fully held that the Holy Father must be independent. 'Towards us in England,' said Manning,' and towards Ireland he is the most just and forgiving of all our public men. He is very susceptible of any kindness, and his sympathies and respect religiously are all with us.' 1

BOOK

.8881

To the Duchess of Sutherland.

appeared to me the most beautiful of the Italian lakes. the Lake of Lugano, which I had never seen before, and which it somewhat resembles. We were also intensely delighted with the Italian side may perhaps compete with the Via Mala which to the Brenner, except the Bernardino. A part of the ascent on those commonly traversed from the Stelvio downwards (in height) scenery of all the Alpine passes I have seen, and I have seen all · by the old bridge. As to the St. Gothard I think it the finest in Foligno to Terni, and from Spoleto to Marni, where we went close from the north and east, the others through close defiles from to my recollection. It has three grand stages, one of them rising Ancona to Rome. This is much finer than the old road, according mori yswlist odt yd seninneg A odt do egseseg odt ylno bad evad ew châtel to Lucerne, and then by the St. Gothard to Como. Since then tinuous feast of fine scenery; all the way from Pontarlier by Neusay a surfeit or a glut, for these imply excess and satiety, but a con-Rome, Oct. 13.-We had for five days together last week, I will not

Here we find Rome solitary, which we wished, but also wet and dirty, which we did not. We hope it will soon be clear and dry. No scenery and no city can stand the stripping off its robe of atmosphere. And Rome, which is not very rich in its natural features, suffers in a high degree. We caught sight of the pope received that recognition with the hand which is very appropriate, and I imagine to him not at all troublesome. Next week I hope to see Cardinal Antonelli. We have been to-day to St. Paul's, to see Cardinal Antonelli. We have been to-day to St. Paul's.

BOOK labo V. rem 1868. star

Inderious career, who had already followed to the grave the remains of almost all the friends abreast of whom he had started from the university in the career of public life; and who had observed that, excepting two recent cases [I suppose Palmerston and Russell], it was hard to find in our whole history a single man who had been permitted to reach the fortieth year of a course of labour similar to his own within the walls of the House of Commons; such a man might be excused... if he formed a less sanguine estimate of the excused... if he formed a less sanguine estimate of the facused of the formed a less sanguine estimate of the facused... if he formed a less sanguine estimate of the

It was Maynooth that originally cut from under his feet the principle of establishment in Ireland as an obligation of the state. When that went, more general reflections arose in his mind. In 1872 he wrote to Guizot:—

been the case with his critics.'1

It is very unlikely that you should remember a visit I paid you, I think at Passy in the autumn of 1845, with a message from Lord Aberdeen about international copyright. The Maynooth final had just been passed. Its author, I think, meant it to be lating me upon it, as I well remember, said we should have the sympathies of Europe in the work of giving Ireland justice—a remark which evidently included more than the measure just remark which I ever after saved and pondered. It helped me, on towards what has been since done.

'that for years past I have been watching the sky with a strong sense of the obligation to act with the first streak of dawn.' He now believed the full sun was up, and he was right. In an autobiographic note, undated but written near to the end of his days, he says:—

I am by no means sure, upon a calm review, that Providence has endowed me with anything that can be called a striking gift. But if there be such a thing entrusted to me it has been shown at certain political junctures, in what may be termed appreciations of the general situation and its result. To make good the idea, this must not be considered as the simple acceptance of public opinion, deanings, vii. p. 135.

believed to be of Harvey. But it is idle to attempt to write of all of the beauties and the marvels. The church liere is satisfactory; the new clergyman, Mr. Crowther, introduced himself on Sunday with an admirable sermon. We expect the Clarendons to-night. We do Dante every morning, and are in the sixteenth canto.

knocks may be given in the process ? what kind of bound will they spring up again, and what ugly which has for seventeen years bowed them to the ground. sented in the garrison, takes a weight off Roman wills and energies, his share of them. This departure of the might of France repreordered sixteen boxes to be packed with the spoils of Rome, or some grounds, including this, that General Count Montebello had of the departure of the French; in which I believed already on gleams of light. To-day we are at length assured unconditionally great thick clouds in the heaven around us, yet tipped with broad small interest in comparison with the great events that hang as own little tether. But Sevres plates and all other 'objects' are of when I first saw them, already got much too near the end of my should never have passed them on to a seeond purchaser had I not, you do not think them a valuable acquisition. I own that I refused for them a while ago. I shall be much disappointed if · purchased for little more, I believe, than half what the proprietor Sèvres dinner plates, soft paste, which with great spirit he has old in that I have recommended to his notice a beautiful set of old absorbing interests that surround us. I hope for your approbation say what an addition they are, even anidst the surpassing and Dec. 4.—At last we have got the Argylls, and I need not

The trip was not in every respect successful. On Christmas day, he writes to Brand: 'We have had some discomforts. Our apartments twice on fire, a floor burnt through each time. Then I was laid down with a most severe influenza: very sore throat, a thing quite new to me. The Roman climate is as bad for me as can be.' I have been told by one who saw much of the party during the Roman visit, that Mr. Gladstone seemed to care little or not at all about wonders of archæology alike in Christian and pagan Rome, but never wearied of bearing Italian sermons from priests and preaching friars. This was consonant with the whole temper of his life. He

.8881

BOOK

population of this country which qualified them to embrace, in a attitude of attention and preparedness on the part of the whole phenomena came home to the popular mind, and produced that the maintenance of life and property-then it was when these country were swearing themselves in as special constables for mean, he said, the painful, the dangerous, the discreditthe mind of anybody taking part in public affairs. tive audience that Ireland was hardly ever absent from at Bristol in the January of 1868, and told his conservamember of his father's government, went to a banquet the truth was of the plainest. Lord Stanley, then a bear to hear what they cannot fail to see. In this case He never had much patience with people who cannot truth, from any spurious notions of national self-esteem. part of Mr. Gladstone's courage not to muffle up plain This influence was palpable and undoubted, and it was of the Irish controversy.1 manner foreign to their habits in other times, the vast importance at bottom the principle of Pitt and Castlereagh and of many of endowments for religion in Ireland. Mr. Disraeli's was without establishing any other, and with a general cessation of religious equality; disestablishment of the existing church; was the policy of levelling up. It was met by a counter plan protestant establishment were upheld in its integrity. status of the unendowed clergy of that country, provided the eiple of religious equality in Ireland by a great change in the university; and declared their readiness to recognise the prinestablish at the charge of the exchequer a Roman catholic policy of concurrent endowment. They asked parliament to they had nothing better nor deeper to propose than the The conservatives in power took it up, and said later,2 was admitted by both sides to be the question intelligible answer?' The state of Ireland, as Mr. Gladstone when we look for a remedy, who is there to give us an with him, the 'miserable state of things,' and yet he asked, Ireland.' He described in tones more fervid than were usual able state of things that unhappily continues to exist in great whigs, but he might have known, and doubtless did

1 Hansard, May 31, 1869.

2 At Greenwich, Dec. 21, 1868.

we would give him. he will part company the moment he sees his way to more than upon him, more than the government have on us; and I imagine do not like what I see of Bright's speeches. We have no claim should be put into such a position again. Pray consider this. I with evil consequences. It would be most unfortunate if they avoid. In 1859 the liberal party had to play the obstructive, and afraid of, and what I am, for one, above all things anxious to to meet a tortuous bill by a tortuous motion. This is what I am you must yourself go into the wood to drive him. We may have be tortuous too. But if you have to drive a man out of a wood, Ethiopian will not change his skin. His Reform bill of 1867 will 1859. All have been thoroughly tortuous measures. And the the budget of 1852, the India bill of 1858, the Reform bill of Mow he has made in his lifetime three attempts at legislation he does among his compeers, will predominate in its formation. of Disraeli, as leader of the House of Commons, and standing as But their bill will be neither good nor straightforward. The mind as an £8 francliise without tricks, would be easily dealt with. save us much trouble and anxiety. A straightforward bill, such he is weaker, and not stronger. A good bill from them would meutrality: the little outline is sketched with temper and a sort of years after. Time had extinguished the volcanic fires, and described by Mr. Gladstone in a fragment written thirty one of the most curious in our parliamentary history, was The general character of the operations of 1867, certainly had to be recognised. The Salisbury secession from the governhad his peer colleagues at his feet. Besides these, other divisions the opposite principles of Disraeli, who on a tranchise question it has been since the creed and practice of Peel were subverted by another mind. To keep to the drupeau was the guiding motive, as they would have to take; that depended on the secret counsels of us who had been expelled. The first did not know what course regular supporters of the tory ministry, and those grouped around were curiously distributed. The two great bodies were the When the parliament reassembled in 1867, parties and groups of the clock continues, the balance weights are gone.'2 twenty it has, I fear, been on the decline. The movement basis of splendid public services for thirty years; for almost Mr. Gladstone to Granville in 1868, built itself up on the as the repealer of the corn laws. 'A great reputation, wrote 1845, which had provented his name going down in history been Grey's refusal to join his government in December Granville that 'the great disappointment of his life had Lord Russell was now seventy-five. He once told Lord age which, if spared, I shall touch in three days' time.'1

II

898

NOC

r ton si behnim-tdgil bns suolovirt neewted eenereflib edT to Lord Derby as 'frivolous.' He preferred 'light-minded':of Stockmar's Memoirs for rendering 'leichtsinnig' applied government. Mr. Gladstone found fault with the translator health compelled him to retire from his position as head of the counsels of the crown. In February 1868 Lord Derby's was the accession of Mr. Disraeli to the first place in the A more striking event than Lord Russell's withdrawal habit of an unprincipled one. the occasional deviation of an honourable man, not the fixed mental sustained and exhausting efforts of the high art. But this was allowed the excitements of the game to draw him off from the his character. Politics are at once a game and a high art; he passed in the present age, but he had a serious and earnest side to degree with Lord Derby. Not only were his natural gifts unsurlight-minded on one side of his character. So it was in an eminent or perversity of will; further he is frivolous all over, he may be or as people say by nature, whereas he is light-minded by defect broad one. But in my opinion a man is frivolous by disposition,

During the thirty-one years of his life in the House of mentary existence had been four or five years shorter. years older (perhaps more) than Mr. Gladstone; his parliathat his tenure of office could not last long. He was five incident was more dramatic than important; it was plain Mr. Disraeli became prime minister. For the moment, the

I Mr. Gladstone's letter to Lord Russell is given in Walpole's Russell,

ii. p. 446. 2 Till like a clock worn out with eating time, The wheels of weary life at last stood still.—Dryden's Ædipus.

House, our whip met me and stated that Disraeli was about to a stranger emotion of surprise than when, as I was entering the defeat by a majority of a hundred. Mever have I undergone but without an idea that it could be carried, and anticipating its solicitor little known in the House.1 He went there to support it, posal from Mr. Hodgkinson, member for Newark, and a local fullest breadth yet in a form of considerable efficiency, by a promasters of the situation. The question was raised, if not in its government were beyond all doubt, at least for the moment, the intimidated and prudential support of our liberal fringe. on which we could not reckon upon either the conscientions or was really to determine the character of our legislation, was one party. But the grand question of compound householding, which did not venture to uphold against the assaults of their own in the measure were such as the double-facing liberal fringe reached the committee, for some of the restrictions included fession. This we were able to do in some degree, when we reality of the bill into correspondence with its great promade it our next duty to bowl them over by bringing the admitted, bowled ns over by the force of the phrase; and and wishes of the time. But the government, it must be in our view totally inadmissible; the second beyond the wants operation to the idea that the phrase conveyed. The first was or a household suffrage fairly conforming in substance and cabined, and confined by the condition of personal ratepaying, ing choice was whether it should be a household suffrage cribbed, as its battle-ground, was irresistible, and that the only remainwhen the phrase had once been advertised by a government we ought to have recognised that the idea of household suffrage, The result was in a tactical sense highly damaging to us. Perhaps had been warmly approved at party meetings held at my house. of the bill and abandon our plan, although our mode of operation sphere of practical operation, determined to support the principle suffrage], combined with the recommendation to them of a narrow bill had the popular recommendation of a great phrase [household _ But the Adullamite spirit went to work, and finding that the

This proposal was in effect to of parliamentary boroughs. Carried abolish compounding in the limits May 27.

.8881

BOOK

of the clock continues, the balance weights are gone.' $^{\rm 2}$ twenty it has, I fear, been on the decline. The movement basis of splendid public services for thirty years; for almost Mr. Gladstone to Granville in 1868, 'built itself up on the as the repealer of the corn laws.' ' A great reputation,' wrote 1845, which had prevented his name going down in history been Grey's refusal to join his government in December Grandille that 'the great disappointment of his life had Lord Russell was now seventy-five. He once told Lord age which, if spared, I shall touch in three days' time.'

to Lord Derby as 'frivolous.' He preferred 'light-minded':of Stockmar's Memoirs for rendering 'leichtsinnig' applied government. Mr. Gladstone found fault with the translator health compelled him to retire from his position as head of the counsels of the crown. In February 1868 Lord Derby's was the accession of Mr. Disraeli to the first place in the A more striking event than Lord Russell's withdrawal habit of an unprincipled one. the occasional deviation of an honourable man, not the fixed mental sustained and exhausting efforts of the high art. But this was allowed the excitements of the game to draw him off from the his character. Politics are at once a game and a high art; he passed in the present age, but he had a serious and earnest side to degree with Lord Derby. Not only were his natural gifts unsurlight-minded on one side of his character. So it was in an eminent or perversity of will; further he is frivolous all over, he may be or as people say by nature, whereas he is light-minded by defect broad one. But in my opinion a man is frivolous by disposition, The difference between trivolous and light-minded is not a

During the thirty-one years of his life in the House of mentary existence had been four or five years shorter years older (perhaps more) than Mr. Gladstone; bis parliathat his tenure of office could not last long. He was five incident was more dramatic than important; it was plain Mr. Disraeli became prime minister. For the moment, the

ii, p. 446. 2 Till like a clock worn out with eating time, The wheels of weary life at last stood still.—Dryden's Ædipus. Mr. Gladstone's letter to Lord Russell is given in Walpole's Russell,

House, our whip met me and stated that Disraeli was about to a stranger emotion of surprise than when, as I was entering the defeat by a majority of a hundred. Never have I undergone but without an idea that it could be carried, and anticipating its solicitor little known in the House.1 He went there to support it, posal from Mr. Hodgkinson, member for Mewark, and a local fullest breadth yet in a form of considerable efficiency, by a promasters of the situation. The question was raised, if not in its government were beyond all doubt, at least for the moment, the intimidated and prudential support of our liberal fringe. The on which we could not reckon upon either the conscientious or was really to determine the character of our legislation, was one party. But the grand question of compound householding, which and not venture to uphold against the assaults of their own eguiri laredil gaisal-elduob edt aa dous erwe erusaem edt ai reached the committee, for some of the restrictions included fession. This we were able to do in some degree, when we reality of the bill into correspondence with its great proande it our next duty to bowl them over by bringing the admitted, bowled us over by the force of the phrase; and and wishes of the time. But the government, it must be in our view totally inadmissible; the second beyond the wants operation to the idea that the phrase conveyed. The first was bna esnatelus ni gnimrotnos virist egarilus blodesnod a ro cabined, and confined by the condition of personal ratepaying, , beddira egarffuz blodezuod a ed bluodz ti redtetha zaw esiodo zai as its battle-ground, was irresistible, and that the only remainwhen the phrase had once been advertised by a government we ought to have recognised that the idea of household suffrage, The result was in a tactical sense highly damaging to us. Perhaps had been warmly approved at party meetings held at my house. of the bill and abandon our plan, although our mode of operation sphere of practical operation, determined to support the principle suffrage], combined with the recommendation to them of a narrow blodesuod sarid tast a see a seemendation of a great phrase [household But the Adullamite spirit went to work, and finding that the

This proposal was in effect to of parliamentary boroughs. Carried abolish compounding in the limits May 27.

,8881

Lords would undoubtedly fight, as it did, to its last ditch. of awaking the sleuth-hounds of No-popery. The House of its mitred front' in the catholic island, was to run sharp risk of England. To attack a high protestant institution 'exalting own chosen friends and closest allies in the kindred church To attack the Irish church was to alarm and scandalise his nobody could say what the majority was, nor where it lay. many liberals were profoundly disaffected to their leader; tortuous manœuvres that ended in household suffragé; vative; both parties were demoralised by the strange and The parliament was Palmerstonian and in essence conserthere were many pit-falls, and the ground hid dangerous fire. aggravated by the ascendency of religion over religion.' But by it. The fatal ascendency of race over race is unspeakably every other question. Even the land question is exasperated of alienation between Ireland and England. It embitters ment is a great wrong. It is the cause of division in Ireland, wrote to Mr. Gladstone (March 28, '68):—'The Irish establishacts of his life. Manning did not overstate the case when he \mathtt{BOOK}^+ a mere sounding sentence in a speech; it was one of the heroic have made a step, nay a stride, and this stride is on the land, 'is a day of excitement—almost of exultation. We House Terrace. 'This, he wrote to the Duchess of Suthorleader and his two sons as they walked home to Carlton in Westminster Hall, and an enthusiastic crowd followed the victorious party was prodigious, both within the House and 61. The cheering at this demonstration of a united and tion, and carried the preliminary motion by a majority of Within a week of giving notice, he opened the first resolu-Attendant and consequential changes were appended. of Ireland should cease to exist as an establishment. of three resolutions to the effect that the established church Within a week of this historic trumpet-blast, he gave notice nor Chatham's son in 1783, nor anybody else in days gone by. day, and not surpassed by Pym in 1640, nor Chatham in 1758, it with an intrepidity all his own among the statesmen of his stone entered upon it with military promptitude, and pursued Having once decided upon this bold campaign, Mr. Glad-

from religious passion and the prejudice of race, gigantic. The legislative task itself was in complexity and detail, apart

would be no polities, but when we have made full allowance affairs. It may be true that 'if there were no blundors there We always do best to seek rational explanations in largo assented added almost a million voters to the electorate, 1 400,000 new voters, while the measure to which it now in effect, rejected a measure for the admission of only carried by a House of Commons that the year before had,

It was undoubtedly true in a sense that Mr. Gladstone same rule. Household suffrage followed the against the corn law. 1832 by the political unions; free trade by the league emancipation was won by O'Connell; the reform act of ment without severe agitation out of doors. Catholic one of the main changes of that age was carried in parliaby every kind of power. It is worthy of remark that not series of speeches in England, Scotland, and Ireland, marked autumn of 1866 Mr. Bright led a splendid campaign in a franchise, yet they would not stand its refusal. In the though the workmen might not be anxious to demand the people at Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, showed that even a hundred, two hundred, two hundred and fifty thousand from London up to Glasgow, open-air meetings attended by street processions measured by the mile in the great cities Here the demonstration was not little. Riots in Hydo Park, tion was quite enough to frighten them into accepting it. pensation that very little in the way of popular demonstrathat made the ruling classes dread reform, had the comopinion had suddenly swelled to flood. The same timidity done in 1866, would seem to be that the tide of public reversal in 1867 of all that had been said, attempted, and nature of things have a share. The secret of the strange for blunder, caprice, chance, folly, craft, still reason and tho who won't risk a collision with the government, and hope suffrage, but don't want it carried. 2. Whigs (aristocrats), sets of people: -. I. Radicals, who will vote for household (April 10, 1867) describes Mr. Gladstone as hampered by three 1867. But its composition was peculiar. Sir Thomas Acland was at the head of a majority in 1866, and now again in

The electorate was enlarged from 1,352,970 in 1867 to 2,2 o

CHAPTER XVI

PRIME MINISTER

(1000)

Giwonn's let ihm eine Herr, her eele, Und ist ge tellt auf einen Hern cherplatz. Weld une, dashes so ist ! . . . Wohl dem Ganzen, findet Sieh einmal einer, der ein Mittelpunkt Fur viele Tau and wird, ein Halt.

Schulter.

He is poor od by a commanding epirit, And his, too, is the station of command. And well for us it is so. . . . Well for the whole if there be found a man Who makes himself what Nature destined him, The page, the central point of thour and thom andr. Coleridge's Translation.

During the election (Nov. 23) Mr. Gladstone published his Chapter of Autobiography, the history of his journey from XVI. the book of 1838 to the resolutions thirty years later. Lord Air. 59. Granville told him frankly that he never liked nor quite understood the first book; that the description of it in the new 'Chapter' gave him little pleasure; that he had at first a feeling that the less a person in Mr. Gladstone's position published, the better; and that unnecessary explanation would only provoke fresh attacks. But as he read on, these misgivings melted away; he thought the description of a certain phase of the history of the English church one of the most eloquent and feeling passages he ever read; the reference to the nonconformists was a graceful amend to them for being so passionate an Oxonian and churchman; the piece of controversy with Macaulay rather an exaggeration and not easy to understand; the closing pages admirable.

1 Gleanings, vii.

the humour of the great parliamentary chess tournament, C looking at the pieces on the board and the face of Disraeli; — its tragic side in a glimpse of the face of Gladstone; in the mephistophelian nonchalance of one, the melancholy earnest-ness of the other.¹

Far away from the world of politics, we have an estimate sonally popular with any of them. no great attachment to him, nor did he seem to be perhailed his recent exertions in favour of reform, they had agree with them, and though they admired his talents, and on many points, especially on all church matters, he did not him as an opponent for many years; the radicals knew that House of Commons. For the old whig party remembered sympathy or connection with any considerable party in the self went on to say that Gladstone had, in truth, no that neither of them was fit for it. And Halifax himgoverned by Diaraeli and Gladstone, and the Duke observed him that things were drifting into the country being the Duke of Bedford when he was dying, and had said to Lord Halifax that he had gone down to see his brother profoundest minutiæ. About this time, Lord Russell told it was lazy about details, he insisted upon teaching it the cynical about popular equality, and he was enthusiastic; earnest; the House was lax and he was strict; it was press,—the House was indifferent, and Mr. Gladstone was his foes. As it was excellently put by a critic in the over-righteousness, both chafed his friends and exasperated lined face, his 'glare of contentious eagerness,' his seeming than a little feared; and that Gladstone, with his deeply devised retort, was neither liked nor trusted, though more from behind his mask, now and again launching a well-Everybody knew that Disraeli, as he watched the scene of Mr. Gladstone at this time from the piercing satirist of his age. 'Is not he at any rate a man of principle,' said a quaker lady to Carlyle. 'Oh, Gladstone!' the sage replied, 'I did hope well of him once, and so did John Sterling, though I heard he was a Puseyite and so forth; still it seemed the right thing for a state to feel itself bound to he assailed the system of making things pleasant all round, CHAP. stimulating local cupidity to feed upon the public purse, XVI. and seattering grants at the solicitation of individuals and classes. No minister that ever lived toiled more sedulously, in office and out of office, to avert this curse of popular government. The main staple of his discourse was naturally the Irish case, and though within the next twenty years he acquired a wider familiarity with detail, he never exhibited the large features of that ease with more cogent and persuasive mastery. He told the story of the transformation of the franchise bill with a combined precision, completeness and lightness of hand that made his articles of charge at once extremely interesting and wholly unanswerable. In a vein of pleasant mockery, on the accusation that he was going to ruin and destroy the constitution, he reminded them that within his own recollection it had been wholly ruined and destroyed eight times: in 1828 by the repeal of the Corporation and Test acts; in 1829 by admitting Roman eatholies to parliament; in 1832 by reform; in 1846 by free trade; in 1849 by repeal of the navigation law; in 1858 when Jews were allowed to sit in parliament; in 1866 when the government of Lord Russell had the incredible audacity to propose a reform bill with the intention of carrying it or falling in the attempt. It was a magnificent eampaign. But in South-West Laneashire the church of England was strong; orange prevailed vastly over green; and Mr. Gladstone was beaten. Happily he had in anticipation of the result, and by the eare of friends, already been elected for Greenwich.1 In the kingdom as a whole he was triumphant. The liberal majority was 112. When the gross votes were added up, it was calculated that the liberals had a million and a half and the conservatives less than a million.2 After a long era of torpor a powerful party thus once more came into

AET. 59.

¹ In Lancashire (Nov. 24) the 6939. At Greenwich (Nov. 17)—numbers were—Cross, 7729; Turner, Salomons, 6645; Gladstone, 6351; 7676; Gladstone, 7415; Grenfell, Parker, 4661; Mahon, 4342.

Liberal. Conservative. Liberal Majority. 1,231,450 824,056 23,391 407,393 ² England and Wales, 123,410 100,019 Scotland. 17,297 36,083 53,379 Ireland.

. Halifax Papers. him. If they can point out any statesman who can add not follow him have any one who is equal, let them show his convictions? If these gentlemen who say they will eloquence? Who equals him in courage and fidelity to Who equals him in earnestness? Who equals him in Mr. Gladstone in knowledge of all political questions? in the House of Commons, he demanded, 'who equals Speaking to his constituents at Birmingham, 'Who is there least effusive of all men in the direction of large panegyric. among them none was more stout than Mr. Bright, the of his friends, he was not without valiant backers, and to his oar. If Mr. Gladstone was much buffeted in the house appended. So day after day amid surf and breakers he held ville and others who cut off a fine peacock's tail that I had ency in my letter to Crawford. That is all owing to Granfriendly critics, he said to Brand, 'note a tone of despondheretofore to remain at the service of the party. The further amendment of his own, he was not less willing than he told his correspondent that though he would move no Considering the large number who supported his proposal, renommoo to second end to vironim a dud virolem a don ever liberals whose convictions allowed united action upon reform the members for the City, a supporter, it showed that the vas undoubtedly severe. As Mr. Gladstone wrote to one of bench did lodge itself in his mind for long. The 'smash' did almost everybody else.' still the notion of a back at the present moment, and went out of town, as indeed leader of the opposition. He was dissuaded from doing this announcing that he would give up the ostensible post of the morning. He spoke of retiring to a back bench, and the late government whom he summoned to his house in stone expressed himself strongly to five or six members of expected to stay away voted with the government. Glad-Cranborne secession was small, and some who had been with the government, while nearly 20 were absent. The secession had taken place, and 43 liberal members voted Spoke in reply and voted in 289-310. A smash perhaps without example. A victory of 21 for ministers. A new -

XVI.
Air. 59.

CHAP.

this letter) to explain, the Queen would impose no restrictions on Mr. Gladstone as to the arrangement of the various offices in the manner which he believes to be best for the public service, and she trusts that he will find no difficulty in filling them up, or at least the greater part of them, so that the council may be held before the 13th. Mr. Gladstone will understand why the Queen would wish to be spared making any arrangements of this nature for the next few days after the 13th. The Queen adds what she said on a similar occasion two years and a half ago to Lord Derby, that she will not name any time for seeing Mr. Gladstone, who may wish to have an opportunity of consulting some of his friends, before he sees her; but that, as soon as he shall have done so, and expresses a desire to see the Queen, she will be ready to receive him.

One of his first letters after undertaking to form a government was to Lord Russell, to whom he said that he looked forward with hope and confidence to full and frequent communications, and to the benefit of his friendship and advice. 'There remains, however, a question,' he went on; 'you have an experience and knowledge to which no living statesman can pretend; of the benefit to be derived from it, I am sure that all with whom I can be likely to act would be deeply sensible. Would it be too great an invasion of your independence to ask you to consider whether you could afford it as a member of the cabinet without the weight of any other responsibility?' Lord Russell replied in cordial terms, but said that the servitude of a cabinet, whether with or without a special office, was what he did not wish to encounter. 'What I should have said,' he added at a later date (Dec. 28), 'if the office of the president of the council or the privy seal had been offered me, I do not know: at all events I am personally very well satisfied to be free from all responsibility.' Sir George Grey also declined, on the ground of years: he was within one of the three score and ten allotted to mortal man. Lord Halifax, on whose ability and experience both the Queen and Mr. Gladstone set special value, declined the Irish viceroyalty, and stood goodnaturedly aside until 1870 when he joined as privy scal. The vaters, really because at present Gladstone refuses to take the chair at the dinner, though attached to Brand, because many who had deserted him (G.) would attend the dinner. Gladstone will not countenance the appearance of a sham union when the party is discredited. June 7.—Attack on Gladstone as being in debt hard pressed by creditors, and therefore wishing for office. The malice against him is wonderful. 29.—Dined at Newspaper Press Fund. Gladstone in the chair, made a really faultless speech. Fund. Gladstone in the chair, nor the flow of his eloquence never did I hear his voice better, nor the flow of his eloquence more unbroken.

Two or three items more from Mr. Gladstone's diary are worth recording:—

May 9.—Spoke earnestly and long for compound householders, May 9.—Spoke earnestly and long for compound householders, in vain. Beaten by 322-256. Much fatigued by heat and work, May 28.—Spoke (perforce) on Disraeli's astonishing declaration of consistency. July 15.—Third reading of Reform bill. A remarkable night. Determined at the last moment not to take part in the debate, for fear of doing mischiel on our own side.

demain; talked about borrowing their ethics from the that the House should have applauded a policy of legerscale. In his most biting style, Lord Cranborne deplored seats was extended into an operation of enormously larger bank franchise, all disappeared; that the distribution of dual vote, voting papers, educational franchise, savingsdemand that lodgers were invested with votes; that the the dictation of Gladstone. It was at Mr. Gladstone's the result of the adoption of the principles of Bright at final shape, after undergoing countless transformations, as the chief conservative seceder, described the bill in its men, and the execration of posterity.' Lord Cranborne, of office; but it merits alike the contempt of all honest may fail or not; it may lead to the retention or the loss never was there tergiversation so complete. Such conduct party. 'Never,' cried Mr. Lowe, in desolation and chagrin, year as severe as have ever fallen on the head of an English sharghts from his followers and confederates of the previous The conservative leader himself was exposed to oninfluence in the councils of Europe. Only eighteen or twenty months remained to him; they were spent in useful activity. My relations with him were, as they were afterwards with Granville, close, constant, and harmonious.

CHAP. XVI.

Of this cabinet Mr. Gladstone always spoke as one of the best instruments for government that ever were constructed.\(^1\) Nearly everybody in it was a man of talent, character and force, and showed high capacity for public business. In one or two eases, conformably to the old Greek saying, office showed the man; showed that mere eleverness, apart from judgment and discretion is only too possible, and that good intention only makes failure and incapacity in carrying the intention out, so much the more mortifying. The achievements of this cabinet as a whole, as we shall see, are a great chapter in the history of reform and the prudent management of national affairs. It forms one of the best vindications of the cabinet system, and of the powers of the minister who created, guided, controlled and inspired it.

'And so,' Manning, the close friend of other years, now wrote to him, 'you are at the end men live for, but not, I believe, the end for which you have lived. It is strange so to salute you, but very pleasant. . . . There are many prayers put up among us for you, and mine are not wanting.' At an earlier stage sympathetic resolutions had been sent to him from nonconformist denominations, and in writing to Dr. Allon who forwarded them, Mr. Gladstone said:—'I thank you for all the kind words contained in your letter, but most of all for the assurance, not the first I am happy to say which has reached me, that many prayers are offered on my behalf. I feel myself by the side of this arduous undertaking a small creature; but where the Almighty sends us duties, He also sends the strength needful to perform them.' To Mr. Arthur Gordon, the son of Lord Aberdeen, he wrote (Jan. 29, 1869):—

As regards my own personal position, all its interior relations are up to this time entirely satisfactory. I myself, at the period of the Aberdeen administration, was as far as the world in general

¹ The reader will find the list of its members, now and at later periods of its existence, in the Appendix.

CHYPTER XV

OPENING OF THE IRISH CAMPAIGN

(898T)

'I chaim not to have controlled events, but confess plainly that events have controlled me. Now at the end of three years' struggle, the nation's condition is not what either party or any man desired or expected.'—Abraham Lincoln (1864).

Writing to his brother-in-law, Lord Lyttelton, in April 1865, Mr. Gladstone sets out pretty summarily the three incidents that had been taken to mark the line of his advance in the paths of extreme and visionary politics. When it was written, his speech on the franchise the previous year had not ripened, and his speech on the Irish church was only on the eve, nor did he yet know it, of taking shape as a deliberate policy of action.

To Lord Lyttelton.

Conversation of Wednesday evening, which looked before and after, and for your share in which I heartily thank you, has led me to review the subject matters, a process which every man in public life as well as elsewhere ought often to perform, but which the pressure of overwork, and the exhaustion it leaves behind, sadly hinder. But I sum up in favour of a verdict of 'Not suilty,' on the following grounds.

As far as I know, there are but three subjects which have exposed me to the charge of radicalism: the Irish church, the franchise, the paper duty, and the consequent struggle with the House of Lords. My opinions on the Irish church were, I know, those of New-

Book HI

1869-1874

CHAPTER I

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY

(1869)

In the removal of this establishment I see the discharge of a debt of civil justice, the disappearance of a national, almost a world-wide reproach, a condition indispensable to the success of every effort to seeme the peace and contentment of that country; finally relief to a devoted clergy from a false position, cramped and heset by hopeless prejudice, and the opening of a freer career to their sacred ministry.—Gladstone.

Anybody could pulverise the Irish church in argument, and to show that it ought to be disestablished and disendowed was the easiest thing in the world. But as often happens, what it was easy to show ought to be done, was extremely hard to do. Here Mr. Gladstone was in his great element. It was true to say that 'never were the wheels of legislative machinery set in motion under conditions of peace and order and constitutional regularity to deal with a question greater or more profound,' than when the historie protestant church in Ireland was severed from its sister church in England and from its ancient connection with the state. The case had been fully examined in parliament. After examination and decision there, it was discussed and decided in the constituencies of the United Kingdom. Even then many held that the operation was too gigantic in its bearings, too complex in the mass of its detail, to be practicable. Never was our political system more severely paper. In proposing the repeal of the last remaining excise duty upon a simple article of manufacture, I adopted a principle which had already received an unanimous acceptance. In resisting to the uttermost of my power the encroachment of the House of Dords, I acted, as I believe, on the only principle which makes it practicable to defend the true, legitimate, and constitutional powers of that House itself against encroachment from other quarters.

CHAP. I.

Now let me look at the other side of the question. On church rates, on university tests, on clerical subscription (the two last being the only two questions really of principle which, as far as I remember, have been raised), I have held my ground; and on the two last the cabinet of which I form a part has in the main adopted a course essentially (but with a little c) conservative.

replied, 'who in 1865 completed his thirty-third year of a that the question would come on in his time? 'A man,' he feelings. Why did he say that he did not then believe not be able to keep himself from giving expression to his that he had made up his mind on the subject, and should judgment went, he had told Sir Roundell Palmer in 1863, on the practical politics of the day.' So far as his own question was 'remote and apparently out of all bearing of 1865 he wrote to the warden of Glenalmond that the and this I take it we are not prepared for.' In the summer almost an engagement to take it up on some early occasion, motion of this kind with the previous question only, implies the ground of time, as well as on the merits. To meet a to the Irish secretary (April ?), we may always put it on negative. In meeting a question with a negative, he wrote toeting a motion against the Itish church with a direct the House, he concurred with Lord Russell, then first minister, that the time had come. In 1866, when he was leader of He agreed with the mover on the merits, but did not believe Lish church 'called for the early attention of the government,' against a radical member who had moved that the case of the Irish church held its ground. In 1865 Mr. Gladstone voted powers of the Lords in matters of taxation was settled. The The question of franchise was settled, the question of the

Book VI

1869-1874

CHAPTER I

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY

(1869)

In the removal of this establishment I see the discharge of a debt of civil justice, the disappearance of a national, almost a worldwide reproach, a condition indispensable to the success of every effort to secure the peace and contentment of that country; finally relief to a devoted clergy from a false position, cramped and beset by hopeless prejudice, and the opening of a freer career to their sacred ministry.—Gladstone.

ANYBODY could pulverise the Irish church in argument, and to show that it ought to be disestablished and disendowed was the easiest thing in the world. But as often happens, what it was easy to show ought to be done, was extremely hard to do. Here Mr. Gladstone was in his great It was true to say that 'never were the wheels of legislative machinery set in motion under conditions of peace and order and constitutional regularity to deal with a question greater or more profound,' than when the historic protestant church in Ireland was severed from its sister church in England and from its ancient connection with the state. The case had been fully examined in parliament. After examination and decision there, it was discussed and decided in the constituencies of the United Kingdom. Even then many held that the operation was too gigantic in its bearings, too complex in the mass of its detail, to be practicable. Never was our political system more severely

СНАР. 1. Æт. 60.

. . . .8081 ,barlerI rof yilinpo renewal of the Income-tax in 1853; 2. The proposal of religious these considerations may be applicable. They are these :- 1. The There are four occasions of my life with respect to which I think forming a public opinion and for directing it to a particular end. generates in the mind a conviction that the materials exist for facts of particular eras, and their relation one to another, which needful for a given work, like a tide. It is an insight into the founded apon the discormant that it has visen to a certain height can really be done, what is this but to call him a man of clines to attempt to do a thing until he believes that it Yet if an opportunist de defined as a statesman who deto label this with the ill-favoured name of opportunist. The remaining two will appear in good time. It is easy common sense ;

down part of the wall and cost several lives. contined, and fired it. The explosion that followed blew up to the wall of a prison in London where a comrade was hanged. In December a Fenian rolled a barrel of gunpowder in charge, a crime for which three of them were afterwards two Fenian prisoners from a police van, and shot an officer In September, at Manchester, a body of armed men rescued Fenian plots and the mischief flowed over into England. In 1867 Ireland was disturbed by bold and dangerous wide . . . when the inhabitants of the different towns of the inhuman outrage, when a sense of insecurity went abroad far and when the metropolis itself was shocked and horrified by an the tranquillity of the great city of Manchester was disturbed, suspended, when all the consequent proceedings occurred, when Feninism was this that when the habeas corpus Act was to the course proper to be pursued in Ireland. The influence of degree, the convictions which we have entertained with respect deen an influence in determining, or in affecting in the slightest important influence with respect to Irish policy; but it has not with whom I communicated, the Renian conspiracy has had an and was much blamed for saying,—and in the opinion of many In my opinion,—Mr. Gladstone said afterwards in parliament, archdeacon of Meath, a moderate who disliked the policy but wished to make the best of the inevitable, gave Mr. Gladstone the benefit of his experience and ability. When the work was done, Mr. Gladstone wrote to the archdeacon more than once expressing his sense of the advantage derived from his 'thorough mastery of the subject and enlightened view of the political situation.' He often spoke of Stopford's 'knowledge, terseness, discrimination, and just judgment.'

CHAP.

Æт. 60.

1

Meanwhile his own course was clear. He did not lose a day:—

Dec. 13, 1868.—Saw the Queen at one, and stated the case of the Irish church. It was graciously received. 24.—At night went to work on draft of Irish church measure, feeling the impulse. 25.—Christmas Day. Worked much on Irish church abbozzo. Finished it at night. 26.—Revised the Irish church draft and sent it to be copied with notes.

The general situation he described to Bishop Hinds on the last day of the year:—

We cannot wait for the church of Ireland to make up her mind. We are bound, nay compelled, to make up ours. Every day of the existence of this government is now devoted to putting forward by some step of inquiry or deliberation the great duty we have undertaken. Our principles are already laid in the resolutions of the late House of Commons. But in the mode of applying them much may depend on the attitude of resistance or co-operation assumed by the Irish church. It is idle for the leading Irish churchmen to think 'we will wait and see what they offer and then ask so much more.' Our mode of warfare cannot but be influenced by the troops we lead. Our three corps d'armée, I may almost say, have been Scotch presbyterians, English and Welsh nonconformists and Irish Roman catholics. We are very strong in our minority of clerical and lay churchmen, but it is the strength of weight not of numbers. The English clergy as a body have done their worst against us and have hit us hard, as I know personally, in the counties. Yet we represent the national force, tested by a majority of considerably over a hundred know, how odious it would bo to the British householders, who were far more like King George III. than they at all c supposed.

111

At Christmas in 1867 Lord Russell announced to Mr. Gladsix confuries. shores, that had been under our dominating influence for to assimilate to enrecives an island within three hours of our never despair of redeeming the repreach of total incapacity bluow of drug awo sid you have better to do of redden though this might be, was the right conclusion that it was mischief, you cannot undo it at an instant's notice. be healed in a moment. When you have long persevered in a happy and contented people. Inveterate diseases could not he said, that these things would not convert the Irish into college, should all be dealt with in turn.\ \tau \text{finight be true,} rights of the cultivator of the soil. The church, the land, the the reform of its religious institutions, the adjustment of the the promotion of higher education in a backward country, claimed an Irish policy on Irish lines, that should embrace At Southport (Dec. 19) he first raised his standard, and proselves to Mr. (Andstone in all their melancholy dimensions, The wider aspects of the Irish case opened themnevo in the party was likely to be an attack upon the Irish and discovered clearly from the conversation that the next face. In the autumn Roundell Palmer visited Mr. Cardwell, ook the position of the Irish church fairly and fully in the timo could not be far distant when parliament would have to in May, 1867, Mr. Gladstone had told the House that the stone his intention not again to take office, in other words to retire from the titular leadership of the liberal party. Alr. Chadstone did not deny his claim to repose. 'Peel,' he said, 'in 1846 thought he had secured his dismissal at an head, and Lord Derby as his condintor.

'But this commission,' he says, 'did not venture to face any considerable change, and as they would not move, I, who might be held in a manner to have appealed to them, could denothing.'

Ite had also in his own mind the question of the acquisition of the question of the state, and the Irish railways by the position of the royal family in regard to Iroland. On the first of these two heads he was able to man a good commission, was able to man a good commission, with the Duke of Devoushire at its

On Feb. 12, the Queen wrote to Mr. Gladstone from Osborne:—

Ær. 60

CHAP

The Queen has seen the Bishop of Peterborough according to the suggestion made by Lord Granville with the sanction of Mr. Gladstone, and has communicated to him in the strictest confidence the correspondence which had passed between herself and Mr. Gladstone on the subject of the Irish church. She now sends Mr. Gladstone a copy of the remarks made by the bishop on the papers which she placed in his hands for perusal, and would earnestly entreat Mr. Gladstone's careful and dispassionate consideration of what he says. She would point especially to the suggestion which the bishop throws out of the intervention of the bench of English bishops. The country would feel that any negotiation conducted under the direction of the Archbishop of Canterbury would be perfectly safe, and from the concessions which the Bishop of Peterborough expresses his own readiness to make, the Queen is sanguine in her hope that such negotiations would result in a settlement of the question on conditions which would entirely redeem the pledges of the government and be satisfactory to the country. The Queen must therefore strongly deprecate the hasty introduction of the measure, which would serve only to commit the government to proposals from which they could not afterwards recede, while it is certain from what the bishop says, that they would not be accepted on the other side, and thus an acrimonious contest would be begun, which, however it ended, would make any satisfactory settlement of the question impossible.

He replied on the following day:-

Feb 13.—First the bishop suggests that the endowments posterior to the Reformation should be given to the church, and those preceding it to the Roman catholics. It would be more than idle and less than honest, were Mr. Gladstone to withhold from your Majesty his conviction that no negotiation founded on such a basis as this could be entertained, or, if entertained, could lead to any satisfactory result. Neither could Mr. Gladstone persuade the cabinet to adopt it, nor could the cabinet persuade the House of Commons, nor could cabinet and House of Commons

both, he was to contend for a dozen years to come. sixteen years past, and with whom on a loftier elevation for captain with whom Mr. Gladstone had contended for some of the imposing figures of his time. This was the political prolonged conflict against impediments of every kind, one employing, creating political occasions, all made him, after debate and the work of parliament; his genius in capying, attention and industry, his steadfast courage, his talent in something great. His inexhaustible patience, his active at Rome, in spite of all the rococo, there was etuas grosses, and spaciousness of character; as Goetho said of St. Peter's magniloquence of phrase was the expression of real size ficial, but he was no pharisee, and he was never petty. His was his, and he often saw both deep and far; he was artiborn man of letters; the faculty of slow reflective brooding He had culture, innagination, fancy, and other gifts of a come later. Meanwhile the nation had got used to him. confidence at all on the part of the country. That was to possessing the full confidence of his adherents, or any real These two extraordinary feats he had performed without had revolutionised the base of our parliamentary constitution. a party. In the name of that party, called conservative, he Sir Robert Peel twenty-two years before he had built up importance they were supreme. Out of the wreckage left by capacity. In two achievements only had he succeeded, but in and attracted Air. Gladstone, he had no taste and little legislation in the constructive sense in which it interested Russell followed the debating needs of the hour. and his criticisms on the foreign policy of Palmerston and his own beyond being Austrian and papal rathor than Italian, budgets made no mark. In foreign affairs he had no policy of years. He had chosen finance for his department, but his office (from 1852 to 1868), covering little more than as many Commons, up to now he had enjoyed three short spells of

On a motion about the state of Ireland, proceeding from an Irish member (March 16, 1868) Mr. Gladstone at last launched before parliament the memorable declaration that the time had come when the church of Ireland as a church in alliance with the state must cease to exist. This was not that the government, especially in the absence of other CH support, must look. Meanwhile the bill had made its way through the cabinet:—

Feb. 8.—Cabinet, on the heads of Irish Church bill. 9.—Cabinet, we completed the heads of the Irish Church measure to my great satisfaction. 19.—At Lambeth, 12-1½ explaining to the archbishop. 22.—Conclave on Irish church, 2-4½ and 5½-7¾. After twenty hours' work we finished the bill for this stage.

П

On March 1, Mr. Gladstone brought his plan before a House of Commons eager for its task, triumphant in its strength out of doors, and confident that its leader would justify the challenge with which for so many months the country had been ringing. The details are no longer of concern, and only broader aspects survive. A revolutionary change was made by the complete and definite severance of the protestant episcopal church in Ireland alike from the established church of England and from the government of the United Kingdom. A far more complex and delicate task was the winding up of a great temporal estate, tho adjustment of many individual and corporate interests, and the distribution of some sixteen millions of property among persons and purposes to be determined by the wisdom of a parliament, where rival claims were defended by zealous and powerful champions influenced by the strongest motives. sacred and profane, of party, property, and church. necessary to deal with the sums, troublesome though not considerable, allotted to the presbyterians and to the catholic seminary at Maynooth. Machinery was constructed for the incorporation of a body to represent the emancipated church, and to hold property for any of its uses and purposes. Finally, the residue of the sixteen millions, after all the just demands upon it had been satisfied, computed at something between seven and eight millions, was appropriated in the words of the preamble, 'not for the maintenance of any church or clergy, nor for the teaching of religion, but mainly for the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering' not touched by the poor law.

On a motion about the state of Ireland, proceeding from both, ho was to contend for a dozen years to come. sixteen years past, and with whom on a loftier elevation for captain with whom Mr. Gladstone had contended for some of the imposing figures of his time. This was the political prolonged conflict against impediments of every kind, one employing, creating political occasions, all made him, after debate and the work of parliament; his genius in espying, attontion and industry, his steadfast courage, his talent in something great. His inexhaustible patience, his active at Rome, in spite of all the recoee, there was etuas grosses, and spaciousness of character; as Goethe said of St. Peter's magniloquence of phrase was the expression of real size ficial, but he was no pharisee, and he was never petty. His was his, and he often saw both deep and far; he was artiborn man of letters; the faculty of slow reflective brooding He had culture, inagination, fancy, and other gifts of a come later. Meanwhile the nation had got used to him. confidence at all on the part of the country. That was to possessing the full confidence of his adherents, or any real These two extraordinary feats he had performed without had revolutionised the base of our parliamentary constitution. a party. In the name of that party, called conservative, he importance they were supreme. Out of the wreckinge left by Sir Robert Peel twenty-two years before he had built up capacity. In two achievements only had he succeeded, but in and attracted Mr. Gladstone, he had no taste and little legislation in the constructive sense in which it interested Russell followed the debating needs of the hour. For and his criticisms on the foreign policy of Palmerston and his own beyond being Austrian and papal rather than Italian, budgets mado no mark. In foreign affairs he had no policy of years. Ho had chosen finance for his department, but his office (from 1852 to 1868), covering little more than as many Commons, up to now he had enjoyed three short spells of in alliance with the state must cease to exist. T'

On a motion about the state of Ireland, proceeding from an Irish member (March 16, 1868) Mr. Gladstone at last launched before parliament the memorable declaration that the time had come when the church of Ireland as

that the government, especially in the absence of other CHAP. support, must look.' Meanwhile the bill had made its way through the cabinet :-

Feb. 8 .- Cabinet, on the heads of Irish Church bill. Cabinet, we completed the heads of the Irish Church measure to my great satisfaction. 19 .- At Lambeth, 12-12 explaining to the archbishop. 22.—Conclave on Irish church, 2-41 and 51-73. After twenty hours' work we finished the bill for this stage.

On March 1, Mr. Gladstone brought his plan before a House of Commons eager for its task, triumphant in its strength out of doors, and confident that its leader would justify the challenge with which for so many months the country had been ringing. The details are no longer of concern, and only broader aspects survive. A revolutionary change was made by the complete and definite severance of the protestant episcopal church in Ireland alike from the established church of England and from the government of the United Kingdom. A far more complex and delicato task was the winding up of a great temporal estate, the adjustment of many individual and corporate interests, and the distribution of some sixteen millions of property among persons and purposes to be determined by the wisdom of a parliament, where rival claims were defended by zealous and powerful champions influenced by the strongest motives, sacred and profane, of party, property, and church. It was necessary to deal with the sums, troublesome though not considerable, allotted to the presbyterians and to the catholic seminary at Maynooth. Machinery was constructed for the incorporation of a body to represent the emancipated church, and to hold property for any of its uses and purposes. Finally, the residue of the sixteen millions, after all the just demands upon it had been satisfied, computed at something between seven and eight millions, was appropriated in the words of the preamble, 'not for the maintenance of any church or clergy, nor for the teaching of religion, but mainly for the relief of unavoid-able calamity and suffering' not touched by the poor law.

ducted business for five or six years, though in a minority, but being morally supported by a majority, as we have been supported by a majority.' In this crisis he pursued a peculiar course. He advised the Queen to dissolve the parliament; but at the same time he told her Majesty that if she thought the interests of the country would be better served, he tendered his resignation. The Queen did not accept it, he said; and the ministerial decision was to dissolve in the autumn when the new constituencies would be in order. The statement was not clear, and Mr. Gladstone sought in vain to discover with precision whether the prime minister had begun by resigning, or had presented two alternatives leaving the decision to the Queen, and did he mean a dissolution on existing registers? The answer to these questions was not definite, but it did not matter.

This episode did not check Mr. Gladstone for a moment in his course; in a week after the resolutions were carried, he introduced a bill suspending the creation of new interests in the Irish church. This proof of vigour and resolution rapidly carried the suspensory bill through the Commons. The Lords threw it out by a majority of 95 (June 29). we sometimes smile at the sanguine prediction of the optimist, the gloom of his pessimist opponent is more ludicrous. 'If you overthrow the Irish established church,' cried the Archbishop of Dublin, 'you will put to the Irish protestants the choice between apostasy and expatriation, and every man among them who has money or position, when he sees his church go will leave the country. If you do that, you will find Ireland so difficult to manage that you will have to depend on the gibbet and the sword.' The Bishop of Chester and Bishop Thirlwall, whom Mr. Gladstone described as 'one of the most masculine, powerful, and luminous intellects that have for generations been known among the bishops of England,' were deliberately absent from the division. The effect of the bill was not impaired, perhaps it was even heightened; for it convinced the public that its author meant earnest and vigorous business, and the air was instantly alive with the thrill of battle. For it is undoubted that if the country cares for a thing, the resistance to it of the hereditary House seems to add spice and an element of sport.

that the government, especially in the absence of other CHAI support, must look.' Meanwhile the bill had made its way I. through the cabinet:—

Fcb. 8.—Cabinet, on the heads of Irish Church bill. 9.— Cabinet, we completed the heads of the Irish Church measure to my great satisfaction. 19 .- At Lambeth, 12-12 explaining to the archbishop. 22.—Conclave on Irish church, 2-4½ and 5½-7¾. After twenty hours' work we finished the bill for this stage,

On March 1, Mr. Gladstone brought his plan before a House of Commons eager for its task, triumphant in its strength out of doors, and confident that its leader would justify the challenge with which for so many months the country had been ringing. The details are no longer of concern, and only broader aspects survive. A revolutionary change was made by the complete and definite severance of the protestant episcopal church in Ireland alike from the established church of England and from the government of the United Kingdom. A far more complex and delicate task was the winding up of a great temporal estate, the adjustment of many individual and corporate interests, and the distribution of some sixteen millions of property among persons and purposes to be determined by the wisdom of a parliament, where rival claims were defended by zealous and powerful champions influenced by the strongest motives, sacred and profane, of party, property, and church. It was necessary to deal with the sums, troublesome though not considerable, allotted to the presbyterians and to the catholic seminary at Maynooth. Machinery was constructed for the incorporation of a body to represent the emancipated church, and to hold property for any of its uses and purposes. Finally, the residue of the sixteen millions, after all the just demands upon it had been satisfied, computed at something between seven and eight millions, was appropriated in the words of the preamble, 'not for the maintenance of any church or clergy, nor for the teaching of religion, but mainly for the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering' not touched by the poor law.

short, he was all for publication. Another close friend of Mr. Gladstone's, Sir Robert Phillimore, told him (Nov. 29):— 'I am satisfied that you have done wisely and justly both with reference to the immediate and future influence of your character as a statesman. It is exactly what a mere man of the world would not have done. His standard would have been the ephemeral opinion of the clubs, and not the earnest opinion of the silent but thoughtful persons to whom the moral character of their chief is a matter of real moment and concern.' Newman wrote to him from the Oratory at Birmingham, 'It is most noble, and I can congratulate you with greater reason and more hearty satisfaction upon it, than I could upon a score of triumphs at the hustings.' The man of the world and the man at the club did not hide their disgust, but Phillimore was right, and great hosts of people of the other sort welcomed in this publication a sign of sincerity and simplicity and desire to take the public into that full confidence, which makes the ordinary politician tremble as undignified and indecorous.

That Mr. Gladstone had rightly divined the state of public feeling about Ireland was shown by the result. Manning put the case in apt words when he wrote to him: 'I have been much struck by the absence of all serious opposition to your policy, and by the extensive and various support given to it in England and Scotland. It is not so much a change in men's thoughts, but a revelation of what they have been thinking.' Heart and soul he flung himself into the labours of his canvass. The constituency for which he had sat in the expiring parliament was now divided, and with Mr. H. R. Grenfell for a colleague, he contested what had become South-West Lancashire. The breadth, the elevation, the freshness, the power, the measure, the high self-command of these speeches were never surpassed by any of his performances. When publicists warn us, and rightly warn us, that rash expenditure of money extracted from the taxpayer and the ratepayer is the besetting vice and peril of democracy, and when some of them in the same breath denounce Mr. Gladstone as a demagogue pandering to the multitude, they should read the speech at Leigh, in which

that the government, especially in the absence of other CHAP. support, must look.' Meanwhile the bill had made its way through the cabinet:-

Feb. 8.—Cabinet, on the heads of Irish Church bill. 9.— Cabinet, we completed the heads of the Irish Church measure to my great satisfaction. 19.—At Lambeth, 12-1½ explaining to the archbishop. 22.—Conclave on Irish church, $2-4\frac{1}{2}$ and $5\frac{1}{2}-7\frac{3}{4}$. After twenty hours' work we finished the bill for this stage.

II

On March 1, Mr. Gladstone brought his plan before a House of Commons eager for its task, triumphant in its strength out of doors, and confident that its leader would justify the challenge with which for so many months the country had been ringing. The details are no longer of concern, and only broader aspects survive. A revolutionary change was made by the complete and definite severance of the protestant episcopal church in Ireland alike from the established church of England and from the government of the United Kingdom. A far more complex and delicate task was the winding up of a great temporal estate, the adjustment of many individual and corporate interests, and the distribution of some sixteen millions of property among persons and purposes to be determined by the wisdom of a parliament, where rival claims were defended by zealous and powerful champions influenced by the strongest motives, sacred and profane, of party, property, and church. It was necessary to deal with the sums, troublesome though not considerable, allotted to the presbyterians and to the catholic seminary at Maynooth. Machinery was constructed for the incorporation of a body to represent the emancipated church, and to hold property for any of its uses and purposes. Finally, the residue of the sixteen millions, after all the just demands upon it had been satisfied, computed at something between seven and eight millions, was appropriated in the words of the preamble, 'not for the maintenance of any church or clergy, nor for the teaching of religion, but mainly for the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering' not touched by the poor law.

CHAP. I.

ÆT. 60.

ment was thrown out in December 1852 by 19. The same government was again thrown out seven years later by 13. Palmerston was beaten in 1857 by 14, and the next year by In 1864 Palmerston's majority on the Danish question was only 18. The second reading of the Franchise bill of 1866 was only carried by 5, and ministers were afterwards beaten upon it by 11. With Mr. Gladstone's accession the ruling majority for a long time stood at its highest both in size and stability.

With invincible optimism, Mr. Gladstone believed that he would now have 'material communications from the heads of the Irish church'; but letters from Lord Spencer at Dublin Castle informed him that, on the contrary, they were angrier after they knew what the majority meant, than they were before. 'At the diocesan conferences throughout Ireland the bill was denounced as highly offensive to Almighty God, and the greatest national sin ever committed. The Archdeacon of Ossory told churchmen to trust in God and keep their powder dry, though he afterwards explained that he did not allude to carnal weapons. The cabinet was called a cabinet of brigands, and protestant pastors were urged to see to it that before they gave up their churches to an apostate system a barrel of gunpowder and a box of matches should blow the cherished fabrics to the winds of heaven.

Even Mr. Disraeli's astuteness was at fault. The Archbishop of Canterbury perceived from his conversation that he was bent on setting the liberals by the ears, that he looked for speeches such as would betray utter dissension amid professed agreement, that he had good hopes of shattering the enemy, and 'perhaps of playing over again the game that had destroyed Lord Russell's Reform bill of 1866.' The resounding majority on the second reading, he told the archbishop, was expected; it created no enthusiasm; it was a mechanical majority.1

1 Life of Tait, ii. pp. 18-19. 'Dizzy said very little,' he wrote How little he was himself the dupe of these illusions was shown by the next sentence, 'What is of importance now is the course to be pursued lost game in the Commons.'—Life of the House of Lords.' Bishop Archbishop Magee, i. p. 214.

of these illusions was shown by the next sentence, 'What is of importance now is the course to be pursued by the House of Lords.' Bishop Magee met Disraeli on Jan. 28, '69.

inclusion in the same cabinet of Mr. Bright, who had been _ the chief apostle of reform, with Mr. Lowe, its fiercest persecutor, startled the country. As for Lowe, Lord Acton said to me that he once informed Mr. Gladstone that Lowe had written the review of his Financial Statements in the periodical of which Acton was editor. 'He told me at Grillion's that I thereby made him chancellor of the exchequer.' With Bright he had greater difficulties. He often described how he wrestled with this admirable man from eleven o'clock until past midnight, striving to overcome his repugnance to office. The next day Bright wrote to him (Dec. 5):- 'Since I left you at midnight I have had no sleep, from which you may imagine the mental disturbance I have suffered from our long conversation last night. Nevertheless I am driven to the conclusion to take the step to which you invite me, surrendering my inclination and my judgment to your arguments and to the counsel of some whom I have a right to consider my friends. . . . I am deeply grateful to you for the confidence you are willing to place in me, and for the many kind words you spoke to me yesterday.' In the parched air of official politics the relation of these two towards one another is a peculiar and a refreshing element. In the case of Lord Clarendon, some difficulty was intimated from Windsor before Mr. Gladstone began his task. Mr. Gladstone says in one of his late notes:-

Clarendon had already held with credit and success for a lengthened period the seals of the foreign office, and his presumptive title to resume them was beyond dispute. He was a man of free and entertaining and almost jovial conversation in society, and possibly some remark culled from the dinner hour had been reported to the Queen with carelessness or malignity. I do not know much of the interior side of court gossip, but I have a very bad opinion of it, and especially on this ground, that while absolutely irresponsible it appears to be uniformly admitted as infallible. In this case, it was impossible for me to recede from my duty, and no grave difficulty arose. So far as I can recollect the Queen had very little to say in objection, and no keen desire to say it. Clarendon was the only living British statesman whose name carried any in England. Perhaps I should not have spoken of religious equality, for in fact the establishment was known to be adoomed, and the fight turned upon the amount of property with which the free church was to go forth to face its new fortness. 'I should arge the House of Lords,' wrote the Archbishop of Canterbury to Mr. Gladstone (June 3), 'to give all its attention to saving as large an endowment as possible.'

СНАР.

Er. 60.

As at the first stage the Queen had moved for conciliatory courses, so now she again desired Archbishop Tait to communicate with the prime minister. To Mr. Gladstone himself she wrote from Balmoral (June 3):—The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his kind letter. She has invariably found him most ready to enter into her views and to understand her feelings. The first question was whether the Lords should reject the bill on the second reading:—

It is eminently desirable, Mr. Gladstone wrote to the archbishop (June 4), that the bill should be read a second time. But if I compare two methods, both inexpedient, one that of rejection on the second reading, the other that of a second reading followed by amendments incensistent with the principle, I know no argument in favour of the latter, except what relates to the very important question of the position and true interest of the House of Lords itself.

At the same time he promised the archbishop that any views of his upon amendments should have the most careful attention of himself and his colleagues, and 'they would be entertained in a spirit not of jealonsy but of freedom, with every desire to bring them into such a shape that they may be in furtherance, and not in derogation, of the main design of the bill.'

General Grey, the Queen's secretary, told Mr. Gladstone that she had communicated with the archbishop, 'having heard that violent connsels were likely to prevail, and that in spite of their leaders, the opposition in the House of Lords was likely to try and throw out the measure on the second reading.' Her own feeling was expressed in General

eould possibly be, from either expecting or desiring it. I thought at that time that when Lord Russell's career should end, the Duke of Newcastle would be the proper person to be at the head of the government. But during the government of Lord Palmerston, and long before his health broke down, I had altered this opinion; for I thought I saw an alteration both in his tone of opinion, and in his vigour of administration and breadth of view. Since that time I have seen no alternative but that which has now come about, although I am sensible that it is a very indifferent one.

On December 29 he enters in his diary:—'This birthday opens my sixtieth year. I descend the hill of life. It would be a truer figure to say I ascend a steepening path with a burden ever gathering weight. The Almighty seems to sustain and spare me for some purpose of His own, deeply unworthy as I know myself to be. Glory be to His name.' In the closing hours of the year, he enters:—

This month of December has been notable in my life as follows: Dec. 1809.—Born. 1827.—Left Eton. 1831.—Classes at Oxford. 1832.—Elected to parliament. 1838.—Work on Church and State published. 1834.—Took office as lord of the treasury. Secretary of state. 1852.—Chancellor of exchequer. First lord. Rather a frivolous enumeration. Yet it would not be so if the love of symmetry were carried with a well-proportioned earnestness and firmness into the higher parts of life. I feel like a man with a burden under which he must fall and be crushed if he looks to the right or left or fails from any cause to concentrate mind and muscle upon his progress step by step. This absorption, this excess, this constant ayav is the fault of political life with its insatiable demands, which do not leave the smallest stock of moral energy unexhausted and available for other purposes. . . . Swimming for his life, a man does not see much of the country through which the river winds, and I probably know little of these years through which I busily work and live. . . . It has been a special joy of this December that our son Stephen is given to the church, 'whose shoe latchet I am not worthy to unloose.'

CHAP.

Æт. 60.

in England. Perhaps I should not have spoken of religious equality, for in fact the establishment was known to be doomed, and the fight turned upon the amount of property with which the free church was to go forth to face its new fortunes. 'I should urge the House of Lords,' wrote the Archbishop of Canterbury to Mr. Gladstone (June 3), 'to give all its attention to saving as large an endowment as possible.'

As at the first stage the Queen had moved for conciliatory courses, so now she again desired Archbishop Tait to communicate with the prime minister. To Mr. Gladstone himself she wrote from Balmoral (June 3):—'The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his kind letter. She has invariably found him most ready to enter into her views and to understand her feelings.' The first question was whether the Lords should reject the bill on the second reading:—

It is eminently desirable, Mr. Gladstone wrote to the archbishop (June 4), that the bill should be read a second time. But if I compare two methods, both inexpedient, one that of rejection on the second reading, the other that of a second reading followed by amendments inconsistent with the principle, I know no argument in favour of the latter, except what relates to the very important question of the position and true interest of the House of Lords itself.

At the same time he promised the archbishop that any views of his upon amendments should have the most careful attention of himself and his colleagues, and 'they would be entertained in a spirit not of jealousy but of freedom, with every desire to bring them into such a shape that they may be in furtherance, and not in derogation, of the main design of the bill.'

General Grey, the Queen's secretary, told Mr. Gladstone that she had communicated with the archbishop, 'having heard that violent counsels were likely to prevail, and that in spite of their leaders, the opposition in the House of Lords was likely to try and throw out the measure on the second reading.' Her own feeling was expressed in General could possibly be, from either expecting or desiring it. I thought at that time that when Lord Russell's career should end, the Duke of Newcastle would be the proper person to be at the head of the government. But during the government of Lord Palmerston, and long before his health broke down, I had altered this opinion; for I thought I saw an alteration both in his tone of opinion, and in his vigour of administration and breadth of view. Since that time I have seen no alternative but that which has now come about, although I am sensible that it is a very indifferent one.

On December 29 he enters in his diary:—'This birthday opens my sixtieth year. I descend the hill of life. It would be a truer figure to say I ascend a steepening path with a burden ever gathering weight. The Almighty seems to sustain and spare me for some purpose of His own, deeply unworthy as I know myself to be. Glory be to His name.' In the closing hours of the year, he enters:—

This month of December has been notable in my life as follows: Dec. 1809.—Born. 1827.—Left Eton. 1831.—Classes at Oxford. 1832.—Elected to parliament. 1838.—Work on Church and State published. 1834.—Took office as lord of the treasury. Secretary of state. 1852.—Chancellor of exchequer. First lord. Rather a frivolous enumeration. Yet it would not be so if the love of symmetry were carried with a well-proportioned earnestness and firmness into the higher parts of life. I feel like a man with a burden under which he must fall and be crushed if he looks to the right or left or fails from any cause to concentrate mind and muscle upon his progress step by step. This absorption, this excess, this constant ayav is the fault of political life with its insatiable demands, which do not leave the smallest stock of moral energy unexhausted and available for other purposes. . . . Swimming for his life, a man does not see much of the country through which the river winds, and I probably know little of these years through which I busily work and live. . . . It has been a special joy of this December that our son Stephen is given to the church, 'whose shoe latchet I am not worthy to unloose.'

took a step from which Mr. Gladstone hoped for 'most important consequences,' in writing direct to Lord Derby, dwelling on the danger to the Lords of a collision with the Commons. In a record of these proceedings prepared for Mr. Gladstone (August 4, '69), Lord Granville writes:—

Ær. 60.

CHAP.

Before the second reading of the Irish Church bill in the House of Lords, I was asked by the Archbishop of York to meet him and the Archbishop of Canterbury. They said it was impossible for them to vote for the second reading in any case, but before they decided to abstain from voting against it they wished to know how far the government would act in a conciliatory spirit. I made to them the same declaration that I afterwards made in the House, and after seeing you I had another interview with the Archbishop of Canterbury. I told his grace that it was impossible for the government to suggest amendments against themselves, but I gave a hint of the direction in which such amendments might be framed, and, without mentioning that the suggestion came from you, I said that if his grace would tell Dr. Ball that he only wished to propose amendments which it would be possible for the government to accept, that learned gentleman would know better than others how it could be done. The archbishop, however, seems chiefly to have made use of Dr. Ball to supply him with arguments against the government.

The result was doubtful to the very end. It was three o'clock in the morning (June 19) before the close of a fine debate—fine not merely from the eloquence of the speakers and cogency of argument on either side, but because there was a deep and real issue, and because the practical conclusion was not foregone. It was the fullest House assembled in living memory. Three hundred and twenty-five peers voted. The two English archbishops did not vote, and Thirlwall was the only prelate who supported the second It was carried by a majority of 33. In 1857 Lord Derby's vote of censure on Palmerston for the China war was defeated by 36, and these two were the only cases in which the conservatives had been beaten in the Lords for twenty years. Thirty-six conservative peers, including Lord Salisbury, voted away from their party in favour of the second reading.

tested, and never did it achieve a completer victory. Every great organ of the national constitution came into active play. The sovereign performed a high and useful duty. The Lords fought hard, but yielded before the strain reached a point of danger. The prelates in the midst of anger and perturbation were forced round to statesmanship. The Commons stood firm and unbroken. The law, when at length it became law, effected the national purpose with extraordinary thoroughness and precision. And the enterprise was inspired, guided, propelled, perfected, and made possible from its inception to its close by the resource, temper, and incomparable legislative skill of Mr. Gladstone. That the removal of the giant abuse of protestant establishment in Ireland made a deeper mark on national well-being than other of his legislative exploits, we can hardly think, but—quite apart from the policy of the act, as to which there can now be scarcely two opinions—as a monument of difficulties surmounted, prejudices and violent or sullen heats overcome, rights and interests adjusted, I know not where in the records of our legislation to find its master.

With characteristic hopefulness and simplicity Mr. Gladstone tried to induce Archbishop Trench and others of the Irish hierarchy to come to terms. Without raising the cry of no surrender, they declined all approaches. If Gladstone, they said, were able to announce in the House of Commons a concordat with the Irish clergy, it would ruin them both with the laity of the Irish establishment, and with the English conservatives who had fought for them at the election and might well be expected, as a piece of party business if for no better reasons, to fight on for them in the House of Lords. Who could tell that the Gladstone majority would hold together? Though 'no surrender' might be a bad cry, it was even now at the eleventh hour possible that 'no popery' would be a good one. In short, they argued, this was one of the cases where terms could only be settled on the field of battle. There were moderates, the most eminent being Bishop Magee of Peterborough, who had an interview with Mr. Gladstone at this stage, but nothing came of it. One Irish clergyman only, Stopford the the interview had been impatisfactory, but gave me an assurance of his desire to avoid a conflict. . . . On the 4th of July I wrote again suggesting a compromise on Lord Carnarvon's clause. He declined, that clause being the one thing they cared about. He ended by telling me his growing impression was, that there would be no Church bill this session.

CHAP.

Ær. 60.

The general result of the operations of the Lords was to leave disestablishment complete, and the legal framework of the bill undisturbed. Disendowment, on the other hand, was reduced to a shadow. An additional sum of between three and four millions was taken for the church, and the general upshot was, out of a property of sixteen millions, to make over thirteen or fourteen millions to an ecclesiastical body wholly exempt from state control. This, Mr. Gladstone told the Queen, the House of Commons would never accept, and the first effect of persistence in such a course would be a stronger move against the episcopal seats in the Honse of Lords than had been seen for more than two hundred years. He ridiculed as it deserved the contention that the nation had not passed judgment on the question of disendowment, and he insisted that the government could not go further than three quarters of a million towards meeting the extravagant claims of the Lords. Confessing his disappointment at the conduct of the episcopal body, even including the archbishop, he found a certain consolation in reflecting that equally on the great occasions of 1829 and 1831, though 'the mild and wise Archbishop Howley was its leader,' that body failed either to meet the desires of the country, or to act upon a far-sighted view of the exigencies of the church. · One point obstinately contested was the plan for the future application of the surplus. A majority of the Lords insisted on easting out the words of the preamble providing that the residue should not be applied for purposes of religion, and substituting in one shape or another the principlo of concurrent endowment, so hostile, as Mr. Gladstone judged it, to the peace of Ireland, and so irreconcilable with public feeling in England and Scotland.

On July 12, the bill came back to the Commons. The voices. It is hazardous in these times to tamper with such a force.

The preparation of the bill went rapidly forward:-

Hawarden, Jan. 13, 1869 .- Wrote out a paper on the plan of the measure respecting the Irish church, intended perhaps for the Queen, Worked on Homer. We felled a lime. 14.-We felled another tree. Worked on Homer, but not much, for in the evening came the Spencers [going to Dublin], also Archdescon Stopford, and I had much Irish conversation with them. 15.-We felled an ach. Three hours conversation with the viceroy and the archdescon. I went over much of the roughest ground of the intended measure; the archdeacon able and helpful. Also convereation with the viceroy, who went before 7. Worked on Homer at night. 19 .- One hour on Homer with Sir J. Acton. Whist in evening. 20.-Further and long conversations on the Irish church question and its various branches with Granville, the attorney-general for Ireland, and in the evening with Dean Howson, also with Sir J. Acton. 21 .- Wrote a brief abstract of the intended bill. Woodcutting. 23,-Saw the Queen [at Osborne] on the Irish church especially, and gave H.M. my paper with explanation, which appeared to be well taken. She was altogether at ease. We dined with H.M. afterwards. 24.—Saw her Mnjesty, who spoke very kindly about Lord Clarendon, Mr. Bright, Mr. Lowe, the Spanish crown, Prince Leopold, Mr. Mozley, and so forth, but not a word on the Irish church. Feb. 4.-A letter from H.M. to-day showed much disturbance, which I tried to soothe.

In February Lord Granville thought that it might do good if the Queen were to see Bishop Magee. Mr. Gladstone said to him in reply (Feb. 7 '69):—

The case is peculiar and not free from difficulty. On the whole I think it would be wrong to place any limit upon the Queen's communications to the Bishop of Peterborough except this, that they would doubtless be made by H.M. to him for himself only, and that no part of them would go beyond him to any person whatever.

.Ет. 60

involved a meaning which Mr. Gladstone declared that no CHAP. power on earth could induce the Commons to accept. crisis was of unsurpassed anxiety for the prime minister. Ho has fortunately left his own record of its phases:1-

Saturday, July 17,-On the 16th of July the amendments made by the Lords in the Irish Church bill had been completely disposed of by the Honse of Commons. The last division, taken on the disposal of the residue, had, chiefly through mere lazy absences, reduced the majority for the government to 72. This relative weakness offered a temptation to the opposition to make play upon the point. The cabinet met the next forenoon. We felt on the one hand that it might be difficult to stake the bill on the clause for the disposal of the residue, supposing that to be the single remaining point of difference; but that the postponement of this question would be a great moral and political evil, and that any concession made by us had far better be one that would be of some value to the disestablished church.

By desire of the cabinet I went to Windsor in the afternoon, and represented to II. M. what it was in our power to do: namely, although we had done all we could do upon the merits, yet, for the sake of peace and of the Honse of Lords, [we were willing], (a) to make some one further pecuniary encession to the ehurch of sensible though not very large amount; (b) to make a further concession as to curates, slight in itself; (c) to amend the residue clause so as to give to parliament the future control, and to be content with simply declaring the principle on which the property should be distributed. The Queen, while considering that she could not be a party to this or that particular scheme. agreed that it might be proper to make a representation to the archbishop to the general effect that the views of the government at this crisis of the measure were such as deserved to be weighed, and to promote confidential communication between us. intimated her intention to employ the Dean of Windsor as a medium of communication between herself and the archbishop. and wished me to explain particulars fully to him. I went to the deanery, and, not finding the dean, had written as much as here follows on a scrap of paper, when he eame in. . . .

¹ The memorandum is dated Aug. 14, 1869.

united persuade the nation to acquiesce, and the very attempt would not only prolong and embitter controversy, but would weaken authority in this country. For the thing contemplated is the very thing that the parliament was elected not to do.

Osborne, Feb. 14.—The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his long letter, and is much gratified and relieved by the conciliatory spirit expressed throughout his explanations on this most difficult and important question. The Queen thinks it would indeed be most desirable for him to see the Archbishop of Canterbury—and she is quite ready to write to the archbishop to inform him of her wish and of Mr. Gladstone's readiness to accede to it, should he wish it.

'My impression is,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville (Feb. 14), that we should make a great mistake if we were to yield on the point of time. It is not time that is wanted; we have plenty of time to deal with the Bishop of Peterborough's points so far as they can be dealt with at all. Sir R. Palmer has been here to-day with overtures from persons of importance unnamed. I think probably the Archbishop of Canterbury and others.1 I do not doubt that on the other side they want time, for their suggestions are crude.

On the following day (Feb. 15) the Queen wrote to the archbishop, telling him that she had seen Mr. Gladstone, 'who shows the most conciliatory disposition,' and who at once assured her 'of his readiness-indeed, his anxiety-to meet the archbishop and to communicate freely with him.' The correspondence between the Queen and the archbishop has already been made known, and most of that between the archbishop and Mr. Gladstone, and I need not here reproduce it, for, in fact, at this first stage nothing particular came of it.2 'The great mistake, as it seems to me,' Mr. Gladstone writes to Archdeacon Stopford (Feb. 8), 'made by the Irish bishops and others is this. They seem to think that our friends are at the mercy of our adversaries, whereas our adversaries are really at the mercy of our friends, and it is to these latter remember which, in order to form the basis of my communication to the archbishop. I returned from my interview, and reported, as I afterwards did to the Dean of Windsor, that his tone was friendly, and that he appeared well disposed to the sort of arrangement I had sketched.

¹ No: Archbishop Trench and Lord Carnarvon. See Selborne, Memorials, i. pp. 114-6.
² See Life of Tait, ii. pp. 8-14.

CHAP. I. ÆT. 60.

Tuesday, July 20.—The archbishop, who had communicated with Lord Cairns in the interval, came to me early to-day and brought a memorandum as a basis of agreement, which, to my surprise, demanded higher terms than those of Mr. Disraeli. I told the archbishop the terms in which we had already expressed ourselves to Mr. Disraeli. . . . Meantime an answer had come from Mr. Disraeli stating that he could not do more. Then followed the meeting of the opposition peers at the Duke of Marlborough's.

On the meeting of the Houses, a few of us considered what course was to be taken if the Lords should again cast out of the preamble the words which precluded concurrent endowment; and it was agreed to stay the proceedings for the time, and consider among ourselves what further to do. [Lord Granville has a pencil note on the margin, 'The first order I received was to throw up the bill, to which I answered that I could not do more than adjourn the debate.'] Lord Granville made this announcement accordingly after the Lords had, upon a hot debate and by a large majority, again excluded our words from the preamble [173: This had been after a speech from Lord Cairns, in which he announced his intention of moving other amendments which he detailed, and which were in general conformable to the proposals already made to us. The first disposition of several of us this evening, myself included, was to regard the proceeding of the opposition as now complete; since the whole had been announced, the first stroke struck, and the command shown of a force of peers

11.	The Lords' amendment as	s to c	urates to	be ad	opted,		£380,000
2.	The Ulster glebes, . The glebehouses to be fre	•	-	•	•		465,000
3.	The glebehouses to be fre	e,	•	•	•	•	150,000
						-
	0 1 71 1 17 1						£995,000
	Or the Bishop of Peterborupon livings in licu of	rough No.	ı's amendı 3, would	ment a 1 carr	as to the 'y a hea	tax vier
	charge by	•			•		124,000
						:	£1,119,000

united persuade the nation to acquiesce, and the very attempt would not only prolong and embitter controversy, but would weaken authority in this country. For the thing contemplated is the very thing that the parliament was elected not to do.

Osborne, Feb. 14.—The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his long letter, and is much gratified and relieved by the conciliatory spirit expressed throughout his explanations on this most difficult and important question. The Queen thinks it would indeed be most desirable for him to see the Archbishop of Canterbury—and she is quite ready to write to the archbishop to inform him of her wish and of Mr. Gladstone's readiness to accede to it, should he wish it.

'My impression is,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville (Feb. 14), 'that we should make a great mistake if we were to yield on the point of time. It is not time that is wanted; we have plenty of time to deal with the Bishop of Peterborough's points so far as they can be dealt with at all. Sir R. Palmer has been here to-day with overtures from persons of importance unnamed. I think probably the Archbishop of Canterbury and others.¹ I do not doubt that on the other side they want time, for their suggestions are crude.'

On the following day (Feb. 15) the Queen wrote to the archbishop, telling him that she had seen Mr. Gladstone, 'who shows the most conciliatory disposition,' and who at once assured her 'of his readiness—indeed, his anxiety—to meet the archbishop and to communicate freely with him.' The correspondence between the Queen and the archbishop has already been made known, and most of that between the archbishop and Mr. Gladstone, and I need not here reproduce it, for, in fact, at this first stage nothing particular came of it.2 'The great mistake, as it seems to me,' Mr. Gladstone writes to Archdeacon Stopford (Feb. 8), 'made by the Irish bishops and others is this. They seem to think that our friends are at the mercy of our adversaries, whereas our adversaries are really at the mercy of our friends, and it is to these latter

No: Archbishop Trench and Lord Carnarvon. See Selborne, Memorials, pp. 114-6.
 See Life of Tait, ii. pp. 8-14.

are narrated by Lord Granville in a memorandum to Mr. CHAP. Gladstone, dated August 4:—

.Ет. 60.

After seeing you I met Lord Cairns at the colonial office. He offered me terms.1 . . . I asked him whether, in his opinion, he, the archbishop, and I could carry anything we agreed upon. He said, 'Yes, certainly.' After sceing you I met Lord Cairns a second time in his room at the House of Lords. I asked as a preliminary to giving any opinion on his amendments, how he proposed to deal with the preamble. He said, 'to lcave it as amended by the Lords.' I then proposed the words which were afterwards adopted in the 68th clause. He was at first taken aback, but admitted that he had personally no objection to them He asked what was the opposition to be feared. I suggested some from Lord Grey. He believed this to be certain, but immaterial. I objected in toto to Lord Salisbury's clause or its substitute. He was unwilling to yield, chiefly on Lord Salisbury's account, but finally consented. We agreed upon the commutation clause if the 7 and the 5 per cent. were lumped together. On the curates clause we could come to no agreement. He proposed to sec Lord Salisbury and the archbishop, and to meet again at four at the colonial office. He spoke with fairness as to the difficulty of his position, and the risk he ran with his own party. I again saw you and asked the Irish attorney-general to be present at the last interview. I stated to him in Lord Cairns's presence how far we agreed, and expressed my regret that on the last point—the curates-our difference was irreconcilable. Lord Cairns said he hoped not, and proceeded to argue strongly in favour of his proposal. He at last, however, at 4.30, compromised the matter by accepting five years instead of one. I shook his hand, which was trembling with nervousness. We discussed the form of announcing the arrangement to the House. We at once agreed it was better to tell the whole truth, and soon settled that it would be houses to be given to the church at ten years' purchase of the sites, a slight modification of Lord Salisbury's amendment=£140,000. From this it appeared that even in the mid hours of this final day Lord Cairns asked above £800,000.

¹ They were somewhat but not very greatly improved. The Ulster glebes, however, were gone. He now demanded: 1. The acceptance of the amendment respecting curates = £380,000; 2. Five per cent. to be added to the seven per cent. on commutations = £300,000; 3. The glebe

united persuade the nation to acquiesce, and the very attempt would not only prolong and embitter controversy, but would weaken authority in this country. For the thing contemplated is the very thing that the parliament was elected not to do.

Osborne, Feb. 14.—The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his long letter, and is much gratified and relieved by the conciliatory spirit expressed throughout his explanations on this most difficult and important question. The Queen thinks it would indeed be most desirable for him to see the Archbishop of Canterbury-and she is quite ready to write to the archbishop to inform him of her wish and of Mr. Gladstone's readiness to accede to it, should he wish it.

'My impression is,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville (Feb. 14), that we should make a great mistake if we were to yield on the point of time. It is not time that is wanted; we have plenty of time to deal with the Bishop of Peterborough's points so far as they can be dealt with at Sir R. Palmer has been here to-day with overtures from persons of importance unnamed. I think probably the Archbishop of Canterbury and others. I do not doubt that on the other side they want time, for their suggestions are crude.'

On the following day (Feb. 15) the Queen wrote to the archbishop, telling him that she had seen Mr. Gladstone, 'who shows the most conciliatory disposition,' and who at once assured her 'of his readiness-indeed, his anxiety-to meet the archbishop and to communicate freely with him.' The correspondence between the Queen and the archbishop has already been made known, and most of that between the archbishop and Mr. Gladstone, and I need not here reproduce it, for, in fact, at this first stage nothing particular came of it.2 'The great mistake, as it seems to me, Mr. Gladstone writes to Archdeacon Stopford (Feb. 8), 'made by the Irish bishops and others is this. They seem to think that our friends are at the mercy of our adversaries, whereas our adversaries are really at the mercy of our friends, and it is to these latter

¹ No: Archbishop Trench and Lord Carnarvon. See Selborne, Memorials, i. pp. 114-6.
² See Life of Tait, ii. pp. 8-14.

there would have been, if Cairns had not taken upon himself CHAP. the responsibility of acting as he did.'

Among interesting letters was one from Manning: (July -Er. 60. 24) 'My joy over the event is not only as a catholic, though that must be, as it ought to be, my highest motive, but as an Englishman to whom, as I remember your once saying, the old English monarchy is dear next after the catholic church. But at this time I will only add that I may wish you joy on I could hardly have hoped that you could personal reasons. so have framed, mastered, and carried through the bill from first to last so complete, so unchanged in identity of principle and detail, and let me add with such unwearying and sustained self-control and forbearance.'

The diary gives us a further glimpse of these agitating days:--

July 20.—Conclave of colleagues on Irish church proceedings. An anxious day, a sad evening. 21.—Cabinet 11-21, stiff, but 22.—I was obliged to take to my sofa and spent the day so in continual interviews with Granville, Glyn, West, Sullivanespecially the first-on the details and particulars of the negotiations respecting the Irish Church bill. The favourable issue left me almost unmanned in the reaction from a sharp and stern tension of mind. 23.-My attack did not lessen. Dr. Clark came in the morning and made me up for the House, whither I went 2-5 P.M., to propose concurrence in the Lords' amendments. Up to the moment I felt very weak, but this all vanished when I spoke and while the debate lasted. Then I went back to bed 25.—Weak still. I presumed over much in walking a little and fell back at night to my lowest point.

Sir Robert Phillimore records:—

July 21.-Found Gladstone at breakfast, calm, pale, but without a doubt as to the course which the government must pursue, viz.: to maintain upon every important point the bill as sent back by the Commons, probably an autumn session, a bill sternly repeated by the Commons, too probably without the clauses favourable to the Irish church. 23.—Nothing talked or written of but the political marvel of yesterday. Gladstone in a speech universally praised proposed to the House of Commons the bill as united persuade the nation to acquiesce, and the very attempt would not only prolong and embitter controversy, but would weaken authority in this country. For the thing contemplated is the very thing that the parliament was elected not to do.

Osborne, Feb. 14.—The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his long letter, and is much gratified and relieved by the conciliatory spirit expressed throughout his explanations on this most difficult and important question. The Queen thinks it would indeed be most desirable for him to see the Archbishop of Canterbury—and she is quite ready to write to the archbishop to inform him of her wish and of Mr. Gladstone's readiness to accede to it, should he wish it.

'My impression is,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville (Feb. 14), that we should make a great mistake if we were to yield on the point of time. It is not time that is wanted; we have plenty of time to deal with the Bishop of Peterborough's points so far as they can be dealt with at all. Sir R. Palmer has been here to-day with overtures from persons of importance unnamed. I think probably the Archbishop of Canterbury and others. I do not doubt that on the other side they want time, for their suggestions are crude.'

On the following day (Feb. 15) the Queen wrote to the archbishop, telling him that she had seen Mr. Gladstone, 'who shows the most conciliatory disposition,' and who at once assured her 'of his readiness-indeed, his anxiety-to meet the archbishop and to communicate freely with him.' The correspondence between the Queen and the archbishop has already been made known, and most of that between the archbishop and Mr. Gladstone, and I need not here reproduce it, for, in fact, at this first stage nothing particular came of it.2 'The great mistake, as it seems to me, Mr. Gladstone writes to Archdeacon Stopford (Feb. 8), 'made by the Irish bishops and others is this. They seem to think that our friends are at the mercy of our adversaries, whereas our adversaries are really at the mercy of our friends, and it is to these latter

¹ No: Archbishop Trench and Lord Carnarvon. See Selborne, Memorials, i. pp. 114-6.
² See Life of Tait, ii. pp. 8-14.

CHAPTER II

FIRST CHAPTER OF AN AGRARIAN REVOLUTION

(1870)

THE Irish Land Act of 1870 in its consequences was certainly one of the most important measures of the nineteenth century.—Lecky.

In the beginning of 1870 one of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues CHAP. wrote of him to another, 'I fear that he is steering straight _ upon the rocks.' So it might well seem to any who knew the unplumbed depths on which he had to shape his very ze. Irish history has been said to resemble that of Spain for the last three centuries,—the elaboration of an inose ideas of law and political economy most unsuited to the needs of the nation concerned. Such ideas, deeply encrished in Britain where they had succeeded, Mr. Gladstone was now gradually drawn forward to reverse and overthrow in Ireland where they had ended in monstrous failure. Here a pilot's eye might well see jagged reefs. The occasion was the measure for dealing with the land of Ireland, that he had promised at the election. The difficulty grose from the large and bottomless ignorance of those in whose hands the power Mr. Gladstone in the course of these discussions said, and said truly, of the learned Sir Roundell Palmer, that he knew no more of land tenures in Ireland than he knew of. land tenures in the moon. At the beginning much the same might have been observed of the cabinet, of the two houses of parliament, and of the whole mass of British elected No doubt one effect of this great ignorance was to rese Mr. Gladstone dictator. Still ignorance left all the power to prejudice and interests. We may imagine the The cabinet was in the main made up of landlords hardened and convicted economists, not everunited persuade the nation to acquiesce, and the very attempt would not only prolong and embitter controversy, but would weaken authority in this country. For the thing contemplated is the very thing that the parliament was elected not to do.

Osborne, Feb. 14.—The Queen thanks Mr. Gladstone for his long letter, and is much gratified and relieved by the conciliatory spirit expressed throughout his explanations on this most difficult and important question. The Queen thinks it would indeed be most desirable for him to see the Archbishop of Canterbury—and she is quite ready to write to the archbishop to inform him of her wish and of Mr. Gladstone's readiness to accede to it, should he wish it.

'My impression is,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville (Feb. 14), 'that we should make a great mistake if we were to yield on the point of time. It is not time that is wanted; we have plenty of time to deal with the Bishop of Peterborough's points so far as they can be dealt with at all. Sir R. Palmer has been here to-day with overtures from persons of importance unnamed. I think probably the Archbishop of Canterbury and others.¹ I do not doubt that the other side they want time, for their suggestions are on the following day (Feb. 15) the Queen wrote to the archbishop, telling him that she had seen Mr. Gladstone, 'who shows the most conciliatory disposition,' and who at once assured her 'of his readiness—indeed, his anxiety—to meet the archbishop and to communicate freely with him.' The correspondence between the Queen and the archbishop has already been made known, and most of that between the archbishop and Mr. Gladstone, and I need not here reproduce it, for, in fact, at this first stage nothing particular came of it.2 'The great mistake, as it seems to me,' Mr. Gladstone writes to Archdeacon Stopford (Feb. 8), 'made by the Irish bishops and others is this. They seem to think that our friends are at the mercy of our adversaries, whereas our adversaries are really at the mercy of our friends, and it is to these latter

¹ No: Archbishop Trench and Lord Carnarvon. See Selborne, Memorials, i. pp. 114-6.
² See Life of Tait, ii. pp. 8-14.

still closer to the pith of the matter when he says to Mr. Bright:—'Your plan, if adopted in full, could only extend to a small proportion of the two or three hundred millions worth of land in Ireland; and I do not well see how the unprotected tenants of the land in general would take essential benefit from the purchase and owning of land by a few of their fortunate brethren.' If the land question was urgent, and Bright himself, like Mill, thought that it was, this answer of Mr. Gladstone's was irrefragable. In acknowledging the despatch of this correspondence from Mr. Gladstone, Lord Granville says to him (May 26, 1869):—

This question may break us up. Bright is thin-skinned; the attacks in the Lords rufile him more than he chooses to admit. It cannot make out how far he likes office, the cabinet, and his new position. It will be particularly disagreeable to him to have this plan, of which he is so much enamoured and for which he has received so much blame and a little praise, snuffed out by the cabinet. And yet how is it possible to avoid it, even putting aside the strong opinions of Lowe, Cardwell, and others? My only hope is that you have got the germ of some larger and more comprehensive plan in your head, than has yet been developed.

The plan ultimately adopted, after a severe struggle and with momentous consequences, did not first spring from Mr. Gladstone's brain. The idea of adapting the law to custom in all its depth and breadth, and extending the rooted notion of tenant-right to its furthest bearings, was necessarily a plant of Irish and not of English growth. Mr. Chichester Fortescue, the Irish chief secretary and an Irishman, first opened a bold expansion of the familiar principle of many, tenant-right bills. He had introduced such a bill himself in 1866, and the conservative government had brought in another in 1867. It is believed that he was instigated to adopt the new and bolder line by Sir Edward Sullivan, then the Irish attorney-general. Away from Sullivan, it was observed, he had little to say of value about his plan. the cabinet Fortescue was not found effective, but he was thoroughly at home in the subject, and his speeches in public on Irish business had all the cogency of a man

CHAI.
II.
ÆT. 60.

The speech in which this arduous scheme was explained to parliament was regarded as Mr. Gladstone's highest example of lucid and succinct unfolding of complicated matter. Mr. Disraeli said there was not a single word wasted. So skilfully were the facts marshalled, that every single hearer believed himself thoroughly to comprehend the eternal principles of the commutation of tithe-rent-charge, and the difference in the justice due to a transitory and a permanent curate. Manning said that the only two legislative acts in our history that approached it in importance for Ireland were the repeal of the penal laws and the Act of Union. However this may be, it is hardly an excess to say that since Pitt, the author of the Act of Union, the author of the Church Act was the only statesman in the roll of the century, capable at once of framing such a statute and expounding it with the same lofty and commanding power.\footnote{1}

In a fugitive note, Mr. Gladstone named one or two of the speakers on the second reading:—'Ball: elaborate and impressive, answered with great power by Irish attorney general. Bright: very eloquent and striking. Young George Hamilton: a first speech of great talent, admirably delivered. Hardy: an uncompromising defence of laws and institutions as they are, with a severe picture of the character and civil conduct of the Irish population.' Mr. Disraeli's speech was even more artificial than usual. It was Mr. Hardy and Dr. Ball who gave cogent and strenuous expression to the argument and passion of the church case. When the division came, called by Mr. Gladstone 'notable and historic' (March 24), the majority in a crowded house was 118.2 'Our division this morning,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville, 'even exceeded expectations, and will powerfully propel the bill.' The size of this majority deserves the reader's attention, for it marked the opening of a new parliamentary era. In 1841 Peel had turned out the whigs by a majority of 1. Lord John Russell was displaced in 1852 by 9. The Derby govern-

¹ The Irish Church bill is the so marvellous.—Dr. Temple to greatest monument of genius that I Acland, March 12, 1869. have yet known from Gladstone; even his marvellous budgets are not the capital and the skill of the tenant. In Ireland, in the minds of the vast majority of the population, for reasons just as good, property includes rights of the cultivator, whose labour has drained the land, and reclaimed it, and feneed it, and made farm-roads, and put a dwelling and farm buildings on it, and given to it all the working value that it possesses. We need suppose no eriminality on either side. The origin of the difference was perfectly natural. In Ireland the holdings were small and multitudinous; no landlord who was not a millionaire, could have prepared and equipped holdings numbered by hundreds or thousands; and if he could, the hundreds and thousands of tenants had not a straw of capital. This peculiarity in social circumstances made it certain, therefore, that if the moral foundation of modern ideas of property is that he who sows shall reap, the idea of property would grow up in the mind of the cultivator, whenever the outer climate permitted the growth in his mind of any ideas of moral or equitable right at all.

In 1845 the Devon Commission had reported that it is the tenant who has made the improvements; that large confiscations of these improvements had been systematically practised in the shape of progressive enhancements of rent; that erime and disorder sprang from the system; and that parliament ought to interfere. A bill was proposed by the Peel government in 1845 for protecting the rightful interests of the tenant against the landlord. It was introduced in the House mainly composed of landlords. There it had such contumelious greeting, that it was speedily dropped. This was a crowning illustration of the levity of the imperial parliament dealing with Irish problems. The vital necessity for readjusting the foundations of social life demonstrated; a half measure languidly attempted; attempt dropped; bills sent to slumber in limbo; dry rot left quietly alone for a whole generation, until bloody outrage and murder awoke legislative conscience or roused executive fear. The union was seventy years old before the elementary feature in the agrarian condition of Ireland was recognised by the parliament which had undertaken to govern Ireland. Before the union Ireland

CHAP. II. ÆT. 60.

The bill swept through the stages of committee without _ alteration of substance and with extraordinary celerity, due not merely to the 'brute majority,' nor to the expectation that all was sure to be undone in another place, but to the peculiar powers developed by the minister. From the speech in which he unfolded his plan, down to the last amendment on report, he showed a mastery alike of himself and of his project and of the business from day to day in hand, that routed opposition and gave new animation and ardour to the confidence of his friends. For six or seven hours a day he astonished the House by his power of attention, unrelaxed yet without strain, by his double grasp of leading principle and intricate detail, by his equal command of legal and historic controversy and of all the actuarial niceties and puzzles of commutation. 'In some other qualities , parliamentary statesmanship, says one acute observer of that time, 'as an orator, a debater, and a tactician he has rivals; but in the powers of embodying principles in legislative form and preserving unity of purpose through a multiplicity of confusing minutiæ he has neither equal nor second among living statesmen.' The truth could not be better summed up. He carried the whole of his party with him, and the average majority in divisions on the clauses was 113. Of one dangerous corner, he says:-

May 6.—H. of C., working Irish Church bill. Spoke largely on Maynooth. [Proposal to compensate Maynooth out of the funds of the Irish church.] The final division on the pinching point with a majority of 107 was the most creditable (I think) I have ever known.

By a majority of 114 the bill was read a third time on the last day of May.

III

The contest was now removed from the constituencies and their representatives in parliament to the citadel of privilege. The issue was no longer single, and the struggle for religious equality in Ireland was henceforth merged before the public eye in a conflict for the supremacy of the Commons aires anywhere as the whig and tory statesmen who tried to CHAP. regenerate Ireland in the middle of the ninetcenth century. They first of all passed an Act (1849) inviting the purchase of the estates of an insolvent landlord upon precisely the same principles as governed the purchase of his pictures or his furniture. We passed the Encumbered Estates Act, Mr. Gladstone said, with lazy, heedless, uninformed good intentions.' The important rights given by custom and equity to the cultivator were suddenly extinguished by the supreme legal right of the rent-receiver. About one-eighth of the whole area of the country is estimated to have changed hands on these terms. The extreme of wretchedness and confusion naturally followed. Parliament thought this must be due to some misunderstanding. That there might be no further mistake, it next proceeded formally to declare (1860) that the legal relations between landlord and tenant in Ircland were to be those of strict contract. Thus blunder was clenched by blunder. The cultivators were terror-struck, and agitation waxed hot.

¹ See Daily News, April 26, 1869.

II. Ær. 60

Oliver Cromwell had a glimpse of the secret in 1649.7 'These poor people,' he said, 'have been accustomed to as' much injustice and oppression from their landlords, the' great men, and those who should have done them right, as any people in that which we call Christendom. Sir, if justice were freely and impartially administered here, the foregoing darkness and corruption would make it look so much the more glorious and beautiful.' It was just two hundred and twenty years before another ruler of England saw as deep, and applied his mind to the free doing of justice.

Almost immediately after recovering from the fatigues of the session of 1869, Mr. Gladstone threw himself upon his new task, his imagination vividly excited by its magnitude and its possibilities. 'For the last three months,' he writes approbation came from the tory benches. So deep was parliamentary ignorance of Ircland even in 1887, after the Acts of 1870 and 1881.-Hans. 314, p. 295.

When the present writer once referred to the principle of the Act of 1860 as being that the hiring of land is just as much founded on trade principles as the chartering of a ship or the hiring of a street cab, loud

Grey's letter to the archbishop of the same date, of which a copy was sent to the prime minister:—

Mr. Gladstone is not ignorant (indeed the Queen has never concealed her feeling on the subject) how deeply her Majesty deplores the necessity, under which he conceived himself to lie, of raising the question as he has done; or of the apprehensions of which she cannot divest herself, as to the possible consequences of the measure which he has introduced. These apprehensions, her Majesty is bound to say, still exist in full force; but considering the circumstances under which the measure has come to the House of Lords, the Queen cannot regard without the greatest alarm the probable effect of its absolute rejection in that House. Carried, as it has been, by an overwhelming and steady majority through a House of Coramons, chosen expressly to speak the feeling of the country on the question, there seems no reason to believe that any fresh appeal to the people would lead to a different result. The rejection of the bill, therefore, on the second reading, would only serve to bring the two Houses into collision, and to prolong a dangerous agitation on the subject.

Mr. Gladstone replied:-

June 5.—From such information as has indirectly reached Mr. Gladstone, he fears that the leaders of the majority in the House of Lords will undoubtedly oppose the second reading of the Irish Church bill, of which Lord Harrowby is to propose the rejection. He understands that Lord Salisbury, as well as Lord Carnarvon, decidedly, but in vain, objected to this course at the meeting held to-day at the Duke of Marlborough's. Very few of the bishops were present. Lord Derby, it is said, supported the resolution. Although a division must now be regarded as certain, and as very formidable, all hope need not be abandoned that your Majesty's wise counsels through the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the sagacity of the peers themselves with reference to the security and stability of their position in the legislature, may avail to frustrate an unwise resolution.

'How much more effectually,' Mr. Gladstone wrote to Hawarden, 'could the Queen assist in the settlement of this question were she not six hundred miles off.' As it was, she and we can hardly avoid some early step towards making progress in it. A committee keeps a cabinet quiet. It is highly necessary that we should be quite ready when parliament meets, and yet there is so much mental movement upon the question from day to day, as we see from a variety of curious utterances (that of the Times included), that it is desirable to keep final decisions open. Much information will be open, and this a committee can prepare in concert with the Irish government. It also, I think, affords a means of bringing men's minds together.

He tells the Irish secretary that so far as he can enter into the secretary's views, he 'enters thoroughly into the spirit of them.' But many members of the cabinet, laden sufficiently with their own labours, had probably not so closely followed up the matter:—

The proposition, that more than compensation to tenants for their improvements will be necessary in order to settle the Irish land laws, will be unpalatable, or new, to several, and naturally enough. You will have observed the total difference in the internal cituation between this case and that of the Irish church, where upon all the greater points our measure was in a manner outlined for us by the course of previous transactions.

At the end of October the question was brought formally before the cabinet:—

Oct. 30—Cabinet, 2-5½. . . . We broke ground very satisfactorily on the question of Irish land. Nov. 3.—Cabinet. Chiefly on Irish land, and stiff. 9.—To Guildhall, where I spoke for the government. The combination of physical effort with measured words is difficult. 22.—Worked six hours on my books, arranging and re-arranging. The best brain rest I have had, I think, since December last.

The brain rest was not for long. On Dec. I he tells Lord Granville that Argyll is busy on Irish land, and in his views is misled by 'the rapid facility of his active mind.' 'It is rather awkward at this stage to talk of breaking up the government, and that is more easily said than done.' I know no more singular reading in its way than the correspondence between Mr. Gladstone and the Duke of Argyll;

CHAI

Ær. 6

IV

For the moment ministers breathed freely, but the bill was soon in the trough of the sea. The archbishop wrote to the Queen that they had decided if they could not get three million pounds to float the new church upon, they would take their chance of what might happen by postponing the bill until next year. Asked by the Queen what could be done (July 10), Lord Granville, being at Windsor, answered that the cabinet would not make up their mind until they knew how far the Lords would go in resistance, but he thought it right to tell her that there was no chance of ministers agreeing to postpone the bill for another year. The day after this conversation, the Queen wrote again to the archbishop, asking him seriously to reflect, in case the concessions of the government should not go quite so far as he might himself wish, whether the postponement of the settlement for another year would not be likely to result rather in worse than in better terms for the church. She trusted that he would himself consider, and endeavour to induce others to consider, any concessions offered by the House of Commons in the most conciliatory spirit, rather than to try and get rid of the bill. 'The amendments,' said Mr. Gladstone, 'seem to mean war to the knife?

After the second reading a tory lady of high station told Lord Clarendon and Mr. Delane that in her opinion a friendly communication might have great influence on Lord Salisbury's course.

I therefore wrote to him (Lord Granville says in the memorandum already referred to), stating why on public and personal grounds it was desirable that he should meet you. I said that although it would be difficult for us to initiate suggestions, yet from your personal regard for him such a conversation would advance matters. He consented, stating that he was in communication as to amendments with Lord Cairns and the archbishop. He was extremely desirous that no one should know of the interview. You were of opinion that the interview had done good, and I wrote to ask Lord Salisbury whether he would like me to put dots on some of your i's. He declined, and considered relief, to which they do not themselves give the first place in importance. It is most dangerous to discredit propositions which you mean to adopt, in the face of any who (as yet) do not mean to adopt them, and who may consistently and honourably use all your statements against them, nay, who would really be bound to do so. No part of what I have said is an argument against your propositions. . . . If your seven propositions were law to-day, you would have made but a very small progress towards settling the land question of Ireland. For all this very plain speech, you will, I am sure, forgive me.

CHAP.

Æт. 60

A letter from Mr. Gladstone to Fortescue (Dec. 5) shows the competition between Bright's projects of purchase by state-aid, and the scheme for dealing with the tenants as tenants:—

I am a good deal staggered at the idea of any interference with present rents. But I shall not speak on this subject to others. It will be difficult enough to carry the substance of the plan you proposed, without any enlargement of it. I hope to see you again before the question comes on in the cabinet... Bright is very full of waste lands, and generally of his own plans, considerably (at present) to the detriment of yours. He wants the government to buy waste lands, and says it is not against political economy, but yours is. I think he will come right. It appears to me we might in the case of waste lands lend money (on proper conditions) to any buyers; in the case of other lands we are only to lend to occupiers. What do you think of this?

At this date he was still in doubt whether anybody would agree to interference with existing rents, but he had for himself hit upon the principle that became the foundation of his law. He put to Fortescue (Dec. 9) as a material point:—

Whether it is expedient to adopt, wherever it can be made available, the custom of the country as the basis for compensation on eviction and the like. I cannot make out from your papers whether you wholly dissent from this. I hoped you had agreed in it. I have acquired a strong conviction upon it, of which I have written out the grounds; but I shall not circulate the paper till I understand your views more fully.

tension had hardly yet begun to tell upon him, but Mr. Gladstone enters on these days:—

July 11.—Formidable accounts from and through Windsor. 12.—The time grows more and more anxious. 15.—This day I received from a Roman catholic bishop the assurance that he offered mass and that many pray for me; and from Mr. Spurgeon (as often from others), an assurance of the prayers of the non-conformists. I think in these and other prayers lies the secret of the strength of body which has been given me in unusual measure during this very trying year.

This was the day on which, amid the ardent cheers of his party, he arose to announce to the House the views of the government. He was in no compromising mood. In a short speech he went through the amendments made by men so out of touch with the feeling of the country that they might have been 'living in a balloon.' One by one he moved the rejection of all amendments that involved the principle of concurrent endowment, the disposal of the surplus, or the postponement of the date of disestablishment. He agreed, however, to give a lump sum of half a million in lieu of private benefactions, to readjust the commutation terms, and make other alterations involving a further gift of £280,000 to the church. When the Commons concluded the consideration of the Lords' amendments (July 16), Mr. Gladstone observed three things: first, that the sentiment against concurrent endowment in any form was overwhelming; second, that not only was no disposition shown to make new concessions, but concessions actually made were sorely grudged; and third, that the tories were eager to postpone the destination of the residuary property.

V

On July 16, the bill, restored substantially to its first shape, was again back on the table of the Lords, and ship-wreck seemed for five days to be inevitable. On July 20, at eleven o'clock, by a majority of 175 to 93, the Lords once more excluded from the preamble the words that the Commons had placed and replaced there, in order to declare the policy of parliament on matters ecclesiastical in Ireland. This pages of it-on the recognition of usage beyond the limit of CHAP Ulster custom as a distinct head. You pressed your view repeatedly on the cabinet, which did not adopt it. Till the cabinet alters its mind, we have no option except to use every effort to get the bill drawn according to its instructions.

ÆT. 61

How much he had his Irish plans at heart, Mr. Gladstone showed by his urgency that the Queen should open parlia-His letter to her (Jan. 15) on the subject, he told Lord Granville, 'expresses my desire, not founded on ordinary motives, nor having reference to ordinary circumstances':--

We have now to deal with the gros of the Irish question, and the Irish question is in a category by itself. It would be almost a crime in a minister to omit anything that might serve to mark, and bring home to the minds of men, the gravity of the occasion. Moreover, I am persuaded that the Queen's own sympathies would be, not as last year, but in the same current as ours. To this great country the state of Ireland after seven hundred years of our tutelage is in my opinion so long as it continues, an intolerable disgrace, and a danger so absolutely transcending all others, that I call it the only real danger of the noble empire of the Queen. I cannot refrain from bringing before her in one shape or another my humble advice that she should, if able, open parliament.

Public opinion was ripening. The Times made a contribution of the first importance to the discussion, in a series of letters from a correspondent, that almost for the first time brought the facts of Irish land before the general public. pamphlet from Mill, then at the height of his influence upon both writers and readers, startled them by the daring proposition that the only plan was to buy out the landlords. The whole host of whig economists and lawyers fell heavily upon him in consequence. The new voters showed that they were not afraid of rew ideas. It was not until Jan. 25 that peril was at an end inside the government:-

The great difficulties of the Irish Land Jan. 25, '70.—Cabinet. Thank God! Feb. 7 .- With the Prince bill there are now over.

The object of this paper was to induce the archbishop to discountenance any plan for pressing the postponement of the provisions respecting the residue, and to deal with us in preference respecting any practicable concession to the church. When the dean came in, I explained this further, recited the purport of my interview with the Queen, and on his asking me confidentially for his own information, I let him know that the further pecuniary concession we were prepared to recommend would be some £170,000 or £180,000.

Sunday, July 18.—In the afternoon Lord Granville called on me and brought me a confidential memorandum, containing an overture which Mr. Disraeli had placed in the hands of Lord Bessborough for communication to us. [Memorandum not recoverable.] He had represented the terms as those which he had with much difficulty induced Lord Cairns to consent to. While the contention as to the residue was abandoned, and pecuniary concessions alone were sought, the demand amounted, according to our computation, to between £900,000 £1,000,000. . . . This it was evident was utterly inadmissible. saw no possibility of approach to it; and considered that a further quarter of a million or thereabouts was all that the House of Commons could be expected or asked further to concede. On the same afternoon Lord Granville, falling in with Mr. Goschen, asked him what he thought the very most that could be had-would it it be £500,000? Goschen answered £300,000, and with this Glyn agreed. Mr. Disraeli desired an answer before three on Monday.

Monday, July 19.—Those members of the government who had acted as a sort of committee in the Irish church question met in the afternoon. We were all agreed in opinion that the Disraeli overture must be rejected, though without closing the door; and a reply was prepared in this sense, which Lord Granville undertook to send. [Draft, in the above sense that no sum approaching £1,000,000 could be entertained.]

Meantime the archbishop had arrived in Downing Street, in pursuance of the arrangements of Saturday; and a paper was either now drawn, or sanctioned by my colleagues, I do not

CHAP.

ÆT. 61.

The second reading was carried by 442 to 11, the minority being composed of eight Irish members of advanced type, and three English tories, including Mr. Henley and Mr. James Lowther, himself Irish secretary eight years later. The bill was at no point fought high by the opposition. Mr. Disraeli moved an amendment limiting compensation to unexhausted improvements. The government majority fell to 76, 'a result to be expected,' Mr. Gladstone reports, 'considering the natural leanings of English and Scotch members to discount in Ireland what they would not apply in Great Britain. They are not very familiar with Irish land tenures.' One fact of much significance he notes in these historic proceedings. Disraeli, he writes to the Duke of Argyll (April 21, 1870), 'has not spoken one word against valuation of rents or perpetuity of tenure.' It was from the house of his friends that danger came:-

April 4.—H. of C. Spoke on Disraeli's amendment. A majority of 76, but the navigation is at present extremely critical. 7.—H. of C. A most ominous day from end to end. Early in the evening I gave a review of the state of the bill, and later another menace of overturn if the motion of Mr. William Fowler [a liberal banker], which Palmer had unfortunately (as is too common with him) brought into importance, should be carried. We had a majority of only 32.

To Lord Russell he writes (April 12):-

I am in the hurry-scurry of preparation for a run into the country this evening, but I must not omit to thank you for your very kind and welcome letter. We have had a most anxious time in regard to the Irish Land bill. . . . The fear that our Land bill may cross the water creates a sensitive state of mind among all tories, many whigs, and a few radicals. Upon this state of things comes Palmer with his legal mind, legal point of view, legal aptitude and inaptitude (vide Mr. Burke), and stirs these susceptibilities to such a point that he is always near bringing us to grief Even Grey more or less goes with him.

Phillimore records a visit in these critical days:—

April 8.—Gladstone looked worn and fagged. Very affectionate VOL. 1. 3 N

amply sufficient to do the rest. 1... The idea did not, however, include an absolute abandonment of the bill, but only the suspension of our responsibility for it, leaving the opposition to work their own will, and with the intention, when this had been done, of considering the matter further. . . .

Wednesday, July 21.—The cabinet met at 11; and I went to it in the mind of last night. We discussed, however, at great length all possible methods of proceeding that occurred to us. The result was stated in a letter of mine to the Queen, of which I annex a copy. [See Appendix. He enumerates the various courses considered, and states that the course adopted was to go through the endowment amendments, and if they were carried adversely, then to drop their responsibility.]

Most of the cabinet were desirous to go on longer; others, myself included, objected to proceeding to the end of the bill or undertaking to remit the bill again to the House of Commons as of our own motion. It occurred to me, however, that we might proceed as far as to the end of the many amendments, about the middle of the bill; and this appeared to meet the views of all, even of those who would have preferred doing more, or less.

Thursday, July 22.—I was laid up to-day, and the transactions were carried on by Lord Granville, in communication with me from time to time at my house. First he brought me a note he had received from Lord Cairns.

This, dated July 22, was to the effect that Lord Cairns had no right and no desire to ask for any information as to the course proposed that night; but that if the statements as to the intention of the government to proceed with the consideration of the amendments were correct, and if Lord Granville thought any advantage likely to result from it, Lord Cairns would be ready, 'as you know I have throughout been, to confer upon a mode by which without sacrifice of principle or dignity upon either side the remaining points of difference might be arranged.' The proceedings of this critical day his cabinet; and it is said that Lord Granville told him that if he gave up the bill he must find somebody else to lead the Lords.'—(July 22, 1869), Memoirs of an Ex-Minister, ii. p. 409.

¹ The version in society was that 'Gladstone wanted to throw up the bill after the debate of last Tuesday, when the words of the preamble were re-inserted, but he was outvoted in

V

CHAP.

Neither the Land Act nor the Church Act at once put out Art. 61. the hot ashes of Fenianism. A Coercion Act was passed in the spring of 1870. In the autumn Mr. Gladstone tried to persuade the cabinet to approve the release of the Fenian prisoners, but it was not until the end of the year that he prevailed. A secret committee was thought necessary in 1871 to consider outrages in Westmeath, and a repressive law was passed in consequence. Mr. Gladstone himself always leaned strongly against these exceptional laws, and pressed the Irish government hard the other way. we have to do,' he said, 'is to defy Fenianism, to rely on public sentiment, and so provide (as we have been doing) the practical measures that place the public sentiment on our side, an operation which I think is retarded by any semblance of severity to those whose offence we admit among ourselves to have been an ultimate result of our misgovernment of the country. I am afraid that local opinion has exercised. habitually and traditionally, too much influence in Ireland, and has greatly compromised the character of the empire. This question I take to be in most of its aspects an imperial question.' The proposal for a secret committee was the occasion of a duel between him and Disraeli (Feb. 27, 1871) -'both,' said Lord Granville, 'very able, but very bitter.' The tory leader taunted Mr. Gladstone for having recourse to such a proceeding, after posing as the only man capable of dealing with the evils of Ireland, and backed by a majority which had legalised confiscation, consecrated sacrilege, and condoned high treason.

better for its success that he should announce the details. I was afterwards apprehensive that this latter arrangement might be disadvantageous to us, but nothing could be better or fairer than his statement. I cannot finish this statement, which I believe is accurate, without expressing my admiration at the firmness and conciliation which you displayed in directing me in all these negotiations.

'The news was brought to me on my sofa,' Mr. Gladstone says, 'and between five and six I was enabled to telegraph to the Queen. My telegram was followed up by a letter at 7 P.M., which announced that the arrangement had been accepted by the House of Lords, and that a general satisfaction prevailed.' To the Queen he wrote (July 22):—

Mr. Gladstone is at a loss to account for the great change in the tone and views of the opposition since Sunday and Monday, and even Tuesday last, but on this topic it is needless to enter. As to the principal matters, the basis of the arrangement on the side of the government is much the same as was intended when Mr. Gladstone had the honour of an audience at Windsor on Saturday; but various minor concessions have been added. Mr. Gladstone does not doubt that, if the majority of the House of Lords should accede to the advice of Lord Cairns, the government will be able to induce the House of Commons to agree on the conditions proposed. Mr. Gladstone would in vain strive to express to your Majesty the relief, thankfulness, and satisfaction, with which he contemplates not only the probable passing of what many believe to be a beneficent and necessary measure, but the undoubted and signal blessing of an escape from a formidable constitutional conflict. The skill, patience, assiduity, and sagacity of Lord Granville in the work of to-day demand from Mr. Gladstone the tribute of his warm admiration.

On reviewing this whole transaction, and doing full justice to the attitude both of the Queen and the archbishop, the reader will be inclined to agree with old Lord Halifax:—'I think we owe a good turn to Cairns, without whose decision on Thursday I hardly think that the settlement could have been effected. Indeed Derby's conduct proves what difficulty strict limitation of all teaching paid for in schools aided or provided out of public money, whether rate or tax, to purely _ secular instruction. In that case, however, he held strongly that subject to local consent, the master who gave the secular teaching should be allowed to give religious teaching also at other times, even within the school-house.1

CHAP.

Ær. 61.

- What Mr. Gladstone cared for was the integrity of religious instruction. What he disliked or dreaded was, in his own language, the invasion of that integrity 'under cover of protecting exceptional consciences.' The advance of his ideas is rather interesting. So far back as 1843,2 in considering the education clauses of the Factory bill of that year, he explained to Lord Lyttelton that he was not prepared to limit church teaching in the schools to the exposition of scripture. Ten years later, he wrote to his close friend, Bishop Hamilton of Salisbury:-

I am not friendly to the idea of constraining by law either the total or the partial suppression of conscientious differences in religion, with a view to fusion of different sects whether in church or school. I believe that the free development of conviction is upon the whole the system most in favour both of truth and of charity. Consequently you may well believe that I contemplate with satisfaction the state of feeling that prevails in England, and that has led all governments to adopt the system of separate and independent subsidies to the various religious denominations,

As for the government bill of that year (1853), he entirely repudiated the construction put upon some of its clauses, namely, 'that people having the charge of schools would be obliged to admit children of all religious creeds, as well as that having admitted them, they would be put under control as to the instruction to be given.' Ten years later still, we find him saying, 'I deeply regret the aversion to "conscience clauses," which I am convinced it would be most wise for the took up arms against it, and after full consideration in the cabinet (one of my first acts in cabinet), they withdrew it rather than stir up the religious flame.'— Mr. Gladstone to Herbert Gladstone, May 7, 1896.

¹ Article on Mr. Forster, Nineteenth Century, September 1888.

² 'In 1843 the government of Sir R. Peel, with a majority of 90, introduced an Education bill, rather large, and meant to provide for the factory districts. The nonconformists at large now modified, and it passed with much harmony, broken by an Orange member. Gladstone very unwell, and ought to have been in bed when he made his speech. 24.—Gladstone still very weak but in a state of calm happiness at the unexpected turn which the Irish bill had taken. Does not now know the origin or history of the sudden resolution on the part of the leaders of the opposition. I am satisfied that Disraeli was alarmed and thoroughly frightened at the state of the House of Commons and the country, that Cairns was determined to regain what he had practically lost or was losing, the leadership of the Lords, and that many of his party were frightened at the madness and folly of Tuesday night considered after a day's reflection. . . . Above all there was a well-grounded alarm on the part of Cairns and his immediate supporters in the Lords, that their order was in imminent danger. Bluster disappeared, and a retreat, as decent as well could be expected, was made from a situation known to be untenable. They had never expected that Gladstone would drop the bill. 25.—Much conversation with Gladstone, who is still very weak. He wrote to the Archbishop of Dublin to say in effect, that as a private churchman he would be glad to assist in any way the archbishop could point out in the organizing of the voluntary church in Ireland.

Sir Thomas Acland writes, August 3, 1869:—

I stayed at House of Commons perforce till about 1.30 or 2, and then walked away with Gladstone through the Park. It is beautiful to see his intense enjoyment of the cool fresh air, the trees, the sky, the gleaming of light on the water, all that is refreshing in contrast to the din of politics.

A month later the Archbishop of Canterbury found Mr. Gladstone at Lord Granville's at Walmer Castle:—

Reached Walmer Castle about 6.30. Found Gladstone lying in blankets on the ramparts eating his dinner, looking still very ill.

... He joined us at night full of intelligence. His fierce vigour all the better for being a little tempered. . . . Much interesting conversation about the state of the church and morality in Wales, also about leading ecclesiastics. I gather that he will certainly nominate Temple for a bishopric.¹

¹ Life of Archbishop Tait, ii. p. 45.

but great differences of opinion have come to the surface, and much trouble may arise.' In fact trouble enough arose to shake his ministry to its foundations. What would be enrious if he had not had the Land bill on his hands, is that he did not fight hard for his own view in the cabinet. He seems to have been content with stating it, without insisting. Whether he could have carried it in the midst of a whirlwind of indeterminate but vehement opinions, may well be doubted.

The Education bill was worked through the cabinet by Lord de Grey as president of the conneil, but its lines were laid and its provisions in their varying forms defended in parliament, by the vice-president, who did not reach the eabinet until July 1870. Mr. Forster was a man of sterling force of character, with resolute and effective power of work, a fervid love of country, and a warm and true humanity. No orator, he was yet an excellent speaker of a sound order, for his speaking, though plain and even rough in style, abounded in substance; he always went as near to the root of the matter as his vision allowed, and always with marked effect for his own purposes. A quaker origin is not incompatible with a militant spirit, and Forster was sturdy in combat. He had rather a full share of self-esteem, and he sometimes exhibited a want of tact that unluckily irritated or estranged many whom more suavity might have retained. Then, without meaning it, he blundered into that most injurious of all positions for the parliamentary leader, of appearing to eare more for his enemics than for his friends. As Mr. Gladstone said of him, 'destiny threw him on the main oecasions of his parliamentary career into open or qualified confliet with friends as well as focs, perhaps rather more with friends than focs.' A more serious defeet of mind was that he was apt to approach great questions-Education, Ireland, Turkey-without truly realising how great they were, and this is the worst of all the shortcomings of statesmanship. There was one case of notable exception. In all the stages and aspects of the American civil war. Forster played an admirable part.

The problem of education might have seemed the very

CHAP. 111. Ær. 61 Mill, but men saturated with English ideas of contract, of competitive rent, of strict rule of supply and demand. Mr. Bright, it is true, had a profound conviction that the root of Irish misery and disorder lay in the land question. Here he saw far and deep. But then Mr. Bright had made up his mind that the proper solution of the land question was the gradual transformation of the tenants into owners, and this strong preconception somewhat narrowed his vision. Even while Mr. Gladstone was in the middle of his battle on the church, Bright wrote to him (May 21, '69):—

When the Irish church question is out of the way, we shall find all Ireland, north and south alike, united in demanding something on the land question much broader than anything hitherto offered or proposed in compensation bills. If the question is to go on without any real remedy for the grievance, the condition of Ireland in this particular will become worse, and measures far beyond anything I now contemplate will be necessary. I am most auxious to meet the evil before it is too great for control, and my plan will meet it without wrong to any man.

'I have studied the Irish land question,' said Bright, 'from a point of view almost inaccessible to the rest of your colleagues, and from which possibly even you have not had the opportunity of regarding it. . . . I hope you are being refreshed, as I am, after the long nights in the Houselong nights which happily were not fruitless. I only hope our masters in the other House will not undo what we have done.' Mr. Gladstone replied the next day, opening with a sentence that, if addressed to any one less revered than Bright, might have seemed to veil a sarcasm :- 'I have this advantage for learning the Irish land question, that I do not set out with the belief that I know it already; and certainly no effort that I can make to acquire the mastery of it will be wanting.' He then proceeds to express his doubts as to the government embarking on a very large operation of landjobbing buying up estates from landlords and reselling them to tenants; and whether the property bought and sold again by the state would not by force of economic laws gradually return again to fewer hands. He then comes

but great differences of opinion have come to the surface, and much trouble may arise.' In fact trouble enough arose to shake his ministry to its foundations. What would be curious if he had not had the Land bill on his hands, is that he did not fight hard for his own view in the cabinet. He seems to have been content with stating it, without insisting. Whether he could have carried it in the midst of a whirlwind of indeterminate but vehement opinions, may well be doubted.

The Education bill was worked through the cabinet by Lord de Grey as president of the council, but its lines were laid and its provisions in their varying forms defended in parliament, by the vice-president, who did not reach the cabinet until July 1870. Mr. Forster was a man of storling force of character, with resolute and effective power of work, a fervid love of country, and a warm and true humanity. No orator, he was yet an excellent speaker of a sound order, for his speaking, though plain and even rough in style, abounded in substance; he always went as near to the root of the matter as his vision allowed, and always with marked effect for his own purposes. A quaker origin is not incompatible with a militant spirit, and Forster was sturdy in combat. He had rather a full share of self-esteem, and he sometimes exhibited a want of tact that unluckily irritated or estranged many whom more snavity might have retained. Then, without meaning it, he blundered into that most injurious of all positions for the parliamentary leader, of appearing to care more for his enemies than for his friends. As Mr. Gladstone said of him, 'destiny threw him on the main occasions of his parliamentary career into open or qualified conflict with friends as well as foes, perhaps rather more with friends than foes.' A more serious defect of mind was that he was apt to approach great questions-Education, Ireland, Turkey-without truly realising how great they were, and this is the worst of all the shortcomings of statesmanship. There was one case of notable exception. In all the stages and aspects of the American civil war, Forster played an admirable part.

The problem of education might have seemed the very speaking his native tongue, and even genius in an acquired language is less telling. What is astonishing is the magic of the rapid and sympathetic penetration with which Mr. Gladstone went to the heart of the problem, as it was presented to him by his Irish advisers. This was his way. When acts of policy were not of great or immediate concern, he took them as they came; but when they pressed for treatment and determination, then he swooped down upon them with the strength and vision of an eagle.

H

His career in the most deeply operative portion of it was so intimately concerned with Ireland, that my readers will perhaps benignantly permit a page or two of historic digression. I know the subject seems uninviting. My apology must be that it occupied no insignificant portion of Mr. Gladstone's public life, and that his treatment of it made one of his deepest marks on the legislation of the century. After all, there is no English-speaking community in any part of the wide globe, where our tragic mismanagement of the land of Ireland, and of those dwelling on it and sustained by it, has not left its unlucky stamp.

If Englishmen and Scots had not found the theme so uninviting, if they had given a fraction of the attention to the tenure and history of Irish land, that was bestowed, say, upon the Seisachtheia of Solon at Athens, or the Sempronian law in ancient Rome, this chapter in our annals would not have been written. As it was, parliament had made laws for landlord and tenant in Ireland without well understanding what is either an Irish landlord or an Irish tenant. England has been able to rule India, Mill said, because the business of ruling devolved upon men who passed their lives in India, and made Indian interests their regular occupation. India has on the whole been governed with a pretty full perception of its differences from England. Ireland on the contrary, suffering a worse misfortune than absentee landlords, was governed by an absentee parliament. In England, property means the rights of the rent-receiver who has equipped the land and prepared it for

The churchman hoped, but did not expect, the first. The nonconformist (broadly speaking), the academic liberal, and the hard-grit radical, were keen for the second, and they were all three well represented in the House of Commons.

III. Ær. 61.

CHAP.

What the government proposed was that local boards should be called into existence to provide schools where provision was inadequate and inefficient, these schools to be supported by the pence of the children, the carned grant from parliament, and a new rate to be levied upon the locality. The rate was the critical element. If the boards chose, they could make bye-laws compelling parents to send their children to school; and they could (with a conscience clause) settle what form of religious instruction they pleased. The voluntary men were to have a year of grace in which to make good any deficiency in supply of schools, and so keep out the boards. The second reading was secured without a division, but only on assurances from Mr. Gladstone that amendments would be made in committee. On June 16, the prime minister, as he says, 'explained the plans of the government to an eager and agitated house.'

Two days before, the cabinet had embarked upon a course that made the agitation still more eager. Mr. Gladstone wrote the pregnant entry: 'June 14. Cabinet; decided on making more general use of machinery supplied by voluntary schools, avoidance of religious controversy in local boards.' This meant that the new system was in no way to supersede the old non-system, but to supplement it. The decision was fatal to a national settlement. As Mr. Forster put it, their object was 'to complete the voluntary system and to fill up gaps.' Lord Ripon used the same language in the Lords. Instead of the school boards being universal, they should only come into existence where the ecclesiastical party was not strong enough in wealth, influence, and liberality, to keep them out. Instead of compulsory attendance being universal, that principle could only be applied where a school board was found, and where the school board liked to apply it. The old parliamentary grant to the denominational schools was to be doubled. This last provision was Mr. Gladstone's own. Forster had told him that it was imposwas governed by the British cabinet, through the Irish landed gentry, according to their views, and in their interests. After the union it was just the same. She was treated as a turbulent and infected province within the larger island; never as a community with an internal economy peculiarly her own, with special sentiments, history, recollections, points of view, and necessities all her own. Between the union and the year 1870, Acts dealing with Irish land had been passed at Westminster. Every one of these Acts was in the interest of the landlord and against the tenant. A score of Insurrection Acts, no Tenant-right Act. Meanwhile Ireland had gone down into the dark gulfs of the Famine (1846-7).

Anybody can now see that the true view of the Irish eultivator was to regard him as a kind of copyholder or customary freeholder, or whatever other name best fits a man who has possessory interests in a piece of land, held at the landlord's will, but that will controlled by enstom. In Ulster, and in an embryo degree elsewhere, this was what in a varying and irregular way actually had come about. Agrarian customs developed that undoubtedly belong to a backward social system, but they sprang from the necessities of the case. The essence of such customs in Ulster was first, a fair rent to be fixed not by competition, but by valuation, and exclusive of tenant's improvements; second, the right of the tenant to transfer to somebody else his goodwill, or whatever else we may call his right of occupancy in the holding.

Instead of adapting law to custom, habit, practice, and equity, parliament proceeded to break all this down. With well-meaning but blind violence it imported into Ireland after the famine the English idea of landed property and contract. Or rather, it imported these ideas into Ireland with a definiteness and formality that would have been impracticable even in England. Just as good people thought they could easily make Ireland protestant if only she could be got within earshot of evangelical truth, so statesmen expected that a few clauses on a parchment would suffice to root out at a stroke the inveterate habits and ideas of long generations. We talk of revolutionary doctrinaires in France and other countries. History hardly shows such revolutionary doctrinary doctrinary abolition of the church rate.' Writing to a brother non- CHAP. conformist, he expresses his almost unbounded admiration for Mr. Gladstone, 'but it is a bitter disappointment that his government should be erecting new difficulties in the way of religious equality.' Under the flashing eye of the prime minister himself the nonconformist revolt reared its crest. Miall, the veteran bearer of the flag of disestablishment, told Mr. Gladstone (July 22) that he was leading one section of the liberal party through the valley of humiliation. 'Once bit, twice shy. We can't stand this sort of thing much longer, he said. In a flame of natural wrath Mr. Gladstone replied that he had laboured not to gain Mr. Miall's support, but to promote the welfare of the country. 'I hope my hon, friend will not continue his support to the government one moment longer than he deems it consistent with his sense of right and duty. For God's sake, sir, let him withdraw it the moment he thinks it better for the cause he has at heart that he should do so.' The government, he said, had striven to smooth difficulties, to allay passions, to avoid everything that would excite or stimulate, to endeavour to bring men to work together, to rise above mere sectional views, to eschew all extremes, and not to make their own narrow choice the model of the measure they were presenting to parliament, but to admit freely and liberally into its composition those great influences which were found swaying the community. Forster wrote to a friend, 'it does not rest with me now whether or no the state should decree against religion-decree that it is a thing of no account. Well, with my assent the state shall not do this, and I believe I can prevent it.'2 Insist, forsooth, that religion was not a thing of no account against men like Dale, one of the most ardent and instructed believers that ever fought the fight and kept the faith; against Bright, than whom no devouter spirit breathed, and who thought the Education Act 'the worst Act passed by any liberal parliament since 1832.'

Ær. 61.

The opposition did not show deep gratitude, having secured as many favours as they could hope, and more to the Duke of Argyll (Dec. 5), 'I have worked daily, I think, upon the question, and so I shall continue to do. The literature of it is large, larger than I can master; but I feel the benefit of continued reading upon it. We have before us a crisis, and a great crisis, for us all, to put it on no higher ground, and a great honour or a great disgrace. As I do not mean to fail through want of perseverance, so neither will I wilfully err through precipitancy, or through want of care and desire at least to meet all apprehensions which are warranted by even the show of reason.'

¹ Life of Dale, p. 295.

² Life of Forster, i. p. 497.

It was not reading alone that brought him round to the full measure of securing the cultivator in his holding. The crucial suggestion, the expediency, namely, of making the landlord pay compensation to the tenant for disturbing him, came from Ireland. To Mr. Chichester Fortescue, the Irish secretary, Mr. Gladstone writes (Sept. 15):—

I heartily wish it were possible that you, Sullivan, and I could have some of those preliminary conversations on land, which were certainly of great use in the first stages of the Irish Church bill. As this is difficult, let us try to compare notes as well as we can in writing. I anticipate that many members of the cabinet will find it hard to extend their views to what the exigencies of the time, soberly considered, now require; but patience, prudence, and good feeling will, I hope, surmount all obstacles.

Like you, I am unwilling to force a peasant proprietary into existence. . . . The first point in this legislation, viz., that the presumption of law should give improvements to the tenant, is now, I suppose, very widely admitted, but no longer suffices to settle the question. . . . Now as to your 'compensation for disturbance.' This is indeed a question full of difficulty. It is very desirable to prevent the using of augmentation of rent as a method of eviction. I shall be most curious to see the means and provisions you may devise, without at present being too sanguine.

Meanwhile he notes to Lord Granville (Sept. 22) how critical and arduous the question is, within as well as without the cabinet, and wonders whether they ought not to be thinking of a judicious cabinet committee:—

The question fills the public mind in an extraordinary degree, abolition of the church rate.'1 Writing to a brother nonconformist, he expresses his almost unbounded admiration for Mr. Gladstone, 'but it is a bitter disappointment that his government should be ereeting new difficulties in the way of religious equality.' Under the flashing eye of the prime minister himself the nonconformist revolt reared its crest. Miall, the veteran bearer of the flag of disestablishment, told Mr. Gladstone (July 22) that he was leading one section of the liberal party through the valley of humiliation. 'Once bit, twice shy. We can't stand this sort of thing much longer,' he said. In a flame of natural wrath Mr. Gladstone replied that he had laboured not to gain Mr. Miall's support, but to promote the welfare of the country. 'I hope my hon, friend will not continue his support to the government one moment longer than he deems it consistent with his sense of right and duty. For God's sake, sir, let him withdraw it the moment he thinks it better for the cause he has at heart that he should do so.' The government, he said, had striven to smooth difficulties, to allay passions, to avoid everything that would excite or stimulate, to endeavour to bring men to work together, to rise above mere sectional views, to eschew all extremes, and not to make their own narrow choice the model of the measure they were presenting to parliament, but to admit freely and liberally into its composition those great influences which were found swaving the community. Forster wrote to a friend, 'it does not rest with me now whether or no the state should decree against religion-decree that it is a thing of no account. Well, with my assent the state shall not do this, and I believe I can prevent it.'2 Insist, forsooth, that religion was not a thing of no account against men like Dale, one of the most ardent and instructed believers that ever fought the fight and kept the faith; against Bright, than whom no devouter spirit breathed, and who thought the Education Act 'the worst Act passed by any liberal parliament since 1832.'

CHAP. III. ÆT. 61.

The opposition did not show deep gratitude, having secured as many favours as they could hope, and more

¹ Life of Dale, p. 295.

² Life of Forster, i. p. 497.

Mr. Gladstone trying to lead his argumentative colleague over one or two of the barest rudiments of the history of Irish land, and occasionally showing in the process somewhat of the quality of the superior pupil teacher acquiring to-day material for the lesson of to-morrow. Mr. Gladstone goes to the root of the matter when he says to the Duke:- 'What I would most earnestly entreat of you is not to rely too much on Highland experience, but to acquaint yourself by careful reading with the rather extensive facts and history of the Irish land question. My own studies in it are very imperfect, though pursued to the best of my ability; but they have revealed to me many matters of fact which have seriously modified my views, most of them connected with and branching out of the very wide extension of the idea and even the practice of tenant right, mostly perhaps unrecognised beyond the limits of the Ulster custom.'

Then Lord Granville writes to him that Clarendon has sent him two letters running, talking of the certainty of the government being broken up. 'The sky is very far from clear,' Mr. Gladstone says to Mr. Fortescue (Dec. 3), 'but we must bate no jot of heart or hope.' The next day it is Mr. Bright to whom he turns in friendly earnest admonition. His words will perhaps be useful to many generations of cabinet ministers:—

It is not the courageous part of your paper to which I now object, though I doubt the policy of the reference to feebleness and timidity, as men in a cabinet do not like what may seem to imply that they are cowards. It is your argument (a very overstrained one in my opinion) against Fortescue's propositions, and your proposal (so it reads) to put them back in order of discussion to the second place now, when the mind of the cabinet has been upon them for six weeks... Had the cabinet adopted at this moment a good and sufficient scheme for dealing with the Irish tenants as tenants, I should care little how much you depreciated such a scheme in comparison with one for converting them into owners. But the state of things is most critical. This is not a time at which those who in substance agree, can afford to throw away strength by the relative depreciation of those parts of a plan of dents of geography. So now quarrels about education and CHAP catechism and conscience masked the standing jealousy between church and chapel—the unwholesome fruit of the historic mishaps of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that separated the nation into two camps, and invested one of them with all the pomp and privilege of social ascendency. The parent and the child, in whose name the struggle raged, stood indifferent. From the point of party strategy, the policy of this great statute was fatal. The church of England was quickened into active antagonism by Irish disestablishment, by the extinction of sectarian tests at Oxford and Cambridge, and by the treatment of endowed schools. This might have been balanced by the zeal of nonconformists. Instead of zeal, the Education Act produced refrigeration and estrangement.

We may be sure that on such a subject Mr. Gladstone looked further than strategies of party, 'I own to you,' said he to a correspondent before the battle was quite over, 'that the history of these last few months leaves upon my mind some melancholy impressions, which I hope at some fancied period of future leisure and retirement to study and interpret.' He soon saw how deep the questions went, and on what difficult ground the state and the nation would be inevitably drawn. His notions of a distinctive formula were curious. Forster seems to have put some question to him on the point whether the three creeds were formularies within the Act. It appears to me, Mr. Gladstone answered (October 17, 1870):-

It is quite open to you at once to dispose of the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds and to decline inquiring whether they are distinctive, upon the ground that they are not documents employed in the instruction of young children. . . . Obviously no one has a right to call on you to define the distinctive character of a formulary such as the Thirty-nine Articles, or of any but such as are employed in schools. With respect to the Apostles' Creed, it appears to me not to be a distinctive formulary in the sense of the Besides the fact that it is acknowledged by the great bulk of all Christendom, it is denied or rejected by no portion of the Christian community; and, further, it is not controversial in its

III.

Æт. 61

Mr. Gladstone trying to lead his argumentative colleague over one or two of the barest rudinents of the history of Irish land, and occasionally showing in the process somewhat of the quality of the superior pupil teacher acquiring to-day material for the lesson of to-morrow. Mr. Gladstone goes to the root of the matter when he says to the Duke :- What I would most earnestly entreat of you is not to rely too much on Highland experience, but to acquaint yourself by careful reading with the rather extensive facts and history of the Irish land question. My own studies in it are very imperfeet, though pursued to the best of my ability; but they have revealed to me many matters of fact which have seriously modified my views, most of them connected with and branching out of the very wide extension of the idea and even the practice of tenant right, mostly perhaps unrecognised beyond the limits of the Ulster custom.'

Then Lord Granville writes to him that Clarendon has sent him two letters running, talking of the certainty of the government being broken up. 'The sky is very far from clear,' Mr. Gladstone says to Mr. Fortesene (Dec. 3), 'but we must bate no jot of heart or hope.' The next day it is Mr. Bright to whom he turns in friendly earnest admonition. His words will perhaps be useful to many generations of cabinet ministers:—

It is not the courageous part of your paper to which I now object, though I doubt the policy of the reference to feebleness and timidity, as men in a cabinet do not like what may seem to imply that they are cowards. It is your argument (a very overstrained one in my opinion) against Fortescue's propositions, and your proposal (so it reads) to put them back in order of discussion to the second place now, when the mind of the cabinet has been upon them for six weeks. . . . Had the cabinet adopted at this moment a good and sufficient scheme for dealing with the Irish tenants as tenants, I should care little how much you depreciated such a scheme in comparison with one for converting them into owners. But the state of things is most critical. This is not a time at which those who in substance agree, can afford to throw away strength by the relative depreciation of those parts of a plan of tional schools the fees of parents who, though not paupers, were unable to pay them. This provision suddenly swelled into dimensions of enormity hitherto unsuspected. A caustic onlooker observed that it was the smallest ditch in which two great political armies ever engaged in civil war. Yet the possibility under cover of this section, of a sectarian board subsidising church schools was plain, and some cases, though not many, actually occurred in which appreciable sums were so handed over. The twenty-fifth section was a real error, and it made no bad flag for an assault upon a scheme of error.

Great things were hoped from Mr. Bright's return to the government in the autumn of 1873. The correspondence between Mr. Gladstone and him sheds some interesting light upon the state into which the Education Act, and Mr. Forster's intractable bearing in defence of it, had brought important sections of the party:—

Mr. Bright to Mr. Gladstone.

Aug. 12, 1873.—So far as I can hear, there is no intention to get up an opposition at Birmingham, which is a comfort, as I am not in force to fight a contested election. I am anxious not to go to the election, fearing that I shall not have nerve to speak to the 5000 men who will or may crowd the town hall. Before I go, if I go, I shall want to consult you on the difficult matter-how to deal frankly and wisely with the education question. I cannot break with my 'noncou.' friends, the political friends of all my life; and unless my joining you can do something to lessen the mischief now existing and still growing, I had better remain as I have been since my illness, a spectator rather than an actor on the political field. . . . I hope you are better, and that your troubles, for a time, are diminished. I wish much you could have announced a change in the education department; it would have improved the tone of feeling in many constituencies.

Mr. Gladstone himself had touched 'the watchful jealousy' of Bright's nonconformist friends by a speech made at the time at Hawarden. This speech he explained in writing to Bright from Balmoral (Aug. 21):—

The upshot, I think, is this. My speech could not properly have

СНАР. 111. Æт. 64.

Lowe, at the other extremity, describes himself as more and more 'oppressed by a feeling of heavy responsibility and an apprehension of serious danger,' and feeling that he and the minority (Clarendon, Argyll, and Cardwell-of whom he was much the best hand at an argument)-were being driven to choose between their gravest convictions, and their allegiance to party and cabinet. They agreed to the presumption of law as to the making of improvements; to compensation for improvements, retrospective and prospective; to the right of new tenants at will to compensation on eviction. The straw that broke the camel's back was compensation for eviction, where no custom could be proved in the case of an existing tenancy. Mr. Gladstone wrote a long argumentative letter to Lord Granville to be shown to Lowe, and it was Lowe thought the tone of it very fair and the arguments of the right sort, but nevertheless he added, in the words I have already quoted, 'I fear he is steering straight upon the rocks.'

surprise us, is that though this was a measure for Irish tenants, it was deemed heinously wrong to ascertain directly from their representatives what the Irish tenants thought. Lord Bessborough was much rebuked in London for encouraging Mr. Gladstone to communicate with Sir John Gray, the owner of the great newspaper of the Irish tenant class. Yet Lord O'Hagan, the chancellor, who had the rather relevant advantage of being of the same stock and faith as three-fourths of the nation concerned, told them that 'the success or failure of the Land bill depends on the Freeman's Journal; if it says, We accept this as a fixity of tenure, every priest will say the same, and vice versa.' It was, however, almost a point of honour in those days for British cabinets to make Irish laws out of their own heads.

What might surprise us, if anything in Irish doings could

Nearly to the last the critical contest in the cabinet went on. Fortescue fought as well as he could even against the prime minister himself, as the following from Mr. Gladstone to him shows (Jan. 12):—

There can surely be no advantage in further argument between you and me at this stage—especially after so many hours and

CHAP.

ÆT. 64.

clause still yawned. The prime minister fell back into the position of August. The whole situation of the ministry had become critical in every direction. 'Education must be regarded as still to a limited extent an open question in the government.'

When the general election came, the party was still disunited. Out of 425 liberal candidates in England, Scotland, and Wales, 300 were pledged to the repeal of the 25th clause. Mr. Gladstone's last word was in a letter to Bright (Jan. 27, 1874):—

The fact is, it seems to me, that the noncons. have not yet as a body made up their minds whether they want unsectarian religion, or whether they want simple secular teaching, so far as the application of the rate is concerned. I have never been strong against the latter of these two which seems to me impartial, and not, if fairly worked, of necessity in any degree unfriendly to religion. The former is in my opinion glaringly partial, and I shall never be a party to it. But there is a good deal of leaning to it in the liberal party. Any attempt to obtain definite pledges now will give power to the enemies of both plans of proceeding. We have no rational course as a party but one, which is to adjourn for a while the solution of the grave parts of the education problem; and this I know to be in substance your opinion.

v

The same vigorous currents of national vitality that led to new endeavours for the education of the poor, had drawn men to consider the horrid chaos, the waste, and the abuses in the provision of education for the directing classes beyond the poor. Grave problems of more kinds than one came The question, What is education? was nearly as into view. hard to answer as the question of which we have seen so much, What is a church? The rival claims of old classical training and the acquisition of modern knowledge were matters of vivacious contest. What is the true place of classical learning in the human culture of our own age? Misused charitable trusts, and endowments perverted by the fluctuations of time, by lethargy, by selfishness, from the objects of pious founders, touched wakeful jealousies in the privileged sect, and called into action that adoration of of Wales $3\frac{1}{4}$ - $4\frac{1}{4}$ explaining to him the Land bill, and on other matters. He has certainly much natural intelligence. 15.—H. of C. Introduced the Irish Land bill in a speech of $3\frac{1}{4}$ hours. Well received by the House at large. Query, the Irish popular party?

Lord Dufferin, an Irish landlord, watching, as he admits, with considerable jealousy exceptional legislation in respect to Ireland, heard the speech from the peers' gallery, and wrote to Mr. Gladstone the next day:—'I feel there is no one else in the country who could have recommended the provisions of such a bill to the House of Commons, with a slighter shock to the prejudices of the class whose interests are chiefly concerned.' He adds: 'I happened to find myself next to Lord Cairns. When you had done, he told me he did not think his people would oppose any of the leading principles of your bill.'

The policy of the bill as tersely explained by Mr. Gladstone in a letter to Manning, compressing as he said eight or ten columns of the Times, was 'to prevent the landlord from using the terrible weapon of undue and unjust eviction, by so framing the handle that it shall cut his hands with the sharp edge of pecuniary damages. The man evicted without any fault, and suffering the usual loss by it, will receive whatever the custom of the country gives, and where there is no custom, according to a scale, besides whatever he can claim for permanent buildings or reclamation of land. Wanton eviction will, as I hope, be extinguished by provisions like these. And if they extinguish wanton eviction, they will also extinguish those demands for unjust augmentations of rent, which are only formidable to the occupier, because the power of wanton or arbitrary eviction is behind them.' What seems so simple, and what was so necessary, marked in truth a vast revolutionary stride. It transferred to the tenant a portion of the absolute ownership, and gave him something like an estate in his holding. The statute contained a whole code of minor provisions, including the extension of Mr. Bright's clauses for peasant proprietorship in the Church Act, but this transfer was what gave the Act its place in solid legal form.

VI

CHAP. III.

In one region Mr. Gladstone long lagged behind. He had Ær. 60. done a fine stroke of national policy in releasing Oxford from some of her antique bonds in 1854; but the principle of a free university was not yet admitted to his mind. 1863 he wrote to the vice-chancellor how entirely the government concurred in the principle of restricting the governing body of the university and the colleges to the church. The following year he was willing to throw open the degree; but the right to sit in convocation he guarded by exacting a declaration of membership of the church of England.² In 1865 Mr. Goschen—then beginning to make a mark as one of the ablest of the new generation in parliament, combining the large views of liberal Oxford with the practical energy of the city of London, added to a strong fibre given him by nature—brought in a bill throwing open all lay degrees. Mr. Gladstone still stood out, conducting a brisk correspondence with dissenters. 'The whole controversy,' he wrote to one of them, 'is carried on aggressively, as if to disturb and not to settle. Abstract principles urged without stint or mercy provoke the counter-assertion of abstract principles in return. There is not power to carry Mr. Goschen's speech either in the cabinet, the parliament, or the country. Yet the change in the balance of parties effected by the elections will cast upon the liberal majority a serious responsibility. I would rather see Oxford level with the ground, than its religion regulated in the manner which would please Bishop Colenso.'

Year by year the struggle was renewed. Even after the Gladstone government was formed, Coleridge, the solicitorgeneral, was only allowed in a private capacity to introduce a bill removing the tests. When he had been two years at the head of administration, Mr. Gladstone warned Coleridge: 'For me individually it would be beyond anything out the test of subscribing to the formity.

¹ See vol i., book iv., chap. iv. universities dissenters were shut out from college fellowships, unless will-proceed to the bachelor's degree withing to make a declaration of con-

March 16, 1864.

Thirty - nine Articles. Cambridge ² Speech on Mr. Dodson's bill, was a shade more liberal. At both March 16, 1864.

and confidential. Annoyed at Palmer's conduct. Gladstone feels — keenly the want of support in debate. Bright ill. Lowe no moral weight. 'I feel when I have spoken, that I have not a shot in my locker.'

As a very accomplished journalist of the day wrote, there was something almost painful in the strange phenomenon of a prime minister fighting as it were all but single-handed the details of his own great measure through the ambuscades and charges of a numerous and restless enemy—and of an enemy determined apparently to fritter away the principle of the measure under the pretence of modifying its details. 'No prime minister has ever attempted any task like it—a task involving the most elaborate departmental readiness, in addition to the general duties and fatigues of a prime minister, and that too in a session when questions are showered like hail upon the treasury bench.'

Then the government put on pressure, and the majority sprang up to 80. The debate in the Commons lasted over had been taken by the Church bill. The third reading was carried without a division. In the Lords the bill was read a second time without a division. Few persons 'clearly foresaw that it was the first step of a vast transfer of property, and that in a few years it would become customary for ministers of the crown to base all their legislation on the doctrine that Irish land is not an undivided ownership, but three and a half months, or about a fortnight longer than

. مريس

``_~=

In March Mr. Gladstone had received from Manning a memorandum of ill omen from the Irish bishops, setting out the amendments by them thought necessary. This paper included the principles of perpetuity of tenure for the tiller of the soil and the adjustment of rent by a court. The reader may judge for himself how impossible it would have been, even for Mr. Gladstone, in all the plenitude of his power, to persuade either cabinet or parliament to adopt such invasions of prevailing doctrine. For this, ten years more of agitation were required, and then he was able to complete the memorable chapter in Irish history that he had now opened.

¹ Spectator. ² Lecky, Democracy and Liberty, i. p. 165.

larger number of competitors for each vacancy? five or seven or ten?'

CHAP. III. ÆT. 61.

Resistance came from Lord Clarendon and, strange to say, from Mr. Bright. An ingenious suggestion of Mr. Gladstone's solved the difficulty. All branches of the civil service were to be thrown open where the minister at the head of the department approved. Lowe was ready to answer for all the departments over which he had any control,—the treasury, the board of works, audit office, national debt office, paymaster-general's office, inland revenue, customs and post-office. Mr. Cardwell, Mr. Childers, Mr. Goschen, and Lord de Grey were willing to do the same, and finally only Clarendon and the foreign office were left obdurate. It was true to say of this change that it placed the whole educated intellect of the country at the service and disposal of the state, that it stimulated the acquisition of knowledge, and that it rescued some of the most important duties in the life of the nation from the narrow class to whom they had hitherto been confided.

CHAPTER III

EDUCATION-THE CAREER AND THE TALENTS

(1870)

He that taketh away weights from the motions, doth the same as he that addeth wings.—PYM.

AMID dire controversies that in all countries surround all _ questions of the school, some believe the first government of Mr. Gladstone in its dealing with education to have achieved its greatest constructive work. Others think that, on the contrary, it threw away a noble chance. In the new scheme of national education established in 1870, the head of the government rather acquiesced than led. In his own words, his responsibility was that of concurrence rather than of authorship. His close absorption in the unfamiliar riddles of Irish land, besides the mass of business incident to the office of prime minister, might well account for his small share in the frame of the education bill. More than this, however, his private interest in public education did not amount to zeal, and it was at bottom the interest of a church-Mr. Gladstone afterwards wrote to Lord Granville (June 14, '74), 'I have never made greater personal concessions of opinion than I did on the Education bill to the united representations of Ripon and Forster.' His share in the adjustments of the Act was, as he said afterwards, a very simple one, and he found no occasion either to differ from departmental colleagues, or to press upon them any proposals of his own. If they had been dealing with an untouched case, he would have preferred the Scotch plan, which allowed the local school board to prescribe whatever religious education pleased it best. Nor did he object to a church to adopt. As far back as 1838 I laboured hard to get the National Society to act upon this principle permissively; and if I remember right, it was with the approval of the then Bishop of London.' In 1865 he harps on the same string in a letter to Lord Granville:—

third chapter of St. John, and he explains the passage relating to baptism in the sense of the prayer book and articles—the dissenters would say this is instruction in the doctrine of the church of England. Now it is utterly impossible for you to tell the church schoolmaster or the clergyman that he must not in the school explain any passage of scripture in a sense to which any of the parents of the children, or at least any sect objects; for then you would in principle entirely alter the character of the religious teaching for the rest of the scholars, and in fact upset the whole system. The dissenter, on the other hand, ought (in my opinion) to be entitled to withdraw his child from the risk (if he considers it such) of receiving instruction of the kind I describe.

Mr. Gladstone had therefore held a consistent course, and in cherishing along with full freedom of conscience the integrity of religious instruction, he had followed a definite and intelligible line. Unluckily for him and his government this was not the line now adopted.

77

When the cabinet met in the autumn of 1869, Mr. Gladstone wrote to Lord de Grey (afterwards Ripon) (Nov. 4):—

I have read Mr. Forster's able paper, and I follow it very generally. On one point I cannot very well follow it. . . . Why not adopt frankly the principle that the State or the local community should provide the secular teaching, and either leave the option to the ratepayers to go beyond this sine quâ non, if they think fit, within the limits of the conscience clause, or else simply leave the parties themselves to find Bible and other religious education from voluntary sources?

Early in the session before the introduction of the bill, Mr. Gladstone noted in his diary, 'Good hope that the principal matters at issue may be accommodated during the session,

CHAP.

AET. 60.

system, and Cavour first began the recasting of the map, was but the repulsive and dangerous symptom of a dire conflict in the depths of international politics. The Mexican adventure, and the tragedy of Maximilian's death at Queretaro, had thrown a black shadow over the iridescent and rotten fabric of Napoleon's power. Prussian victory over Anstria at Sadowa had startled Europe like a thunderclap. The reactionary movement within the catholic fold, as disclosed in the Vatiean council, kindled many hopes among the French clericals, and these hopes inspired a lively antagonism to protestant Prussia in the breast of the Spanish-born Empress of the French. Prissia in 1866 had humiliated one great catholie power when she defeated the Austrian monarchy on the battlefields of Bohemia. Was she to overthrow also the power that kept the pope upon his temporal throne in Rome? All this, however, was no more than the fringe, though one of the hardest things in history is to be sure where substance begins and fringe ends. cardinal fact for France and for Europe was German unity. Ever since the Danish conflict, as Bismarck afterwards told the British government, the French Emperor strove to bring Prussia to join him in plans for their common aggrandizement. The unity of Germany meant, besides all else, a vast extension of the area from which the material of military strength was to be drawn; and this meant the relative depression of the power of French arms. Here was the substantial fact, feeding the flane of national pride with solid fuel. The German confederation of the Congress of Vienna was a skilful invention of Metternich's, so devised as to be inert leadership of Prussia gave France a very different neighbour. In August 1867, the French ambassador at Berlin said to the ambassador of Great Britain, 'We can never passively permit the formation of a German empire; the position of the Emperor of the French would become untenable.' The British ambassador in Paris was told by the foreign minister there, that 'there was no wish for aggrandizement in the Emperor's mind, but a solicitude for the safety for offence, but extremely efficient against French aggression. A German confederation under the powerful and energetic simplest. After the extension of the franchise to the workmen, everybody felt, in a happy phrase of that time, that 'we must educate our masters.' Outside events were supposed to hold a lesson. The triumphant North in America was the land of the common school. The victory of Prussians over Austrians at Sadowa in 1866 was called the victory of the elementary school teacher. Even the nonconformists had come round. Up to the middle of the sixties opinion among them was hostile to the intervention of the state in education. They had resisted Graham's proposals in 1842 and Lord John Russell's in 1847; but a younger generation, eager for progress, saw the new necessity that change of social and political circumstance imposed. The business in 1870 was to provide schools, and to get the children into them.'

¹ July 28, 1870.

It is surprising how little serious attention had been paid even by speculative writers in this country to the vast problem of the relative duties of the State and the Family in respect of education. Mill devoted a few keen pages to it in his book upon political economy. Fawcett, without much of Mill's intellectual power or any of his sensitive temperament, was supposed to represent his principles in parliament; yet in education he was against free schools, while Mill was for them. All was unsettled; important things were even unperceived. Yet the questions of national education, answer them as we will, touch the moral life and death of nations. The honourable zeal of the churches had done something, but most of the ground remained to be covered. The question was whether the system about to be created should. merely supplement those sectarian, private, voluntary schools, or should erect a fabric worthy of the high name of national.

efforts of a handful out of the whole nation had accomplished the fairly efficient education of about one-third of the children, and had provided schools for about one-half; but the rest either went to inefficient schools, or to no school at all, and for them there was no room even had the power to compel their attendance existed.'—See Sir Henry Craik's The State in its Relation to Education, pp. 84, 85.

¹ In 1869 about 1,300,000 children were being educated in state-aided schools, 1,000,000 in schools that received no grant, were not inspected, and were altogether ineflicient, and 2,000,000 ought to have been, but were not at school at all. The main burden of national education fell on the shoulders of 200,000 persons whose voluntary subscriptions supported the schools. In other words, the interplay of stern forces, the chance seemed but dim and faint. Rumour and gossip of a pacific tenour could not hide the vital fact of incessant military preparation on both sides—steadfast and scientific in Prussia, loose and ill-concerted in France. Along with the perfecting of arms, went on a busy search by France for alliances. In the autumn of 1869 Lord Clarendon had gone abroad and talked with important personages. Moltke told him that in Prussia they thought war was near. To Napoleon the secretary of state spoke of the monster armaments, the intolerable burden imposed upon the people, and the constant danger of war that they created. The Emperor agreed—so Lord Clarendon wrote to Mr. Gladstone (Sept. 18, '69)—but went on to say that during the King of Prussia's life, and as long as the present Prussian system lasted, he thought no change of importance could be effected. Still the seed by and by appeared to have fallen on good ground. For in January 1870, in a conversation with the British ambassador, the French foreign minister (Daru) suggested that England might use her good offices with Prussia, to induce a partial disarmament in order that France might disarm also. The minister, at the same time, wrote a long despatch in the same sense to the French ambassador at St. James's. Lord Clarendon perceived the delicacy of opening the matter at Berlin, in view of the Prussian monarch's idolatry of his army. He agreed, however, to bring it before the king, not officially, but in a confidential form. This would compromise nobody. The French ambassador in London agreed, and Lord Clarendon wrote the draft of a letter to Loftus in Berlin. He sent the draft to Mr. Gladstone (Jan. 31, 1870) for 'approval and criticism.' Mr. Gladstone entered eagerly into Lord Clarendon's benevolent correspondence:—

Mr. Gladstone to Lord Clarendon.

31 Jan. 1870.—The object of your letter on disarmament is noble, and I do not see how the terms of the draft can be improved. I presume you will let the Queen know what you are about, and possibly circumstances might arrive in which she could help?

CHAP. IV.

Ær. 60.

sible to earry a proposal allowing school boards to contribute to denominational schools, and the only compensation open was a larger slice of the grant from parliament.

111

The storm at once began to rage around the helmsman's ears. Some days earlier the situation had been defined by Mr. Brand, the whip, for his leader's guidance. The attempt, he said, made by Fawcett, Dilke, and others, to create a diversion in favour of exclusively secular education has signally failed; the opinion of the country is clearly adverse On the other hand, while insisting on the religious element, the country is just as strongly opposed to dogmatic teaching in schools aided by local rates. 'You ask me,' said Mr. Gladstone to Mr. Brand (May 24), 'to solve the problem in the words "to include religion, and to exclude dogma," which, as far as I know, though it admits of a sufficient practical handling by individuals acting for themselves, has not yet been solved by any state or parliament.' Well might be report at Windsor (June 21) that, though the auspices were favourable, there was a great deal of crude and indeterminute opinion on the subject in the House as well as elsewhere, and the bill, if carried, would be carried by the authority and persistence of the government, aided by the acquiescence of the opposition.' It was this earrying of the bill by the aid of the tory opposition that gave fuel to the liberal flame, and the increase of the grant to the rectarian schools made the heat more intense. The most critical point of the bill, according to Mr. Gladstone, was a proposal that now seems singularly worded, to the effect that the teaching of scriptures in rate reloods should not be in favour of, or opposed to, tenets of any denomination. This was beaten by 251 to 130. The minority was life ral, but more than hidf of the libered party present voted in the majority.

We respect Mr. Forster, eried Dale of Birmincham the honour Mr. Gladstone, but we are determined that likely is shall not avoid be our of with the birterne, and strife from which we had begod that we had for ever evaged, by the event will render the lately risen hope of universal peace CHAP. questionable.'1 The unexpected event did not tarry, and Bismarck's own share in laying the train is still one of the historic enigmas of our time.

IV. Æт. 61.

11

Ever since 1868 the statesmen of revolutionary Spain had looked for a prince to fill their vacant throne. Among others they bethought themselves of a member of a catholic branch of the house of Hohenzollern, and in the autumn of 1869 an actual proposal was secretly made to Prince Leopold. The thing lingered. Towards the end of February, 1870, Spanish importunities were renewed, though still under the seal of strict secrecy, even the Spanish ambassador in Paris being kept in the dark.2 Leopold after a long struggle declined the glittering bait. The rival pretenders were too many, and order was not sure. Still his refusal was not considered final. The chances of order improved, he changed his mind, and on June 23 the Spanish emissary returned to Madrid with the news that the Hohenzollern prince was ready to accept the crown. The King of Prussia, not as king, but as head of the house, had given his assent. That Bismarck invented the Hohenzollern candidature the evidence is not conclusive. What is undoubted is that in the late spring of 1870 he took it up, and was much discontented at its failure in that stage.3 He had become aware that France was striving to arrange alliances with Austria, and even with Italy, in spite of the obnoxious presence of the French garrison at Rome. It was possible that on certain issues Bavaria and the South might join France against Prussia. All the hindrances to German unity, the jealousies of the minor states, the hatred of the Prussian military system, were likely to be aggravated

¹ Reminiscences of the King of Roumania. Edited from the original by Sydney Whitman. 1899. P. 92.

² King William wrote to Bismarek (Feb. 20, 1870) that the news of the Hohenzollern eandidature had come upon him like a thunderbolt, and that they must confer about it. Kaiser Wilhelm I. und Bismarck, i. p. 207.

³ The story of a ministerial eouncil at Berlin on March 15, at which the question was discussed between the king, his ministers, and the Hohenzollern prinecs, with the result that all decided for acceptance, is denied by Bismarck.—Recollections, ii. p.

sible to carry a proposal allowing school boards to contribute to denominational schools, and the only compensation open was a larger slice of the grant from parliament.

III

The storm at once began to rage around the helmsman's Some days earlier the situation had been defined by Mr. Brand, the whip, for his leader's guidance. The attempt, he said, made by Fawcett, Dilke, and others, to create a diversion in favour of exclusively secular education has signally failed; the opinion of the country is clearly adverse. On the other hand, while insisting on the religious element, the country is just as strongly opposed to dogmatic teaching in schools aided by local rates. 'You ask me,' said Mr. Gladstone to Mr. Brand (May 24), 'to solve the problem in the words "to include religion, and to exclude dogma," which, as far as I know, though it admits of a sufficient practical handling by individuals acting for themselves, has not yet been solved by any state or parliament.' Well might be report at Windsor (June 21) that, though the auspices were favourable, there was a great deal of crude and indeterminate opinion on the subject in the House as well as elsewhere, and 'the bill, if carried, would be carried by the authority and persistence of the government, aided by the acquiescence of the opposition.' It was this carrying of the bill by the aid of the tory opposition that gave fuel to the liberal flame, and the increase of the grant to the sectarian schools made the heat more intense. The most critical point of the bill, according to Mr. Gladstone, was a proposal that now seems singularly worded, to the effect that the teaching of scriptures in rate schools should not be in favour of, or opposed to, tenets of any denomination. This was beaten by 251 to 130. 'The minority was liberal, but more than half of the liberal party present voted in the majority.'

'We respect Mr. Forster,' cried Dale of Birmingham, 'we honour Mr. Gladstone, but we are determined that England shall not again be cursed with the bitterness and strife from which we had hoped that we had for ever escaped, by the

CHAP.

Ær. 61.

the project to be carried out. M. Lavalette added that he Contracted that her Majesty's government, considering its friendly relations with France and its general desire to maintain peace, would use its influence with the other parties concerned. I told M. de Lavalette that the announcement had taken the prime minister and myself entirely by surprise.

Yet two days before Mr. Hammond told Lord Granville that he was not aware of anything important to be dealt with at the foreign department, a deputation had started from Madrid with an invitation to Prince Leopold. At the moment when this singular language was falling from our under-secretary's lips, the Due de Gramont, the French foreign minister, was telling Lord Lyons at Paris that France would not endure the insult, and expressing his hope that the government of the Queen would try to prevent it. After all, as we have seen, Bismarck in February had used words not very unlike Mr. Hammond's in July.

On July 5, the Emperor, who was at St. Cloud, sent for Baron Rothschild (of Paris), and told him that as there was at that moment no foreign minister in England, he wished to send through him a message to Mr. Gladstone. wanted Mr. Gladstone to be informed, that the council of ministers at Madrid had decided to propose Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern for the Spanish throne, that his candidature would be intolerable to France, and that he hoped Mr. Gladstone would endeavour to seeme its withdrawal. The message was telegraphed to London, and early on the morning of July 6, the present Lord Rothschild deciphered it for his father, and took it to Carlton House Terrace. He found Mr. Gladstone on the point of leaving for Windsor, and drove with him to the railway station. For a time Mr. Gladstone was silent. Then he said he did not approve of the candidature, but he was not disposed to interfere with the liberty of the Spanish people to choose their own sovereign.

Lord Granville put pressure on the provisional government at Madrid to withdraw their candidate, and on the

¹ Hansard, July 11, 1870.

than they had anticipated. A proposal from the government (July 14) to introduce secret voting in the election of local boards was stubbornly contested, in spite, says Mr. Gladstone, 'of the unvarying good temper, signal ability and conciliatory spirit of Mr. Forster,' and it was not until after fourteen divisions that a few assuaging words from Mr. Gladstone brought the handful of conservative opposition to reason. It was five o'clock before the unflagging prime minister found his way homewards in the broad daylight.

It is impossible to imagine a question on which in a free government it was more essential to carry public opinion with the law. To force parents to send children to school, was an enterprise that must break down if opinion would not help to work it. Yet probably on no other question in Mr. Gladstone's career as law-maker was common opinion so hard to weigh, to test, to focus and adjust. Of the final settlement of the question of religious instruction, Mr. Gladstone said to Lord Lyttelton when the battle was over (Oct. 25, '70):—

of the government. Our first proposition was by far the best. But it received no active support even from the church, the National Society, or the opposition, while divers bishops, large bodies of clergy, the Education Union, and earliest of all, I think, Roundell Palmer in the House of Commons, threw overboard the catechism. We might then have fallen back upon the plan of confining the application of the rate to secular subjects; but this was opposed by the church, the opposition, most of the dissenters, and most of our own friends. As it was, I assure you, the very utmost that could be done was to arrange the matter as it now stands, where the exclusion is limited to the formulary, and to get rid of the popular imposture of undenominational instruction.

At bottom the battle of the schools was not educational, it was social. It was not religious but ecclesiastical, and that is often the very contrary of religious. In the conflicts of the old centuries whence Christian creeds emerged, disputes on dogma constantly sprang from rivalries of race and accisaid that it made up 'a chapter which for fault and folly CHAP. taken together is almost without a parallel in the history of nations."

On July 6 the French ministers made a precipitate declaration to their Chambers, which was in fact an ultimatum to Prassia. The action of Spain was turned into Prussian action. Prussia was called to account in a form that became a public and international threat, as Bismarck put it, 'with the hand on the sword-hilt.' These rash words of challenge were the first of the French disasters. On July 8 the Duc de Gramont begged her Majesty's government to use all their influence to bring about the voluntary remunciation by Prince Leopold of his pretensions. This he told Lord Lyons would be 'a most fortunate solution' of the question. Two days later he assured Lord Lyons that 'if the Prince of Hohenzollern should, on the advice of the King of Prussia, withdraw his acceptance of the crown the whole affair would be at an end.'

On July 10 Lord Granville suggests to Mr. Gladstone: 'What do you think of asking the Queen whether there is any one to whom she could write confidentially with a view to persuade Hohenzollern to refuse?' Mr. Gladstone replies :--

1. I should think you could not do wrong in asking the Queen, as you propose, to procure if she can a refusal from Hohenzollern, through some private channel. 2. I suppose there could be no objection to sounding the Italian government as to the Duke of Aosta. 3. If in the meantime you have authentic accounts of military movements in France, would it not be right formally to ask their suspension, if it be still the desire of the French government that you should continue to act in the sense of procuring withdrawal?

The ambassador at Paris was instructed to work vigorously in this sense, and to urge self-possession and measure upon the Emperor's council. On July 12, however, the prospects of peace grew more and more shadowy. On that day it became known that Prince Leopold had spontaneously form, but sets forth in the simplest shape a series of the leading facts on which Christianity, the least abstract of all religions, is based.

¹ Gleanings, iv. p. 222. Modern French historians do not differ from Mr. Gladstone.

Manning plied him hard (September, October, November, 1871). The state of Paris (Commune blazing that year, Tuileries and Hôtel de Ville in ashes, and the Prussian spiked helmets at the gates) was traceable to a godless education—so the archbishop argued. In England the Christian tradition was unbroken. It was only a clique of doctrinaires, Huxley at the head of them, who believing nothing trumpeted secular education. 'Delighted to see Mr. Forster attacked as playing into the hands of the clergy.' Mr. Gladstone should stimulate by every agency in his power the voluntary religious energies of the three kingdoms. 'The real crisis is in the formation of men. They are as we make them, and they make society. The formation of men is the work you have given to the school boards. God gave it to the parents. Neither you nor Mr. Forster meant this; you least of all men on your side of the House. Glad to see you lay down the broad and intelligible line that state grants go to secular education, and voluntary efforts must do the rest. Let us all start fair in this race. Let every sect, even the Huxleyites, have their grant if they fulfil the conditions. As for the school-rate conscience, it is a mongrel institution of quakerism.' How Mr. Gladstone replied on all these searching issues, I do not find.

IV

The passing of the Act did not heal the wound. The nonconformist revolt was supported in a great conference at Manchester in 1872, representing eight hundred churches and other organizations. Baptist unions and congregational unions were unrelenting. We may as well finish the story. It was in connection with this struggle that Mr. Chamberlain first came prominently into the arena of public life—bold, intrepid, imbued with the keen spirit of political nonconformity, and a born tactician. The issue selected for the attack was the twenty-fifth section of the Education Act, enabling school boards to pay in denomina-same time Lord Granville strongly nrged M. de Lavalette in London, to impress upon his government that they ought not to take upon themselves the responsibility of pursning the quarrel on a matter of form, when they had obtained what Gramont had assured Lord Lyons would put an end to the dispute. Though Mr. Disraeli afterwards imputed want of energy to the British remonstrances, there is no reason to suppose that Lord Lyons was wanting either in directness or emphasis. What warnings were likely to reach the minds of men trembling for their personal popularity and for the dynasty, afraid of clamour in the streets, afraid of the army, ignorant of vital facts both military and diplomatic, incapable of measuring such facts even if they had known them, committed by the rash declaration of defiance a week before to a position that made retreat the only alternative to the sword? At the head of them all sat in misery, a sovereign reduced by disease to a wavering shadow of the will and vision of a man. . They marched headlong to the pit that Bismarck was digging for them.

CHAP.

Æт. 61.

On July 14 Mr. Gladstone again writes to Lord Granville, suggesting answers to questions that might be asked that night in parliament. Should they say that the candidature was withdrawn, and that with this withdrawal we had a right to hope the whole affair would end, but that communieations were still continued with Prussin? In duty to all parties we were bound to hope that the subject of complaint having disappeared, the complaint itself and the danger to the peace of Europe would disappear also. Then he proeeeds:- 'What if you were to telegraph to Lyons to signify that we think it probable questions may be asked in parliament to-day; that having been called in by France itself, we cannot affect to be wholly outside the matter; and that it will be impossible for us to conceal the opinion that the cause of quarrel having been removed, France ought to be satisfied. While this might fairly pass as a friendly notice, it might also be useful as admonition. Please to consider. The claim in the telegrams for more acknowledgment of the conduct of Prussia in parliament, seems to me to deserve consideration.'

been made by a man who thinks that boards and public rates ought to be used for the purpose of putting down as quickly as may be the voluntary schools. But the recommendation which I made might have been consistently and properly supported by any one whose opinions fell short of this, and did not in the least turn upon any preference for voluntary over compulsory means.¹

As he said afterwards to Lord Granville, 'I personally have no fear of the secular system; but I cannot join in measures of repression against voluntary schools.'

'There is not a word said by you at Hawarden,' Bright replied (Aug. 25), 'that would fetter you in the least in considering the education question; but at present the general feeling is against the idea of any concession on your part. . . . What is wanted is some definite willingness or resolution to recover the goodwill and confidence of the nonconformist leaders in the boroughs; for without this, reconstruction is of no value. . . . Finance is of great moment, and people are well pleased to see you in your old office again; but no budget will heal the soreness that has been created—it is not of the pocket, but of the feelings. . . . I want you just to know where I am and what I feel; but if I could talk to you, I could say what I have to say with more precision, and with a greater delicacy of expression. I ask you only to put the best construction on what I write.'

If Forster could only have composed himself to the same considerate spirit, there might have been a different tale to tell. Bright made his election speech at Birmingham, and Forster was in trouble about it. 'I think,' said the orator to Mr. Gladstone, 'he ought rather to be thankful for it; it will enable him to get out of difficulties if he will improve the occasion. There is no question of changing the policy of the government, but of making minor concessions. . . . I would willingly change the policy of irritation into one of soothing and conciliation.' Nothing of great importance in the way even of temporary reconciliation was effected by Mr. Bright's return. The ditch of the twenty-fifth

¹ For the rest of the letter see Appendix.

CHAP.

Æт. 61.

Meanwhile the courier arrived, but before the courier a despatch came from Paris conveying the suggestion that the King might write an apologetic letter to the French Emperor. This naturally gave the King some offence, but he contented himself with sending Benedetti a polite message by an aide-de-camp that he had received in writing from Prince Leopold the intelligence of his renunciation. 'By this his Majesty considered the question as settled.' Benedetti persevered in seeking to learn what answer he should make to his government on the question of further assur-The King replied by the same officer that he was obliged to decline absolutely to enter into new negotiations; that what he had said in the morning was his last word in the matter. On July 14, the King received Benedetti in the railway carriage on his departure for Berlin, told him that any future negotiations would be conducted by his government, and parted from him with courteous salutations. Neither king nor ambassador was conscious that the country of either had suffered a shadow of indignity from the representative of the other.

Bismarck called upon the British ambassador in those days, and made what, in the light of later revelations, seems a singular complaint. He observed that Great Britain 'should have forbidden France to enter on the war. She was in a position to do so, and her interests and those of Europe demanded it of her.' Later in the year he spoke in the same sense at Versailles: 'If, at the beginning of the war, the English had said to Napoleon, "There must be no war," there would have been none.' What is certain is that nobody would have been more discomfitted by the success of England's prohibition than Count Bismarck. The sincerity and substance of his reproach are tested by a revelation made by himself long after. Though familiar, the story is worth telling over again in the biography of a statesman who stood for a type alien to policies of fraud.

Bismarck had hurried from Varzin to Berlin on July 12, in profound concern lest his royal master should subject his

¹ The Diplomatic Reminiscences of Lord Augustus Loftus. Second series, i. p. 283. Second series,

the principle of property which insists upon applying all _ the rules of individual ownership to what rightfully belongs to the community. Local interests were very sensitive, and they were multitudinous. The battle was severely fought, and it extended over several years, while commission upon commission explored the issues.

In a highly interesting letter (1861) to Lord Lyttelton Mr. Gladstone set out at length his views upon the issue between ancient and modern, between literary training and scientific, between utilitarian education and liberal. The reader will find this letter in an appendix, as well as one to Sir Stafford Northcote. While rationally conservative upon the true basis of attainments in 'that small proportion of the youth of any country who are to become in the fullest sense educated men,' he is rationally liberal upon what the politics of the time made the burning question of the sacrosanctity of endowments. 'It is our habit in this country,' he said, 'to treat private interests with an extravagant tenderness. The truth is that all laxity and extravagance in dealing with what in a large sense is certainly public property, approximates more or less to dishonesty, or at the least lowers the moral tone of the persons concerned.'

The result of all this movement, of which it may perhaps be said that it was mainly inspired and guided by a few men of superior energy and social weight like Goldwin Smith, Temple, Jowett, Liddell, the active interest of the classes immediately concerned being hardly more than middlingwas one of the best measures in the history of this government of good measures (1869). It dealt with many hundreds of schools, and with an annual income of nearly six hundred thousand pounds. As the Endowed Schools bill was one of the best measures of the government, so it was Mr. Forster's best piece of legislative work. That it strengthened the government can hardly be said; the path of the reformer is not rose-strewn.2 in the service of that church, or had required that the masters should be in holy orders. Mr. Gladstone protested against the bill as 'inequitable, unusual and unwise,' and it was largely modified in committee.

¹ See Appendix.
² In 1874 the conservative government brought in a bill restoring to the church of England numerous schools in cases where the founder had recognised the authority of a bishop, or had directed attendance

Æт. 61.

effect of the abbreviated text of the Ems telegram, as com- CHAP. pared with that produced by the original was not the result of stronger words but of the form, which made this announcement appear decisive, while Abeken's version would only have been regarded as a fragment of a negotiation still pending and to be continued at Berlin. After I had read out the concentrated edition to my two guests, Moltke remarked: "Now it has a different ring; it sounded before like a parley; now it is like a flourish in answer to a challenge." I went on to explain: "If in execution of his Majesty's order I at once communicate this text, which contains no alteration in or addition to the telegram, not only to the newspapers, but also by telegraph to all our embassies, it will be known in Paris before midnight, and not only an account of its contents, but also an account of the manner of its distribution, will have the effect of a red rag upon the Gallic bull. Fight we must, if we do not want to act the part of the vanquished without a battle. Success, however, essentially depends upon the impression which the origination of the war makes upon us and others; it is important that we should be the party attacked, and that we fearlessly meet the public threats of France." This explanation brought about in the two generals a revulsion to a more joyous mood, the liveliness of which surprised me. They had suddenly recovered their pleasure in eating and drinking, and spoke in a more cheerful vein. Roon said: "Our God of old lives still, and will not let us perish in disgrace."'1

The telegram devised at the Berlin dinner-party soon

will perhaps care to see the telegram will perhaps care to see the telegram as Bismarck received it, drawn up by Abeken at the King's command, handed in at Ems, July 13, in the afternoon, and reaching Berlin at six in the evening:—'His Majesty writes to me: "Count Benedetti spoke to me on the promenade, in order to demand from me, finally in a very importunate manner, that I should authorise him to telegraph at once that I bound myself for all future time never again to give my consent if the Hohenzollerns should renew

1 Bismarck: His Reflections and Reminiscences, 1898, ii. pp. 95-101. Somewhat sternly, as it is neither right nor possible to undertake ensomewhat sternly, as it is neither right nor possible to undertake engagements of this kind à tout jamais. Naturally I told him I had as yet received no news, and as he was earlier informed about Paris and Madrid he could clearly see that my government once more had no hand in the matter." His Majesty has since received a letter from the Prince. His Majesty having told Count Benedetti that he was awaiting news from the Prince, has decided, with reference to the above demand, upon the representation of Count Eulenburg and myself, not to receive odious, I am almost tempted to say it would be impossible, after my long connection with Oxford, to go into a new controversy on the basis of what will be taken and alleged to be an absolute secularisation of the colleges; as well as a reversel of what was deliberately considered and sanctioned in the parliamentary legislation of 1854 and 1856. I incline to think that this work is work for others, not for me.'

It was not until 1871 that Mr. Gladstone consented to make the bill a government measure. It rapidly passed the Commons and was accepted by the Lords, but with amendments. Mr. Gladstone when he had once adopted a project never loitered; he now resolutely refused the changes proposed by the Lords, and when the time came and Lord Salisbury was for insisting on them, the peers declined by a handsome majority to carry the fight further. It is needless to add that the admission of dissenters to degrees and endowments did not injuriously affect a single object for which a national university exists. On the other hand, the mischiefs of ecclesiastical monopoly were long in disappearing.

7.11

We have already seen how warmly the project of introducing competition into the civil service had kindled Mr. Gladstone's enthusiasm in the days of the Crimean war. Reform had made slow progress. The civil service commission had been appointed in 1855, but their examinations only tested the quality of candidates sent before them on nomination. In 1860 a system was set up of limited competition among three nominated candidates, who had first satisfied a preliminary test examination. This lasted until 1870. Lowe had reform much at heart. At the end of 1869, he appealed to the prime minister: 'As I have so often tried in vain, will you bring the question of the civil service before the cabinet to-day? Something must be decided. We cannot keep matters in this discreditable state of abeyance. If the cabinet will not entertain the idea of open competition, might we not at any rate require a

CHAP. IV.

Ær. 61.

An inflammatory appeal was made to the Chambers. When a parliamentary committee was appointed, a vital document was suppressed, and its purport misrepresented. Thus in point of scruple, the two parties to the transaction were not ill-matched, but Bismarck had been watchful, provident, and well informed, while his opponents were men, as one of them said, 'of a light heart,' heedless, uncalculating, and ignorant and wrong as to their facts.1

On July 15 Mr. Gladstone reported to the Queen:—

Mr. Disraeli made inquiries from the government respecting the differences between France and Prussia, and in so doing expressed opinions strongly adverse to France as the apparent aggressor. Mr. Gladstone, in replying, admitted it to be the opinion of the government that there was no matter known to be in controversy of a nature to warrant a disturbance of the general peace. He said the course of events was not favourable, and the decisive moment must in all likelihood be close at hand.

'At a quarter past four,' says a colleague, 'a cabinet box was handed down the treasury bench to Gladstone. He opened it and looking along to us, said-with an accent I shall never forget-"War declared against Prussia."'2 'Shall I ever forget,' says Archbishop Tait, 'Gladstone's face of earnest care when I saw him in the lobby?'3

The British cabinet made a final effort for peace. Lord Granville instructed our ambassadors to urge France and Prussia to be so far controlled by the treaty of Paris that before proceeding to extremities they should have recourse to the good offices of some friendly Power, adding that his government was ready to take any part that might be desired in the matter. On the 18th Bismarck replied by throwing the onus of acceptance on France. On the 19th France declined the proposal.

Yet he had prepared this document for the very purpose of tempting France into a declaration of war.

² Grant Duff's Diaries, ii. p. 153.

The technical declaration of war by ³ Life, ii. p. 78.

In the Reichstag, on July 20, Bismarck reproached the French ministers for not yielding to the pressure of the members of the opposition like Thiers and Gambetta, and producing the document, which would have overthrown the base on which the declaration of war was founded.

France was made at Berlin on July 19.

CHAPTER IV

THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR

(1870)

OF all the princes of Europe, the king of England alone seemed to be seated upon the pleasant promontory that might safely view the tragic sufferings of all his neighbours about him, without any other concernment than what arose from his own princely heart and Christian compassion, to see such desolation wrought by the pride and passion and ambition of private persons, supported by princes who knew not what themselves would have.—CLARENDON.

During the years in which England had been widening the , base of her institutions, extending her resources of wealth and credit, and strengthening her repute in the councils of Christendom, a long train of events at which we have glanced from time to time, had slowly effected a new distribution of the force of nations, and in Mr. Gladstone's phrase had unset every joint of the compacted fabric of continental Europe. The spirit in which he thought of his country's place in these transactions is to be gathered from a letter addressed by him to General Grey, the secretary of the Queen, rather more than a year before the outbreak of the Franco-German war. What was the immediate occasion I cannot be sure, nor does it matter. The letter itself is full of interest, for it is in truth a sort of charter of the leading principles of Mr. Gladstone's foreign policy at the moment when he first incurred supreme responsibility for our foreign affairs :---

Mr. Gladstone to General Grey.

April 17, 1869.— . . . Apart from this question of the moment, there is one more important as to the tone in which it is to be desired that, where matter of controversy has arisen on the

as between parties. I hope you do not think it unkind that I should write thus. Forgive the rashness of a friend. One of the purposes in life dear to my heart has been to knit together in true amity the people of my own country with those of your great nation. That web of concord is too tender yet, not to suffer under the rude strain of conflicts and concussions even such as we have no material share in. I think that even if I err, I cannot be without a portion of your sympathy: now when the knell of the brave begins to toll. As for us, we have endeavoured to cherish with both the relations of peace and mutual respect. May nothing happen to impair them!

Though good feeling prevented Mr. Gladstone from dividing praise and blame between the two governments, his own judgment was clear. The initial declaration of July 6, followed by the invention of a second demand by France upon Prussia after the first had been conceded, looked to him, as it did to England generally, like a fixed resolution to force a quarrel. In September he wrote of the proceedings of the French government:—

Wonder rises to its climax when we remember that this feverish determination to force a quarrel was associated with a firm belief in the high preparation and military superiority of the French forces, the comparative inferiority of the Germans, the indisposition of the smaller states to give aid to Prussia, and even the readiness of Austria, with which from his long residence at Vienna the Duc de Gramont supposed himself to be thoroughly acquainted, to appear in arms as the ally of France. It too soon appeared that, as the advisers of the Emperor knew nothing of public rights and nothing of the sense of Europe, so they knew nothing about Austria and the mind of the German states, and less than nothing about not only the Prussian army, but even their own.¹

CHAP.

Æт. 61.

¹ Gleanings, iv. p. 222.

the answer is, No. But do not, on the other hand, allow it to be believed that England will never interfere. For the eccentricities of other men's belief no one can answer; but for any reasonable belief in such an abnegation on the part of England, there is no ground whatever. As I understand Lord Clarendon's ideas, they are fairly represented by his very important diplomatic communications since he has taken office. They proceed upon such grounds as these:-That England should keep entire in her own hands the means of estimating her own obligations upon the various states of facts as they arise; that she should not foreclose and narrow her own liberty of choice by declarations made to other Powers, in their real or supposed interests, of which they would claim to be at least joint interpreters; that it is dangerous for her to assume alone an advanced, and therefore an isolated position, in regard to European controversies; that, come what may, it is better for her to promise too little than too much; that she should not encourage the weak by giving expectations of aid to resist the strong, but should rather seek to deter the strong by firm but moderate language, from aggressions on the weak; that she should seek to develop and mature the action of a common, or public, or European opinion, as the best standing bulwark against wrong, but should beware of seeming to lay down the law of that opinion by her own authority, and thus running the risk of setting against her, and against right and justice, that general sentiment which ought to be, and generally would be, arrayed in their favour. I am persuaded that at this juncture opinions of this colour being true and sound, are also the only opinions which the country is disposed to approve. But I do not believe that on that account it is one whit less disposed than it has been at any time, to cast in its lot upon any fitting occasion with the cause it believes to be right. . . . I therefore hope and feel assured her Majesty will believe that Lord Clarendon really requires no intimation from me to ensure his steadily maintaining the tone which becomes the foreign minister of the Queen.

Heavy banks of cloud hung with occasional breaks of brighter sky over Europe; and all the plot, intrigue, conspiracy, and subterranean scheming, that had been incessant ever since the Crimean war disturbed the old European On July 16 he wrote to Cardwell at the war office:—

CHAP.

If, unhappily, which God forbid, we have to act in this war, it will not be with six months', nor three months', nor even one month's notice. The real question is, supposing an urgent call of honour and of duty in an emergency for 15,000 or 20,000 men, what would you do? What answer would the military authorities make to this question, those of them especially who have brains rather than mere position? Have you no fuller battalions than those of 500? At home or in the Mediterranean? If in the latter, should they not be brought home? Childers seemed to offer a handsome subscription of marines, and that the artillery would count for much in such a case is most probable. What I should like is to study the means of sending 20,000 men to Antwerp with as much promptitude as at the Trent affair we sent 10,000 to Canada.

The figures of the army and navy were promptly supplied to the prime minister, Cardwell adding with a certain shrillness that, though he had no wish to go either to Antwerp or anywhere else, he could not be responsible for sending an expedition abroad, unless the army were fitted for that object by measures taken now to increase its force.

I entirely agree with you, Mr. Gladstone replied, that when it is seriously intended to send troops to Antwerp or elsewhere abroad, 'immediate measures must be taken to increase our force.' I feel, however, rather uneasy at what seems to me the extreme susceptibility on one side of the case of some members of the cabinet. I hope it will be balanced by considering the effect of any forward step by appeal to parliament, in compromising the true and entire neutrality of our position, and in disturbing and misdirecting the mind of the public and of parliament. I am afraid I have conveyed to your mind a wrong impression as to the state of my own. It is only a far outlook which, in my opinion, brings into view as a possibility the sending a force to Antwerp. Should the day arrive, we shall then be on the very edge of war, with scarcely a hope of not passing onward into the abyss.

Cardwell sent him a paper by a high military authority, on which Mr. Gladstone made two terse ironic comments.

of France.' This solicitude evaporated in what Bismarck disdainfully called the policy of pourboires, the policy of tips and pickings—scraps and slips of territory to be given to France under the diplomatic name of compensation. For three years it had been no secret that peace was at the mercy of any incident that might arise.

The small Powers were in trepidation, and with good reason. Why should not France take Belgium, and Prussia take Holland? The Belgian press did not conceal bad feeling, and Bismarck let fall the ominous observation that if Belgium persisted in that course, 'she might pay dear for it.' The Dutch minister told the British ambassador in Vienna that in 1865 he had a long conversation with Bismarck, and Bismarck had given him to understand that without colonies Prussia could never become a great maritime nation; he coveted Holland less for its own sake, than for her wealthy colonies. When reminded that Belgium was guaranteed by the European Powers, Bismarck replied that 'a guarantee was in these days of little value.' This remark makes an excellent register of the diplomatic temperature of the hour.

Then for England. The French Emperor observed (1867), not without an accent of complaint, that she seemed 'little disposed to take part in the affairs of the day.' This was the time of the Derby government. When war seemed inevitable on the affair of Luxemburg, Lord Stanley, then at the foreign office, phlegmatically remarked (1867) that England had never thought it her business to guarantee the integrity of Germany. When pressed from Prussia to say whether in the event of Prussia being forced into war by France, England would take a part, Lord Stanley replied that with the causes of that quarrel we had nothing to do, and he felt sure that neither parliament nor the public would sanction an armed interference on either side. Belgium, he added, was a different question. General non-intervention, therefore, was the common doctrine of both our parties.

After Mr. Gladstone had been a year in power, the chance of a useful part for England to perform seemed to rise on the horizon, but to those who knew the racing currents, the 7 Feb.—The answer to your pacific letter as reported by Loftus throws, I think, a great responsibility on the King of Prussia.

12 Feb.—I hope, with Daru, that you will not desist from your efforts, whatever be the best mode of prosecuting the good design. I thought Bismarck's case, on Loftns's letter, a very bad one. I do not think Lyons's objections, towards the close of his letter, apply in a case where you have acted simply as a friend, and not in the name and on behalf of France.

18 Feb.—I return Bismarck's confidential letter on disarmament. As the matter appears to me, the best that can be said for this letter is that it contains matter which might be used with more or less force in a conference on disarmament, by way of abating the amount of relative call on Prussia. As an argument against entertaining the subject, it is futile, and he ought at any rate to be made to feel his responsibility,—which, I daresay, you will contrive while acknowledging his civility.

9 April.—I presume you have now only in the matter of disarmament to express your inability to recede from your opinions, and your regret at the result of the correspondence. If inclined to touch the point, you might with perfect justice say that while our naval responsibilities for our sea defence have no parallel or analogue in the world, we have taken not far short of two millions off our estimates, and have not announced that the work of reduction is at an end: which, whether satisfactory or not, is enough to show that you do not preach wholly without practising.

It is a striking circumstance, in view of what was to follow, that at this moment when Mr. Gladstone first came into contact with Bismarck,—the genius of popular right and free government and settled law of nations, into contact with the genius of force and reason of state and blood and iron—the realist minister of Prussia seemed to be almost as hopeful for European peace as the minister of England. The political horizon, Bismarck wrote (Feb. 22), seen from Berlin appears at present so unclouded that there is nothing of interest to report, and I only hope that no unexpected by time, if France, while keeping her powder dry, were to persevere in a prudent abstention. Bismarck believed that Moltke's preparations were more advanced than Napoleon's. It was his interest to strike before any French treaties of alliance were signed. The Spanish crown was an occasion. It might easily become a pretext for collision if either France or Germany thought the hour had come. If the Hohenzollern candidate withdrew, it was a diplomatic success for France and a humiliation to Germany; if not, a king from Prussia planted across the Pyrenees, after the aggrandizements of north German power in 1864 and 1866, was enough to make Richelieu, Mazarin, Louis xiv., Bonaparte, even Louis Philippe, turn in their graves.

On June 27, 1870, Lord Clarendon died, and on July 6 Lord Granville received the seals of the foreign department from the Queen at Windsor. The new chief had visited his office the day before, and the permanent under-secretary coming into his room to report, gave him the most remarkable assurance ever received by any secretary of state on first seating himself at his desk. Lord Granville told the story in the House of Lords on July 11, when the crash of the fiercest storm since Waterloo was close upon them:—

The able and experienced under-secretary, Mr. Hammond, at the foreign office told me, it being then three or four o'clock, that with the exception of the sad and painful subject about to be discussed this evening [the murders by brigands in Greece] he had never during his long experience known so great a lull in foreign affairs, and that he was not aware of any important question that I should have to deal with. At six o'clock that evening I received a telegram informing me of the choice that had been made by the provisional government of Spain of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and of his acceptance of the offer. went to Windsor the following day, and had the honour of receiving the seals of the foreign office from her Majesty. On my return I saw the Marquis de Lavalette, who informed me of the fact which I already knew, and in energetic terms remarked on the great indignity thus offered to France, and expressed the determination of the government of the Emperor not to permit government at Berlin 'effectually to discourage a project fraught with risks to the best interests of Spain. The draft of this despatch was submitted by Lord Granville to Mr. Gladstone, who suggested a long addition afterwards incorporated in the text. The points of his addition were an appeal to the magnanimity of the King of Prussia; an injunction to say nothing to give ground for the supposition that England had any business to discuss the abstract right of Spain to choose her own sovereign; that the British government had not admitted Prince Leopold's acceptance of the throne to justify the immediate resort to arms threatened by France; but that the secrecy with which the affair had been conducted was a ground for just offence, and the withdrawal of the prince could alone repair it.1 Austria made energetic representations at Berlin to the same effect. In sending this addition to Lord Granville, Mr. Gladstone says (July 8), 'I am doubtful whether this despatch should go till it has been seen by the cabinet, indeed I think it should not, and probably you mean this. The Queen recollects being told something about this affair by Clarendon—without result -last year. I think Gramont exacts too much. It would never do for us to get up a combination of Powers in this difficult and slippery matter.'

Events for a week—one of the great critical weeks of the century—moved at a dizzy speed towards the abyss. Peace unfortunately hung upon the prudence of a band of statesmen in Paris, who have ever since, both in their own country and everywhere else, been a byword in history for blindness and folly. The game was delicate. Even in the low and broken estate into which the moral areopagus of Europe had fallen in these days, it was a disadvantage to figure as the aggressor. This disadvantage the French Empire heedlessly imposed upon itself. Of the diplomacy on the side of the government of France anterior to the war, Mr. Gladstone before the cabinet, and was sent to Berlin by special messenger that evening. The only other cabinet meeting during this critical period was on July 14.

¹ The despatch is dated July 6 in the blue-book (C. 167, p. 3), but it was not sent that day, as the date of Mr. Gladstone's letter shows. No cabinet seems to have been held before July 9. The despatch was laid

renounced the candidature, or that his father had renounced _ it on his behalf. The French ministers made up their minds that the defeat of Prussia must be more direct. Gramont told Lyons (July 12) that the French government was in a very embarrassing position. Public opinion was so much excited that it was doubtful whether the ministry would not be overthrown, if it went down to the Chamber and announced that it regarded the affair as finished, without having obtained some more complete satisfaction from Prussia. So the Emperor and his advisers flung themselves gratuitously under Bismarck's grinding wheels by a furtherdemand that not only should the candidature be withdrawn, but the King should pledge himself against its ever being at any time revived. Mr. Gladstone was not slow to see the fatal mischief of this new development.

Mr. Gladstone to Lord Granville.

July 12, 11.30 P.M.—I have seen, since Rothschild's telegram, that of Lyons, dated 7.55 P.M. It seems to me that Lyons should be supplied with an urgent instruction by telegram before the council of ministers to-morrow. France appealed to our support at the outset. She received it so far as the immediate object was concerned. It was immediately and energetically given. appears to have been named by the French minister in public inclusively with that of other Powers. Under these circumstances it is our duty to represent the immense responsibility which will rest upon France, if she does not at once accept as satisfactory and conclusive, the withdrawal of the candidature of Prince Leopold.

The substance of this note was despatched to Paris at 2.30 A.M. on the morning of July 13. It did not reach Lord Lyons till half-past nine, when the council of ministers had already been sitting for half an hour at St. Cloud. The telegram was hastily embodied in the form of a tolerably emphatic letter and sent by special messenger to St. Cloud, where it was placed in M. de Gramont's hand, at the table at which he and the other ministers were still sitting in council in the presence of the Emperor and the Empress.2 At the

¹ The Rothschild telegram was:—
The Prince has given up his candidature. The French are satisfied.

2 No. 39. Correspondence respecting thenegotiations preliminary to the war between France and Prussia, 1870.

On July 13 Gramont asked Lord Lyons whether he could count upon the good offices of England in obtaining the prohibition of any future candidature, at the same time giving him a written assurance that this would terminate the incident. Lord Lyons declined to commit himself, and referred home for instructions. The cabinet was hastily summoned for noon on the 14th. It decided that the demand could not be justified by France, and at the same time took a step of which Gramont chose to say, that it was the one act done by the English government in favour of peace. They suggested to Bismarck that as the King of Prussia had consented to the acceptance by Prince Leopold of the Spanish crown, and had thereby, in a certain sense, become a party to the arrangement, so he might with perfect dignity communicate to the French government his consent to the withdrawal of the acceptance, if France waived her demand for an engagement covering the future. This suggestion Bismarck declined (July 15) to bring before the King, as he did not feel that he could recommend its acceptance. he had decided to hold France tight in the position in which her rulers had now planted her, we can understand why he could not recommend the English proposal to his master. Meanwhile the die was cast.

III

The King of Prussia was taking the waters at Ems. Thither Benedetti, the French ambassador to his court, under instructions followed him. The King with moderation and temper told him (July 11) he had just received a telegram that the answer of Prince Leopold would certainly reach him the next day, and he would then at once communicate it. Something (some say Bismarck) prevented the arrival of the courier for some hours beyond the time anticipated. On the morning of the 13th the King met Benedetti on the promenade, and asked him if he had anything new to say. The ambassador obeyed his orders, and told the King of the demand for assurances against a future candidature. The King at once refused this new and unexpected concession, but in parting from Benedetti said they would resume their conversation in the country and his minister to what, after the menace of Gramont and Ollivier on July 6, would be grave diplomatic defeat. He had resolved to retire if the incident should end in this shape, and the chief actor has himself described the strange sinister scene that averted his design. He invited Moltke and Roon to dine with him alone on July 13. In the midst of their conversation, 'I was informed,' he says, 'that a telegram from Ems in cipher, if I recollect rightly, of about 200 "groups" was being deciphered. When the copy was handed me it showed that Abeken had drawn up and signed the telegram at his Majesty's command, and I read it out to my guests, whose dejection was so great that they turned away from food and drink. On a repeated examination of the document I lingered upon the authorisation of his Majesty, which included a command, immediately to communicate Benedetti's fresh demand and its rejection to our ambassadors and to the press. I put a few questions to Moltke as to the extent of his confidence in the state of our preparations, especially as to the time they would still require in order to meet this sudden risk of war. He answered that if there was to be war he expected no advantage to us by deferring its outbreak. . . . Under the conviction that war could be avoided only at the cost of the honour of Prussia, I made use of the royal authorisation to publish the contents of the telegram; and in the presence of my two guests I reduced the telegram by striking out words, but without adding or altering, to the following form: "After the news of the renunciation of the hereditary Prince of Hohenzollern had been officially communicated to the imperial government of France by the royal government of Spain, the French ambassador at Ems further demanded of his Majesty the King that he would authorise him to telegraph to Paris that his Majesty the King bound himself for all future time never again to give his consent if the Hohenzollerns should renew their candidature. His Majesty the King thereupon decided not to receive the French ambassador again, and sent to tell him through the aidede-camp on duty that his Majesty had nothing further to communicate to the ambassador." The difference in the reached Paris. For a second time the 14th day of July was to be a date of doom in French history. The Emperor and his council deliberated on the grave question of calling out the reserves. The decisive step had been pressed by Marshal Lebœuf the night before without success. He now returned to the charge, and this time his proposal was resolved upon. It was about four o'clock. The marshal had hardly left the room before new scruples seized his colleagues. The discussion began over again, and misgivings revived. The Emperor showed himself downcast and worn out. Towards five o'clock somebody came to tell them it was absolutely necessary that ministers should present themselves before the Chambers. Gramont rose and told them that if they wished an accommodation, there was still one way, an appeal to Europe. The word congress was no sooner pronounced than the Emperor, seized by extraordinary emotion at the thought of salvation by his own favourite chimera, was stirred even to tears. An address to the Powers was instantly drawn up, and the council broke off. At six o'clock Lebœuf received a note from the Emperor, seeming to regret the decision to call out the reserves. On Lebœuf's demand the council was convoked for ten o'clock that night. In the interval news came that the Ems telegram had been communicated to foreign governments. As Bismarck had calculated, the affront of the telegram was aggravated by publicity. At ten o'clock the council met, and mobilisation was again considered. By eleven it was almost decided that mobilisation should be put off. At eleven o'clock a foreign office despatch arrived, and was read at the council. What was this despatch, is not yet known—perhaps from the French military agent at Berlin, with further news of Prussian preparations. It was of such a kind that it brought about an instant reaction. The orders for mobilisation were maintained 1

Count Benedetti again, but only to let him be informed through an aidede-camp: That his Majesty has now received from the Prince confirmation of the news which Benedetti had already received from Paris, and has nothing further to say to the ambassador. His Majesty leaves it to your excellency whether Benedetti's fresh demand and its rejection should not be at once communicated both to our ambassadors and to the press.' (ii. p. 96).

1 See Sorel, Hist. diplomatique de

¹ See Sorel, Hist. diplomatique de la guerre franco-allemande (1875), i. pp. 169-71.

Just as Bismarck said that England ought to have prevented the war, Frenchmen also said that we ought to have held the Emperor back. With what sanction could Mr. Gladstone have enforced peremptory counsel? Was France to be made to understand that England would go to war on the Prussian side? Short of war, what more could she have done? Lord Granville had told Gramont that he had never in despatch or conversation admitted that after the French had received satisfaction in substance, there was a case for a quarrel on pure form. The British cabinet and their ambassador in Paris had redoubled warning and remonstrance. If the Emperor and his advisers did not listen to the penetrating expostulations of Thiers, and to his vigorous and instructed analysis of the conditions of their case, why should they listen to Lord Granville? Nor was there time, for their precipitancy had kindled a conflagration before either England or any other Power had any chance of extinguishing the blaze.1

To Michel Chevalier Mr. Gladstone wrote a few days later:—

I cannot describe to you the sensation of pain, almost of horror, which has thrilled through this country from end to end at the outbreak of hostilities, the commencement of the work of blood. I suppose there was a time when England would have said, 'Let our neighbours, being, as they are, our rivals, waste their energies, their wealth, their precious irrevocable lives, in destroying one another: they will be the weaker, we shall be relatively the stronger.' But we have now unlearned that bad philosophy; and the war between France and Prussia saddens the whole face of society, and burdens every man with a personal grief. We do not pretend to be sufficient judges of the merits: I now mean by 'we' those who are in authority, and perhaps in a condition to judge least ill. We cannot divide praise and blame

1 'Il fallait donner à l'Europe le temps d'intervenir, ce qui n'empêchait pas que vos armements continuassent, et il nc fallait pas se hâter, de venir ici dans le moment où la susceptibilité française devait être la plus exigeante, des faits qui devaient causer une irritation dangereuse.... Ce n'est pas pour l'intérêt essentiel de la France, c'est par la faute du

cabinct que nous avons la guerre.'—
Thiers, in the Chamber, July 15, 1870.
For this line of contention he was called an 'unpatriotic trumpet of disaster,' and other names commonly bestowed on all men in all countries who venture to say that what chances for the hour to be a popular war is a blunder.

CHAPTER V

NEUTRALITY AND ANNEXATION

(1870)

THE immediate purpose with which Italians and Germans effected the great change in the European constitution was unity, not liberty. They constructed not securities but forces. Machiavelli's time had come.—Acton.

I'THE war is a grievous affair,' Mr. Gladstone said to Brand, , and adds much to our cares, for to maintain our neutrality in such a case as this, will be a most arduous task. On the face of the facts France is wrong, but as to personal trustworthiness the two moving spirits on the respective sides, Napoleon and Bismarck, are nearly on a par.' His individual activity was unsparing. He held almost daily conferences with Lord Granville at the foreign office; criticised and minuted despatches; contributed freely to the drafts. 'There has not, I think,' he wrote to Bright (Sept. 12), 'been a single day on which Granville and I have not been in anxious communication on the subject of the war.' When Lord Granville went to Walmer he wrote to Mr. Gladstone, 'I miss our discussions here over the despatches as they come in very much.' 'I hope I need not say that while you are laid up with gout at Walmer,' Mr. Gladstone wrote in October, 'I am most ready to start at a few hours' notice at any time of day or night, to join you upon any matter which you may find to require it. Indeed I could not properly or with comfort remain here upon any other terms. Details of this agitating time, with all its convulsions and readjustments, belong to the history of Europe. The part taken by Mr. Gladstone and his cabinet was for several months in pretty close harmony with the humour of the country. It will be enough for us to mark their action at decisive moments.

by time, if France, while keeping her powder dry, were to persevere in a prudent abstention. Bismarck believed that Moltke's preparations were more advanced than Napoleon's. It was his interest to strike before any French treaties of alliance were signed. The Spanish crown was an occasion. It might easily become a pretext for collision if either France or Germany thought the hour had come. If the Hohenzollern candidate withdrew, it was a diplomatic success for France and a humiliation to Germany; if not, a king from Prussia planted across the Pyrenees, after the aggrandizements of north German power in 1864 and 1866, was enough to make Richelieu, Mazarin, Louis xiv., Bonaparte, even Louis Philippe, turn in their graves.

On June 27, 1870, Lord Clarendon died, and on July 6 Lord Granville received the seals of the foreign department from the Queen at Windsor. The new chief had visited his office the day before, and the permanent under-secretary coming into his room to report, gave him the most remarkable assurance ever received by any secretary of state on first seating himself at his desk. Lord Granville told the story in the House of Lords on July 11, when the crash of the fiercest storm since Waterloo was close upon them:—

The able and experienced under-secretary, Mr. Hammond, at the foreign office told me, it being then three or four o'clock, that with the exception of the sad and painful subject about to be discussed this evening [the murders by brigands in Greece] he had never during his long experience known so great a lull in foreign affairs, and that he was not aware of any important question that I should have to deal with. At six o'clock that evening I received a telegram informing me of the choice that had been made by the provisional government of Spain of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and of his acceptance of the offer. went to Windsor the following day, and had the honour of receiving the seals of the foreign office from her Majesty. On my return I saw the Marquis de Lavalette, who informed me of the fact which I already knew, and in energetic terms remarked on the great indignity thus offered to France, and expressed the determination of the government of the Emperor not to permit government at Berlin 'effectually to discourage a project fraught with risks to the best interests of Spain.' The draft of this despatch was submitted by Lord Granville to Mr. Gladstone, who suggested a long addition afterwards incorporated in the text. The points of his addition were an appeal to the magnanimity of the King of Prussia; an injunction to say nothing to give ground for the supposition that England had any business to discuss the abstract right of Spain to choose her own sovereign; that the British government had not admitted Prince Leopold's acceptance of the throne to justify the immediate resort to arms threatened by France; but that the secrecy with which the affair had been conducted was a ground for just offence, and the withdrawal of the prince could alone repair it.1 Austria made energetic representations at Berlin to the same effect. In sending this addition to Lord Granville, Mr. Gladstone says (July 8), 'I am doubtful whether this despatch should go till it has been seen by the cabinet, indeed I think it should not, and probably you mean this. The Queen recollects being told something about this affair by Clarendon-without result -last year. I think Gramont exacts too much. It would never do for us to get up a combination of Powers in this difficult and slippery matter.'

Events for a week—one of the great critical weeks of the century—moved at a dizzy speed towards the abyss. Peace unfortunately hung upon the prudence of a band of statesmen in Paris, who have ever since, both in their own country and everywhere else, been a byword in history for blindness and folly. The game was delicate. Even in the low and broken estate into which the moral areopagus of Europe had fallen in these days, it was a disadvantage to figure as the aggressor. This disadvantage the French Empire heedlessly imposed upon itself. Of the diplomacy on the side of the government of France anterior to the war, Mr. Gladstone

before the cabinet, and was sent to Berlin by special messenger that evening. The only other cabinet meeting during this critical period was on July 14.

¹ The despatch is dated July 6 in the blue-book (C. 167, p. 3), but it was not sent that day, as the date of Mr. Gladstone's letter shows. No cabinet seems to have been held before July 9. The despatch was laid renounced the candidature, or that his father had renounced it on his behalf. The French ministers made up their minds that the defeat of Prussia must be more direct. Gramont told Lyons (July 12) that the French government was in a very embarrassing position. Public opinion was so much excited that it was doubtful whether the ministry would not be overthrown, if it went down to the Chamber and announced that it regarded the affair as finished, without having obtained some more complete satisfaction from Prussia. So the Emperor and his advisers flung themselves gratuitously under Bismarck's grinding wheels by a furtherdemand that not only should the candidature be withdrawn, but the King should pledge himself against its ever being at any time revived. Mr. Gladstone was not slow to see the fatal mischief of this new development.

Mr. Gladstone to Lord Granville.

July 12, 11.30 P.M.—I have seen, since Rothschild's telegram, that of Lyons, dated 7.55 P.M. It seems to me that Lyons should be supplied with an urgent instruction by telegram before the council of ministers to-morrow. France appealed to our support at the outset. She received it so far as the immediate object was concerned. It was immediately and energetically given. appears to have been named by the French minister in public inclusively with that of other Powers. Under these circumstances it is our duty to represent the immense responsibility which will rest upon France, if she does not at once accept as satisfactory and conclusive, the withdrawal of the candidature of Prince Leopold.

The substance of this note was despatched to Paris at 2.30 A.M. on the morning of July 13. It did not reach Lord Lyons till half-past nine, when the council of ministers had already been sitting for half an hour at St. Cloud. The telegram was hastily embodied in the form of a tolerably emphatic letter and sent by special messenger to St. Cloud, where it was placed in M. de Gramont's hand, at the table at which he and the other ministers were still sitting in council in the presence of the Emperor and the Empress.2 At the

¹ The Rothschild telegram was:—
The Prince has given up his candidature. The French are satisfied.

2 No. 39. Correspondence respecting thenegotiations preliminary to the war between France and Prussia, 1870.

On July 13 Gramont asked Lord Lyons whether he could count upon the good offices of England in obtaining the prohibition of any future candidature, at the same time giving him a written assurance that this would terminate the incident. Lord Lyons declined to commit himself, and referred home for instructions. The cabinet was hastily summoned for noon on the 14th. It decided that the demand could not be justified by France, and at the same time took a step of which Gramont chose to say, that it was the one act done by the English government in favour of peace. They suggested to Bismarck that as the King of Prussia had consented to the acceptance by Prince Leopold of the Spanish crown, and had thereby, in a certain sense, become a party to the arrangement, so he might with perfect dignity communicate to the French government his consent to the withdrawal of the acceptance, if France waived her demand for an engagement covering the future. This suggestion Bismarck declined (July 15) to bring before the King, as he did not feel that he could recommend its acceptance. he had decided to hold France tight in the position in which her rulers had now planted her, we can understand why he could not recommend the English proposal to his master. Meanwhile the die was cast.

III

The King of Prussia was taking the waters at Ems. Thither Benedetti, the French ambassador to his court, under instructions followed him. The King with moderation and temper told him (July 11) he had just received a telegram that the answer of Prince Leopold would certainly reach him the next day, and he would then at once communicate it. Something (some say Bismarck) prevented the arrival of the courier for some hours beyond the time anticipated. On the morning of the 13th the King met Benedetti on the promenade, and asked him if he had anything new to say. The ambassador obeyed his orders, and told the King of the demand for assurances against a future candidature. The King at once refused this new and unexpected concession, but in parting from Benedetti said they would resume their conversation in the country and his minister to what, after the menace of Gramont and Ollivier on July 6, would be grave diplomatic defeat. He had resolved to retire if the incident should end in this shape, and the chief actor has himself described the strange sinister scene that averted his design. He invited Moltke and Roon to dine with him alone on July 13. In the midst of their conversation, 'I was informed,' he says, 'that a telegram from Ems in cipher, if I recollect rightly, of about 200 "groups" was being deciphered. When the copy was handed me it showed that Abeken had drawn up and signed the telegram at his Majesty's command, and I read it out to my guests, whose dejection was so great that they turned away from food and drink. On a repeated examination of the document I lingered upon the authorisation of his Majesty, which included a command, immediately to communicate Benedetti's fresh demand and its rejection to our ambassadors and to the press. I put a few questions to Moltke as to the extent of his confidence in the state of our preparations, especially as to the time they would still require in order to meet this sudden risk of war. He answered that if there was to be war he expected no advantage to us by deferring its outbreak. . . . Under the conviction that war could be avoided only at the cost of the honour of Prussia, I made use of the royal authorisation to publish the contents of the telegram; and in the presence of my two guests I reduced the telegram by striking out words, but without adding or altering, to the following form: "After the news of the renunciation of the hereditary Prince of Hohenzollern had been officially communicated to the imperial government of France by the royal government of Spain, the French ambassador at Ems further demanded of his Majesty the King that he would authorise him to telegraph to Paris that his Majesty the King bound himself for all future time never again to give his consent if the Hohenzollerns should renew their candidature. His Majesty the King thereupon decided not to receive the French ambassador again, and sent to tell him through the aidede-camp on duty that his Majesty had nothing further to communicate to the ambassador." The difference in the reached Paris. For a second time the 14th day of July was to be a date of doom in French history. The Emperor and his council deliberated on the grave question of calling out the reserves. The decisive step had been pressed by Marshal Lebœuf the night before without success. He now returned to the charge, and this time his proposal was resolved upon. It was about four o'clock. The marshal had hardly left the room before new scruples seized his colleagues. The discussion began over again, and misgivings revived. The Emperor showed himself downcast and worn out. Towards five o'clock somebody came to tell them it was absolutely necessary that ministers should present themselves before the Chambers. Gramont rose and told them that if they wished an accommodation, there was still one way, an appeal to Europe. The word congress was no sooner pronounced than the Emperor, seized by extraordinary emotion at the thought of salvation by his own favourite chimera, was stirred even to tears. An address to the Powers was instantly drawn up, and the council broke off. At six o'clock Lebœuf received a note from the Emperor, seeming to regret the decision to call out the reserves. On Lebœuf's demand the council was convoked for ten o'clock that night. In the interval news came that the Ems telegram had been communicated to foreign governments. As Bismarck had calculated, the affront of the telegram was aggravated by publicity. At ten o'clock the council met, and mobilisation was again considered. By eleven it was almost decided that mobilisation should be put off. At eleven o'clock a foreign office despatch arrived, and was read at the council. What was this despatch, is not yet known-perhaps from the French military agent at Berlin, with further news of Prussian preparations. It was of such a kind that it brought about an instant reaction. The orders for mobilisation were maintained 1

Count Benedetti again, but only to let him be informed through an aidede-camp: That his Majesty has now received from the Prince confirmation of the news which Benedetti had already received from Paris, and has nothing further to say to the ambassador. His Majesty leaves it to your excellency whether Benedetti's fresh demand and its rejection should not be at once communicated both to our ambassadors and to the press.' (ii. p. 96).

1 See Sorel, Hist. diplomatique de

¹ See Sorel, Hist. diplomatique de la guerre franco-allemande (1875), i. pp. 169-71.

Just as Bismarck said that England ought to have prevented the war, Frenchmen also said that we ought to have held the Emperor back. With what sanction could Mr. Gladstone have enforced peremptory counsel? Was France to be made to understand that England would go to war on the Prussian side? Short of war, what more could she have done? Lord Granville had told Gramont that he had never in despatch or conversation admitted that after the French had received satisfaction in substance, there was a case for a quarrel on pure form. The British cabinet and their ambassador in Paris had redoubled warning and remonstrance. If the Emperor and his advisers did not listen to the penetrating expostulations of Thiers, and to his vigorous and instructed analysis of the conditions of their case, why should they listen to Lord Granville? Nor was there time, for their precipitancy had kindled a conflagration before either England or any other Power had any chance of extinguishing the blaze.1

To Michel Chevalier Mr. Gladstone wrote a few days later:—

I cannot describe to you the sensation of pain, almost of horror, which has thrilled through this country from end to end at the outbreak of hostilities, the commencement of the work of blood. I suppose there was a time when England would have said, 'Let our neighbours, being, as they are, our rivals, waste their energies, their wealth, their precious irrevocable lives, in destroying one another: they will be the weaker, we shall be relatively the stronger.' But we have now unlearned that bad philosophy; and the war between France and Prussia saddens the whole face of society, and burdens every man with a personal grief. We do not pretend to be sufficient judges of the merits: I now mean by 'we' those who are in authority, and perhaps in a condition to judge least ill. We cannot divide praise and blame

1 'Il fallait donner à l'Europe le temps d'intervenir, ce qui n'empêchait pas que vos armements continuassent, et il nc fallait pas se hâter, de venir ici dans le moment où la susceptibilité française devait être la plus exigeante, des faits qui devaient causer une irritation dangereuse.... Ce n'est pas pour l'intérêt essentiel de la France, c'est par la faute du

cabinct que nous avons la guerre.'—
Thiers, in the Chamber, July 15, 1870.
For this line of contention he was called an 'unpatriotic trumpet of disaster,' and other names commonly bestowed on all men in all countries who venture to say that what chances for the hour to be a popular war is a blunder.

CHAPTER V

NEUTRALITY AND ANNEXATION

(1870)

THE immediate purpose with which Italians and Germans effected the great change in the European constitution was unity, not liberty. They constructed not securities but forces. Machiavelli's time had come.—Acton.

I'THE war is a grievous affair,' Mr. Gladstone said to Brand, , and adds much to our cares, for to maintain our neutrality in such a case as this, will be a most arduous task. On the face of the facts France is wrong, but as to personal trustworthiness the two moving spirits on the respective sides, Napoleon and Bismarck, are nearly on a par.' His individual activity was unsparing. He held almost daily conferences with Lord Granville at the foreign office; criticised and minuted despatches; contributed freely to the drafts. 'There has not, I think,' he wrote to Bright (Sept. 12), 'been a single day on which Granville and I have not been in anxious communication on the subject of the war.' When Lord Granville went to Walmer he wrote to Mr. Gladstone, 'I miss our discussions here over the despatches as they come in very much.' 'I hope I need not say that while you are laid up with gout at Walmer,' Mr. Gladstone wrote in October, 'I am most ready to start at a few hours' notice at any time of day or night, to join you upon any matter which you may find to require it. Indeed I could not properly or with comfort remain here upon any other terms. Details of this agitating time, with all its convulsions and readjustments, belong to the history of Europe. The part taken by Mr. Gladstone and his cabinet was for several months in pretty close harmony with the humour of the country. It will be enough for us to mark their action at decisive moments.